I. Jonah's disobedience (i). He was bidden to go to Nineveh and cry against it. But he desired the destruction of the city, probably because its punishment would humble an enemy of Israel, and he feared lest it should repent at his message and be spared to the destruction of his nation. Accordingly he took ship at Joppa to flee to Tarshish. A great storm arose. The ship was in danger. At length the sailors cast lots to ascertain on whose account the storm had been sent. The lot fell upon Jonah. He told them that he was a worshiper of the God of heaven who had made the sea and the dry land, and that, if they would cast him overboard, the sea would become calm. They reluctantly obeyed. The sea became quiet: and the prophet, who had disappeared in the depths, was swallowed by a great fish which the Lord had prepared. II. Jonah's prayer (ii). Surprised at finding himself alive in the midst of the sea, the prophet gave thanks to God for his present escape from death and gratefully expressed the hope of ultimate deliverance. The fish at length vomited him upon the dry land. III. Jonah's message and its results (iii, iv). Bidden a second time to go to Nineveh, he obeyed and delivered his message. The Ninevites publicly repented and God spared the city. At this Jonah was displeased; not that his prophecy had been nullified by the repentance of the people, for he and his hearers expected that it would be (iii. 9; iv. 2), but probably because he felt that the doom of his own country was sealed. But by the withering of a gourd the Lord taught him the lesson of divine compassion on man and beast generally, irrespective of man's relation to the church.

The motive that led Jonah to flee was probably a narrow and mistaken patriotism. He feared that Nineveh would repent and that God in his mercy would spare the city. Jonah wished Nineveh to perish (iv. 2, 4, 11); for it was a powerful foe of Israel and, if it were not destroyed, the doom of Israel was sealed.

The purpose of the book is primarily to teach that God's purposes of grace are not limited to the children of Abraham, but the gentiles can receive mercy while still outside the pale of Israel's law. But besides this great lesson the book of Jonah affords illustrations of truth, which from their nature may perhaps even be regarded as types teaching truth.

1. Nineveh repented at the preaching of one prophet; whereas Israel repented not, although many prophets were sent to it (cp. Mat. xii. 41). This seems to be a type, to be related to and look forward to a general truth, that the gentiles yield a readier acquiescence to the doctrines of God than Israel had done: acquiescing not more readily to the moral law indeed, but to the revelation of God as a whole; for example, to his method of salvation as outlined in Hosea xiv. (cp. Is. ii 2-4 with 5)

2 Jonah, an Israelite and God's servant sent to preach to the gentiles, is an evidence of God's will that the people of God's kingdom shall lead the gentiles to repentance and to God. Jonah was not the only Israelite in whom this truth was exemplified. Elijah was sent to a woman of Zarephath (1 Kin xvii), Elisha cured Naaman the Syrian (2 Kin v.), Christ talked to a woman of Samaria about the things of God and healed the daughter of a Syrophenician woman (Mark vii, John iv)

3 Jonah, an Israelite and God's servant fleeing from duty, is cast into the sea, but is afterwards delivered in order that he may fulfil his mission. This illustrates the prophetic doctrine that the children of Israel, untrue to their assigned task, shall be cast forth from their native land; but a remnant, chiefly of the southern kingdom, shall be saved to fulfil Israel's mission to the world (Is. xlii. 1-4, xlix 1-13, cp. ii. 2-4; xi 10).

4. Jonah, an Israelite and God's servant cast into the depths of Sheol and yet brought up alive out of the pit (Jon ii 2, 6), illustrates and probably portended the death for sins not his own, and the burial and the resurrection of the Messiah, the representative Israelite and perfect servant of the Lord (Mat xii. 40).

It has been urged that the book of Jonah nowhere claims to have been written by that prophet. But the title (i. 1) is like the title of Hosea, Joel, Micah, Zephaniah, Haggai, and Zechariah, books of which the authorship is not disputed. It is urged further that the book was written long after Jonah's time, because 1. In the prayer ascribed to him are some quotations from late psalms (ii. 3 with Ps. xlii 7; 5 with Ps lxix 1; 9 with Ps. l 14). But the psalms may equally well contain quotations from Jonah. 2. The language contains Aramaic elements and grammatical constructions which are found in the latest books. But the prophet Jonah belonged to the northern kingdom, and the linguistic features of the book resemble those in early literature of the north; for example, the song of Deborah, the narratives of Elijah and Elisha, and the prophecies of Hosea. The word ta'am, classed as Aramaic in meaning, is the Assyrian word for a royal command, and is so used in the book of Jonah in the mouth of the Assyrian king. 3. The failure to give the name of the Assyrian king indicates that it was unknown to the author. But the reference is merely to the ruler as such; and the king of Nineveh is spoken of just as are the king of the children of Ammon (Judg xi 12, 13), the king of Moab (1 Sam. xxii. 3), the king of Edom (2 Kin. iii. 9, 12), the king of Assyria (xxiii 29; 2 Chron. xxxiii. 11), the king of Damascus (2 Chron. xxiv 23, though fully known, cp 2 Kin. xii 17, 18), whose personal names did not require mention. Ordinarily the Hebrews spoke of the king who ruled at Nineveh as the king of Assyria, but here he is called the king of Nineveh. So they spoke of Sihon as the king of the Amorites (Num. xxi 21, 29, Deut i 4; ii 2; iv. 46), but also as the king of Heshbon (Deut ii 26, Josh. xii. 5, xiii 27), where he resided; and Benhadad they called the king of Syria (1 Kin. xx. 1), but also the king of Damascus (2 Chron. xxiv 23), and Ahab they entitled the king of Israel, but also the king of Samaria (1 Kin xxi 1, R. V.) The prophecy may be dated before or shortly after the close of the reign of Jeroboam II (2 Kin. xiv 25). It perhaps belongs chronologically after Amos (Amos i 1) and probably before the vigorous reign of Tiglath-pileser over Assyria, which began in 745 B. C.

The narrative has been variously regarded as myth, legend, parable, history. The chief interpretations are—1. The allegorical or parabolical. This conception of the prophecy is much in vogue, for it avoids the miracle or, if no miracle was involved in the escape of Jonah, the extraordinary nature of the event. It interprets Jonah as a type of Israel fleeing from the duty imposed on the nation to bear witness to the world for God. The sea typifies, as frequently, the raging nations; the sleep of Jonah represents Israel's sloth to fulfil its mission to the gentiles, for which it is delivered into captivity to the world, but yet is preserved alive; having been disciplined, it is ready to engage in its appointed mission, but it is still narrow and needs to be taught the wideness of God's mercy. In support of this view it is pointed out that Jeremiah speaks of Nebuchadnezzar under the figure of a dragon swallowing up Israel, but compelled to disgorge his prey (li. 34), and Hosea represents the exile of Israel as lasting three days (vi 2). If, however, there was any borrowing at all, Jeremiah is as likely to have borrowed from Jonah as vice versa. Hosea was a contemporary prophet with Jonah in the northern kingdom, and might draw a lesson from Jonah's experience, if there is any interdependence of Hos. vi 2 and Jon i. 17. 2. The historical. The miraculous element is magnified or minimized according to individual judgment and knowledge. The conception of the narrative as historical has these supports: (1) The form of the book is historical and has left this impression on its readers. (2) Jonah himself was unquestionably a historical personage. (3) While it is conceivable that the words of Christ regarding Jonah in the belly of the fish and at Nineveh do not imply his belief in the events, it is highly probable that they do, especially since Jonah was a real person (Mat. xii. 39, 40; Luke xi. 29, 30). (4) The narrative was regarded by the Jews as historical (Antiq. ix 10, 2). (5) The repentance of the Ninevites is credible. They were given to superstition; national distress and a low state of the empire would dispose them to listen to a warning from the gods, the arrival from a foreign country of a strange prophet, of whose peculiar history they may have heard, was calculated to affect them; the Spirit of God worketh when and where he will. It is urged, indeed, against the historical character of the book that (a) permanent conversion of the Ninevites did not take place. Certainly it did not, and it is nowhere asserted that it did. The statement merely is that the men of that generation repented under the lead of their king. So the men of Judah in Hezekiah's and Josiah's reigns sanctified themselves under the leadership of those kings. (b) Against the historical character of the book is also urged the size ascribed to Nineveh (in. 3; iv. 11). But see NINEVEH. (c) Also the rapid growth of the gourd or ricinus has been regarded with suspicion (iv 10). But was this growth miraculous or extraordinary? Verse 10 is rendered by the Targum, "which this night was, and in another night perished." Probably the words describe merely the ephemeral character of the plant. From the narrative itself, verses 6-8, it does not appear that the growth was supernaturally rapid (cp Ps xc 6; Mat vi. 30). (d) It is further urged that the book was scarcely regarded as a historical narrative when the Hebrew canon was arranged, or it would have been placed among the historical, and not among the prophetic, books. But the recorded events are typical and prophetic, like the events narrated in Zech. vi. 9-15. And, what is more, the Hebrew canon does not make the distinction between historical and prophetic books. The prose writings of official prophets are grouped by themselves. Omitting Ruth, the books from Joshua to 2 Kings inclusive are classed as prophetic. This collection forms continuous history, and it is immediately followed by a second group denominated prophetic, and containing all the remaining books which bear the name of an official prophet. Here Jonah rightly belongs, and here the book has been placed. See CANON.

2. Father of Simon Peter (Mat xvi 17; John i. 42; xxi. 15). In R V of John Simon's father is called John on the authority of manuscripts. See BAR-JONAH.

Jon'a-than [Jehovah has given].

1. A Levite, son or remoter descendant of Gershom, son of Moses (Judg. xviii 30, R. V.). He was doubtless the Levite who had sojourned at Bethlehem-judah, but had left that town to seek another residence, and, when passing through Ephraim, was hired by Micah to officiate as priest before an image of Jehovah (xvii. 7-13). When the Danites were on their way to seek new settlements in the north of Palestine, they robbed Micah of his image, and persuaded his mercenary priest to go with them, tempting his ambition by promising that he should be the priest, not of a single household, but of a tribe. They kept their word, and Jonathan became the first of a line of priests who worshipped at the shrine of the stolen idol all the time that the tabernacle was in Shiloh, till the captivity of the land or district (Judg xviii 3-6, 14-31). To avoid the dishonor accruing to Moses from the idolatry of his descendant, a nun was inserted in the Hebrew word for Moses, which changed it into Manasseh (30, A. V). The inserted letter was not incorporated into the text, but was suspended above the line.

2. Eldest son of king Saul (1 Sam xiv 49; cp. xx 31). When first mentioned, after his father had become king, he is in command of 1000 men, while Saul leads other 2000. Jonathan smote the Philistine garrison or, rather, deputy at Geba (1 Sam. xiii 3). Shortly afterwards the young prince, attended only by his armor-bearer, climbed up a precipice to the Philistine camp overlooking the pass of Michmash, and falling upon the first Philistines he met, created a panic in their army, which became so great that in their fright the soldiers turned their arms against each other (xiv 1-23). The same day Saul had almost put his heroic son to death for having eaten honey in a wood, being ignorant that the king had pronounced a rash imprecation against any one who should partake of food that day. But the people interferred, and would not allow Jonathan's life to be sacrificed (24-46). When David, then a young man and known to but few, achieved his great victory over Goliath, Jonathan, who was of a singularly unselfish nature, conceived a warm friendship for the hero (xviii. 1), and would not give it up, even when Saul pointed out that his friend might one day supersede him on the throne. During Saul's persecution of David, Jonathan communicated with his youthful associate, giving him most valuable intelligence of the king's feelings and movements, till at length the tyrant, provoked by what he considered his unfaithful conduct, threw a javelin at him, as he had more than once done at David (xviii.-xx.). On this last occasion Jonathan was seeking to discover whether a reconciliation of Saul with David was possible. David was lying in concealment in the fields waiting for word. The two friends anticipated the difficulty Jonathan might have in conveying this information to David, especially in case Saul should be evilly minded toward the son of Jesse, for Jonathan was known to favor David, and Saul and the party opposed to David would watch Jonathan to prevent him from communicating with David and a second time frustrating their plans. Accordingly, to disarm suspicion, Jonathan arranged to go out with company, and as though to hunt, and by means of arrows to give a sign to David. He did so, and then, finding that suspicion had been allayed and that he was no longer observed, he sent the boy back to the town with the bow and arrows, and remained for a final interview with David. The two friends met once after this in the wood of Ziph (1 Sam xxiii 16-18). Jonathan was killed, with two of his brothers and their father, at the battle of Gilboa, and his bones, like theirs, were affixed to the wall of Beth-shean, till the men of Jabesh-gilead removed them and gave them honorable burial (xxxii 1, 11-13, 1 Chron x. 2, 8-12). David deeply lamented his death (2 Sam i 17-27). Jonathan left one son, called Mephibosheth and Merib-baal, who was lame (2 Sam. iv. 4). David showed him kindness for Jonathan's sake, and the line of his descendants is traceable for several generations in increasing numbers, as if all danger of its extinction had passed away (2 Sam ix 1-13; 1 Chron. viii. 33-40; ix. 39-44).

3 Uncle of king David. He was a counselor, a man of understanding, and a scribe (1 Chron. xxvii. 32). Some expositors believe that in this passage the Hebrew word for uncle is used in a general sense for relation, and they identify this counselor with David's nephew Jonathan (R V, margin).

4 Son of the high priest Abiathar. He was one of two young men who concealed themselves at En-rogel, near Jerusalem, during Absalom's rebellion, and sent David information of everything passing in the city (2 Sam. xv 36; xvii. 15-22). When Adonijah attempted to usurp the throne and was celebrating a feast, Jonathan brought the news that Solomon had been proclaimed king, a piece of intelligence which led to the breaking up of the assemblage (1 Kin i 41-49).

5 A son of David's brother Shimeah, and distinguished as the slayer of one of the gigantic men of Gath (2 Sam xxi 21, 22).

6. One of David's mighty men, son of Shagebor, rather, Shammah the Hararite (1 Chron. xi. 34; cp. 2 Sam xxiii. 11). The text of 2 Sam. xxiii 32, 33 is to be emended by comparison with Chronicles.

7. An official under David (1 Chron. xxvii 25). See JEHONATHAN.

8 A son of Kareah. After the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, he placed himself under the protection of Gedaliah (Jer. xl. 8). The name is not found in the corresponding passage (2 Kin. xxv 23). Perhaps it accidentally dropped out of Kings or erroneously crept into the text of Jeremiah.

9 A scribe, in whose house Jeremiah was imprisoned (Jer. xxxvii 15, 20).

10 A son of Jada (1 Chron ii. 32).

11 A descendant of Adin (Ezra viii 6).

12 An opponent of Ezra's proposal that foreign wives should be put away (Ezra x. 15, R V).

13 A Levite of the lineage of Asaph (Neh xii 35, cp xi 15, 17).

14 A priest, head of a father's house in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh xii 14).

15 A high priest, son of Joiada (Neh xii 11). See JOHANAN 11.

16 Youngest son of the priest Mattathias (1 Mac ii. 5). When his brother Judas Maccabæus was slain in battle in 160 B. C., Jonathan was chosen his successor (ix. 23-31).

The forces at his disposal were, however, too few for offensive operations against the Syrians, and he withdrew into the wilderness of Tekoa (33). He was surnamed Apphus (ii 5), which is thought to mean Dissembler, and to have been given him on account of his first exploit, in which he laid an ambush for the children of Jambri and slew them because they had killed his brother John (ix 37-41). On a Sabbath day in 157 B. C. he repulsed an attack of the Syrians under Bacchides on the Jordan, probably on the eastern bank; but after the victory he and his followers leaped into the river and swam to the other side (ix 43-48), where they remained (54), outwitting the attempts which were made to assassinate their leader (60, 61). Jonathan and Simon afterwards fortified themselves at Bethbasi in the wilderness, probably of Tekoa; and when Bacchides besieged the fortress, Jonathan left Simon to defend the place, while he himself ravaged the surrounding country (62, 66). Bacchides was so straitened that he made peace with Jonathan and withdrew from Judæa (67-72). Jonathan took up his residence at Michmash, and began to judge the people (73). When Alexander Balas revolted against Demetrius, king of Syria, the latter hastened to secure Jonathan as an ally, and gave him authority to gather troops. The Syrians who were still in the strongholds of Judæa fled, and Jonathan entered Jerusalem in 152 B. C. (x. 1-14). Alexander, equally desirous to have the support of Jonathan, appointed him high priest of the Jews and king's friend, and Jonathan put on the pontifical robes at the feast of tabernacles in 152 B. C. (15-21). Upon hearing of this event, Demetrius hastened to make further concessions to the Jews (22-45). Jonathan, however, gave no credence to the words of Demetrius; and Alexander, when he secured the throne of Syria in 150 B. C. appointed him governor of Judæa (46, 59-66). In 148-7 B. C. Demetrius II. raised the standard of revolt against Alexander. Demetrius was assisted by Apollonius, who sent a threatening message to Jonathan. Jonathan seized Joppa and defeated Apollonius in the neighboring plain (67-87). When Alexander's father-in-law, Ptolemy, intervened in the war, Jonathan showed his friendship and accompanied him to the borders of Syria (xi 1-7). Ptolemy proved treacherous to Alexander and placed Demetrius on the throne. Jonathan was able to secure the friendship of the new king, and rendered him great service by a contingent of 3000 Jewish soldiers, who quelled an insurrection against Demetrius in Antioch. Demetrius proved false, and Jonathan sided with the young Antiochus and fought successfully with the troops of Demetrius near Kedesh in Galilee. Jonathan now sought the aid of the Romans and Spartans (xii 1, 2); he also undertook aggressive operations against Demetrius, and defeated his troops and allies in the vicinity of Hamath (24-35). But Tryphon, who had championed the cause of the young Antiochus, now lifted up his hand against his master and sought to destroy Jonathan also. He persuaded the Jewish leader to come with but a small body-guard to Ptolemais. When Jonathan entered, the gates of the city were closed, Jonathan's escort was put to the sword, he himself was seized and kept for a time a prisoner and finally slain in Gilead in 143 B C (39-48; xiii 12-23). The bones of Jonathan were recovered and buried in the family sepulcher at Modin (25-27).

17. A general who, at the command of Simon Maccabæus, took possession of Joppa. He was a son of Absalom (1 Mac xiii 11).

Jop'pa, in A V. once Japho (Josh xix 46), and so twice on margin of R V. of O T., this being the Hebrew form, while Joppa is derived from the Greek [beauty].

A town in Palestine which was assigned to Dan (Josh. xix. 46). It was the seaport of Jerusalem, to which the wood cut down in Lebanon for the building of Solomon's temple was floated from Tyre (2 Chron ii. 16). Jonah embarked at Joppa in a ship about to sail to Tarshish, when he made his vain attempt to escape from Jehovah (Jon. i. 3). When the temple was rebuilt, after the return from Babylon under Zerubbabel and Jeshua, rifts of cedar trees were again floated from Tyre to Joppa (Ezra iii. 7, R. V.). The Christian woman Tabitha lived her charitable life and died at Joppa and was raised from the dead by Peter (Acts ix. 36-42). The miracle resulted in many converts to Christianity being made in the place. The apostle remained with them for some time, lodging in the house of one Simon a tanner (43; x 5, 6); and it was to Joppa that the servants of Cornelius came to invite Peter to Cæsarea (7-48). Joppa still flourishes. It is called by the Arabs Yāfa, and by the English Jaffa. A ledge of rocks runs out from the promontory on which the houses stand, and makes a harbor which, though small and dangerous, is still the only one on the coast for many miles north and south. The harbor is surrounded by rocks, with two entrances, the most northerly one rendered dangerous by sandbanks, the other, which is only 10 feet wide, by its proximity to rocks. Only a few small vessels can find accommodation within its confined area. The town stands on a rocky hill of oblong form on successive platforms produced by strata reposing the one on the other. In the vicinity are fine gardens, watered by Persian water wheels, and containing orange, lemon, apricot, quince, and other fruit trees. It has various soap works, and tanneries still exist upon the seashore. It is a gate of entrance into Palestine for pilgrims, and is the terminus of a railway to Jerusalem. (See illustration, p 410.)

Jo'ram and Jehoram, the forms being interchangeable in Hebrew [Jehovah is high]

1 A son of Toi, king of Hamath, who was sent by his father to congratulate David on his victory over Hadadezer (2 Sam viii. 10). Called in 1 Chron xviii 10 Hadoram, which in this case probably means "the god Addu or Hadad is exalted"

2 A Levite, descended from Moses' son Eliezer (1 Chron. xxvi 25; cp xxiii. 15, 17)

3 Son of Ahab, king of Israel. On the death of his elder brother, Ahaziah, he succeeded to the throne 853 B C, and reigned till 842 B C. He put away the image of Baal which his father had made, but adhered to the calf worship instituted by Jeroboam. On the death of Ahab, Mesha, king of Moab, had rebelled and withheld tribute. To recover his dominion over Moab, Joram obtained the assistance of king Jehoshaphat of Judah, and of the Edomite ruler. As the confederates were marching around the southern portion of the Dead Sea, they were nearly perishing with thirst, but Elisha bade them dig trenches, and on the following morning water came rushing down the wady and filled the trenches. Not only did the water supply the needs of the Israelites, but, looking ruddy under the rays of the morning sun, was mistaken by the Moabites for blood; and, supposing that the Israelites had fallen out among themselves, they rushed to the spoil. Joram and his allies rose against them when they were thus off their guard, and put them to flight, and then overran Moab, but without being able permanently to reduce it to subjection (2 Kin. iii. 1-27); see MOABITE

Joppa, now Jaffa, from the South

STONE. Joram was without doubt the king to whom the king of Syria sent Naaman to be cured of his leprosy (v 1-27); and to whom Elisha made known every movement of the Syrian invaders, and who had them in his power at Samaria, and by Elisha's advice sent them home unmolested (vi 8-23); and who, during the famine, when Ben-hadad was besieging Samaria, vowed vengeance against Elisha for the distress (24-31; called in verse 32 the son of a murderer). His end was tragic. He was at Jezreel, seeking cure from wounds received at Ramoth-gilead, when a watchman announced the approach of Jehu mounting his chariot and accompanied by his nephew, the king of Judah, in another chariot, the two kings drove forth to meet Jehu. They came up to him at the field which Joram's mother had gotten for his father by having its owner, Naboth, slain. Jehu shot Joram through the heart with an arrow and, recalling a prophecy to mind, had the body thrown from the chariot into the field of Naboth (ix, 14-26). With Joram the dynasty of Omri ceased, and that of Jehu began.

4. One of the priests sent by Jehoshaphat to instruct the people (2 Chron. xvii 8).

5. Son of Jehoshaphat. From about 854 B. C. he was associated with his father in the government, and in 849 B. C., in the fifth year of Jehoram, king of Israel, the reins of government were transferred entirely to his hands (2 Kin. viii. 16; cp i 17; iii. 1). No sooner did he feel himself secure on his throne than he murdered all his brothers and some other princes of Judah (2 Chron. xxi. 1-4). He had for his wife a daughter of Ahab, who led him into gross forms of heathenism, as Jezebel had seduced Ahab (2 Kin. viii. 18; 2 Chron. xxi. 6, 11). As in other cases, his departure from Jehovah brought with it adversity. The Edomites rose in rebellion, and though he gained a victory over them, yet this did not prevent their achieving their independence. Libnah also revolted, and successfully (2 Kin. viii. 20-22; 2 Chron. xxi 8-10). Philistines and Arab marauders entered Judah and plundered the palace, carrying off the king's wives and children, with the single exception of Jehoahaz, or Ahaziah, the youngest boy (2 Chron. xxi. 16, 17; xxii. 1). A writing from the prophet Elijah was handed to the king, denouncing his apostasy and his wickedness, and threatening him with painful disease and death; see ELIJAH. He was soon afterwards seized with dysentery, which became chronic and continued for two years (2 Chron. xxi. 18, 19). During this sickness Ahaziah acted as regent (2 Kin. ix. 29 with viii. 25, 26). There was no pretense at lamentation when his death occurred. His sole reign, beginning in the fifth year of Jehoram of Israel, was eight years. He died in 842 B. C., leaving his one surviving son Ahaziah to ascend the throne (2 Kin. viii. 24; 2 Chron. xxi. 12-xxii. 1).

Jor'dan [descender].

The most important river in Palestine. It rises from various sources. The eastern source is at Banias, the ancient Cæsarea Philippi, where a copious stream, the Banias, issues from a cave in a lofty cliff. The central and largest source is at Tell el-Kâdi, probably the ancient Dan, where from two great springs the abundant Leddán takes its rise. The third source, the most northern and highest perennial one, is the fountain, below Hasbeiya, from which the river Hasbány flows. Thomson says that the Hasbány is the longest by 40 miles the Leddán much the largest, and the Banias the most beautiful. From the source of the river at Banias to the lake of the Huleh the distance is 12 miles; the junction of the Banias and the Leddán taking place about midway between these points, and the confluence with the Hasbány a fraction of a mile lower. The lake itself is 4 miles long. The Jordan, emerging from it at its southern side, next makes its way 10½ miles more to the sea of Galilee, which is 12½ miles long. After passing through this lake, it pursues a tortuous course, till it enters the Dead Sea, at a point 65 miles in a straight line from the southern part of the sea of Galilee. Including the two lakes, and taking no note of the windings, the river from Banias to the Dead Sea is 104 miles long. As far as is known, it stands absolutely alone among the rivers of the world in the fact that throughout the greater part of its course it runs below the level of the ocean. When it issues from the cave at Banias it is 1000 feet above the level of the Mediterranean. By the time it enters the lake of the Huleh it has fallen to within seven feet of sea level. At the sea of Galilee it is 682 feet below the sea level, and when entering the Dead Sea 1292 feet. It was appropriately named Jordan, the descender. The stream is tortuous also. Lieut. Lynch, of the American navy, who in 1848 led an expedition from the United States, sailed from the sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea. Lieut. Lynch wrote: "In a space of 60 miles of latitude and 4 miles of longitude the Jordan traverses at least 200 miles. . . . We have plunged down twenty-seven threatening rapids, besides a great many of lesser magnitude."

The biblical associations with the river proper attach mainly to the stretch from the sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea. The river was fringed, as it is now, with a thicket of trees and shrubs, principally tamarisks, oleanders, and willows, among which lions lurked (Jer. xlix. 19; Zech. xi. 3). The valley in its southern part, where the depression below sea level is greatest, is virtually a tropical country, and under irrigation produced crops of tropical luxuriance (War iv. 8, 3). On account of its fertility Lot, forgetful of moral considerations, chose it as the place of his residence (Gen. xiii. 8-13). The river was not bridged until Roman times, but was forded. The fords are frequent and easy in the upper stream and as far down as the mouth of the Jabbok, where Jacob crossed (xxxii. 10; xxxiii. 18). Below that point the river is rarely fordable, and then only at certain seasons of the year. The current of the river is so rapid near Jericho that the numerous pilgrims who go thither to bathe are always in danger, and not infrequently are swept away. For the Israelites to cross the Jordan at any time, and above all when the river was in flood, required the miracle or extraordinary providence of the checked waters (Josh iii 1-17; iv 1-24, Ps. cxiv. 3, 5). The fullness of the Jordan, with the overflow of its water over the banks immediate to its channel, during the time of harvest (March or April in that warm valley) is produced by the melting of the snow on mount Hermon (Josh iii 15). The fleeing Midianites, pursued by Gideon, crossed by the fords at and above the mouth of the Jabbok (Judg vii 24^{viii}. 4, 5). David, when fleeing from Absalom and on returning to his kingdom, crossed twice somewhere between Jericho and the Jabbok (2 Sam xvii 22, 24^{xix}. 15-18). Elijah and Elisha, amidst the wonderful events at the close of Elijah's career, crossed at Jericho (2 Kin ii. 5-8, 13-15). Naaman the Syrian, as directed by the prophet, washed seven times in the Jordan, somewhere in its upper reaches, either north or south of the sea of Galilee, and was cured of his leprosy (2 Kin v 14). John the Baptist administered the special rite which gave him his designation in the Jordan, and it was there that our Lord was baptized (Mat iii 6, 13-17).

Jo'rim.

An ancestor of Christ, who lived about 350 years after David (Luke iii. 29).

Jor'ke-am, in A. V. Jorkoam [perhaps, pallor or fear of the people, or possibly, stability, expansion].

A place peopled by members of the family of Hezion and house of Caleb (1 Chron. ii. 44).

Jos'a-bad. See JOZABAD.

Jos'a-phat. See JEHOSEPHAT.

Jo'se. See JESUS 2.

Jo'sech.

An ancestor of Christ, who probably lived after the exile (Luke iii. 26). The A. V., following a different reading, calls him Joseph.

Jos'e-dech. See JOZADAK.

Jo'seph [may he add]. The name has also the sound of a verb of different etymology, meaning "he taketh away;" and the Hebrew writer in Gen. xxx. 23, 24, following custom, plays upon the sound and upon both etymologies when he explains, not what the root of the word is, but the reason for bestowing the name.

1. The eleventh of Jacob's twelve sons, and the elder son of Rachel, who, when she gave him birth, said, "The Lord add to me another son," and therefore called his name Joseph (Gen xxx. 22-24). He was born in Paddan-aram, about six years before the return of Jacob to Canaan (25; cp. xxxi. 41), when Jacob was 90 or 91 years old. He was his father's favorite child, because he was the son of his old age and Rachel's child; and he made him a coat such as was worn by young people of the better class (xxxvii. 3). The father's favoritism aroused the envy of the elder brethren; and their ill-will was increased by two dreams which Joseph had, and which foreshadowed the time when his father, his mother, and his brethren should bow down and do him obeisance. When Joseph was seventeen years old (xxxvii 2), Jacob sent him to Shechem, where his brothers were feeding their flocks, to ask after their welfare. On reaching Shechem, he found that they had gone on to Dothan, and he followed them thither. As he was seen approaching, the brothers proposed to slay him and report to his father that a wild beast had devoured him. Reuben, however, prevailed upon them not to take Joseph's life, but to cast him alive into a pit, intending eventually to take the youth out and restore him to his father. In Reuben's absence a caravan of Ishmaelites, traveling on the great highway that led down into Egypt, drew near. To Midianite merchantmen of the company Joseph was sold. A kid of the goats being killed, his coat was dipped in the blood and the besmeared garment was sent to Jacob, who concluded that his son had been torn to pieces by some wild beast (Gen xxxvii 1-35). Meanwhile the slave dealers took Joseph down into Egypt, and sold him to Potiphar, the captain of Pharaoh's guard. The young slave's ability was soon discovered, and Potiphar gave him charge of all his house. But on false accusations he was committed to prison, where he was confined for years. There he so gained the confidence of the jailer that all the prisoners were committed to his charge. God enabled him to interpret prophetic dreams of the chief butler and the chief baker of Pharaoh, who were confined with him in prison, and his interpretation in each instance was found correct. Two years later Pharaoh dreamed two prophetic dreams, which no one could interpret, and the chief butler, who had been restored to his royal master's favor, remembered Joseph and told of the occurrences in the prison. Joseph was immediately sent for, and interpreted the dreams, both of which had the same meaning. Seven years of great plenty were to be succeeded by seven years of grievous famine. He ventured to recommend that some one should be appointed to collect the surplus produce during the seven years of plenty, and store it against the years of famine. Pharaoh approved the plan; and, having had evidence of the wisdom of Joseph (xli. 9-13, 25-36), he appointed him superintendent of the royal granaries and as such the head of a department of the state and one of the officials next in rank to the king (xli. 39-44). Joseph was now thirty years of age (xli. 46). He had been chastened and humbled by the sufferings of thirteen years. Pharaoh gave him Asenath, daughter of a priestly family at On, to wife; and before the famine began two sons were born to him, Manasseh and Ephraim (xli 50-52). The famine came as predicted (see NILE), and affected all the known world, especially the western part of it around the Mediterranean (xli. 54, 56, 57; see WORLD). In Egypt, however, there was a store of food, and Joseph's brothers went thither to buy grain. They did not recognize Joseph, but he knew them; and as they did obeisance to him, he saw that the dreams which brought him into such trouble had come to be verified. After testing their character in various ways, on their second visit he revealed himself to them, forgave them the wrong they had done him, and persuaded them and their father to settle in Egypt. Pharaoh warmly welcomed them. The king who acted thus kindly has long been believed to have been Apepi II or Apophis (Eusebius). At any rate, he was doubtless of the Hyksos or Shepherd dynasty, and being himself a Semite, was the more ready to welcome men of a race identical with his own. Joseph died at the age of 110 years, and his body was embalmed and put in a coffin in Egypt; but he had left strict injunctions that when the exodus took place his remains should be removed to Canaan (Gen xli-1.; Heb. xi. 22). His wishes were carried out; and his remains were ultimately buried near Shechem, in the very center of the promised land (Ex. xiii. 19; Josh xxiv 32).

The particulars of Joseph's life, which involve Egyptian customs, are borne out by the monuments and the papyri. It is known, for instance, from the Rosetta stone that it was the habit of the king to release prisoners at his birthday feast and on other great occasions. References to magicians and soothsayers are frequent, and great stress is laid on dreams as messages from the gods. When Joseph was sent for in the prison, although there is express mention of haste, yet he stayed to shave himself and put on clean raiment (Gen. xli 14). Shaving was particularly practiced and among the priests was a religious rite. The term "Lord over the whole land" has been found but once (on a monument in the museum of Turin), but the investiture of an official of high rank is frequently depicted and agrees with the description in Genesis, the signet ring, the linen vesture, and the chain about the neck being prominent. The phrase, also, "According unto thy word [mouth] shall all my people be ruled" is emphasized by the fact that the hieroglyph for ruler is a mouth. An economic change, whereby the land came to be owned entirely by the king and the priests, took place some time before the rise of the New Empire; see EGYPT II. 5.

There is reference to Egyptian conceptions of propriety in the separate setting of bread for Joseph. for his brethren, and for the Egyptians present (Gen. xliii. 32). Joseph ate by himself, because he was a man of highest rank and a member of the priestly class, which kept apart from the laity. The Egyptians ate by themselves, for Egyptians held aloof from foreigners; the priests ate and drank nothing that was imported (Porphery iv. 7), and the people generally considered it an abomination to use the eating utensils of the Greeks (Herod i. 41), and ostracized shepherds, swineherds, and cowherds, even when native Egyptians, because the occupation of tending cattle was incompatible with the refinement and cleanliness demanded by Egyptian standards (Gen. xlv. 34, Herod ii. 47; cp. 164). This objection to herdsmen was probably the cause of Joseph's settling his kindred in the land of Goshen, where they would not come in contact with the natives of the land.

Jacob-el and Joseph-el are names of places in Palestine conquered by Thothmes III., the Egyptian warrior-king, long after the descent of Jacob and his sons into Egypt and about a century before the exodus. It is doubtful whether they stand in any relation to the patriarch Jacob and his son Joseph. They are names like Jiphthah-el or Iphthah-el, a valley in the territory of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 14), may mean God doth supplant and God doth take away, and they were in use in Babylonia as personal names.

An Egyptian story, known as 'the Tale of the Two Brothers, recounts the temptation of a young man in the home of his elder brother, similar to the experience of Joseph in the house of Potiphar (Gen. xxxix.). The younger brother is saved from the wrath of the elder by the interposition of the sun-god, who makes a river full of crocodiles to flow as a barrier between the two. The further adventures of the twain, at length reconciled to each other, are equally fabulous. The story was transcribed in the reign of Seti II., of the nineteenth dynasty, centuries after the time of Joseph; but when the tale was composed is not known. Such incidents were not uncommon, and were introduced into story (Homer, Iliad vi. 155 seq.).

The two tribes of Manasseh and Ephraim descended from Joseph's two sons. The blessings pronounced on Joseph by the dying Jacob were designed for these tribes as well as for Joseph himself (Gen. xlviii. 8-22; xlix. 22-26). In Ps lxxx. 1 Joseph is a poetic designation of the tribes of Manasseh and Ephraim.

2. Father of the spy from the tribe of Issachar (Num. xiii. 7).

3. A son of Asaph and head of a course of musicians in the reign of David (1 Chron. xxv. 2, 9).

4. An ancestor of Christ, who lived between the time of David and the exile (Luke iii. 30).

5. A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 42).

6. A priest, head of the family of Shebaniah in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. xii. 14).

7. An ancestor of Christ who lived after the exile (Luke iii. 26, in R. V. Joseph).

8. Son of Mattathias, in the ancestry of Christ (Luke iii. 24, 25).

9. Son of Zacharias. When Judas Macchabæus sent Simon to aid the Jews in Galilee and himself went to fight in Gilead, he left Joseph and Azarias in charge of the forces in Judæa. They engaged in battle, contrary to their orders, and were defeated (1 Mac. v. 18, 55-62).

10. The husband of Mary, the mother of Jesus (Mat. i. 16; Luke iii. 23). For his ancestry see GENEALOGY. When Mary was found with child before marriage, Joseph was minded to put her away without public exposure, for he was a just man. But an angel informed him in a dream that the child to be born had been miraculously conceived by the Holy Spirit. Now he had no hesitation in carrying out his contract with her, and he made her his wife (Mat. i. 18-25). Being a descendant of David, he had to go to Bethlehem, the early home of his ancestors, for enrollment, according to the decree of the emperor Augustus, and was there with Mary when Jesus was born (Luke i. 4, 16). He was with Mary when, at the presentation of Jesus in the temple, Simeon and Anna gave forth their prophetic utterances (33). Warned by an angel in a dream that Herod plotted the murder of the child, Joseph conducted the flight into Egypt (Mat. ii. 13, 19). He returned to Nazareth when Herod was dead (22, 23). He was accustomed to go with Mary annually to the passover at Jerusalem, and he took Jesus also to the feast when our Lord was twelve years old (Luke ii. 43), and he also safely reached Nazareth on the return journey (51). He was a carpenter (Mat. xiii. 55), and was assisted in his work by the young man Jesus (Mark vi. 3). Apparently Joseph was alive when Jesus' ministry had well begun (Mat. xiii. 55), but as we do not hear of him in connection with the crucifixion, it may be inferred that he died previously to that event. This was the reason why Jesus, when on the cross, commended Mary to the kindness of the apostle John, which he would scarcely have done had her natural guardian still been alive (John xix. 26, 27).

11. The same as Joses 1 (Mat. xiii. 55, R. V.). See BRETHREN OF THE LORD.

12. A Jew of Arimathea, a member of the sanhedrin, a counselor of honorable estate, who looked for the kingdom of God (Mark xv. 43). He had not consented to the resolution of the sanhedrin to put Jesus to death, for he was a disciple of Jesus, although secretly, for, like Nicodemus, the only other member of the governing body who believed on our Lord, he was fearful of publicly committing himself. Both became more courageous when they saw the crucifixion. Joseph went boldly to Pilate, begged the body of Jesus, and laid it in his own new tomb, which he had hewn out in a rock (Mat. xxvii. 57-60; Luke xxiii. 50-53; John xix. 38).

13. A Christian called Barsabbas or son of Sabbas, and Justus. He had accompanied with Jesus and the disciples from the time of Jesus' baptism, and was one of two who were considered worthy to fill the vacancy among the apostolic twelve produced by the apostasy of Judas; but the lot fell upon Matthias (Acts i. 21, 26). He was probably a brother of Judas, called Barsabbas (Acts xv. 22).

14. The personal name of Barnabas (Acts iv. 36, in A. V. Joses).

Jo'ses [a Greek form of Joseph].

1. One of the brethren of the Lord (Mark vi. 3). In Mat. xiii. 55, R. V. prefers the manuscripts which gave the name as Joseph.

2. The personal name of Barnabas, for a time the missionary colleague of Paul (Acts iv. 36, in R. V. Joseph).

Jo'shah [perhaps, uprightness].

A Simeonite, son of Amaziah (1 Chron. iv. 34).

Josh-a-phat [Jehovah hath judged].

1. A Mithnite, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi. 43).

2. A priest, one of the trumpeters before the ark during its removal to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xv. 24, in A. V. Jehoshaphat).

Josh-a-vi'ah [perhaps, Jehovah setteth upright].

One of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi. 46).

Josh-be-ka'shah [possibly, seat of hardness].

A singer, son of Heman (1 Chron. xxv. 4), and head of the seventeenth course of singers (24).

Josh-eb-bas'she-beth, in A. V. margin Josheb-bassebet.

A textual corruption in 2 Sam. xxiii. 8 for, apparently, Ish-baal, there is a Lord. Baal was altered, as was often done after it had acquired idolatrous associations, to bosheth, shame; and instead of bosheth, i. e. b-sh-th, the word b-sh-b-th which ends the preceding verse was seen by a copyist. His identity with Jashobeam is fairly established by comparison of this verse with 1 Chron. xi. 11 and verses 8 and 9 with 1 Chron. xxvii. 2, 4. This latter form is perhaps another mode of avoiding the name Baal.

Josh-i-bi'ah, in A. V. Josibiah [Jehovah gives an abode].

A Simeonite, family of Asiel (1 Chron. iv. 35).

Josh'u-a, in A. V. once Jehoshua (Num. xiii. 16), and once Jehoshuah (1 Chron. vii. 27), the latter an inconsistency not found in A. V. in the original edition of 1611. Jehoshua developed into Jeshua (Nev. viii. 17), and this form was Grecianized and appears as Jesus (Acts vii. 45) [Jehovah is salvation].

1 An Ephraimite, the son of Nun (Num. xiii. 8, 16). He commanded the Israelites in their successful conflict with the Amalekites at Rephidim (Ex. xvii. 8-16). A personal attendant on Moses, he was with him on mount Sinai when the golden calf was made, and mistook the noise of idolatrous revelry in the camp for the shouting of hostile combatants (xxiv. 13, xxxii. 17, 18). He had charge of the first tent of meeting (xxxiii. 11). As prince of Ephraim, he was a member of the commission of twelve sent to report on the land of Canaan and its assailability; and he joined Caleb in seeking to persuade the people to go and possess the land (Num. xiii. 8, xiv. 6-9). For this the two narrowly escaped being stoned to death (10), but God rewarded them for their fidelity and trust in Jehovah by keeping them alive to enter the promised land (30, 38). At the end of the forty years' sojourn in the wilderness, by divine direction Moses placed Joshua before the high priest and the congregation in Shittim and publicly ordained him to be his successor (Num. xxvii. 18-23, Deut. i. 38), and just before death, the lawgiver took Joshua to the tabernacle to receive his charge from the Lord (xxxi. 14, 23). On the death of Moses, Joshua began immediate preparations for crossing the Jordan. The people were allowed three days in which to prepare victuals (Josh. i. 10, 11), the two and a half tribes were reminded of their obligation to render their brethren armed assistance (12-18), and spies were dispatched to search out Jericho (ii. 1). The camp was then moved to the river and the people carefully instructed as to the order of march (iii. 1-6). He showed his military skill in the plan of campaign which he adopted for the conquest of Canaan: a central camp, advantageously situated; the capture of the towns which commanded the approaches to his camp; great campaigns following up victories; see CANAAN. He blundered, however, in making a treaty with the Gibeonites and in not garrisoning the citadel of the Jebusites. By these two mistakes Judah was to a degree isolated from the northern tribes. He carried out the injunction to assemble the people on Ebal and Gerizim to hear the blessings and the cursings (viii. 30-35). His campaigns had broken the power of the Canaanites, but not exterminated them (see CANAAN). But although the prospect of further fighting remained, the time had come to plan for the settlement of the country. Aided by the high priest and a commission, he superintended the allotment of the conquered country, beginning the distribution while the camp was at Gilgal (xiv. 6-xvii.), and completing it and assigning cities of refuge and the Levitical towns after he had removed the tabernacle to Shiloh (xviii.-xxi.). For himself he asked and obtained a town, Timnath-serah, in mount Ephraim (xix. 50). When old, he convoked an assembly of the people at Shechem, because it was the place of Abraham's first altar on entering Canaan and the locality where the tribes had invoked blessings and cursings upon themselves. There he made them a powerful address, urging them not to forsake Jehovah (xxiv. 1-28). Soon afterwards he died, at the age of 110, and was buried at the place of his choice, Timnath-serah (29, 30).

The Book of Joshua properly follows Deuteronomy in the Hebrew Scriptures and in the English Bible; for it continues the history from the death of Moses, which was the last event recorded in Deuteronomy. It is more intimately connected with the Pentateuch than with the books which follow it: for the spirit of the Mosaic times was still active in the history which it recounts; and it is the sequel of Genesis in that it records the possession of the promised land for which Abraham waited, as related in Genesis. But since it was not written by Moses, it was kept distinct from the five books of Moses in the Hebrew Scriptures. In these Scriptures it is the first of "the prophets," and begins that division of them called the "former prophets," which embraces all the books of the English Bible between Joshua and 2 Kings inclusive, except Ruth; see CANON. The book may be divided into three sections. I. The conquest of Canaan (i.-xii.) including the preparation for crossing the Jordan and the passage of the river (i.-iv. 18), the establishment of the camp and celebration of the passover (iv. 19-v. 12), the capture of Jericho and Ai, the confirmation of the covenant on Ebal, and the treaty with the Gibeonites (v. 13-ix.), the southern and northern campaigns (x, xi.), and the summary (xii.). II. The distribution of Canaan (xiii.-xxii.); including a description of the land which remained to be divided (xiii.), its allotment, with the assignment of cities of refuge and the allotment of towns to the tribe of Levi (xiv.-xxi.), and the temporary misunderstanding about the altar on the Jordan, as though it were intended to divide the nation (xxii.). III. Joshua's farewell address and death (xxiii., xxiv.).

It is expressly stated that Joshua wrote "these words," including at least the account of the proceedings at Shechem (xxiii.-xxiv. 25) in the book of the law of God (xxiv. 26). The concluding verses of the book (xxiv. 29-33) were written after the death of Joshua, Eleazar, and the men of that generation. The simplest theory is that the conquest of Hebron, Debir, and Anab by Caleb took place after the death of Joshua and is recorded proleptically in xv. 13-20 (see HEBRON), that Zephath is called Hormah by anticipation in xii. 14, and that this verse reflects an event which occurred after the death of Joshua (Judg. i. 17; see HORMAH); and that xix. 47 records the migration of the Danites in the days of the judges. It is reasonable to conclude from the general character of the documents and casual statements in them that large portions of the book were in writing in the time of Joshua. At any rate, they received final form while the town of Ai was still in ruins (viii 28), before the reign of Solomon, while the Canaanites still dwelt in Gezer (xvi. 10 with i Kin ix. 16), and before the reign of David, at a time when the Jebusites still occupied the stronghold of Jerusalem (xv 63). In general, see PENTATEUCH.

2. A native of Beth-shemesh, the owner of a field to which the king drawing the cart which carried the ark from the Philistine country made their way (i Sam. vi. 14)

3 The governor of Jerusalem during the reign of Josiah (2 Kin. xxiii 8)

4 The high priest while Zerubbabel was governor of Judah (Hag i 1, 12, 14; ii 2-4 Zech iii 1-9). Called in Ezra and Nehemiah Jeshua (q. v)

Jo-si'ah, in A. V. of N. T. Josias [Jehovah healeth].

1. Son and successor of Amon as king of Judah. He came to the throne about the year 639 B C, when eight years old. In his youth his adviser seems to have been the high priest Hilkiah, and Josiah hearkened to him. In the eighth year of his reign he began the attempt to conform his own conduct as king, and the life of the court, to the laws of God. In his twelfth regnal year he commenced to suppress idolatry and other unlawful worship; a work which he prosecuted for years not only in Judah and Jerusalem, but after his eighteenth year in Israel also (2 Kin. xxii. 1, 2; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 1-7, 33). In his eighteenth year he took energetic steps to repair and adorn the temple; and the workmen, entering with enthusiasm into his plans, acted with exemplary fidelity in using the money entrusted to them for the purpose. While the repairs of the temple were being executed, Hilkiah, the high priest, found the book of the law in the house of the Lord, and handed it over to Shaphan, the scribe, who read it to the king. Josiah was deeply impressed by the prophecy that if the people departed from Jehovah dreadful consequences would ensue. He rent his clothes and humbled himself before God, who was pleased to give him the gracious assurance that the threatened calamity should not come in his time (2 Kin. xxii 8-20; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 15-28). The prophecy which so affected Josiah was Deut. xxviii.-xxx., especially xxix. 25-28. The book found by Hilkiah must thus have contained Deuteronomy at least, and it may have been a copy of the entire Pentateuch. The sacred books had, doubtless, been generally destroyed and lost sight of during the apostasy and persecution in the long reign of Manassah (2 Kin. xxi. 16; 2 Chron. xxxiii 9), and the book found by Hilkiah was probably the temple copy of the law, which had been hidden or thrown aside during the profanation of the sanctuary (Deut. xxxi 9, 26), or possibly it was a law book that had been placed in the wall, according to an ancient custom, when the temple was first built. That Deuteronomy was an old book at the time may be argued from the fact that it reflects the condition of Israel in early times and not in the reign of Josiah. It enjoins upon the people the extermination of the Canaanites and Amalekites (xx. 16-18; xxv. 17-19), but in Josiah's day there was no occasion for such a law. It contemplates foreign conquest on the part of the Israelites (xx. 10-15), but in Josiah's day and for nearly a century previously the question was not of conquest, but whether Judah could maintain its existence at all. It vests the supreme authority under Jehovah in a judge and the priesthood, but makes provision for a time when the Israelites should desire a king (xvii. 8-20, xix. 17), but in Josiah's day the Israelites had been ruled by kings for centuries. It discriminates against Ammon and Moab in favor of Edom (xxiii 3-8); but in Josiah's day and for a long time previously Egypt was the representative foe of the people of God (Is lxiii 6, Joel iii 19; Obad.), and Jeremiah promises future restoration to Moab and Ammon, but denies it to Edom (xlviii. 47; xlix 6, 17, 18). The legislation of Deuteronomy was in force long before the time of Josiah. It was observed at the coronation of Joash in 835 B C. (2 Kin. xi. 12), and was followed by Joash's son and successor, Amaziah (xiv 6; cp Deut. xxiv 16). The reading of the book to the people affected them as it had the king. So deep was the impression produced that a second assault upon idolatry was begun, more sweeping than the first. After the king and his subjects had together covenanted to worship Jehovah only, they proceeded to take the vessels of Baal, of the Asherim, and of the heavenly bodies, burn them, and cast the ashes into the brook Kidron. The Asherah in the house of the Lord was similarly burnt, the residences of the sodomites were broken down, and the high places were destroyed, not merely through the kingdom of Judah, but through the former territory of the northern tribes, now largely empty of its Israelitish inhabitants. The valley of Hinnom and the shrine of Topheth, in which children had been made to pass through the fire to Molech, were defiled, and other sweeping reforms effected. When at Bethel, Josiah took the bones of the idolatrous priests from their graves, and burnt them on the altar, thus fulfilling the prophecy of a man of God in Jeroboam's time (1 Kin. xiii. 2). Nor did he scruple to slay the living idolatrous priests themselves on the altars on which they had been accustomed to sacrifice. Then he concluded by holding a passover, so well attended and so solemn that nothing like it had been celebrated since the time of Samuel (2 Kin. xxiii. 1-25; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 29-xxxv. 19). Thirteen years afterwards Pharaoh-necho, king of Egypt, marched an army along the maritime portion of Palestine on his way to the Euphrates, where he designed to try his strength against the great Assyrian power. Situated as the small and comparatively feeble kingdom of Judah was between the Assyrian and Egyptian empires, then in mutual hostility, it was difficult for it to maintain neutrality; indeed, Josiah seems to have looked on himself as a vassal of the Assyrian king, legally and morally bound to give him military aid in war, and he gave battle to Pharaoh-necho at Megiddo in the plain of Jezreel, and in the fight was mortally wounded by an arrow. His attendants removed him from his war chariot to a second conveyance, which brought him to Jerusalem. He had, however, only reached that capital when he died. Great lamentations were made for him by Jeremiah, the singing men and the singing women, and the people generally. His loss to his country was irreparable. The religious reforms which he had commenced were assailed, and the partial independence which his country had enjoyed under his rule passed away. He had reigned thirty-one years, but was only thirty-nine when he died, about 608 B. C. (2 Kin. xxii. 1; xxiii. 29, 30; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20-27; cp. Zech. xii. 11). Jeremiah and Zephaniah prophesied during the latter part of his reign (Jer. i. 2, iii. 6; Zeph. i. 1).

2. A son of Zephaniah, in Zechariah's days (Zech. vi. 10). Perhaps the same as Hen of ver. 14, but see HEN.

Jos-i-bi'ah. See JOSHIBIAH.

Jos-i-phi'ah [Jehovah will increase].

Head of the house of Shelomith, who returned from exile with Ezra (Ezra viii. 10).

Jot. A transliteration of the Greek word jota (Mat. v. 18), the name of the letter of the Greek alphabet which corresponds to the Hebrew jod and is its equivalent etymologically. The discourse, of which Mat. v. 18 forms a part, was probably spoken in the vernacular Hebrew; and the allusion to the law is a reference to Hebrew literature. The word jot, therefore, doubtless stands for the Hebrew jod. At the beginning of the first century A. D. this letter did not always differ in size from the other letters of the Hebrew alphabet (see examples on coins, article MONEY), although as sometimes written it was one of the smaller ones (see VAU); perhaps, therefore, the point of the comparison does not lie in the smallness of the letter. But in many Hebrew words the use of the jod is a matter of comparative indifference, and in such cases the letter may be employed or dispensed with at the pleasure of the writer; hence figuratively jod signifies a matter that seems to be of small moment.

Jot'bah [pleasantness, goodness]

The town of king Amon's grandfather (2 Kin. xxi. 19).

Jot'ba-thah, in A. V. once Jotbath (Deut. x. 7) [goodness, pleasantness]

A station of the Israelites in the wilderness, apparently near Ezion-geber (Num. xxxiii. 33). The place abounded in brooks of water (Deut. x. 7). Situation unknown.

Jo'tham, in A. V. once Joatham (Mat. i. 9), in imitation of the Greek form [Jehovah is upright]

1. Youngest son of Gideon. He escaped when his seventy brothers (the offspring of polygamy, of course) were massacred by their half-brother Abimelech, and afterwards, in contempt of the usurpation, standing on mount Gerizim, he uttered the parable, audible to the Shechemites in the valley below, of the trees anointing a king (Judg. ix. 1-21).

2. A king of Judah, who reigned as regent of his father, Uzziah, while the latter was a leper (2 Kin. xv. 5). His regency began while Jeroboam II. was still king of Israel (1 Chron. v. 17). Further evidence of the partial contemporaneity of the regency of Jotham and the reign of Jeroboam exists, if the earthquake took place while Uzziah and Jeroboam were reigning (Amos i. 1, Zech. xiv. 5) and occurred coincidentally with or shortly after Uzziah's invasion of the priest's office (Antiq. ix. 10, 4). Jotham became sole ruler when his father died, about 734 B. C. He followed Jehovah, but did not interfere with the high places at which the people worshipped other gods. He built the high gate of the temple and worked on the wall on the hill of Ophel, south of the holy house. He erected cities in the uplands of Judah and castles and towers in the forests. He gained a victory over the Ammonites and made them tributary. During his reign of sixteen years Isaiah and Hosea continued to prophesy (Is. i. 1, Hos. i. 1). At the close of his reign the allied Israelites and Syrians began their invasion of Judah. He died at the age of forty-one; surviving his father scarcely a year, it seems. He left his son Ahaz to ascend the throne (2 Kin. xv. 32-38; 2 Chron. xxvii. 1-9). With Jotham, Hosea is connected by a strange synchronism. "Hosea reigned in the twentieth year of Jotham" (2 Kin. xv. 30). This reference has been explained as meaning the twentieth year since Jotham began to reign, his accession having been recorded (ver. 5), but his reign and death not having been yet described by the author of Kings. Whatever be the true explanation, this strange synchronism goes far to bring the data of the Hebrew record into harmony with the Assyrian chronology.

3. A son of Jahdai (1 Chron. ii 47).

Joz'a-bad, in A V. once Josabad (1 Chron xii 4) [Jehovah has bestowed].

1 A Gederathite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron xii 4)

2 and 3 Two Manassites who assisted David to pursue the Amalekites after their capture of Ziklag (1 Chron xii 20).

4 A Levite, one of the overseers of the tithes in Hezekiah's reign (2 Chron. xxxi 13).

5 A chief of the Levites in the time of Josiah (2 Chron. xxxv. 9)

6 A Levite, son of Jeshua (Ezra viii. 33). Perhaps he was the Jozabad who by order of Ezra took part in teaching the people the law (Neh. viii 7), and was the Levitical chief who had the oversight of the outward business of the house of God (Neh xi. 16); he may have been the Levite of the name, who was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (x 23)

7 A priest, a son of Pashhur, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x 22).

Joz'a-car, in A. V Jozachar [Jehovah has remembered]

Son of an Ammonitess and one of the two assassins of Joash, king of Judah (2 Kin. xii 21). Called erroneously Zabad in 2 Chron xxiv. 26, see BETH and DALETH

Joz'a-dak and Jehozadak, in A V Josedech in Haggai and Zechariah [Jehovah is just]

Father of Jeshua, the high priest (Ezra ii 2, 8) He was carried captive to Babylonia by Nebuchadnezzar (1 Chron vi 15)

Ju'bal [a stream, a moist region, perhaps also music]

The younger son of Lamech, by his wife Adah Jubal was the father of all such as handle the harp and pipe (Gen iv 21)

Ju'bi-le, in A. R. V. and some editions of A V Jubilee [joyful shout, sound of the trumpet].

The fiftieth year occurring after seven times seven years had been counted from the institution of the festival or from the last jubilee (Lev xxv. 8-10); cp the calculation of Pentecost It derived its name from the custom of proclaiming it by a blast on the trumpet. As every seventh year was a Sabbatic year, the jubilee followed immediately after one of this character. In the tenth day of the seventh month (the great day of atonement), in the fiftieth year, the trumpet of the jubilee was sounded. It proclaimed liberty to all Israelites who were in bondage to any of their countrymen, and the return to their ancestral possessions of any who had been compelled through poverty to sell them. Even the ground for that year was allowed to remain fallow, though it had been so in the previous Sabbatic year. To prevent injustice to one who having purchased land could retain it only to the first jubilee, the practice (thoroughly in conformity with the principles of political economy) was to give for the purchased possession only the worth of the temporary occupation till the jubilee year But one purchasing from another a house in a walled city retained it permanently; it did not revert to the original owner at the jubilee, since city lots were apparently not bound up with the several portions of Canaan as originally allotted to families. Those of the unwalled villages were regarded as belonging to the field and did so return; so also did the houses of Levites wheresoever situated (Lev xxv 8-55; xxvii 17, 18, Num. xxxvi 4). There appears to be an allusion to the jubilee in Is. lxi 1-3 and Ezek xlv. 17, cp also Neh v 1-13

Ju-dæ'a, in A V in canonical books once Judea (Ezra v 8), and thrice Jewry (Dan v. 13, Luke xxiii 5; John vii. 1) [Latin from Greek Joudaia, Jewish land, and that in turn from Hebrew Y'hudah].

A geographical term first introduced in the Bible in Ezra v 8, A. V., to designate a province of the Persian empire. It is there the rendering of the Aramaic Y'hud The R V translates it "the province of Judah." The land of Judæa is mentioned in 1 Esdras i 39, and the kings of Judæa in verse 33 The land of Judæa is also spoken of in Maccabees times after the Persian had given place to the Macedonian-Greek dominion (1 Mac v 45; vii 10, A V). On the banishment of Archelaus Judæa was annexed to the Roman province of Syria, but it was governed by procurators appointed by the Roman emperor. The succession of procurators was interrupted for a brief period by the reign of Herod Agrippa I. A. D. 41-44. The procurator resided at Cæsarea. His immediate superior was the proconsul, or president, of Syria, ruling from Antioch (Luke iii 1; Antiq xvii 13, 5; xviii 1, 1) This arrangement obtained when our Lord carried out his ministry on earth, and Judæa is often mentioned in the N. T. (Luke xxiii 5-7, John iv 3; vii 3; Acts i 8) Its northern boundary may be considered as extending from Joppa on the Mediterranean to a point on the Jordan about 10 miles north of the Dead Sea. Its southern boundary may be drawn from the wady Ghuzzeh, about 7 miles southwest of Gaza, through Beer-sheba, to the southern portion of the Dead Sea. The length from north to south is about 55 English miles, and that from east to west the same. See HISTORY

Ju'dah, Grecianized Judas, genitive Juda, and once anglicized Jude (Jude i.) [object of praise]

1. The fourth son of Jacob, the fourth also of Leah. He was not associated with his brothers Simeon and Levi, when by treachery and murder they avenged the wrong done to Dinah, who was the full sister of all three (Gen. xxxiv.). He married a Canaanite, a daughter of Shua of Adullam, and had two sons, Er and Onan, who were slain by divine judgment for their sins (xxxviii. 1-10). Prior to this he had had a third son, Shelah (5). Afterwards, by Tamar, the deceased Er's widow, Judah became the father of twin sons, Perez and Zerah (11-30; xlv. 12; Num. xxvi. 19). It was through Perez that Judah became the ancestor of David (Ruth iv. 18-22), and when the fullness of time was come, of our Lord (Mat. i. 3-16). Judah saved Joseph's life by proposing that he should be sold instead of murdered (Gen. xxxvii. 26-28). When Joseph, whose relationship by his brother was not suspected, proposed to detain Benjamin in Egypt, Judah deprecated the step in a speech marked by great natural eloquence, and ended by offering himself to remain a prisoner provided Benjamin was set free (xlv. 33, 34). The result of this splendid advocacy was that Joseph, with no further delay, revealed himself to his brethren (xlv. 1). When Jacob was on his way to Egypt he chose Judah, though not the eldest son, to go before him to Joseph, to show the way before him unto Goshen (xlv. 28). On account of the sins of Reuben, Simeon, and Levi, they were passed over, and the blessing of the birth-right was bestowed by Jacob on Judah (xlix. 3-10). See SHILOH.

2 A tribe sprung from Judah. It was divided into five tribal families which proceeded from his three sons and two grandsons (Num. xxvi. 19-21; 1 Chron. ii. 3-6). The prince of the tribe of Judah in the early period of the wanderings was Nahshon, the son of Aminadab (Num. i. 7; ii. 3; vii. 12-17; x. 14). Another prince was Caleb, son of Jephunneh (xiii. 6; xxxiv. 19). At the first census in the wilderness it numbered 74,600 (i. 26, 27); and at the second census, taken at Shittim on the eve of entering Canaan, 76,500 (xxvi. 22). It was one of the tribes which stood on mount Gerizim to bless the people (Deut. xxvii. 12). Achan, who brought trouble upon all Israel by his greed, belonged to the tribe of Judah (Josh. vii. 1, 17, 18). After the death of Joshua, this tribe was the first one sent to take possession of its allotted territory; and its fighting men, with the aid of the Simeonites, captured such towns as were found occupied by the Canaanites, and drove out the inhabitants of the hill country (Judg. i. 1-20); see CANAAN 2.

The tribe of Judah occupied the greater part of southern Palestine. The boundary drawn for it by Joshua commenced at the extreme southern point of the Dead Sea, passed thence, probably by wady-el-Fikreh, south of the ascent of Akrabbim, to the wilderness of Zin, thence by the south of Kadesh-barnea and the brook of Egypt to the Mediterranean Sea. The eastern border was the Dead Sea. The northern boundary started from the northern end of the sea, at the mouth of the Jordan, and passing by Beth-hoglah and near Jericho, went up by the ascent of Adummim, by En-shemesh, to En-rogel and the valley of the son of Hinnom, south of Jerusalem, passed on to Kirjath-jearim, and thence by Beth-shemesh and Timnah, north of Ekron, to Jabneel, and on to the Mediterranean. That sea itself constituted the western boundary, but a portion of the area was almost always in the hands of the Philistines (Josh. xv. 1-12; cp. also 13-63; xviii. 11-20). The length of the territory of the tribe of Judah from north to south was about 50 miles where most thickly inhabited, but about 95 miles from Jerusalem to Kadesh-barnea; and its breadth from the Jordan to the Philistine plain was about 45 miles. As to its physical features, it is naturally divided into three regions: the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv. 48; Luke i. 39); the lowland or Shephelah (Josh. xv. 33), and the plain near the Mediterranean Sea. The country about Beer-sheba was known as the Negeb or south. A great part of Judah is rocky and barren, but it is admirably adapted for the culture of the vine and for pasture (cp. Gen. xlix. 11, 12). The artificially-terraced hills (now neglected) were once the scene of extensive cultivation. Parts of the territory were regarded as a wilderness, especially the region south of Arad (Judg. i. 16) and that immediately west of the Dead Sea (Ps. lxxiii. title). The city of Judah (2 Chron. xxv. 28) is the city of David (2 Kin. xiv. 20). The text is probably corrupt.

Soon after their conquest of Canaan the Israelites were oppressed by the king of Mesopotamia, but Othniel of the tribe of Judah delivered the nation from the foreign domination (Judg. iii. 8-11). In the troublous times which now came upon the Israelites, due to their neglect of God, to tribal jealousies, and to failure to dispossess all the heathen, Judah, Dan, and Simeon became a group by themselves, separated from the other tribes to the north by a strip of country several miles broad which was traversed with inconvenience, in part by reason of its Canaanite inhabitants, Amorites, Gibeonites, and Jebusites, and in part on account of its natural roughness and wildness, being cleft by deep transverse valleys between Jerusalem and Jericho. It was also separated from Gad and Reuben by the chasm of the Jordan and the Dead Sea. The tribe had its own difficulties to contend with, being beset by the Philistines (Judg. iii. 31; x. 7: xiii. 1), and took little part in the wars of the other tribes against oppressors. Boaz and Ruth lived in Bethlehem at this time. Judah, however, united with the other tribes to punish Benjamin (xx. 1, 18). In the time of Eli and Samuel, when the Philistines oppressed both Judah and Benjamin, intercourse with the northern tribes became closer; and Judah was included in the kingdom of Saul. After the death of Saul, the men of Judah supported the claims of their tribesman David to the throne, and for seven years warred in his behalf. When his cause triumphed, Jerusalem on the border of Judah and Benjamin was made the capital of all Israel. The promise had been given to David that his posterity should forever occupy his throne (2 Sam. vii 13-16; 1 Chron. xvii. 12, 14, 23), though chastisement would be inflicted if there were a departure from Jehovah. The promise was not intended to do away with the necessity for wisdom in the king, and when Rehoboam manifested his unacquaintance with the first principles of government, ten tribes were lost to the house of David. See ISRAEL.

Judah and a large part of Benjamin remained loyal to David's line, and constituted the main elements of the kingdom of Judah. This kingdom lasted from about 931 B. C. until the fall of Jerusalem in 587 B. C. During this time nineteen kings of David's line, exclusive of the usurping queen Athaliah, occupied the throne; see CHRONOLOGY. Its territory was nearly coincident with that of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, save that the northern boundary fluctuated, Bethel being sometimes held by Judah, especially after the fall of Samaria. An event which exercised the most powerful influence on the history and ultimate fate of the rival kingdoms was the construction of the two golden calves by Jeroboam, that the people of his kingdom might have local sanctuaries, and not have to visit Jerusalem for worship, and perhaps be there won over to their old allegiance. One effect this had was to make all who were faithful to Jehovah emigrate to the kingdom of Judah, bringing it no mean accession of spiritual and even of political strength (1 Kin. xii 26-33; xiii. 33; 2 Chron. x 16, 17). The first relations of the two rival kingdoms were naturally those of mutual hostility. This, doubtless, emboldened the neighboring nations to intermeddle in Jewish affairs, and in the fifth year of Rehoboam's reign Shishak, king of Egypt, plundered Jerusalem (1 Kin. xiv. 25-28; 2 Chron. xii. 1-12). War between Judah and Israel went on in a languid way during the first sixty years of their separate existence (1 Kin. xiv. 30; xv. 7, 16; 2 Chron. xii. 15; xiii 2-20); after which, under Ahab and Jehoshaphat, not merely peace, but a political and family alliance took place between the two reigning houses. In consequence, the worship of Baal was introduced into Judah, and at last became a potent factor in the destruction of the kingdom. Two great parties were formed, the one attached to the worship of Jehovah, the other in favor of Baal and other foreign divinities. During the subsequent period of the kingdom of Judah these parties were in continual conflict with each other, first one and then the other becoming temporarily dominant, according as the reigning monarch was its friend or its opponent. As at other periods of the theocracy, fidelity to Jehovah brought temporal as well as spiritual prosperity, while apostasy from him was attended by disaster. Among the good kings were Asa, Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, and Josiah, while Ahaz, Manasseh, and some others were conspicuously the reverse. The foreign relations of the kingdom were important. Egypt was Judah's neighbor on the southwest, and was frequently involved in the affairs of Judah. The Egyptian kings Shishak and Zerah and, after a long interval, Necho warred with Judah. On the other hand, Egypt was regarded as a valuable ally against the great empires on the Tigris and Euphrates, and the blow inflicted upon the Assyrians by Tirhakah in the reign of Hezekiah contributed to the deliverance of Judah, and later the advance of the Egyptians compelled the army of Nebuchadnezzar to raise the siege of Jerusalem temporarily. See PHARAOH. On the capture of Jerusalem by the Babylonians, a large body of Jews found refuge in the country of the Nile. During all these years the varied influences of Egyptian culture and religion were exerted upon the people of Judah. In respect to the powerful nations on the Tigris and Euphrates, there were, of course, an Assyrian and a Babylonian period. The Assyrian period began in 734 B. C., when Ahaz invoked the aid of Tiglath-pileser against the allied kings of Israel and Syria, and afterwards did homage to him at Damascus. After the Assyrian conquest of the northern kingdom a decade later, Judah was exposed for nearly a century and a quarter to the greed and fury of the Assyrians, until Nineveh was overthrown by the Babylonians Sargon, Sennacherib, Esarhaddon, and Ashurbanipal, four successors on the Assyrian throne, mention more or less extensive conquests of Judah. Three of these four kings are mentioned in the Hebrew records (Is. xx 1; xxxvi 1; xxxvii. 38), and perhaps the fourth also (see ASNAPAR). The Babylonian period began in 605, when Jehoiakim was subjugated by Nebuchadnezzar. In less than a score of years Jerusalem was in ruins and the people of Judah were deported to Babylonia. The divine promise to David did not preclude the temporary loss of the throne by his descendants.

The causes which led to the fall of Jerusalem and the exile were: 1. Those causes which issued in the disruption of the kingdom and the fall of Samaria, which left Judah solitary. See ISRAEL. 2. The neglect of God's command to exterminate the Canaanites. When the Israelites could not, that is, would not, utterly destroy the Canaanites, they preserved the haven of corruption in their midst. 3. Social and political alliances with idolatrous peoples. 4. The loss of moral

5. A son of Simon Maccabæus (1 Mac. xvi. 2). His father devolved the command of the army upon him and his brother John, and sent them against Cendebeus. The two brothers gained a great victory over the Syrian general near Kidron, not far from Ashdod (2-10). Judas was wounded in the battle (9). In 135 B. C. about three years later, he and his brother Mattathias were reacherously murdered in the castle of Dok by a kinsman by marriage, either at a feast at the same time that their father Simon was assassinated (14-17) or a little later Antiq. xiii. 8, 1).

6. Judas of Galilee, who, in the days of the enrollment, raised a revolt; but he perished, and all, as many as obeyed him, were scattered abroad (Acts v. 37; cp. Luke ii. 2). Josephus calls him several times a Galilean, but once a Gaulonite, of the city of Gamala, implying that he was from Gaulonitis, east of the Jordan. It appears that, with the support of a Pharisee called Sadduc, Judas imbued his countrymen with the belief that the enrollment under Quirinius was the commencement of their reduction to a state of servitude. He founded a philosophic sect whose chief tenet was that their only ruler and lord was God (Antiq. xviii. 1, 1 and 6; War ii. 8, 1). Josephus states that Judas succeeded in making some of the Jews revolt, and implies, but does not directly mention, that he lost his life. He expressly states, however, that his sons were slain (Antiq. xx. 5, 2). The indirect consequence of this attempt was the rise of the party of zealots, who largely contributed to the disturbances which provoked the Jewish war of A. D. 66-70.

7. Judas Iscariot, son of Simon Iscariot (John vi. 71. R. V.), and the apostle who betrayed his divine Lord, and that by a kiss. By being surnamed Iscariot he is distinguished from another of the twelve who was named Judas (Luke vi. 16; John xiv. 22). The surname probably meant that he came originally from Kerioth (see ISCARIOT), and may thus indicate that he was not a Galilean. Judged by his character, he followed Jesus probably because he expected to derive earthly advantage from the establishment of Christ's kingdom. Jesus, without naming any person, early referred to the future act of treason which one of the twelve would commit (John vi. 70). Judas was appointed to keep the bag, but he yielded to dishonesty, and appropriated part of the money to himself. When Mary of Bethany in her affection for Jesus broke the alabaster box of precious ointment and anointed him, Judas was the spokesman of himself and others in denouncing what he considered extravagance; not that he cared for the poor, but that he wished the price of the ointment to be put into the bag, whence he could help himself as he had done before (John xii. 5, 6). Jesus mildly reproved him; but the rebuke aroused his resentment, and he went to the chief priests and offered to betray Jesus unto them for a price. They agreed with him on thirty pieces of silver, about $19.50, an ordinary price for a slave. From that time Judas sought an opportunity to deliver Jesus unto them (Mat. xxvi. 14-16; Mark xiv. 10, 11; Ex. xxi. 32; Zech. xi. 12, 13). At the pass-over supper Jesus, in order to carry out his design of being crucified at the feast, pointed out the traitor. The devil had already put into the heart of Judas to betray his Master (John xiii. 2). When Jesus solemnly said, "One of you shall betray me," each disciple asked, "Lord, is it I?" Peter beckoned to John to ask Christ who it was. Jesus replied enigmatically that it was one of those that were dipping with him in the dish (Mat. xxvi. 23, Mark xiv. 20), one to whom he would give the sop (John xiii. 26, R. V.): in other words, his own familiar friend, one who ate bread with him (18; Ps. xli. 9). Jesus and Judas, it would seem, were dipping together in the dish; and Jesus dipped the sop that he then held in his hand, and gave it to Judas (John xiii. 26). After the sop Satan entered into Judas (27). He also asked: "Is it I, Rabbi?" Jesus answered: "Thou hast said," which was the equivalent of "Yes" (Mat. xxvi. 21-25 R. V.). Even yet the disciples did not know just what Jesus meant, and when he added, "That thou doest, do quickly," they supposed that this was a direction to the treasurer to lose no time in buying some articles of which they had need. The traitor went at once to the chief priests. It is probable that Judas was not at the institution of the sacrament. He was present at the supper, and partook of it with the twelve (Mat. xxvi. 20); but he went out immediately after receiving the sop (John xiii. 30), and the eucharist was after the supper (Mat. xxvi. 26-29; Mark xiv. 22-25; Luke xxii. 19, 20). Luke in narrating the events of the supper, changes the actual order that he may place the spirit of Christ and the spirit of the disciples in contrast (xxii. 15-20 and 21-24). After the departure of Judas the tone of Jesus' conversation changes. When supper was ended he led the eleven to the garden of Gethsemane. Thither Judas came, accompanied by a great multitude with swords and staves, from the chief priests and elders. In accordance with a sign which had been agreed upon, in order to point out Jesus to the soldiers, Judas advanced and saluted Jesus with a kiss, and Jesus was seized (Mat. xxvi. 47-50). The next morning, when Judas, now in calmer mood, saw that Jesus was condemned, and was likely to be put to death, he awoke to the enormity of his guilt, and went to the chief priests with the confession, "I have sinned in that I have betrayed the innocent blood," and offered to return the money. His conscience was not so seared as the consciences of the chief priests, who, having seduced the erring apostle into his great sin, then turned round on him and said, "What is that to us? see thou to that." On which he cast down the silver pieces in the temple, and went and hanged himself (Mat xxvii 3-5), and falling headlong he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out (Acts i 18). The 109th Psalm, directed primarily against some contemporary of the writer, found fulfillment in Judas (Ps cix 8; Acts i. 20). But no heavenly coercion compelled the son of perdition (John xvii. 12) to fulfill his destiny. Nor was he, a suppliant, refused mercy; he did not ask it.

8 One of the twelve apostles, carefully distinguished from Judas Iscariot (John xiv. 22). He was son or perhaps brother of James (Luke vi. 16; Acts i. 13; see R. V. text and margin). He was also called Thaddæus, for this name is found in other lists in the place corresponding to his (Mat. x 3; Mark iii. 18). The received text of Mat. x. 3 has "Lebbæus, whose surname was Thaddæus." These two surnames are believed to mean the same thing: the former coming from Hebrew and Aramaic leb, heart, and the latter from Aramaic thad, a mother's breast, and both signifying a beloved child.

9. One of the four brethren of the Lord (Mat. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3, in A V Juda), and probably the author of the Epistle of Jude. See BROTHERN OF THE LORD, JUDE

10. A man who lived at Damascus, in the street called Straight, and with whom Paul lodged just after his conversion (Acts ix. 11).

11. Judas, surnamed Barsabbas. He was a leading man in the church at Jerusalem, and was chosen with Silas to accompany Barnabas and Paul to Antioch, bearing the letter from the council at Jerusalem to the churches of Syria and Cilicia. He had prophetic gifts. His subsequent history is unknown (Acts xv. 22, 27, 32). He bears the same surname as the disciple Joseph, who was proposed for the apostleship, and was probably his brother (i. 23).

Jude, in E. R. V. of Jude 1 Judas.

An English form of the name Judas, given in the A. V. to the writer of the Epistle of Jude (ver. 1). He describes himself simply as "brother of James," by whom the author of the Epistle of James and leader of the church in Jerusalem seems to be meant. In this case Jude should be a brother of the Lord, and not an apostle; and these inferences seem borne out by the presence of a Judas in the lists of our Lord's brethren (Mat. xiii. 55; Mark vi. 3), and by the apparent implication of verse 17 of his epistle, that its writer was not an apostle. Those who identify the brothers of the Lord with the sons of Alphæus, nevertheless, identify Jude with the apostle Judas. Except his bare name, nothing is recorded of him beyond what we may infer from the facts that the brethren of the Lord did not believe in him during his life on earth (John vii. 5) and that after his resurrection they were his followers (Acts i 14). An interesting story told of his grandchildren by the church writer, Hegesippus, and preserved by Eusebius (H. E. iii. 20), confirms the possible inference from 1 Cor. ix 5 that he was married, and implies that he was dead before A. D. 80.

The General Epistle of Jude is a brief epistle. It names its author as Judas, a bond servant of Jesus Christ and brother of James (ver. 1, R. V. margin); that is probably Judas, the brother of the Lord (Mat xiii 55; Mark vi 3) Its address is quite general - "to them that are called, beloved in God the Father, and kept for Jesus Christ" (ver 1, R. V.). Nevertheless, it is probable from the character of the epistle, which seems intended for a special occasion and is full of allusions which would be likely to be intelligible only to Jews, that some particular body of Christians was intended, which, from the circumstances of sending the letter, did not need to be specified in the address. It is most natural to think of it as intended for the Jewish Christians dwelling in Palestine. The letter has been largely used by 2 Pet. ii., [verses 4-18 with the exceptions of verses 14 and 15 being represented in 2 Pet ii -iii 3]; and must have been written before it, probably not much before - it seems most natural to date it about A. D. 66 [Those students, who hold the genuineness of 2 Peter, but contend for its priority to Jude, are apt to date the Epistle of Jude between the death of Peter about A. D. 68 and the accession of the Roman emperor Domitian in A. D. 81. The reason for fixing upon A. D. 81 as the limit is found in an ancient tradition, quoted by Eusebius from Hegesippus, who wrote as early as A. D. 170, from which it appears that Jude, the Lord's brother, had died before or at latest early in the reign of Domitian.] It was called out by the outbreak among Jude's readers of an alarming heresy with immoral tendencies, probably something like the incipient gnosticism rebuked in the pastoral epistles and the Apocalypse (ver. 3, 4, 10, 15, 16, 18), and was designed to save the churches addressed from its inroads. After the address (ver. 1, 2), it assigns the reason for its writing (ver. 3, 4) and then first announces the condemnation in store for the false teachers (ver. 5-16), and afterwards divulges the duty of true Christians in the circumstances (ver. 17-23), concluding with a rich and appropriate doxology (ver. 24, 25). Owing doubtless to its brevity, there are no very clear traces of the use of Jude in the very earliest fathers of the church. In the latter part of the second century, however, it is found in full use in the Greek and Latin churches alike [being included in the Old Latin version, listed in the Muratorian fragment, quoted and referred to as Jude's by Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian and later by Origen); and was clearly from the beginning a part of the Christian canon.

Judge.

1. A civil magistrate (Ex. xxi. 22; Deut. xvi. 18) On the advice of his father-in-law, and in order to relieve himself of overwork, Moses organized the judiciary of Israel, acting henceforth himself in matters of great importance only and for the adjudication of cases of less moment assigning a judge to each thousand, to each hundred, to each fifty, and to each ten (Ex. xviii. 13-26). For all the tribal subdivision heads already existed, known as princes and elders, who possessed civil and religious authority, and in the judicial system which he organized Moses included these officials and they retained under the new regulations their hereditary function of judging (Deut. i. 15-17; cp. xxi. 2, and see THOUSAND). Before his death Moses gave directions that the Israelites, on settling in Canaan, appoint judges and officers in all their towns, with instructions to refer matters too difficult for these magistrates to the priests (xvi. 18-20; xvii. 2-13; xix. 15-20; cp. Josh. viii. 33; xxiii. 2; xxiv. 1, 1 Sam. viii. 1). With the establishment of the kingdom the king became supreme judge in civil matters (2 Sam. xv. 2; 1 Kin. iii. 9, 28; vii. 7; cp. 1 Sam. viii. 5). David assigned Levites to the judicial office, and appointed six thousand as officers and judges (1 Chron. xxiii. 4; xxvi. 29). Jehoshaphat organized the judiciary in Judah still further, setting judges in the fortified cities, with a supreme court at Jerusalem, consisting of Levites, priests, and the heads of fathers' houses under the presidency of the high priest in religious matters and of the prince of Judah in civil matters (2 Chron. xix. 5-8).

2. A man whom God raised up to lead a revolt against foreign oppressors and who, having freed the nation and shown thereby his call of God, was looked to by the people to maintain their rights. The judges were saviors like unto Moses. They numbered twelve, not including Abimelech, who was a petty king and not called of God (ix.). They were Othniel of Judah, deliverer of Israel from the king of Mesopotamia; Ehud, who expelled the Moabites and Ammonites; Shamgar, smiter of six hundred Philistines and saviour of Israel; Deborah, associated with Barak, who led Naphtali and Zebulun to victory against the northern Canaanites; Gideon, who drove the Midianites from the territory of Israel; Tola and Jair; Jephthah, subduer of the Ammonites; Ibzan, Elon, Abdon, and Samson, the troubler of the Philistines. Eli and Samuel also judged Israel (1 Sam. iv. 18; vii. 15), but the former acted in his official capacity as high priest and the latter as a prophet of Jehovah. These judges did not form an unbroken succession of rulers, but appeared sporadically.

They were often local, discharging their duties in restricted districts. They apparently exercised only such authority as was spontaneously accorded to them. They could not order the various tribes to war. Some of the oppressions and not a few of the judges were evidently contemporaneous and overlapped. Shamgar, for example, was contemporary with Ehud, for the account of his exploit is inserted in the midst of the narrative of Ehud's work (iii. 31); and a Philistine oppression of Judah was coeval with the Ammonite domination east of Jordan and attack on Judah, Benjamin and Ephraim (x. 7). See CHRONOLOGY III.

These facts throw light on the distracted state of the nation during the period of the judges. The political districts, moreover, are found to be those that were separated by the Jordan and by the heathen barrier between Judah and the north. The song of Deborah and the history of Jephthah show the laxity of the bonds which united the tribes, and make known what tribes were able and willing to join forces and fortunes. The isolation of Judah is remarkable; see JUDAH. But there were centralizing influences at work. National feeling existed, for the war of extermination waged against Benjamin shows the sense of national guilt and national responsibility. There was one ark for all the tribes in the national tabernacle at Shiloh (Josh. xviii. 1; Judg. xxi. 19; cp. Ex. xxiii. 14-17). It was carried to Bethel, where the tribes had gathered for battle and would worship the Lord and ask counsel of him (Judg. xx. 18-29). Great oppressions united the people in common misery and called for united action; great deliverers united the hearts of the people in loyalty and pride about one head; and great deliverances, obtained by united action, bound tribes together in common glory.

The period of the judges has been called Israel's iron age. The people frequently lapsed into idolatry, and worship at the sanctuary was rendered difficult by the distracted state of the country. Rudeness of manners was displayed in Jael's murder of Sisera, in Jephthah's sacrifice of his daughter, in Gideon's treatment of the men of Succoth, in the sin of the men of Gibeah. Against these shadows, however, there stand out brightly the trust and filial piety of Jephthah's daughter, the fidelity of Ruth to Naomi, and the kindly and upright character of Boaz.

Judges, Book of.

A historical book of the O. T. placed after the book of Joshua. It continues the narrative from his death, and consists of three parts. 1. Introduction: departure of the tribes to occupy the districts allotted to them (see Josh. xv.-xxi.), and a list of the towns left by them in the possession of the Canaanite idolaters (Judg. i.-ii. 5). Joshua's wars of conquest had not depopulated the country (see CANAAN). II History of the judges as saviors of Israel, from the death of Joshua to that of Samson (ii. 6-xvi. 31). This section has its own introduction in prophetic style, summarizing the events of the period and pointing out the religious lesson (ii. 6-in. 6), followed by more or less detailed accounts of six judges and brief mention of other six. The assumption of kingship by Abimelech, son of Gideon, is recorded as an integral part of the history, although he was a petty king rather than a judge, and was not a saviour of Israel. III. Two appendices, namely, an account of Micah's image worship and its establishment among the Danites of the north (xvii., xviii.), and of the sin of the men of Gibeah and the consequent war for its punishment (xix-xxi).

The date of the composition of the Book of Judges is difficult to determine. At any rate, the following facts must be satisfied. All schools of criticism at present acknowledge the great antiquity of the song of Deborah, and that it is practically contemporary with the event which it celebrates. This section, the second and main portion of the book, could not have been written until after the death of Samson (xvi. 30, 31). In the appendices, the recurring expression, "in those days there was no king in Israel," points to the composition of these chapters at least after the establishment of the kingdom. The tabernacle was no longer at Shiloh (xviii. 31) when they were written. The mention of the "captivity of the land" (xviii. 30) has been interpreted as a reference to the ravages of Tiglath-pileser in the north (2 Kin. xv. 29), or to the deportation of the ten tribes after the fall of Samaria. But this explanation conflicts with the parallel statement, "all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh" (Judg. xviii. 31). Moreover, historical circumstances in the reigns of David, Solomon, and Jeroboam (1 Kin. v.-vii.; xii. 28-31) make it highly improbable that this image worship continued to be practiced until the time of Tiglath-pileser or the Assyrian exile. Hence from the time of David Kimchi many interpreters have understood the captivity of the land to refer to the capture of the ark by the Philistines, when Jehovah forsook Shiloh. Several expositors have adopted the conjecture of Houbigant that the last letter in the phrase "captivity of the land" has become corrupt, and that the Hebrew text originally had nun instead of tzade, which would then read "captivity of the ark." Keil thinks that the reference is to a conquest of the land of the northern Danites and enslavement of its population by the neighboring Syrians of Damascus. Any of these suppositions is beset by fewer difficulties than the assumption that Micah's image worship continued until the fall of Samaria. The expression "from Dan even to Beersheba" (xx. 1) was, of course, appropriate in the times of the judges, for it doubtless originated then. For x. 11-13; cp. i. 31, 32, 34; iii. 13, 31; vi. 3, 9, 10, 33. The indications of time, which are found in the appendices, thus point to the period before David's reign over all Israel. The general introduction to the book was written while the Jebusites still occupied the stronghold at Jerusalem (i. 21). All these indications of time strongly favor the inference that the book as a whole was written in the time of Samuel, if not actually by that prophet himself, as the Jews of old believed. Critics who deny the Mosaic authorship of Deuteronomy assume that a late reviser worked over the material, because the book reflects the same religious conception as does Deuteronomy.

As the analysis of the work shows, these histories were gathered and placed in their present framework in order to exhibit their religious teaching and serve as an admonition to subsequent ages. This religious significance of the events, which the compiler desired to exhibit, was not concealed from the actors themselves. The song of Deborah and the national uprising to punish the perpetrators and abettors of the crime of Gibeah reveal the consciousness of the participants that they were engaged in sacred warfare and that the history which was being enacted was full of religious instruction.

Judg'ment Hall. See PRÆTORIUM.

Ju'dith [object of praise, praiseworthy; also feminine of Y'huda, a Jew, and meaning a Jewess].

1. A wife of Esau and daughter of Beeri, the Hittite (Gen. xxvi. 34). She was also called Oholibamah (xxxvi. 2; cp. ANAH).

2. Heroine of the book of Judith; see APOCRYPHA.

Ju'ti-a [feminine form of Latin Julius].

A Christian woman at Rome (Rom. xvi. 15), not unlikely the wife of Philologus.

Ju'ti-us.

A centurion of the Augustan band, employed to conduct Paul and other prisoners to Rome (Acts xxvii. 1). He showed courtesy to the apostle, allowing him to visit his friends at Sidon (3). At Crete he did not believe Paul's prediction of the coming storm (11), but after the tempest broke he heeded Paul's advice and kept the sailors from forsaking the ship (31). When the vessel was wrecked, the guard wanted to kill the prisoners lest any should escape; but he forbade the butchery, desiring to save Paul (42, 43).

Ju'ti-as, in A. V. Junia.

A Jewish Christian at Rome, a kinsman and fellow-prisoner of Paul, and in Christ before him (Rom. xvi. 7).

Ju'ti-per.

Not the coniferous tree of the genus Juniperus, of which several species occur in Lebanon, Galilee, and Bashan; but a leguminous plant (Retama rætam), an almost leafless broom (1 Kin. xix. 4, 5; Job xxx. 4; Ps. cxx. 4), see BROOM.

Ju'pi-ter.

The supreme god of the Romans. He corresponded to the Zeus of the Greeks, and in the only part of the N. T. in which the name is introduced (Acts xiv. 12, 13) the Greek text has Zeus. Zeus had a noted temple at Olympia in Elis (Herod. ii. 7), from which he derived his designation of Olympius. Antiochus Epiphanes erected a temple to him under that title at Athens, dedicated the temple at Jerusalem to Jupiter Olympius, and at the request of the Samaritans, Josephus says, called the sanctuary on Gerizim by the name of Jupiter, the protector of strangers (2 Mac vi. 2; Antiq. xii. 5, 5). The worship of Jupiter, which Paul and Barnabas met with at Lystra, existed at the time over the whole Greek and Roman world. He had temples and a priesthood; garlands were presented to him, as were also offerings of other kinds, and oxen and sheep were sacrificed to propitiate his favor.

Ju-shab-he'sed [loving-kindness is returned].

A son of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii. 20).

Jus'tus [just, righteous].

1 A surname of Joseph, the unsuccessful candidate for the apostleship rendered vacant by the fall of the unworthy Judas (Acts i. 23).

2 A godly man of Corinth, whose house adjoined the synagogue, and with whom Paul lodged (Acts xviii. 7). His fuller name was Titus Justus (R. V.).

3 The surname of a Jew called Jesus, who joined Paul in sending salutations to the Colossians (Col. iv. 11).

Ju'tah and Jut'tah [extended, inclined].

A town in the hill country of Judah, mentioned with Maon, Carmel, and Ziph, and doubtless in their vicinity (Josh. xv. 55). With its suburbs it was assigned to the priests (xxi. 16). It is now called Yuttah, and stands on a low eminence, about 5½ miles S by W. of Hebron. The supposition is credible that Jutah was the city of Judah in the hill country to which Mary went to visit Elisabeth (Luke i. 39), and that Judah ('Iouda) has been substituted for Jutah ('Iouta). The more common view, however, is that Hebron was the city of Elisabeth.

K.

Kab, in A. V. Cab.

A Hebrew dry measure (2 Kin. vi. 25): containing, according to rabbinical tradition, one sixth of a seah or one hundred and eightieth of a homer. See MEASURE.

Kab'ze-el and once Jekabzeel (Neh. xi. 25) [God brings together].

A city in the extreme south of Judah

(Josh. xv. 21). It was the home of David's heroic supporter, Benaiah (2 Sam. xxiii. 20; 1 Chron. xi. 22). The town was inhabited after the exile (Neh. xi. 25; where it is called by the synonymous name of Jekabzeel). Exact situation unknown.

Ka'desh, including Ka-desh-bar'ne-a [consecrated]. The meaning of Barnea is unknown.

1. A fountain, city or town, and wilderness on the southern frontier of Judah and of Palestine (Num. xx. 16; xxxiv. 4; Josh. xv. 3; Ps. xxix. 8; Ezek. xlvii. 19; xlviii. 28); distinguished as Kadesh-barnea from other places bearing the name Kadesh (Num. xiii. 26 with xxxii. 8; Deut. i. 19 with 46). At an early period it was called En-mishpat or Fountain of Judgment (Gen. xiv. 7). It was in the wilderness of Paran (Num. xiii. 26), in the wilderness of Zin (Num. xx. 1; xxvii. 14), eleven days' journey from Sinai by way of mount Seir (Deut. i. 2), in the uttermost of the border of Edom (Num. xx. 16). It appears to have been not a great distance from the highway between Palestine and Egypt, for Hagar's well was situated between Kadesh and Bered, and on the road to Egypt (Gen. xvi. 7, 14; cp. xx. 1). The place was overrun by Chedorlaomer (xiv. 7). Into the region adjacent Hagar fled (xvi. 7, 14), and Abraham sojourned there for a time (xx. 1). The Israelites, during their wanderings, twice encamped at Kadesh. They arrived in the neighborhood in the second year about the fifth month (Num. xiii. 20; cp. x. 11), sent thence the spies into Canaan, received the discouraging report there about the difficulties of conquest (xiii. 26), refused to advance, and were condemned to remain in the wilderness, and abode at Kadesh many days (Deut. i. 46). They returned to Kadesh in the first month (Num. xx. 1) of the fortieth year (xxxiii. 36, 38; cp. Deut. ii. 7, 14). Here Miriam died and was buried (Num. xx. 1); and here Moses smote the rock that water might gush out, as, in similar circumstances, it had done at Bephidim (xx. 1-13); see MERIBAH. But he and Aaron sinned in acting in their own name. From Kadesh ambassadors were sent to the king of Edom to ask permission for the Israelites to pass through his territory (xx. 14, 16, 22; Judg. xi. 16, 17). In 1842, the Rev. J. Rowlands discovered a fountain called by the Arabs Kades or Kudes, on the east of Jebel Helal. In 1878, the Rev. T. W. Holland, and in 1881 the Rev. Dr. H. Clay Trumbull, visited the spot and revived the identification. The name remains in wady Kadis, Jebel Kadis, and 'Ain Kadis; the site answers to the biblical description in every respect; and confirmation is afforded by the name of the adjacent wady, Abu Retemat. On the ground that the Israelites encamped twice at Kadesh (Num. xiii. 26; xx. 1, 22; xxxiii. 36), many interpreters had long been of the opinion that Rithmah was practically identical with Kadesh (xii. 16 with xxxiii. 18); and now it appears that the wady nearest and parallel to that of Kadis bears the name corresponding to Rithmah, wady Abu Retemât. 'Ain Kadis is about 77 miles to the south of Hebron and 51 miles south of Beersheba. The spring, Kad'mon-ites [people of the east].

A tribedwelling somewhere between Egypt and the Euphrates (Gen. xv. 19), probably in the Syrian desert.

Kain [possession, creature, smith].

1. The tribal name from which the more familiar gentile adjective Kenite is derived which is of sweet water, issues from under a rugged spur of rock belonging to the north-eastern mountain range west of the Arabah. The stream is copious, and is intercepted in its course by two or three wells built round with masonry. Then after traversing the oasis which it has created, it is finally lost in the desert beyond. This identification has been generally accepted as probably correct. Numerous other sites had previously been suggested, especially 'Ain el-Weibeh, on the western side of the Arabah, northwest of Petra. Robinson had failed to discover any spring called Kadis, and settled on the spring el-Weibeh because of its copiousness and its proximity to the borders of Edom. Wetzstein identified Kadesh with Kadus, north of Jebel Madara; but see KEDESH 1.

2. The name is perhaps contained in "the land of Tahtim-hodshi" (2 Sam. xxiv. 6), corrected by means of Lucian's text to "the land of the Hittites, toward Kadesh."

Kad'mi-el [God is of old]

A Levite, head of a tribal house, who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 40; Neh. vii. 43; xii. 8). He helped to oversee the workmen engaged in rebuilding the temple (Ezra iii. 9). The representative of the house sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 9), perhaps being the same person who had previously assisted in the public confession (ix. 4, 5).

(R. V. of Num. xxiv. 22; Judg. iv. 11, margin). See KENITE.

2. A village in Judah, in A. V. spelled Cain (Josh. xv. 57); perhaps it was an old settlement of the Kenites. See CAIN 3.

Kal'lai [swift].

A priest, head of the father's house of Sallai in the time of Joiakim, the high priest (Neh. xii. 20).

Ka'mon; in A. V. Camon.

The place where the judge Jair the Gileadite was buried (Judg. x. 5). The site is unknown. Eusebius and Jerome locate it in the plain of Esdraelon, between Megiddo and Acre; but presumably it was in Gilead, as Josephus states (Antiq. v. 7, 6). Polybius mentions a town Kamoun which was taken by Antiochus in his war with Ptolemy Philopator, immediately after he had captured Scythopolis and at the same time that he took Pella, Abila, Gadara and other places in Gilead (Hist. v. 70, 12).

Ka'nah [place of reeds].

1. A brook which formed part of the boundary line between Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh. xvi. 8; xvii. 9). Robinson identified it with the wady Kânah, which rises south of Shechem, and joins the 'Aujah, the combined streams falling into the Mediterranean 4 miles north of Joppa. This seems too far south, but the identity of the ancient and modern names is in its favor.

2. A town on the boundary of Asher (Josh. xix. 28). It was plausibly identified by Robinson with the modern Kânâ, about 7½ miles southeast of Tyre. It is a village with no marks of antiquity, but lower down the ravine which comes from it are old sculptures on the face of the southern cliffs.

Kaph. See CAPH.

Ka-re'ah, in A. V. once Careah [bald].

Father of the captains Johanan and Jonathan, who came to Gedaliah, the Babylonian governor of Judah (2 Kin. xxv. 23; Jer. xl. 8).

Kar'ka, in A. V. Kar'ka-a, retaining the final syllable which denotes direction [rent, ravine].

A place on the southern boundary of Judah (Josh. xv. 3). The name has the definite article, and may be a common noun meaning simply the ravine (Wetzstein).

Kar'kor [foundation].

A place east of the Jordan, where Zebah and Zalmunna encamped with their army (Judg. viii. 10). Site unidentified.

Kar'tah [city].

A town of Zebulun given to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi. 34). Not identified.

Kar'tan [perhaps an old dual, twin towns].

A town of Naphtali, given to the Gershonite Levites (Josh. xxi. 32). Called in 1 Chron. vi. 76 Kirjathaim, A. V. Kirjathaim. Site unidentified.

Kat'tath.

A town of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15); identified sometimes with Kitron of Judg. i. 30, and sometimes with Kartah.

Ke'dar [probably, mighty]. To the Hebrews the name was also suggestive of the black tents.

A tribe descended from Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 13), children of the east, dwelling in black tents, possessing flocks and camels (Song. i. 5, Is. lx. 7; Jer. xlix. 28, 29), and having villages also in the wilderness (Is. xlii. 11). They were an Arabian tribe (Is. xxi. 13, 16, Ezek. xxvii. 21). They were ruled by princes (ibid.), and were skillful in archery (Is. xxi. 16, 17). They dwelt between Arabia Petraea and Babylonia. The people of Kedar were Pliny's Cedrai, and from their tribe Mohammed ultimately arose.

Ked'e-mah [toward the east].

A tribe descended from Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Chron. i. 31). Not mentioned elsewhere.

Ked'e-moth [ancient places or beginnings].

A city east of the Jordan, near the wilderness (Deut. ii. 26), allotted to the Reubenites (Josh. xiii. 18) and assigned to the Merarite Levites for residence (xxi. 37; 1 Chron. vi. 79). Site unidentified.

Ke'desh [sacred place, sanctuary].

1. A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 23), probably different from Kadesh-barnea (ver. 3). Its site is perhaps Kadus, about 6½ miles north of Jebel Madara near wady el-Yemen.

2. A fortified city of the Canaanites, whose king was slain by Joshua (Josh. xii. 22; xix. 37). It was allotted to the tribe of Naphtali, and is therefore sometimes called Kedesh-naphtali (Judg. iv. 6). It was given to the Gershonite Levites for their residence, and was made one of the cities of refuge (Josh. xx. 7, xxi. 32; 1 Chron. vi. 76). It was the residence of Barak (Judg. iv. 6). Its inhabitants were carried into captivity to Assyria by Tiglath-pileser (2 Kin. xv. 29). Demetrius considered it a strategic point in his war against the Jews (1 Mac. xi. 63, 73; Antiq. xiii. 5, 6). Robinson's identification of it with the village of Kades in Upper Galilee, about 4½ miles northwest from the waters of Merom, has met with general acceptance.

3. A city of Issachar given to the Gershonite Levites (1 Chron. vi. 72; in Josh. xxi. 28 Kishion, A. V. Kishon). See KISHION.

Ke-hel'a-thah [an assembly].

A station of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. xxxiii. 22, 23). Not identified.

Ke'l'ah.

A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv. 44; 1 Chron. iv. 19). The Philistines fought against it, but David attacked them and delivered the town. Nevertheless he did not remain in the town when Saul approached, lest the men of Keilah should surrender him to Saul (1 Sam. xxiii. 1-13). The town was inhabited after the captivity (Neh. iii. 17, 18). The identification with Kila, a ruined village 8½ miles northwest of Hebron, is scarcely tenable; for Kila is in the mountains and Keilah was situated in the lowland.

Ke-la'iah [perhaps, contempt]. See KELITA.

Kel'i-ta [dwarf].

A Levite, called also Kelaiah, who was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 23). He was employed with others by him to read and interpret the law to the people (Neh. viii. 7), and with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (x. 10).

Kem'u-el [perhaps, congregation of God].

1. Son of Nahor and Milcah, and head of a younger branch of the Aramæans (Gen. xxii. 21).

2. A prince of the tribe of Ephraim and a commissioner for the allotment of Canaan (Num. xxxiv. 24).

3. A Levite, father of Hashabiah (1 Chron. xxvii. 17).

Ke'nan. See CAINAN.

Ke'nath [possession].

A town on the western slope of the Jebel Hauran, on the extreme northeastern border of Israelitish territory. It was the most easterly of the ten cities of the Decapolis (Pliny, Hist. Nat., 5, 16), and was near Bostra (Jerome, Onom.). Imposing ruins of it still remain, which bear the name Kanawat.

It was taken by Nobah, probably a Manassite, who called it after his own name (Num. xxxii. 42). The new name, however, did not permanently supplant the old one. The town passed again into gentile hands (1 Chron. ii. 23). Herod the Great was defeated here by the Arabians (War i. 19, 2).

Ke'naz [perhaps, hunting]

1. A descendant of Esau through Eliphaz (Gen. xxxvi. 11). He became a chieftain in mount Seir (15), probably taking his title from the clan which he ruled (40-43). The reference in Josh. xv. 17; 1 Chron. iv. 13 is probably likewise to the tribe. See KENZIZITE.

2. A descendant of Caleb, son of Jephunneh (1 Chron. iv. 15). A name has evidently dropped out of the text before it.

Ke'nez-ite. See KENZIZITE.

Ke'nite.

A tribe of which a branch dwelt in Canaan or vicinity in the time of Abraham (Gen. xv. 19), while another portion of the same people settled in Midian, and by the time of Moses had become incorporated with the Midianites (Judg. i. 16; iv. 11; cp. Num. x. 29). The Midianite Kenites may, however, have been merely a tribal family descended from a man of Midian named Can, and have had nothing in common with the Kenites who dwelt in Canaan. The latter occupied rocky fastnesses near to Amalek (Num. xxiv. 20-22). It may perhaps be gathered from this that before the conquest of Canaan the Kenites dwelt in the rugged, rocky country northeast of the Amalekites and to the east and southeast of Hebron. Hobab the Midianite, of the family of the Kenites, accompanied the Israelites on their march from mount Sinai to Canaan to aid them with his knowledge of the country (Num. x. 29-32). When the Israelites crossed the Jordan, encamped at Gilgal, and took Jericho, Hobab's family pitched their tents at Jericho; but after the conquest of Canaan they cast in their lot with the tribe of Judah, and settled in the wilderness of Judah, south of Arad and southeast of Hebron (Judg. i. 16). This choice perhaps indicates that they were indeed a branch of the old Kenite tribe of Canaan and sought the home of their forefathers. One Kenite, however, did not care to dwell with his brethren in the south, but took up his abode near Kedesh in Naphtali (Judg. iv. 11). The Kenites who settled in the south of Judah were still there in friendly relations with the Israelites in the time of Saul and David (1 Sam. xv. 6; xxvii. 10; xxx. 29). They had their registry with Judah (1 Chron. ii. 55).

Ken'iz-zite, in A. V. Kenezite, save once (Gen. xv. 19).

One of the tribes in or near Canaan in the time of Abraham (Gen. xv. 19). Found settled in mount Seir, it became subject to the victorious descendants of Esau, when they took possession of the country (Deut. ii. 12), amalgamated with the conquerors, and looked to one of Esau's descendants as its head. This chieftain was known as Kenaz from the tribe which he ruled (Gen. xxxvi. 11, 15, 40-42). Individuals of the tribe, on the other hand, united with the sons of Jacob, Jephunneh the Kenizzite apparently taking to wife a woman of the tribe of Judah, and Othniel the Kenizzite becoming the first judge of Israel after the conquest. See CALEB 2.

Ker-en-hap'puch [the horn of paint].

The youngest of Job's three daughters born after his great trial (Job xlii. 14).

Ke'ri-oth, in A. V. once Kiriath (Amos ii. 2) [cities]

1. A town in the extreme south of Judah, properly Keriath-hezron (Josh. xv. 25). The same as Hazor 2 (q. v.). Possibly it was the birthplace of Judas Iscariot, as the latter half of the name means man of Keriath.

2. A town of Moab (Moabite Stone 13; Jer. xlviii. 24), apparently fortified (41). It possessed palaces (Amos ii. 2). It is supposed to be a synonym of Ar, the ancient capital of Moab, because it seems to be referred to as the capital (ibid.), and because in enumerations of the towns of Moab when Keriath is cited Ar is omitted (Jer. xlviii; Moabite Stone) and vice versa (Is. xv., xvi. cp. Josh. xiii. 16-21). Unidentified; not Kureiyât, for which see KIRIATHAIM.

Ke-ri-oth-hez'ron. See KERIOTH 1 and HAZOR 2.

Ke'ros [the reed of a weaver's loom]

Founder of a family of Nethum, members of which returned from captivity (Ezra ii. 44; Neh. vii. 47).

Ket'tle. See POT.

Ke-tu'rah [incense].

One of Abraham's wives (Gen. xxv. 1; cp. xvi. 3). The narrative is found at the close of the history of Abraham. It owes its position to literary considerations, which obtain throughout the book of Genesis, and not to chronological ones. The writer is in the habit of giving a brief account of the subordinate line of descendants, and forthwith dismissing them from his pages in order to proceed with the main history. From all that appears Abraham may have taken Keturah to wife long before the death of Sarah. She became the ancestress of the tribes of Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah (Gen. xxv. 1, 2; 1 Chron. i. 32). Her sons were not regarded as on the same level with Isaac, and their father gave them gifts and sent them away during his lifetime to the east country (Gen. xxv. 6). A tribe Keṭūra is mentioned in late Arabian genealogies as dwelling near Mecca.

Key.

An instrument for turning bolts (Judg. iii. 25). An oriental key consists of a piece of wood with pegs fastened on it corresponding to small holes in a wooden bolt within. See LOCK. It is generally carried in the girdle, but occasionally it is fastened to something else and borne over the shoulder (cp. Is. xxi. 22). The key is the symbol of authority (ibid.; Mat. xvi. 19; Rev. i. 18; in. 7; ix. 1; xx. 1). It is also the symbol of access to that from which one would otherwise be shut out (Luke xi. 52).

Ke-zí'ah, in A. V. Kezia [cassia].

The second of Job's daughters born after his great trial (Job xlii. 14).

Ke'ziz. See EMEK-KEZIZ.

Kib'roth-hat-ta'a-vah [the graves of lust]

A place in the Sinaitic peninsula, between mount Sinai and Hazeroth, where the Israelites were buried who were slain by a plague for lust after the flesh pots of Egypt (Num. xi. 33-35, xxxiii. 16, 17; Deut. ix. 22). In 1870 Palmer and Drake believed that they had found the site at Erweis el-Ebeirg, a day's journey from 'Am el-Hudera. It is an elevated table-land well adapted for the encampment of a great multitude, and Kid.

A young goat. It was highly esteemed as an article of food (Luke xv. 29). The flesh was boiled and eaten (Judg. vi. 19), being sometimes cooked in milk (Ex. xxiii. 19). The law probably did not prohibit the use of a sucking kid for food, but forbade that it be cooked in its own mother's milk. The relation between even a lower animal and its offspring was sacred and should not be disregarded by man. A kid might be used as a burnt offering (Judg. xiii. 15, 19). The Hebrew words, Sa'ir and S'uah, rendered kid of the goats in A. V., are translated by goat and he goat in R. V. (Gen. xxxvii. 31; and wherever kid occurs in Lev., Num., and Ezek.). See GOAT.

Kid'ron, in A. V. of 1 Mac. and N. T. Cedron [dark, turbid]

1 A ravine which begins about half an hour's walk to the northwest of Jerusalem near the so-called tombs of the judges, trends for a mile and a half toward the southeast, turns sharply to the south and continues in this direction past the city as far as the valley of Hinnom and En-rogel. Here it bends again to the southeast and pursues a tortuous course to the Dead Sea. No stream flows in it except during continuous heavy rains in winter, and there is no evidence that its bed was ever occupied by a perennial brook. Indeed, the word brook, which is connected with it in the English version, represents a Hebrew word which commonly either means a ravine occupied by the channel of a torrent dry during the hot season or denotes the winter torrent itself. By writers who use Greek, the Kidron is expressly called winter brook (John xviii. 1; 1 Mac. xii. 37). The name may be derived from the turbid water of the winter torrents or from the gloominess of the valley, especially in its lower part. To speakers of the Greek language, the Greek form of the name suggested the word for cedar and the rivulet came to be frequently called the brook of the cedars (John xviii. 1, R. V. margin; 2 Sam. xv. 23, codex Vat.). The Kidron separates Jerusalem from the mount of Olives and had to be crossed by those going from the city to Bethany or Jericho (2 Sam. xv. 23). It was regarded as the eastern boundary of the city (1 Kin. ii. 37; Jer. xxxi. 40). The portion of the valley lying near the southern part of the city was early used as a common burying ground (2 Kin. xxiii. 6); and godly kings, who from time to time found it necessary to cleanse the temple of idolatrous symbols, made the Kidron valley the dumping place for the ashes of these abominations (1 Kin. xv. 13; 2 Chron. xxix. 16; xxx. 14; 2 Kin. xxiii. 4). Athaliah is reported to have been led away to the Kidron for execution that the temple might not be defiled by her blood (Antiq. ix. 7, 3).

King.

The head of that form of state which is specifically called a kingdom. The title formerly implied autocratic power. Nimrod ruled over a kingdom in Babylonia containing several cities (Gen. x. 10). Chedorlaomer was king of Elam and head of a confederacy of kings (xiv. 1, 5). Pharaoh held sway over the princes of Egypt (xii. 15). Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon and Artaxerxes the Persian were each a king over kings (Ezra vii. 12; Dan. ii. 37, cp. 2 Kin. xxiv. 17). In Canaan in the time of Abraham the rule of a king was often over one town only (Gen. xiv. 2, 18; xx. 2). Some centuries later Joshua enumerated thirty-one kings whom he had conquered within the bounds of Canaan (Josh. xii. 7-24). It was not until centuries after the tribes and nations adjacent to Palestine had been ruled by kings, that the Israelites demanded a visible monarch. Although the demand when made was prompted by unbelief and in so far was rebellion against Jehovah, yet it was not in itself at variance with the theocracy and the invisible, but efficient, rule of Jehovah; for the theocracy in its very institution contemplated the administration of the several offices of government by human agents; see THEOCRACY. Moses foresaw the need that would arise for a visible king and he provided for the event, just as provision was made for prophets and priests to make known the will or legislation of Jehovah and for judges to represent the unseen Judge (Deut. xvii. 14-20). When the king was chosen the theocracy was not abolished. The nominally uncontrolled sovereign was required to be the vicegerent of Jehovah; and when Saul, mistaking his position, sought to act independently, another was chosen to supersede him and his posterity on the throne. The same rule obtained with all Saul's successors; when they gave up fidelity to Jehovah, they forfeited their title to the kingdom (1 Kin. xi. 31-36). For the succession of kings who ruled in Judah and Israel, see CHRONOLOGY.

A man became king of a nation through appointment to the office by one higher in authority (1 Sam. ix. 16, xvi. 1, 13; 2 Kin. xxiii. 33, 34; xxiv. 17), by the choice of the people (1 Sam. xviii. 8; 2 Sam. v. 1-3; 1 Kin. xii. 20; 2 Kin. xxiii. 30), by usurping a throne (1 Kin. xv. 27, 28), or by inheritance (xi. 36). The ceremony of coronation among the Israelites consisted regularly in placing on the throne, putting the crown upon the head, anointing with oil, and proclamation (2 Kin. xi. 12; cp. 1 Sam. x. 24, 2 Sam. ii. 4, v. 3; 1 Kin. i. 34; 2 Kin. xxiii. 30). It was doubtless regularly accompanied by sacrifice, and sometimes also by a solemn procession (1 Sam. xvi. 2, 5, 1 Kin. i. 25, 43-46). The king often led the army to battle in person (Gen. xiv. 5, Num. xxi. 23, 1 Sam. viii. 20; xiv. 20), made treaties in behalf of himself and his people (Gen. xxi. 22-32, 1 Kin. xv. 19), enacted laws and executed them (Esth. iii. 12, 13; vii. 7-12, Dan. iii. 4-6, 29; vi. 6-9), exercised judicial functions (2 Sam. x. 2; Is. xxxiii. 22), and had the power of life and death (2 Sam. xiv. 1-11; 1 Kin. i. 51, 52; ii. 24-34; Esth. iv. 11; vii. 9, 10). The restraints upon the king were the fear of God and man. The popular will might not always be ignored (1 Sam. xiv. 45; xv. 24). The endurance of the people might not be overtaken with impunity (1 Kin. xii. 4). There were officers of religion, both priests and prophets, who in religious matters were independent of the king and did not hesitate to rebuke misdemeanors (1 Sam. xiii. 10-14; xv. 10-31; 2 Sam. xii. 1-15; 1 Kin. xviii. 17, 18; xxi. 17-22; 2 Chron. xxvi. 16-21). But a despotic king sometimes broke through these restraints (1 Sam. xxii. 17-19; 1 Kin. xii. 13-16; Jer. xxvi. 20-23). In view of the royal duties and prerogatives, the king required physical, mental, and moral qualities of a high order to rule well.

Physical superiority is appreciated the moment it becomes visible. Thus, when Saul was presented to his future subjects, and they saw him tower head and shoulders above all the multitude present, they raised the shout, "God save the king" (1 Sam. x. 23, 24; cp. also xvi. 7). In order to be an able judge the king must be a man of penetration, able to disentangle truth from falsehood, and punish, not the innocent, but the guilty. This is the reason why there was such emotion among the Israelites when Solomon, trying his first case, that of the two women and the child, so signally detected where the truth and where the falsehood lay (1 Kin. iii. 28; cp. Is. xi. 1-9). But penetration was not enough, the moral element was requisite to make the sovereign give, without fear or favor, the verdict which he considered just. For the protection of his person and assistance in the discharge of his duties the king had a bodyguard, the captain of which generally acted as executioner (2 Sam. xv. 18; xx. 23 with 1 Kin. ii. 25, 29), see GUARD. Wealthy kings had magnificent palaces, surrounded themselves with luxury, and lived in state (1 Kin. x). See also SEPULCHER.

God is compared to a king possessed of unlimited power, and using it under the influence of supreme beneficence (Ps. v. 2, x. 16). He is the King of kings (1 Tim. vi. 15). Christ is a king. He called himself so, but explained that his kingdom is not of this world (John xvii. 33-38). He also is the King of kings (Rev. xix. 16).

King'dom.

1. The territory or the people ruled over by a king (2 Kin. xv. 19).

2. The sovereign rule of God over the universe (1 Chron. xix. 11; Ps. xxii. 28; cxlv. 13; Mat. vi. 13).

3. A sovereignty which Daniel predicted God would establish on earth, and which, when once set up, should remain forever. In distinction from the kingdoms of this world, which are exhibited under the figure of beasts, the kingdom of God has for its representative a person like unto a son of man (Dan. vii. 13, 14, R. V.). John the Baptist and our Lord declared that it was at hand (Mat. iii. 2; iv. 17). Jesus taught his disciples to pray for its coming (vi. 10), instructed his apostles on their first mission to say that it was at hand (x. 7), spoke of it afterwards as having come (xii. 28), and illustrated its nature by parables. It is called the kingdom of heaven and the kingdom of God. Matthew prefers the former and Mark and Luke the latter designation (cp. Mat. xiii. 24, 31, 33, 44, 45 with Mark iv. 11, 26, 30, Luke xiv. 15; xvii. 20, etc.). The kingdom is spiritual in character, and no carnal weapons may be used in its establishment (John xviii. 33-37). Commenced on earth with the royal ministry of Christ, it shall be consummated amid the bliss of the eternal world (Mat. xxv. 31-46; Luke xxiii. 42, 43). The kingdom of God is thus the "invisible church." It is the whole spiritual commonwealth of God's children, the true company of all faithful people. It is represented by the organized or visible church, but is more comprehensive and greater than the visible church in any age or all ages.

Kings, Books of the.

The two Books of the Kings were originally one book, but were divided in the Septuagint into two. They are placed among "the prophets" in the Hebrew canon, in that group of Scriptures which, because standing first among the prophets, were known as "former prophets." The writings of the former prophets form a continuous narrative which begins at the death of Moses and ends with the exile. Joshua is the first book in the series and the Books of the Kings are the last. These latter were written to point out the religious teaching of the national history during the period of the kingdom from the accession of Solomon. The author shows the growth and decay of the kingdom, indicates the causes which worked to effect these results, and draws attention to the large part played by forces of a moral and religious character (cp. 2 Kin. xvii). His narrative covers a period of more than four hundred years, and he is consequently dependent upon former historians for his facts. He draws chiefly from the "book of the chronicles of the kings of Israel" (1 Kin. xiv. 19), down to the death of Pekah, and the "book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah" (29), down to the death of Jehoaikim. It is generally believed that these chronicles were originally, as the titles suggest, two separate works. Probably they were ultimately united into one and constituted the work quoted by the chronicler as the "book of the kings of Judah and Israel" (2 Chron. xvi. 11). These two chronicles contained more than the present Books of the Kings, for the writer of Kings refers his readers to them for further details (1 Kin. xv. 19, 29), and the chronicler quotes portions which the writer of Kings does not (2 Chron. xxvii. 7; xxxiii. 18). It is commonly held that these two chronicles were not the public annals, but a compilation from several documents. This opinion is based on the fact that writings of various prophets are mentioned as having been inserted in the book of the kings of Israel (2 Chron. xx. 34; cp. xxxii. 32), which could not have been done if the book were the state annals added to from day to day by the royal scribe. The double chronicles were written before the fall of Jerusalem; for the phrase "unto this day" refers, so far as can be determined, invariably to the time when the city and temple were in existence (1 Kin. vii. 8); and if it does not prove that the writer of the present books of the Kings lived before the exile, it at least shows that the writer of the book from which he quotes did. Whether the writer of the present Books of the Kings began the work before the destruction of Jerusalem or not, he did not complete it until after the middle years of the Babylonian exile (2 Kin. xxv. 27). He perhaps finished it before the close of the exile, since the work contains no allusion to the deliverance of the people from Babylon.

The author is chiefly concerned with the history of the Davidic monarchy. Like the author of Genesis, he disposes of subsidiary matters before treating his main theme. In following this method, he records events relating to Israel before giving the contemporaneous history of Judah. This leads him to sometimes narrate the same event in connection with both the northern and the southern kingdoms (1 Kin. xv. 16 with 32; 2 Kin. xvii. 5, 6 with xviii. 9).

The work is divided into three parts. I. The reign of Solomon (1 Kin. i-xi). II. A synchronistic account of the kingdoms of Judah and Israel until the captivity of Israel (xii.-2 Kin. xvii.). III. The kingdom of Judah until the Babylonian exile.

Kir [wall, fortified town].

1. The place from which the Aramæans migrated to Syria (Amos ix. 7), and to which those of them living in Damascus were carried back again on being conquered by the Assyrians (2 Kin. xvi. 9; Amos i. 5). Its inhabitants are represented as arrayed with Elam against Judah (Is. xxii. 6). Not identified. Gesenius' doubtful identification of it with a region called Kur, between the Black and the Caspian seas, is groundless. Nor is Schrader's identification of it with Media probable (cp Is. xxi. 2 with xxii. 6), for there is no reason for believing that the Aramæans came from Media. Furrer's identification with the district Cyrrhestica, northwest of Antioch, lacks proof.

Kir of Mo'ab.

A fortified city of southern Moab (Is. xlv. 1), thought to be Kir-hareseth and Kir-heres (xvi. 7, 11; Jer. xlviii. 31, 36; in A. V. sometimes Kir-haraseth and Kir-harsh). It was strong enough to resist the combined forces of Israel, Judah, and Edom (2 Kin. iii. 25). Its modern name, traceable back to the Targum, is Kerak. It is 11 miles east from the southern bay of the Dead Sea, south of the Lisan or tongue, and 18 south of the Arnon river. It stands on a triangular hill, at an elevation of 3323 feet above the Mediterranean, on a rocky platform which rises at its southeastern extremity to 3720 feet. Except at one or two spots, the hill is isolated from the neighboring hills by precipices falling sheer down to the deep valleys below. Its weak point for military purposes is that it is commanded by adjacent hills 4050 feet high. Kerak constitutes a triangle from 2400 to 3000 feet on each side. It is entered by two arched tunnels, probably of Roman age. There are remains of Roman crusading, and Mohammedan times. There is a great castle which was built by king Fulco about A. D. 1131, and which from 1183 to 1188 defied the efforts of Saladin to effect its capture. Kerak was also found impregnable by Ibrahim Pasha in 1841. Its present population is believed to be about 8000, of whom 1600 are Christians.

Kir-har'a-seth, Kir-har'e-seth, Kir-ha'-resh, Kir-he'res [city of bricks or city of pottery]. See KIR of MOAB.

Kir'i-ath, in A. V. Kirjath [city].

A town of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 28), sometimes identified with Kirjath-jearim.

Kir-i-a-tha'im, in A. V. sometimes Kir-ja-tha'im [twin cities].

1. An ancient city of the Emim (Gen. xiv. 5), rebuilt by the Reubenites (Num. xxxii. 37; Josh. xiii. 19), which afterwards fell into the hands of the Moabites (Moabite Stone 10; Jer. xlviii. 1, 23; Ezek. xxv. 9). It is believed that its site was at Kureiyât, north of the Arnon, and 2½ miles south by east of Ataroth. The ruins are on two hills.

2. The same as Kartan (q. v.) (1 Chron. vi. 76).

Kir-i-ath-ar'ba, in A. V. Kirjath-arba [city of Arba, or perhaps, city of the croucher].

An old name for the city of Hebron, pointing to the fact that it was the city of Arba, or the Arba, father of Anak. Perhaps he was its founder (Gen. xxiii. 2; Josh. xiv. 15, xv. 13, 54; xx. 7; xxi. 11; Judg. i. 10). The old name was not obsolete even in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. xi. 25). See HEBRON.

Kir-i-ath-ba'al, in A. V. Kirjath-baal [city of Baal]. See KIRIATH-JEARIM.

Kir-i-ath-hu'zoth, in A. V. Kirjath-hu-zoth [city of streets].

A Moabite town near Bamoth-baal (Num. xxii. 39, 41). It may have been the same as Kiriathaim.

Kir-i-ath-je'a-rim, in A. V. Kirjath-jearim [city of woods or forests].

A town belonging originally to the Gibeonites (Josh. ix. 17). It was on the western part of the boundary line between the tribes of Judah and Benjamin (Josh. xv. 9; xvii. 14, 15), but pertained to Judah, being considered a town belonging to the hill country of the latter tribe (xv. 48, 60; Judg. xviii. 12). After the ark had been returned to the Israelites by the Philistines, it remained in safe custody in Kiriath-jearim for the next twenty years, until the second battle of Ebenezer, and longer (1 Sam. vi. 19-vii. 2). Some of its population returned from captivity (Neh. vii. 29; in Ezra ii. 25 the name appears as Kiriath-arim). It was called also Kiriath-baal (Josh. xv. 60; xviii. 14), Baalah (xv. 9, 11), or Baale (2 Sam. vi. 2; cp. 1 Chron. xiii. 6).

Eusebius states that it was situated 9 or 10 Roman miles from Jerusalem on the road to Diospolis, i. e. Lydda, and accordingly it is commonly identified with Kuriet el-'Enab, 7 miles west by north of Jerusalem. Conder argues for the ruins 'Erma, 11 miles west by south of Jerusalem, and 2½ south by west of Kesla. But contrary to his opinion, Josh xv 10 is surely against the location proposed by him. 'Erma and Jearim are also radically different, and the site is too remote from the other Gibeonite settlements.

1 A Benjamite, son of Jeiel (1 Chron. viii. 30, ix. 35, 36).

2 A Benjamite, father of king Saul and son of Abiel (1 Sam. ix 1), but also registered as a son of Ner and a descendant of Jeiel of Gibcon (1 Chron viii 33, ix 36, 39). This latter genealogy may indeed merely register the fact that Kish was a descendant of Ner, without implying that he was his immediate son; and allow of the insertion of Abiel and others between Kish and Ner.

But perhaps only one Kish and one Ner descended from Jeiel. If so the explanation of the genealogy is that Ner's descendants became two tribal houses, those of Kish and Ner. The former, the important royal family of Saul, looked to Ner's son Kish as its founder; but it was merely a younger branch of the older, but less distinguished, line of Ner. Both houses belonged to the family of Jeiel, and hence Kish as well as Ner is registered, according to the familiar principle, among Jeiel's sons (ix. 36). Saul's father, Kish, and Abner's father, Ner, are mentioned as sons of Abiel also (1 Sam. ix. 1; xiv. 51), and either Ner or Abner is stated to have been Saul's uncle (xiv. 50). Abiel may be, as some expositors suppose, or may not be, another name or the uncorrupted form of Jeiel.

3 A Levite, in David's time, of the family of Merari, house of Mahli (1 Chron. xxiii. 21, 22; xxiv. 29)

4. A Levite, family of Merari and son of Abdi, who aided in the revival under Hezekiah (2 Chron xxix 12).

5. A Benjamite, an ancestor of Mordecai (Esth ii. 5)

Kish'1. See KUSHAIAH.

Kish'1-on, in A. V. once Kishon (Josh. xxi 28) [hardness]

A border town of Issachar (Josh. xix. 20), given to the Gershonite Levites (xxi. 28). In 1 Chron vi 72 Kedesh appears in its stead, probably by a copyist's error. Site unknown.

Ki'shon, in A. V. once Kison (Ps. lxxxiii 9) [bending, curving, tortuous].

1. The most important river of Palestine next to the Jordan. "That ancient river, the river Kishon" swept away the soldiers of Sisera's beaten army when they fled northward from Taanach and attempted to cross the stream (Judg. v. 19-21, Ps lxxxiii. 9). The priests of Baal who had the contest with Elijah were slain on its southern bank (1 Kin xviii. 40). It is now called the Nahr el-Mukutta'. Conder and Kitchener state that its real source is near Khurbet el-Mezrah and the springs called el-Mujahiyah, the place of bursting forth of water. From this spot, which is only a little west of Beth-shean, a series of pools extends, and then a continuous stream. As the name Kishon implies, the river is tortuous, making great curves as it proceeds in a generally northwesterly direction through the plain of Esdraelon. It looks an insignificant stream, of 15 or 18 feet across, but has treacherous banks, and a muddy bottom, so much so that when the Turks and Arabs were defeated by the French in the battle of mount Tabor, on April 16, 1799, the fate of the vanquished host was the same as that of Sisera's army. Toward Harosheth of the gentiles, Jabin's city, the Kishon runs through a narrow gorge under the cliffs which constitute the northern side of mount Carmel, the water at one place being nearly hidden by oleander bushes. Then the stream enters the plain of Acre. Sand dunes, dotted with palm trees, interfere with it in the latter part of its course, and it is only when full of water that it can overcome the obstacle, and make a proper entrance into the Mediterranean.

2. A town, so spelled in A. V. See KISHION.

Kiss.

A salutation, common in the Orient from patriarchal times onward, between persons of the same sex and to a limited extent between individuals of different sexes. Fathers and mothers kissed their children and descendants (Gen. xxi. 28, 55; xlviii 10; 2 Sam. xiv 33, etc.), and children their parents (Gen. xxvii. 26, 27; 1. 1, 1 Kin. xix 20). Brother and sister kissed each other (Song viii. 1), and brother kissed brother (Gen. xlv. 15; Ex. iv 27). So did other relatives and kinsfolk (Gen. xxix 11, Ex. xviii. 7; Ruth i 9). Comrades kissed each other, so did friends (1 Sam. xx 41; 2 Sam. xix 39, xx. 9; Acts xx 37). In the time of our Lord, a guest invited to a house expected on entering to be kissed by his entertainer (Luke vii 45). It was in these circumstances that Christians were enjoined to salute each other with a holy kiss (Rom. xvi 16, 1 Cor. xvi 20, 2 Cor. xiii 12; 1 Thes v 26), or with a kiss of love (1 Pet. v 14), symbolical of Christian brotherhood. As kissing between friends, guests, and entertainers lapsed, the salutation enjoined by the apostle fell also into desuetude. In all the foregoing cases a kiss was, or at least professed to be, an expression of love. It therefore added to the baseness of Judas' treachery that he had not merely betrayed his Lord, but did so by means of a kiss (Mat. xxvi. 48, 49, Luke xxii. 47, 48; cp. Prov. xxvii. 6). In all love there is a greater or less amount of respect. The feet of kings were kissed in token of great respect and to tender allegiance (Ps. ii 12), and the same idea was involved in the kiss given to idols (1 Kin. xix. 18; Hos. xiii 2). A kiss was sometimes thrown by the hand to the idol (Job xxxi. 27). When women kissed the feet of our Lord, it indicated the unbounded respect and affection which they felt for his character and work (Luke vii. 38, 45).

Common Kite of Palestine.

Kite.

A bird of prey of the falcon family, with long, pointed wings and usually long, forked tail. The word is used in R. V. to render the Hebrew Da'ah and Dayyah (Lev. xi. 14; Deut. xiv. 13; Is. xxxiv. 15; in A. V. vulgure) and twice in A. V. to render 'Ayyah (Lev. xi. 14; Deut. xiv. 13; in R. V. falcon). Both birds were ceremonially unclean (Lev. xi. 14). The Hebrew name of the former corresponds to the Arabic hadayyeh, vernacular for the kite. It is of various kinds (Deut. xiv. 13). The black kite (Milvus nigrans) is found in central and southern Europe, northern Africa, and western Asia. It appears in Palestine in March, gliding noiselessly in the air, looking down for its food, which consists of offal, for, being a somewhat cowardly bird, it does not molest poultry. It breeds in trees, ornamenting its nest with rags of different colors. The black-winged kite (Elanus caeruleus) also occurs in Palestine, but is rare. Kith'lish, in R. V. Chithlish.

A village in the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv 40). Not identified.

Kit'ron.

A town in the territory of Zebulun, but from which the Canaanites were not driven out (Judg. i 30). Compare KATTATH.

Kit'tim or Chittim, the latter being the more consistent, and in A. V. more frequent spelling [origin and meaning unknown].

Descendants of Javan, who inhabited Cyprus and other islands and coasts of the eastern Mediterranean (Gen. x 4, 1 Chron. i 7, Is. xxiii 1, 12, Jer. ii 10, Ezek. xxvii 6, and Dan. xi 30, where the language of Num. xxiv. 24 is used, Antiq. i 6, 1). The name is connected definitely with Cyprus, chiefly through Kitium, an ancient town on the southern coast of the island, and through the Kiti, whom Thothmes III mentions as possessing the island. The name was eventually greatly extended. In 1 Mac. i 1 Alexander the Great is said to have come out of the land of Chittim, and in viii 5 Perseus is called king of Chittim, meaning Macedonia.

Egyptians kneading Dough in a Trough.

Knead'ing Trough.

A shallow vessel, usually of wood and portable, in which dough is worked into a well-mixed mass preparatory to baking (Ex. xii 34). The Egyptians kneaded the dough with their feet (Herod. ii. 36) or with their hands.

Knife.

The Hebrews used a knife which they called ma'akeleth, eating instrument, for slaughtering animals for food or sacrifice, and for cutting up the carcass (Gen. xxii. 6, Judg. xix. 29; cp. Lev. viii. 20; ix. 13). Another word, heleb, which commonly signifies a sword, denotes a knife made of flint (Josh. v. 2), and perhaps a knife for shaving (Ezek. v. 1; in R. V. sword): see FLINT. The Egyptians also, when embalming a corpse, used a sharp stone knife for making an incision in the body (Herod. ii. 86). The Hebrew scribes sharpened the stylus with a small knife (Jer. xxxvi. 23). Herod the Great was accustomed to use a knife for paring fruit, and attempted to kill himself with it (Antiq. xvii. 7, 1).

Knop.

1 The rendering of the Hebrew Kaphtor in Ex. xxv. 33-36, xxxvii. 17-22, where it constitutes a part of the candlestick used in the tabernacle. In other passages the Hebrew word apparently denotes the capital of a column (Amos ix. 1, Zeph. ii. 14, both R. V.). It seems to have been some projecting support for the branches of the candlestick, and for the corollas of the ornamental flowers; but its precise nature is unknown. Josephus perhaps states that it represented a pomegranate (Antiq. iii. 6, 7), but his words are not clear.

2. The rendering of the Hebrew P'la'im (1 Kin. vi. 18; vii. 24), an ornament cut in cedar, and associated with open flowers in the woodwork of Solomon's temple. Since the feminine form of the word denotes wild gourds, the R. V. places gourds on the margin of the first passage, as if the ornament was shaped like a gourd.

Ko'a.

A people named between Babylonians and Assyrians (Ezek. xxiii. 23), located by Friedrich Delitzsch east of the Tigris, south of the lower Zab.

Ko'hath [perhaps, assembly].

A son of Levi and founder of the great Kohathite family (Gen. xlii. 11; Ex. vi. 16, 18).

Ko'hath-ite.

A member of the great Levite family founded by Kohath. This was subdivided into the families or houses of the Amramites, the Izharites, the Hebronites, and the Uzzielites (Ex. vi. 18; Num. iii. 27). Moses and Aaron were of the Kohathite family (Ex. vi. 20). The Kohathites pitched on the south side of the tabernacle in the wilderness (Num. iii. 29). When the priests had covered the sanctuary and its vessels, the Kohathites carried them, but were not to touch any holy thing, lest they should die (iv. 15, 17-20, 2 Chron. xxxiv. 12). At the first census in the wilderness, the Kohathite males from a month old and upward were 8600 (Num. iii. 28), and those from thirty to fifty years old 2730 (iv. 34-37). In the subsequent allotment of cities to the family, the priests, the descendants of Aaron, had shares with the other Kohathites, the former obtaining thirteen cities out of the tribes of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin, and the latter ten cities out of the tribes of Ephraim, Dan, and Manasseh (Josh. xxi. 4, 5; 1 Chron. vi. 61, 66-70).

Ko-la'iah [voice of Jehovah]

1. Father of the false prophet Ahab (Jer. xxix. 21).

2. A Benjaminite (Neh. xi. 7).

Koph, in A. R. V. Qoph.

The nineteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet. English Q comes from the same source, but in anglicized Hebrew names c or k represents it, as in Cam and Korah. It heads the nineteenth section of Ps. cxix., in which section each verse of the original begins with this letter.

Ko'rah, in A. V. once Kore (1 Chron. xxvi. 19) and once Core (Jude 11) [ice, baldness].

1. A son of Esau by his wife Oholibamah, born in Canaan (Gen. xxxvi. 5, 14), who founded a tribe which dwelt in Edom and was ruled by a chieftain (18).

2. A son of Eliphaz and grandson of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 16). But the name has crept into the text erroneously, not being found in ver. 11, 12 or 1 Chron. i. 36.

3. A son of Hebron (1 Chron. ii. 43). See MARESHAH 2.

4. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar (Num. xvi. 1). In conjunction with the Reubenites Dathan, Abiram, and On he rebelled against Moses and Aaron. He was jealous that Aaron, a Levite of the same family as he and only his equal in rank, should have the office of priest for all Israel. The Reubenites were discontented because the leadership in Israel, which belonged to Reuben as the firstborn of Jacob, was possessed by the tribe of Levi, represented by Moses and Aaron. At length Korah and his company, sons of Levi (7), who formed a large portion of the conspirators, but not all of them, for at least Dathan and Abiram were absent (12), assembled against Moses and Aaron, publicly charged them with usurping the supremacy over the tribes, and claimed that all the congregation was holy and that any one might officiate as a priest (3). Moses replied that God would himself decide the matter, and he bade Korah and his company provide themselves with censers and be ready to offer incense on the morrow (8-11). Moses sent word to Dathan and Abiram to appear likewise on the morrow, but they refused on the ground that Moses had no right to summon them (12-15). Moses then turned to Korah, saying: "Be thou and all thy company present with censers, two hundred and fifty censers besides those of yourself and Aaron" (16-17). They did so, assembling at the tabernacle (18). Korah gathered also the whole congregation of Israel there and incited them against Moses and Aaron (19). God directed Moses and Aaron to separate themselves from the multitude that it might be destroyed, but Moses interceded for the people (20-22). Moses was then directed to bid the congregation remove from the district in the camp occupied by Korah, Dathan, and Abiram (24). It will be remembered that the division of the Levites to which Korah belonged were accustomed to pitch on the south of the tabernacle in immediate proximity to the tribe of Reuben; see CAMP. Accordingly, followed by the elders of Israel, and certainly also by Korah, Moses went to the locality where the tents of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram were pitched and warned the congregation to leave the district (25, 26). The people obeyed. Dathan and Abiram, together with their families, appeared at the door of their tents (27). The earth opened and swallowed them up with their households and Korah with his servants (32, 33, xxvi 10). The sons of Korah, however, were not destroyed (11). After the earthquake fire devoured the two hundred and fifty men that offered incense (xvi 35, cp 40). See KORHITE.

Ko'rah-ite and Ko'rath-ite. See KORHITE.

Ko're [a partridge]

1 The rebellious Levite, founder of a house (1 Chron xxvi. 19); see KORAH 4.

2 A Levite of the house of Korah (1 Chron ix 19; xxvi 1).

3 A Levite, son of Imnah, appointed over the freewill offerings during the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron xxxi 14).

Kor'hite, in R V everywhere and in A V. twice Korahite, and in A V. once Korathite.

A descendant of that Korah who was swallowed up in the wilderness as a punishment for his rebellion. The Korhites constituted a father's house among the Kohathites.

Heman the singer and Samuel the prophet were Korhites (1 Chron. vi 33-38). The descendants of Heman were organized by David as singers (xv. 17; xvi 41, 42; xxv. 4, 5). Psalms xlii (which probably once included xliii), xlv.-xlix., lxxxiv., lxxxv., lxxxvii., lxxxviii., bear the name of the family in the title. Korhites were gatekeepers (1 Chron. ix. 19; xxvi. 19) and bakers for the sanctuary, preparing the showbread and sacrificial cakes (ix 31, 32).

Koz. See HAKKOZ.

A Levite of the family of Merari, house of Mushi (1 Chron. xv. 17), in vi. 44 called Kishi.

L.

La'a-dah [order]

A man of Judah, family of Shelah. He was the father of the inhabitants of Mare-shah (1 Chron. iv. 21).

La'a-dan. See LADAN.

La'ban [white].

1. Son of Bethuel, and grandson of Nahor Abraham's brother. He lived at Haran in Paddan-aram (Gen xxiv. 10, 15; xxviii 5, 10; also xxix. 5; xxxi. 53). He was the brother of Rebekah. When he saw the valuable presents which Abraham's servant had given Rebekah, he readily allowed her to go to Canaan to become Isaac's wife (Gen xxiv 1-67). When Jacob fled from the vengeance of Esau he went to Laban his uncle. He found him the head of a household, father of several sons (xxx 35; xxxi. 1) and at least two daughters (xxix 16), owner of slaves (24, 29), and the possessor of a flock of sheep and goats (9, xxx 30; xxxi 38). Jacob remained with him at least twenty years, serving him seven for his daughter Rachel, and then, having Leah handed over to him in a fraudulent way, a second seven to obtain the daughter for whom he really cared, and then six more for cattle. At the end of the twenty years, Jacob, perceiving that his prosperity had excited the enmity of Laban and his sons, fled with his wives, his children, and his cattle, in the direction of Canaan. He was overtaken by Laban in mount Gilead, but the pursuer, warned by God not to molest Jacob, made a covenant with him, and the two parted to meet no more (Gen xxix.-xxxi). Laban worshiped the God of his fathers, the God of Nahor (xxxi 53), Jehovah (xxiv 50; xxx. 27); but he combined idolatry with his worship, making use of household gods called teraphim (xxxi 30; cp xxxv 4) and practicing divination (xxx. 27, R V.).

2 An unidentified place in the Sinaitic peninsula (Deut i 1). It is mentioned with Hazeroth; hence some have thought that it may have been the same as Libnah, the second station from Hazeroth (Num. xxxiii 20).

La'chish [perhaps, tenacious, difficult to capture]

A fortified city in the lowland of Judah (Josh xv 33, 39). At the time of the conquest of Palestine, its king was defeated and slain by Joshua (x 3-35, xii. 11). Rehoboam strengthened its defenses (2 Chron. xi 9). Amaziah, king of Judah, having fled thither from conspirators at Jerusalem, was pursued and slain in the town (2 Kin. xiv. 19; 2 Chron. xxv 27). Lachish was besieged by Sennacherib, king of Assyria; and it was from the camp in front of it that the rabshakeh was dispatched to demand the surrender of Jerusalem (2 Kin. xviii. 14, 17; cp xix. 8, and 2 Chron. xxxii. 9; Is. xxxvi. 2; xxxvii 8). Lachish is charged with being the beginning of sin to the daughter of Zion, for the transgressions of Israel were found in her (Mic. i. 13). Nebuchadnezzar again besieged Lachish, with other fenced cities of Judah (Jer xxxiv. 7). It was inhabited after the captivity (Neh. xi. 30). The site is found at Tell el-Hesi, 16 miles east by north of Gaza and 11 miles west-southwest of Beit Jibrin. Excavation has laid bare the wall of the ancient city, as well as later constructions believed to belong La'el [devoted to God].

A Gershonite, father of Eliasaph (Num. iii. 24).

La'had [oppressed, oppression].

A son of Jahath, a man of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 2)

La-hai'-roi. See BEER-LAHAI-ROI.

Lah'mam, in R V margin, Lahmas.

A village in the lowland of Judah (Josh.

Lachish assaulted by the Army of Sennacherib to the times of Rehoboam, Asa, Jehoshaphat, Uzziah, Jotham, and Manasseh. Ten towns seem to have occupied the place in succession. The lowest is called Amorite, and is reported to be about a quarter of a mile square. It was built on a bluff, about 60 feet above the stream which flowed on the east, and 40 feet above the level country on the north. A ravine protected it on the south, and another on the west. The northern wall of the town stood on the edge of the bluff. It was about 8 feet thick, with a great tower at the northeastern corner, 56 by 28 feet, with rooms about 10 feet square, enclosed by a wall 9 or 10 feet thick. Other later walls, at least twice as thick, were erected before the conquest of Canaan by the Hebrews. Flint, copper, bronze, and iron implements, with bronze weapons and large quantities of pottery have been unearthed. There were also two inscriptions found, one in old Hebrew characters, the other in cuneiform. The latter dates from about the fifteenth century B. C., and conveys the information that the king then ruling at Lachish was called Zimrida.

La'dan, in A. V. Laadan [well ordered].

1. An Ephraimite in the ancestry of Joshua (1 Chron. vii. 26).

2. A Gershonite in whom several fathers' houses had their origin (1 Chron. xxiii. 7-9; xxvi. 21).

xv. 40), thought to be possibly marked by the ruined village of el-Lahm, $2\frac{1}{2}$ miles south of Beit Jibrin.

Lah'mi.

The brother of Goliath the Gittite. He was slain by Elhanan the son of Jair (1 Chron. xx. 5). The word Lahmi, however, corresponds to the last part of the Hebrew word for Bethlehemite in 2 Sam. xxi. 19. One or other text is corrupt. See ELHANAN.

La'ish [a lion]

1. A man of Gallim, father of Palti (1 Sam. xxv. 44).

2. A Canaanite city in the extreme north of Palestine, "in the valley that lieth by Beth-rehob." The Danites captured the city, and rebuilt it, altering the name to Dan (Judg. xviii. 7-29). See DAN 3.

3. A village (Is. x. 30). See LAISHAH.

La'i-shah, in A. V. Laish [a lion]

A village in Benjamin between Gallim and Anathoth (Is. x. 30).

Lak'kum, in A. V. La'kum [obstruction].

A town of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33). Site unknown.

Lamb.

The flesh of lambs was early used as food (Lev. iii. 7 with vii. 15; 2 Sam. xii. 4, Amos vi. 4); and lambs and kids were largely offered in sacrifice even before the promulgation of the Mosaic law (Gen. iv. 4; xxii. 7). When the passover was instituted in Egypt, a lamb or a kid of the first year was sacrificed and eaten (Ex. xii. 3, 5). Under the Mosaic law a male lamb of the first year was offered for a burnt offering every morning and another every evening, while on the Sabbath there were two (Ex. xxix. 39-41; Num. xxviii. 4). On the first day of each month (Num. xxviii. 11), during the seven days of the passover (16, 19), at the feast of weeks (26, 27), on the day of blowing of trumpets (xxix. 1, 2), and on the day of atonement (7, 8), seven male lambs of the first year formed part of the special burnt offering; while at the feast of tabernacles the lambs numbered fourteen during each of the first seven days and seven on the eighth day (13-36). For all the principal sacrifices of ordinary occasions a lamb might be used; as a male lamb for a burnt offering (Lev. ix. 3; xxiii. 12, 18, Num. vi. 14, vii. 15), a ewe lamb for a sin offering for others than the nation or rulers (Lev. iv. 27, 32, Num. vi. 14), and a male or female lamb for a guilt offering (Lev. v. 6; xiv. 12, 21; Num. vi. 12) or for a peace offering (Lev. iii. 6, 7; xxiii. 19; Num. vii. 17). In every case the lamb must be without blemish. All this points to our Lord. He resembled a lamb in his spotless purity (1 Pet. i. 19). He was like a lamb also in his gentleness and in his submission to unmerited suffering without murmur or complaint (Is. liii. 7 with Luke xxiii. 25; Acts viii. 32; 1 Pet. ii. 21-23). Finally, he, like a lamb, was sacrificed for guilt not his own. Hence he is called the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world (John i. 29, 36), the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world (Rev. xiii. 8), or simply the Lamb (Rev. v. 6, 8, 12, vii. 14, 17; xiv. 1, 4). Both in the O T and in the N. T. the term lamb is at times used figuratively for child (Is. xl. 11; John xxi. 15).

La'mech [possibly, a strong young man].

1. A son of Methusael, of the race of Cain. He had two wives, Adah and Zillah. By Adah he was the father of Jabal and Jubal, and by Zillah he had a son, Tubal-cain, and a daughter, Naamah. His address to his wives, in its Hebrew reproduction, is a fine specimen of Hebrew poetry. There are two principal interpretations of Gen. iv. 23. 1. Lamech declares himself a murderer, saying, "I have slain a man." Stung by remorse, he confesses the rebuke of conscience. He had slain another to his own wounding and hurt. Or else he excuses himself for a murder committed in self-defense, having slain a man for wounding him. 2. Lamech utters a threat: "I will slay any man who wounds me," his words being a song of exultation on the invention of the sword by his son Tubal-cain, sung in anticipation of the advantage he would have in avenging wrongs done to him. The attempt has been made to explain the poem as simply an expression of Lamech's determination to put the new weapon to its lawful use; but expositors quite generally agree that Lamech is vaunting himself. If Cain, who slew a man, is under God's protection and shall be avenged sevenfold should one dare to slay him, surely Lamech with the new weapon, a visible and surer defense, shall be avenged seventy and sevenfold (Gen. iv. 18-24).

2. An antediluvian patriarch of the race of Seth. He was son of Methuselah and father of Noah. He feared the Lord, rested in God's promise for the removal of the curse of sin, and on the birth of his son Noah gave expression to the hope that this child would lead men to a better and a happier life under God's blessing, saying: "This same shall comfort us for our work and for the toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed" (Gen. v. 25, 28-31).

La'med, in A. R. V. Lamedh.

The twelfth letter of the Hebrew alphabet. English L comes from the same source, and represents it in anglicized Hebrew names. It stands at the head of the twelfth section of Ps. cxix., in which section each verse of the original begins with this letter.

Lam-en-ta'tions.

Mournful speeches or compositions, elegies such as the lament of David over Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. i. 17-27).

The Lamentations of Jeremiah are an O T book placed in the English Bible between Jeremiah and Ezekiel, but in the Hebrew Scriptures among the Hagiographa or Sacred Writings, between Ruth and Ecclesiastes. Let the English reader take note of the fact that of the five chapters of Lamentations i, ii, iv., and v. have each twenty-two verses, and iii. 22 × 3 = 66. There are twenty-two distinct letters in the Hebrew alphabet, and in chapters i, ii, and iv the verses are arranged alphabetically, verse 1 beginning with aleph, verse 2 with beth, verse 3 with gimel, and verse 4 with dalet, and so on to the end. In chap. iii the first three verses begin with aleph, the second three with beth, and so on to the end. However, in chapters ii-iv the order of the letters ain and pe is not the same as in chap. i and Ps. cxix., but is reversed, pe preceding ain. The fifth chapter has not an alphabetical arrangement. The theme of the whole five elegies or lamentations is the capture and destruction of the Jewish capital, with dreadful suffering to its defenders by famine, the sword, and outrage of every kind. The catastrophe, it is admitted, was brought on by the sins of the people, not omitting even the prophets and the priests. In various places the Jewish state is personified as a man, and bemoans its hard fate (i. 9, 11, 12-22; ii. 18-22), or the prophet, as representing the nation, speaks in the first person (ii. 11; iii. 1-51, and also 52-66). Notwithstanding that this book is anonymous, in the Hebrew being named only by its first word "How," notwithstanding also that it is arranged among the Hagiographa, critics, even of rationalistic tendencies, attribute the first four chapters to Jeremiah; the fifth or non-alphabetical chapter may, they think, possibly have come from another author. In the Septuagint the following statement is prefixed to the book: "And it came to pass after Israel was led into captivity and Jerusalem laid waste, that Jeremiah sat weeping and lamented this lamentation over Jerusalem, and said." The ascription of the book to the prophet is thus ancient, and it has been commonly, though not without exception, assigned to him by both ancient and modern scholars, the admission being general that the elegies must have been written in or near the times of Jeremiah. The prophet lamented for Josiah (2 Chron. xxxv. 25). If his elegies on the subject were committed to writing, they have been lost, and are not our present book of Lamentations.

Lamp.

A vessel designed to contain an inflammable liquid, which it is proposed to burn for illuminating purposes, and a wick to lift the liquid by capillary attraction to feed the flame (Herod. ii 62). The seven lamps of the golden candlestick of the tabernacle and temple were made of gold (Ex. xxxvii. 23; 1 Kin vii 49) and burned olive oil (Ex. xxvii. 20). Tongs were used to trim the wick, and dishes to receive the snuff (xxv 38). The ordinary lamp for domestic use was made of earthenware. It might have a cover which producing the oil. There was another opening at the margin of the cover, or else a sprout, for the wick.

The Hebrew word regularly rendered lamp is Ner. It is translated light in 2 Sam. xxi. 17, A. V., and candle in Jer. xxv. 10 and Zeph. i 12. In the latter passage, R. V. places lamp on the margin; and everywhere else in both O. and N T., except in these two passages, R. V substitutes the word lamp in the text where A. V has candle. The Hebrew word Lappid is also often rendered lamp in O. T.; for example, Judg. vii. 16, 20, A. V., and Is lxii. 1; Dan. x. 6. But it is of more general meaning. It is translated firebrand in Judg xv 4; and torch in Nah. ii. 4; Zech xii. 6; and in R. V. of Gen. xv. 17; Judg. vii. 16, 20; and lightning in Ex xx. 18. The Greek word rendered lamp in Mat. xxv 1 and Rev iv 5 is translated lights in Acts xx 8, and torches in John xviii 3 and margin of R V of Mat. xxv. 1.

The extinction of the lamp of anyone means figuratively the destruction of his family (Prov xiii. 9). At Gezer a lamp enclosed in a double bowl takes the place of the infant in a jar so frequently buried under the high place during the Amorite period as a sacrifice.

Lan'cet. See SPEAR.

Lan'guage. See TONGUE.

Lan'tern.

Lanterns were carried by the band of Roman soldiers who were sent with Judas to arrest Jesus (John xviii 3). The Romans made the sides of lanterns out of bladder or plates of translucent horn.

La-od-i-ce'a [pertaining to Laodice]

A city called originally Diospolis, city of Zeus, which was enlarged and improved by Antiochus II, and named by him Laodicea, after his wife Laodice. It was the chief city of Phrygia Pacatiana, in Asia Minor, and was situated a little south of Colossæ and Hierapolis, on the river Lycos, a tributary of the Meander. It manufactured cloth and garments from the black wool produced by a breed of sheep in its vicinity, and it was the seat of a medical school, whose physicians prepared the Phrygian powder for the cure of ophthalmia. It numbered many Jews among its inhabitants (Antiq. xiv. 10, 20). Epaphras labored there (Col iv. 12, 13), and is regarded as the founder of its Christian church. Paul felt greatly de-was either removable or made of one piece with the rest of the lamp. Near the center of the cover or top was a hole for insirous of spiritually benefiting the Laodiceans (ii 1) He sent them salutations; and he wrote a letter, of which perhaps a copy only was left at Laodicea (iv. 15, 16). It is believed to be the letter known as the Epistle to the Ephesians. Laodicea was one of the seven churches in Asia addressed in the book of Revelation. It is sharply rebuked (Rev. i. 11; iii. 14-22), and the words in which the rebuke is couched contain allusions to the products and the wealth for which the city was noted. About the year 65 of the Christian era, Laodicea, Colossæ, and Hierapolis were destroyed by an earthquake. The citizens rebuilt Laodicea out of their own resources, without the customary aid from Rome. Its ruins still exist at a place called Eskî Hissar, near Denizli, about 56 miles east-southeast of Smyrna.

Lap'pi-doth, in A. V. Lapidoth [torches]

Husband of Deborah the prophetess (Judg. iv. 4)

Lap'wing.

The rendering of the Hebrew Dukuphath in A. V. of Lev. xi. 19; Deut. xiv. 18. The lapwing (Vanellus cristatus), a member of the sub-family Charadriinae, or true plovers, is found in flocks in winter in Palestine. R. V., following the Septuagint and Vulgate, substitutes the hoopoe (Upupa epops), the type of the Upupidae, a family of fissirostral birds (birds with deeply cleft bills). The hoopoe is a bird about a foot long, grayish-brown above, with the wings and shoulders black, barred with white, and a large crest of feathers upon the head. It is found in central and southern Europe, in Asia, and in northern and central Africa. Tristram says that it appears in Palestine in March, spreading in small parties over the whole country. On the approach of winter it makes a short migration to Egypt and the Sahara.

La-se'a.

A seaport of Crete, near the Fair Havens, passed by the vessel which carried Paul (Acts xxvii. 8). In 1856 the Rev. G. Brown discovered ruins which mark the supposed site on the southern coast about 5 miles east of the Fair Havens.

La'sha [a fissure].

A place mentioned with the cities of the plain (Gen. x. 19). Jerome says it was at Callirrhoe, a ravine east of the Dead Sea, notable for its hot springs, which were visited by Herod the Great during his last illness. The gorge in which they rise is so narrow that it may quite appropriately be called a fissure. There is not room enough in it for a village of ordinary size. The stream from Callirrhoe, now called the Zerka Ma'in, enters the Dead Sea at the eastern side, about 11 miles in a direct line from the mouth of the Jordan. The springs are about 3 miles up the stream.

Las-sha'ron, in A. V. Lasharon [probably, to Sharon]

A town whose king was one of those slain by Joshua (Josh. xii. 18). The Hebrew text may, however, be read king over Sharon. The indications of the Septuagint are that the original text of the verse was "the king of Aphek [which belongs] to Sharon."

Las'the-nes [probably, very strong]

A Cretan who raised an army of mercenary soldiers for Demetrius II, by which the latter effected a landing in Cilicia and set up the standard of revolt against Alexander Balas (Antiq. xiii. 4, 3). He was rewarded with high office, perhaps the governorship of Coele-syria. Demetrius calls him kinsman and father (1 Mac. xi. 31, in A. V. cousin; 32). The latter title implies that he was a man of considerable age; the former means either that he was related to Demetrius, or that he held a high position at court. He was notified by letter of the terms of peace agreed upon between Demetrius and Jonathan Maccabæus, and of the concessions made to the Jews (32-37).

Latch'et.

The thong with which the sandal was bound to the foot (Is. v. 27; Mark i. 7, cp Gen. xiv. 23).

Lat'in.

The language spoken by the Romans. Though from the first century B. C. on for some hundred years the supreme power in Palestine was in the hands of the Romans, whose vernacular language was Latin, yet it did not root itself in that country. A few words only were adopted, as prætorum and centurio, which are written in Greek letters in Mark xv. 16, 39, 45. But since Latin was the language of the Roman officials, the inscription over the cross of Christ was written in Latin as well as in Greek and Aramaic (John xix. 20).

Lat'tice.

A network formed of crossed laths and covering a window (Judg. v. 28; Prov. vii. 6, in A. V. casement; 2 Km. i. 2; Song ii. 9.)

La'ver.

A basin or trough in which to wash. A laver of brass or copper was used in connection with the tabernacle services. It stood upon a base of brass in the court between the altar and the door of the tabernacle. Both laver and base were made of the mirrors given by the women who assembled to minister at the door of the tent of meeting (Ex xxxviii. 8; cp. xxxiii. 7). Women served at the door of the tabernacle (1 Sam ii. 22, R V), as did the Levites (Num iv. 23; viii. 24). They probably came at stated intervals, as did the Levites and priests (Deut xviii. 6; Luke i. 8, 23), to render various kinds of service, such as the performance of sacred dances and instrumental and vocal music (Ex xv. 20, Judg. xxi. 21; Ps lxviii. 25). The priests washed their hands and their feet in the laver before ministering at the altar or entering the sanctuary (Ex xxx. 17-21; Lev viii. 11). This ceremony symbolized the holiness that is required in the service of God. In Solomon's temple there were a molten sea and ten lavers instead of one (1 Km vii. 23-26, 38-40, 43). Some of the arrangements were afterwards altered by Ahaz (2 Km. xvi. 17).

Law.

Of the several meanings which the word law possesses, two are employed in Scripture.

1. A uniformly acting force which determines the regular sequence of events; any uniformly acting influence or motive which controls the will (Rom. vii. 23).

2. A rule of conduct enjoined by a competent authority and, if need be, enforced by penalties. This is the principal meaning of the word in Scripture. Many laws have commenced as customs, which, arising naturally in the intercourse between members of the same society, ultimately gained such acceptance that the community finally resolved to enforce them as laws. But a law may be imposed by a ruler, human or divine, without any reference to previous custom or legislation. In the English version law is mainly the rendering of Hebrew Torah, instruction, Aramaic Dath, perhaps meaning established, and Greek Nomos, custom, law; and it denotes, except as noted under 1, an authoritative rule of conduct whether revealed from within or from without. It may be imposed by the constituted authorities of the state, which are ordained of God (Ezra vii. 26, Esth i. 19, Dan vi. 8), or proceed immediately from God, being revealed in a supernatural manner audibly as at Sinai or through the Spirit to prophets (Zech. vii. 12) or made known in the constitution of our nature (Rom. ii. 14, 15). They who fear God and keep his commandments are wise; and the godly wisdom which they have acquired from the study of the written law, from observation of the human heart, and from a life of holiness, when given forth in instruction is the law of the wise which is a fountain of life (Prov. xiii. 14), and when taught by parents to children is the law of father and mother which to them that obey is a chaplet of grace about the head (Prov. i. 8, 9).

The term "the law" with the definite article, but without any other qualifying word, occasionally refers to the whole O T in general (John xii. 34, 1 Cor. xiv. 21; cp. John x. 34; xv. 25), but it is employed much more frequently as the title of the Pentateuch (Josh. i. 8; Neh. viii. 2, 3, 14; Mat. v. 17; vii. 12, Luke xvi. 16, John i. 17). The law of Moses was given by God through Moses (Ex. xx. 19-22; Mat. xv. 4; John i. 17). It is the law of God (Josh. xxiv. 26; 2 Chron. xxxi. 3). It was written in a book (Josh. i. 7, 8), included the legislation contained in Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy (Mark xii. 26 with Ex. iii. 6; Mark vii. 10 with Ex. xx. 12, xxi. 17; Luke ii. 22 and John vii. 22, 23 with Lev. xii. 2, 3; Mat. viii. 4 with Lev. xiv. 3, Mat. xix. 8 and xxii. 24 with Deut. xxiv. 1 and xxv. 5), and was the title of the Pentateuch, constituting the first division of the canon (Luke xxiv. 44); see PENTATEUCH. The legal portion consists of the ten commandments, which form the fundamental law of the theocracy, and statutes based on them. It was given at Sinai. The fundamental law was uttered audibly in the hearing of the whole congregation. The body of statutes controlled the general form of worship, protected human rights, regulated personal conduct, and prescribed sacred seasons and sacrifice. It was given at the same time as the ten commandments, but through Moses. See THEOCRACY. When the tabernacle was erected, the legislation was enacted which in detail regulated approach to God. See LEVITICUS. Thirty and eight years later Moses rehearsed the law publicly before the new generation, placed the emphasis where the experience of a third of a century had taught him to be advisable, and introduced modifications which the prospective change in the circumstances of the people rendered necessary. See DEUTERONOMY. It is generally held that when all that is local and temporary is put away the remaining portion of the commandments, constituting the essential part, was designed for the Christian as well as the Jewish dispensation, and will not become obsolete at any future time (cp. Ex. xx. 12 or Deut. v. 16 with Eph. vi. 2, 3). The ten commandments, being the fundamental law and a summary of the whole moral code, endure. They are founded in the immutable nature of God and in the permanent relations of men on earth. Of the fourth commandment Christ said: "The Sabbath was made for man," hence its principles remain in force while man continues on earth. Regarding the fifth commandment, the apostle Paul evidently considers both the precept and the essential part of the promise still in force, though the local or temporary portion, "the land" of Canaan, disappears, and "the earth" takes its place (Eph. vi. 2, 3). The ceremonial law apparently referred to in Heb.

viii. 7 as the first covenant, is there described as decaying and waxing old, and being ready to vanish away (13; cp also chapters viii. -x.). Hence the apostles declined to impose it on the gentile converts (Acts xv 23-29, etc.). Its function has been to point, by means of its priesthood, its sacrifices, its ceremonies, and its symbols to Christ, our great High Priest, and his atoning sacrifice for sin. When the antitype came, the types were no longer needful, though the memory of what they had been rendered them objects of interest, and will do so through all future ages. The enactments constituting the civil and criminal code of the Israelites were admirably adapted to the state of civilization which the people had then reached; but these laws were freely modified as the circumstances contemplated by them changed. Moses himself was the first to introduce modifications, and David and others made additions.

Law'yer.

One versed in the law of Moses, of which he was the professional interpreter, a scribe (Mat. xxii. 35 with Mark xi. 28), see SCRIBE. In Luke xi. 44 the words "scribes and Pharisees" are omitted in R. V., and there is no contrast between scribes and lawyers (45). The lawyers joined the Pharisees in rejecting the preaching of John the Baptist (Luke vii. 30). They considered themselves above the need of instruction from Jesus; and when one of them did condescend to hold communication with him, it was to try to puzzle him by means of a difficult question (Mat. xxii. 35; Luke x 25, cp Luke xiv. 3). Jesus denounced them at last in severe language for laying heavy burdens on the people, and keeping back from them the key of knowledge (Luke xi. 45-52).

Lay'ing on of Hands.

An act symbolizing dedication to a special purpose. The Israelites placed their hands on the heads of the Levites, dedicating them to the service of the Lord at the tabernacle in the stead of the firstborn of all the tribes. They pressed down their hands upon the heads of the Levites, doubtless with the intention of signifying thereby that, with God's permission and by his authority, they transferred their own obligation to service to the Levites (Num viii 5-20). The Israelite, who brought an animal to the sacrificial altar, placed his hands upon the victim's head, thereby dedicating it to God and making it his own representative and substitute (Lev. i 4, xvi 21). The aged Jacob laid his hands on the heads of Joseph's sons, giving them a place among his own sons, and bestowing upon them the covenant blessing, transferring it from himself as its past possessor to them (Gen. xlviii 5-20). The hands of presbytery were laid upon the head of Timothy. The young man was thereby set apart to official service and grace was bestowed (1 Tim.

iv. 14). Imposition of the hands of presbytery denoted not only commission, but also the bestowal, by those divinely authorized, of official spiritual grace; or at least it signified the authoritative recommendation of the candidate to God as a recipient of grace.

Laz'a-rus [from Hebrew 'El'azar, God hath helped]

1. The name of the beggar in the parable of the rich man and Lazarus. He was laid at the gate of the rich man desiring to be fed with the crumbs which fell from the sumptuously furnished table. He was also afflicted with ulcers. Yea, even the dogs licked his sores. Nothing is said of his and nothing of the rich man's character; but when they died Lazarus was carried by angels into Abraham's bosom, while the rich man went to the place of woe. At first sight it might appear that the one was rewarded simply for being poor, and the other punished for being rich, but the hint that the rich man's brothers, who evidently lived exactly as he had done, did not believe Moses and the prophets, and as to their life needed repentance, shows that a moral element entered into the case, and that conduct, not position, decided their ultimate destiny (Luke xvi 19-31).

2. A member of the family of Bethany, and brother of Martha and Mary. He was an object of deep affection not only to his sisters, but to Jesus, which speaks well for his character. He was chosen for the signal honor of being raised from the dead, and when he fell sick with a grievous disease the sisters sent word to Jesus, who was beyond the Jordan, but he did not respond at once. Two days later, when Lazarus was dead, Jesus went to Bethany. Being met by Martha outside the village, he had an important conversation with her in which he called forth an expression of her faith in the resurrection and in his power to do all things, and declared himself to be the resurrection and the life. When Mary had come, Jesus went with the sisters and their friends to the sepulcher, which was of the usual kind then in use among the Jews, namely, a cave either natural or artificial in the face of a rock. After the stone had been rolled away, Jesus prayed to the Father. He did this for the sake of the people that stood by, that in the miracle they might discern proof that the Father had sent him. Then he said in the hearing of all present: "Lazarus, come forth!" and the dead awoke to life and came forth (John xi 1-44). The effect of this miracle was profound. It was the cause of the enthusiastic reception of Jesus at Jerusalem. It also brought the sanhedrin to their decision to put him to death; for the people were hailing him as king, and if they should accept him and his undisguised doctrine of the spiritual nature of Christ's kingdom, all hope of their rising against the Romans and endeavoring to restore the theocracy would vanish. The rulers decided that it was better for one man to perish, whether he were guilty or not, rather than for the whole nation to be lost (xi 45-53; xii 9-19). Lazarus was present at a supper given in honor of his great benefactor by Simon the leper at Bethany six days before the pass-over (xii. 1, 2). The extent to which his restoration to life tended to bring new followers to Jesus so irritated the Jewish authorities that they plotted to put him also to death (10, 11). This is the last mention of Lazarus in Scripture. The plot to take his life does not seem to have been carried out, and in due time he doubtless died a second death, the time, the place, and the circumstances of which are all unknown.

Lead.

One of the metals known to the ancients, in Hebrew 'Ophreth. It was taken as spoil from the Moabites (Num xxxi 22), was used by the Egyptians (con. Apion 1 34), was obtained in large quantities in the peninsula of Sinai, was found in Egypt, and was imported from Tarshish (Ezek xxvii. 12). It was used for weights (Zech. v. 7), for sinkers on fish lines (Iliad xxiv. 80), and for tablets on which inscriptions were written (Tacitus, Annal ii 69, Pliny, Hist Nat xii 21, Pausanias ix. 31, 4). Job xix 24 has been understood to refer to such tablets, but the words probably mean that, since a book (23) is liable to perish, Job desires the letters to be cut in the rock and then, to render them more distinct and durable, to be filled with molten lead. It is questionable whether it was consciously employed for cupellation (Ezek. xxii. 20).

1 Foliage of a tree (Gen iii 7; viii. 11).

2 Part of the wing of a folding door, when each of the two wings was divided either lengthwise or crosswise (1 Kin vi 34; Ezek. xli 24). The leaf as well as the entire door is called deleth, because it turns on hinges or pivots. In the former passage, the door of the holy place in Solomon's temple is referred to. It was the fourth part of the wall (1 Kin vi 33); and was probably oblong like the wall itself, and measured 5 cubits in width by $7\frac{1}{2}$ in height (cp 2). The measurement presumably includes the two doorposts and the lintel, leaving an opening at least 4 cubits wide by 7 high. This was closed by two doors, each of which was divided perpendicularly or horizontally into halves. If divided horizontally through the middle, the leaf measured 2 by $3\frac{1}{2}$ cubits, or 3 by $5\frac{1}{4}$ feet, and was quite ample to afford ingress and egress to the priests in their daily ministrations, without requiring the entire door to be opened.

3 The page or column of a roll (Jer. xxxvi. 23; cp. 2).

Le'ah [wild cow].

The elder daughter of Laban. She was less attractive than her younger sister, Rachel, one chief defect being that her eyes were tender. By a trick she was passed off on Jacob as his bride, when he had served seven years for Rachel. Leah became the mother of Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, and their sister Dinah (Gen xxix 16-35; xxx. 17-21).

Leas'ing.

Lying, falsehood (Ps iv. 2; v. 6, A. V.). As the word is now obsolete R. V. substitutes falsehood and lies.

Leath'er.

The art of tanning and dying skins was understood by the Hebrews (Ex xxv. 5; Acts ix 43). Leather was used by them and other nations of antiquity for numerous purposes: for articles of clothing (Lev xiii 48; Num xxxi 20), coverings of tents (Ex. xxvi. 14), bottles (Judith x 5), shields. The leather of the shield was oiled to keep it soft and shining (2 Sam i 21; Is xxi 5). Seal or porpoise skin was used for making a superior kind of sandal (Ezek xvi 10; in A. V. badgers' skin). Elijah and John the Baptist wore leathern girdles (2 Kin i 8, Mat. iii 4).

Leav'en.

A substance used to produce fermentation in dough and make it rise (Ex xii. 15, 19; xiii 7). In Scripture times leaven generally consisted of a little old dough in a high state of fermentation. Its disadvantages were that the bread thus produced had a disagreeably sour taste and smell. To obviate these defects yeast or barm is now employed as leaven. The use of leaven was forbidden in all offerings made by fire to the Lord (Lev. ii 11). But when the offering was to be consumed by man, leaven might be used (vii. 13, xxi. 17). The principal reason for the prohibition was that fermentation is incipient corruption, and was emblematic of corruption. It is used for corrupt doctrine (Mat. xvi 11; Mark viii. 15) and for wickedness in the heart (1 Cor. v. 6-8); and it symbolized moral influence generally, whether good or bad, as when the kingdom of heaven is compared to leaven which a woman hid in three measures of meal till the whole was leavened (Mat xiii 33). The Israelites were forbidden to eat leavened bread or to have any leaven in their houses during the passover festival. The absence of leaven symbolized the incorruptness of life which God's service requires, reminded them of the haste in which they had fled out of Egypt, their dough in their troughs, and suggested the affliction of Egypt by the insipidity of the bread (Ex xii. 39; Deut. xvi. 3; 1 Cor. v. 7, 8).

Leb'an-a and Lebanah [white (this being a poetic designation for the moon)].

Founder of a family, members of which returned from captivity (Ezra ii. 45; Neh. vii. 48).

Leb'a-non [white].

A snow-clad mountain range (Jer. xviii.

14), with hills of less elevation running from it in every direction (Hos xiv 5). Its streams rendered the rich soil of the valleys extremely productive. The lower zone was covered with vines (6, 7), but the mountains were most noted for their forests of gigantic cedars. Fir trees or cypresses also abounded (1 Kin. v 6-10; 2 Kin. xix. 23; Is. xl 16; lx. 13; Zech. xi. 1). Lions and leopards roamed in the woods (2 Kin. xiv. 9; Song iv 8). The trees were felled, and the timber was used not only in the construction of palaces and temples, but also by the Phoenicians for the masts of ships (Ezra iii 7; Ezek. xxvii. 5). Lebanon was the northwestern boundary of the promised land (Deut. i 7; xi 24; Josh. i 4; xi 17; xii. 7; xiii 5). It is of limestone formation. The mountains consist of two ranges, running north and south, separated by the valley of the Litany and the Orontes. In the Grecian period the name Lebanon became restricted to the western range, while the eastern received the name Anti-Lebanon. This distinction still exists. The intervening valley is called Coësyria, that is hollow Syria, or the Bekaa. The chain may be considered to commence about 15 miles southeast of Sidon, and to run to about 12 miles northeast by north of Tripoli, a distance of about 100 miles. The greatest elevation of Lebanon is at its northern end; of Anti-Lebanon, at its southern end in mount Hermon. "For 10 miles the northern end of this ridge [of Lebanon] is over 10,000 feet above the sea. For another 10 miles it is between 7500 and 8000 feet. Then for 20 miles it sinks to an average of from 6500 to 7000 feet. Then it rises in the grand truncated cone of Jebel Sunnin to over 8500 feet. Again it sinks to the plateau between Sunnin and Keniseh, to about 6000 feet. The highest peak of Keniseh rises again to nearly 7000 feet. Then comes the pass of the Damascus road at Khan Muzhir, 5022 feet. Then the ridge of Jebel Barûk and Jebel Niha, over 40 miles long, about 6500 feet, the latter ending in the picturesque Twins (Tomât Niha). Finally, Jebel Rihân, which sinks gradually to the level of the plateau of Merj 'Ayun. Jebel Keniseh, and Jebel Sunnin, at the center of the chain, although not the highest, are from their isolation far the most imposing peaks" (Post, Qur State Exp. Fund, 1892). The highest peaks are Jebel Makmal and Kurnat es-Sauda, each about 10,200 feet. The present population of Lebanon is estimated by Dr Post at 200,000. The people live mostly in villages romantically situated on rocky platforms or on the mountain slopes.

Leb'a-oth [lionesse].

A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 32). See BETH-LEBAOTH.

Leb-bœ-us. See JUDAS 8.

Leb'ka-mal.

An artificial name (Jer. li. 1, A. R. V.), which, when the consonants are exchanged according to the system called Athbash, yields KSDIM, that is, Chaldeans. The method is explained, and another instance is cited, in the article SHESHACH.

Le-bo'nah [incense, frankincense].

A town north of Shiloh (Judg. xxi. 19). It has long been identified with Lubban, on the road between Shechem and Jerusalem, 3 miles west by north of Shiloh.

Le'cah [perhaps, going, a journey]

A village of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 21), to judge from the context. Site unknown.

Leek.

The rendering in Num. xi. 5, of the Hebrew Hasur, which commonly denotes grass. The leek (Allium porrum) is probably intended in this passage, for it is mentioned, along with onions and garlic, as eaten in Egypt; the word is so rendered by the Targum of Onkelos, Septuagint, Vulgate, and Syriac; and h'qur is used in Aramaic for the leek.

Lees.

Dregs or sediment deposited from wine or other liquor (Is. xxv. 6). The liquor was allowed to stand on the lees that its color and body might be better preserved (Is. xxv. 6).

To settle on their lees is to settle down in contentment with one's character and circumstances (Jer. xlviii. 11; Zeph. i. 12). To drink the lees of the cup of wrath means to drain the cup, enduring the punishment to the utmost (Ps. lxxv. 8, rendered dregs).

Le'gion.

The chief subdivision of the Roman army (War iii. 4, 2). It originally contained 3000 foot soldiers with a contingent of cavalry. From 100 B. C. to the fall of the empire the number varied from 5000 to 6200, while from Augustus to Hadrian or during the N. T. period 6000 seems to have been the regular complement and the cavalry was not considered as forming a constituent part of the legion. At this time the legion consisted of ten cohorts, each cohort of three maniples, and each maniple of two centuries (cp. Mat. xxvii. 27, R. V. margin); and was officered by tribunes and centurions (War iii. 5, 3; Acts xxi. 31, 32, R. V. margin; xxii. 23), numbering ten and sixty respectively. In Scripture legion is used to denote any large host (Mat. xxvi. 53; Mark v. 9).

The military standard of the Romans was at first a bunch of straw attached to a pole. Later an eagle and four other animals formed the standards of a legion, but after 104 B. C. the eagle alone was employed (Pliny, Hist. Nat. x. 4). It was committed to the custody of the chief centurion. In addition to the eagle, the standard also commonly bore a small image of the emperor, and the introduction of these images into Jerusalem by Pontius Pilate caused an insurrection of the Jews (Antiq. xviii. 3, 1; War ii. 9, 2). But while the great standard of the whole legion was the eagle, each cohort and century had its own standard, Soldiers of the Roman Legion.

From the Arch of Constantine and these minor ensigns assumed a variety of forms

Le'ha-bim.

A tribe sprung from or incorporated with the Egyptians (Gen. x. 13; 1 Chron. i. 11), probably the same as the Lubim (q. v.).

Le'hi [cheek, jawbone].

A place in Judah (Judg. xv. 9), elevated (11, 13), where the Philistines spread themselves when they advanced into Judah to seize Samson. It may have been a ridge.

It received its name either from a series of jagged crags resembling a jawbone, or from Samson's exploit with the jawbone of an ass. At any rate, that part of it where Samson beat down the Philistines, who seem to have been fleeing, and cast aside the jawbone which had served him as a weapon, was remembered, and it was pointed out as Ramath-lehi, height of the jawbone (17). Guérin locates Lehi at 'Ain el-Lehi, northwest of Bethlehem, about 2 miles west-southwest of Málhah, and hence not far from Etam (cp. 11), on the high plateau. But the existence of 'Ain el-Lehi appears doubtful. The survey map does not indicate it. Moreover, Lehi is best sought near some other Etam, for Samson went from Timnah down, not up, to the rock at Etam.

Lem'u-el [devoted to God].

The royal author of Prov xxxi, who reproduces what was taught him by his mother (ver 1).

Len'til.

A plant (2 Sam xxiii 11), boiled as pottage (Gen. xxv 29, 34) and in times of scarcity made into bread (Ezek iv 9). The modern Arabic name is identical with its Hebrew designation "dashim". The lentil (Ernum lens) is a papilionaceous plant, allied to the vetches. It has compound leaves, with five to six pairs of oblong leaflets, white flowers striped with violet, and small broad legumes. Pottage made from it is red. It was this which was given to Esau when he was famishing, and it was from it that his second name Edom was derived. The plant is wild in Moab, and is cultivated in all parts of Palestine. The seeds when boiled are thoroughly wholesome. It is from them that Renalenta arabica is made, and they are of late quite familiar at most vegetarian restaurants and in many households.

Leop'ard.

A wild animal; in Hebrew Namer, spotted beast, in Greek Pardals. It was, as its name implied, a spotted animal (Jer. xiii. 23). It was very swift (Hab. i. 8). Its appropriate food was the kid (Is. xi. 6), but it sometimes attacked man (Hos. xiii. 7, 8); lurking for the purpose in the vicinity of cities or villages (Jer. v. 6), though its ordinary habitation was among the mountains (Song. iv. 8). The leopard (Felis pardus or Leopardus) was believed by the ancients and some moderns to be a hybrid between the lion and the panther; hence its name, which is compounded of leo and pardus, lion and panther. Now it is generally held that these are merely varieties of the same species. The appropriate habitat of the leopard or panther is Africa and southern Asia. In Palestine it now occurs chiefly in the region east of the Jordan; but it was evidently more common in Scripture times than at present, in the country west of the river.

In Dan. vii. 6 it symbolizes a fierce nation and its king, doubtless Greece (viii. 21); and in Rev. xiii. 2 the composite creature, which combines the four beasts of Daniel and typifies the united powers of this world, has the body of a leopard.

Lep'er.

A person affected with the disease of leprosy (2 Kin. vii. 8, Mat. x. 8). The leper was excluded from intercourse with his fellow-men and from the sanctuary, was required to exhibit the usual signs of mourning and to give the warning cry to all that approached, "Unclean! unclean!" (Lev. xiii. 45; Luke xvii. 12, 13), and he was regarded as a dead man (Num. xii. 12). Strangely enough, if the leprosy was spreading, the sufferer was unclean; but if it overspread the whole man, he was adjudged clean (Lev. xiii. 6, 12, 13). Some expositors understand this to mean that, while the disease manifested activity, the law imputed pollution; but when it might be regarded as having run its course, it lost its character as a curse from God. Others understand the meaning to be that only when the leper was acknowledged to be defiled in every part by this disease, which typified sin, could he be admitted to the privileges of atonement. Yet other interpreters believe that the rapid eruption over the whole body was a sign that the crisis had been passed and recovery had set in. See PURIFICATION.

Lep'ro-sy.

1. A dreadful disease, in Hebrew Šara'ath, scourge. The symptoms are described in Lev. xiii. 1-46. There were skin diseases from which it required to be carefully distinguished. It was not a superficial, but was a deep-seated malady. It often began as a rising, or a scab, or a bright spot, which tended to spread, turning white the hair covering the parts affected (xiii. 2, 3, 7, 8, 10, 24, 25, 27, 35, 36). Raw flesh tended to appear (10, 14-16, 24). Among the parts of the body specially liable to attack were the scalp of the head, the beard, the top of the head, or the forehead, after these had become bald; also any spot which had been accidentally injured by fire (24, 29, 30, 42). A leper was to be excluded from the camp; was required to let the hair of his head go loose and his clothes be rent; while he was to cover his upper lip, and cry, "Unclean! unclean!" (45, 46). He had to appear repeatedly before the priest, who was to pronounce on the character of the disease (1-44); and in the event of the malady departing, he was to go through an elaborate process of cleansing and sacrifice (xiv. 1-32). In the description of the disease given in Lev. xiii. there is no mention of the leper's hue changing to a snowy white, as was the case with Miriam (Num. xii. 10) and Gehazi (2 Kin. v. 27), and momentarily with Moses (Ex. iv. 6). Not even those whose circumstances were comfortable were exempt from this disease. Thus, it affected Naaman, when commander-in-chief of the army of Syria (2 Kin. v. 1-14), and Uzziah during the later years of his reign over Judah (xv. 5, 2 Chron. xxvi. 21). The regulations about excluding the leper from society were carried out among the Hebrews (Num. v. 1-4, xii. 10, 15, 2 Kin. vii. 3, 8, 10; xv. 5; 2 Chron. xxvi. 21; cf. also Luke xvii. 12), but the fact that the king of Syria seems to have leaned on Naaman's hand, even when he was a leper, and that Naaman dwelt with his family and was accompanied by servants, shows that leprosy, though loathsome, was not actually contagious (2 Kin. v. 18). The disease to which the English word leprosy is now confined is a formidable malady, technically called Elephantiasis Græcorum, elephant disease of the Greeks. It appears under two forms. The tuberculated or black leprosy is at present the more common, and the name is restricted to it by some authorities. It affects primarily the skin and mucous membranes. The anæsthetic or white leprosy affects the nerves principally, and produces numbness. The symptoms of the two forms are often united, and one form frequently passes into the other. The coming of the disease is preceded by lassitude for months or years. Then circular spots or blotches of irregular form and varying extent appear on the forehead, the limbs, and the body. After a time, the central portion of the spots and blotches becomes white, and the parts affected contract a certain numbness. In the worst cases the joints of the fingers and toes fall off one by one, and injuries to the other parts produce mutilation and deformity. Thomson says: "The 'scab' comes on by degrees in different parts of the body; the hair falls from the head and eyebrows; the nails loosen, decay, and drop off; joint after joint of the fingers and toes shrink up and slowly fall away. The gums are absorbed, and the teeth disappear. The nose, the eyes, the tongue, and the palate are slowly consumed." Again, he says, that when approaching the Jaffa gate of Jerusalem he was startled by the sudden apparition of a crowd of beggars, without eyes, nose, or hair. They held up handless arms, and unearthly sounds gurgled through throats without palates. This loathsome and fatal disease is popularly believed to be identical with that of Leviticus and the other books of the Bible (cp. Num. xii. 12). But the disease mentioned in Scripture seems to have been curable (Lev. xiv. 3), whereas Elephantiasis Graecorum is not, except in the early stages. If not elephantiasis, what was it? Sir Risdon Bennett (Diseases of the Bible, 15-52) and others believe probably Lepra vulgaris, now merged in the genus Psoriasis, and called Psoriasis vulgaris, the dry tetter. It is a non-contagious, scaly disease, generally commencing about the elbows and knees, as small circular patches of silvery-white scales, which spread till they become the size of a quarter or a half dollar, by which time the scales have fallen from the central portion of the circle, leaving it red; other circles arising coalesce. Afterwards the abdomen, the chest, and the back become affected, and in rare cases the disease extends at last also to the head, face, and hands. The constitutional disturbance is trifling, and the disease is curable, though it is liable to recur. It is simply a skin disease, in no way endangering life. Or the white leprosy of the O. T. may have been Psoriasis guttata, in which the scattered patches are said to give an appearance to the skin as if it had been splashed with mortar. Perhaps the Hebrew term sara'ath was a generic one, and the elephantiasis and the psoriasis two of its species; and it is quite possible that different varieties have prevailed at different times. If the leprosy of the Old and that of the New Testament were identical, then confirmation is given to the opinion that the former was psoriasis, for Luke (v. 12, 13), himself a physician, employs the Greek word lepra, which was technically used of psoriasis. With this Josephus' description of leprosy agrees, for (Antiq. iii. 11, 4) he defines a leper to be a man who has a misfortune in the color of his skin, and makes no allusion to graver symptoms. He mentions also that among the gentiles lepers were not excluded from society, but were competent to discharge important functions in the body politic.

2. The same word sara'ath was applied to a greenish or reddish appearance in a garment and to hollow greenish or reddish streaks in the wall of a house (Lev. xiii. 47-59; xiv. 33-37). It may be some minute cryptogamous plant, an algal or a fungal, which has grown upon the garment or wall after it has become wet in the rainy season.

Le'shem. See DAN 3.

Le-tu'shim.

A tribe descended from Dedan (Gen. xxv. 3). They doubtless settled in Arabia.

Le-um'mim [peoples, nations].

A tribe descended from Dedan (Gen. xxv. 3). They doubtless settled in Arabia.

Le'vi [adhesion, associate]

1. Third son of Jacob and Leah (Gen. xxix. 34). He took part with Simeon, Leah's second son in massacring Hamor, Shechem, and the men of their city, in revenge for the injury done by Shechem to their sister Dinah (xxxiv. 25-31). Jacob on his deathbed remembered with fresh abhorrence this deed of blood, and, referring to Simeon and Levi, said, "Cursed be their anger, for it was fierce; and their wrath, for it was cruel: I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel" (xlix. 7). Levi had three sons: Gershon or Gershom, Kohath, and Merari (Gen. xli. 11), and died in Egypt at the age of 137 (Ex. vi. 16). See LEVITES.

2 and 3. Two ancestors of Christ, one the son of Symeon, and the other a son of Melchi (Luke iii. 24, 29, 30).

4. Another name for the apostle Matthew (cp. Mat. ix. 9-13; Mark ii. 14-17; Luke v. 27-32).

Le-vi'a-than [one spirally wound]

A great aquatic animal mentioned only in poetic passages. He was formed by God to play in the sea (Ps. civ. 26). He has limbs, head, neck, eyes, nose, jaw, mouth, teeth, and tongue (Job xli. 1, 2, 7, 12, 14, 18, 19, 22), and is covered with scales and an impenetrable hide (7, 15-17, 26-29). He lieth upon the mire or maketh the sea to boil like a pot (30, 31). He is too large to be taken by fish hook or harpoon (1, 26), is terrible of aspect (9), and mighty in strength, but comely of proportion (12). He is poetically described as breathing fire and smoke (19-21), as is God in Ps. xviii. 8 and as are the horses in Rev. ix. 17. When God worked salvation by dividing the sea, he destroyed the sea monsters which inhabited it, broke the heads of Leviathan and left his carcass to be eaten by the people of the desert (Ps. lxxiv. 14). As the sea is the type of the restless, surging nations of the earth, so Leviathan which dwells therein, Leviathan the flying serpent, Leviathan the swift serpent, Leviathan the crooked serpent, and the dragon symbolize the fierce and terrible powers of the world which have afflicted the people of God, but whom God will ultimately destroy (Is. xxvii. 1). Leviathan is commonly regarded as the crocodile (Job xli. 1, R. V. margin). As such the imagery is apt. Egypt, its habitat, is the typical oppressor of the kingdom of God, and Egypt's power was broken and its king thwarted when God divided the Red Sea for the deliverance of his people. Leviathan may, however, be merely a creation of the popular fancy, an imaginary sea monster; the inspired poets and prophets of Israel subsidizing fable to serve in the illustration of truth. In Job iii 8 Leviathan may be a fabulous dragon which caused eclipses by swallowing sun and moon, and the cursers of the day may be conjurers who claimed the power to produce eclipses by his aid. Or in this passage Leviathan may be the untamable, terrible crocodile which only conjurers of highest skill claimed ability to summon to their aid.

Le'vites.

1 The descendants of Levi, the son of Jacob. He had three sons: Gershon or Gershom, Kohath, and Merari, each of whom founded a tribal family (Gen. xlii 11; Ex vi. 16; Num. iii 17-1 Chron. vi. 16-48). Moses and Aaron were Levites of the house of Amram and family of Kohath (Ex vi. 16, 18, 20, 26).

2 The men of the tribe of Levi charged with the care of the sanctuary. Aaron and his sons were set apart for the priesthood and the office was made hereditary. But the tabernacle and its service had been projected on a noble scale. The care and transportation of the costly sanctuary and the preparation of materials for the elaborate service entailed labors which no one man and no one family was equal to. Helpers were needed. The charge of the tabernacle was an honorable work. Who should undertake it? The firstborn belonged to God. This conviction was deepened by the circumstances connected with the deliverance from Egypt. When the firstborn of the Egyptians were slain, blood on the lintel and side door posts was needed to protect the Israelite firstborn males from a similar fate. They had then become the special property of Jehovah, and henceforth were consecrated to him as a memorial (Ex xiii 11-16). But instead of the firstborn of all the tribes, the Levites were chosen for service in connection with the sanctuary; and the choice was made because, when the people had broken the covenant with Jehovah by making the golden calf, the Levites alone had voluntarily returned to their allegiance and shown zeal for God's honor (xxxiii 26-29; Num. iii. 9, 11-13, 40, 41, 45 seq.; viii. 16-18). The firstborn males of Israel, exclusive of the Levites, numbered 22,273 in the census taken at Sinai (Num. iii 43, 46). There were 22,000 Levites (39); but the items given in verses 22, 28, and 34 foot up 22,300. Either an error has occurred somewhere in the transcription, or else 300 of these Levites were themselves firstborn and therefore could not serve as substitutes for the firstborn of the other tribes. The 22,000 were substituted. The remaining 273 firstborn of Israel were redeemed by the payment of five shekels apiece (46-51).

It was the duty of the Levites to transport the tabernacle and its furniture when the camp moved; and when the camp rested to erect the tent, have care of it, and assist the priests in their varied work (Num. i. 50-53; iii. 6-9, 25-37; iv. 1-33; 1 Sam. vi. 15; 2 Sam. xv. 24). As the sons of Aaron were Levites as well as priests, they are frequently included under the designation Levite (Deut. xxxiii. 8-10; Josh. xiv. 3, xxi. 1, 4; Mal. iii. 3), and also, either as higher officials or as Levites, they might, if they saw fit, discharge any service that pertained to the Levites.

The age at which the obligation of service began was thirty years (Num. iv 3, 1 Chron. xxiii. 3-5), and twenty-five years (Num. viii. 24), and twenty years (1 Chron. xxiii. 24, 27). The divergent practice at different periods of the history explains the peculiarity in part. It is even conceivable that a reduction in the age for entrance and a lengthening of the term of service was made by Moses himself some time during the course of forty years, and such a change is expressly stated to have been made by David. But it is noticeable that both in the book of Numbers and in the book of Chronicles the age of thirty years is forthwith followed by an earlier age. Also in Numbers iv. the service of the Levites who were thirty years old is defined by an explanatory clause "every one that entered in to do the work of service, and [even] the work of bearing burdens" (47, 49), and, in fact, the particular service is defined by the specifications of the entire chapter. It is, therefore, not at all improbable that at thirty years of age the Levites became eligible to full service of every sort that pertained to Levites at the sanctuary, including the high and honorable offices of bearing the tabernacle and its sacred furniture in public procession and, at a later period, of serving in positions that brought distinction and called for wisdom and discretion (Num. iv 1-33; 1 Chron. xxiii. 3-5); but the Levites began general service at first at twenty-five years of age, and performed the various duties belonging to their calling with the exceptions that have been noted; at least the higher duties are not mentioned in connection with the more youthful age (Num. viii. 24-26; 1 Chron. xxiii. 25-32). David, however, saw fit to make a further reduction in the age at which the simpler duties should be undertaken, and he directed that the Levites should enter upon service at the same time of life as that at which the other Israelites became liable to military service, namely, at twenty years (1 Chron. xxiii. 24, 27), seeing that the need of transporting the ark no longer existed (25, 26) and the service of the sanctuary had become a routine, and a sort of apprenticeship was a useful preparation for the regular ecclesiastical duties. Twenty years was henceforth the legal age for the Levites to enter upon service (2 Chron. xxxi. 17; Ezra iii. 8). At this age they commenced as assistants to the priests and chief Levites (1 Chron. xxiii. 28-31; cp. 2 Chron. xxix.

34; xxxv. 11), but probably not until they reached thirty years were they regarded as experts or eligible for the higher offices of lookkeeper or member of the temple orchestra or administrator or judge (1 Chron xxiii 3-5). They retired from active service at fifty, but were free to render assistance to the Levites who succeeded them in the work at the sanctuary (Num viii 25, 26).

An official dress was not prescribed for the Levites, but on great occasions they drew on festal raiment (1 Chron xv 27; 2 Chron. v. 12). It was an innovation when the Levitical singers in the first century A. D. obtained permission from king Agrippa, with the sanction of the sanhedrin to wear linen garments as constantly as did the priests (Antiq. xx. 9, 6). They were not required to devote their entire time to the sanctuary nor to dwell continually near it, but on the allotment of Canaan they were distributed to various towns (Josh xxi 20-40). Exclusive of the towns allotted to the Levites who were priests, all of which were in Judah, Simeon and Benjamin, the Levitical towns numbered thirty-five and were situated among the remaining tribes on the north and east (Josh xxi 5-7). Since the Levites as a tribe were "wholly given unto the Lord in behalf of the children of Israel," and were appointed to service at the tabernacle, it was natural that in the northern districts, where no Levitical priests dwelt, the lower order of the Levites should be drawn upon by the idolater Micah and after him by the idolatrous migrating Danites to furnish a man for priestly services (Judg xvii 8-13, xviii 18-20, 30, 31). In David's reign the Levites were divided into four classes: 1. Assistants to the priests in the work of the sanctuary; 2. Judges and scribes; 3. Gate keepers; 4. Musicians. Each of these classes, with the possible exception of the second, was subdivided into twenty-four courses or families to serve in rotation (1 Chron xxiv.-xxvi; cp xv 16-24; 2 Chron xix 8-11, xxx 16, 17; Ezra vi. 18; Neh. xiii 5). On the disruption of the monarchy, many Levites and priests (out of Benjamin) quitted the northern kingdom and came to Judah and Jerusalem (2 Chron. xi. 13-15).

Le-vit'i-cus [relating to the Levites].

The third book of the Pentateuch. When the tabernacle had been erected and a priest appointed to minister at the altar, the next step was to regulate access to God. This is the object of the ordinances contained in Leviticus. In approach to Jehovah sacrifices and a priesthood were needed, and intercourse with God requires the attainment and maintenance of purity, both ceremonial and moral. To exercise a proper control over these matters several manuals were prepared, which were placed together and form the book of Leviticus. 1. A directory of procedure to be followed by the worshiper and the priest at the offering of the various kinds of sacrifice (Lev. i 1-vi 7), and a book on the disposal of the sacrifice (vi. 8-vii 36). The directory of procedure was drawn up at Sinai after the tabernacle had been erected, and the book on the disposal of the sacrifice was written at the same general time, when "he commanded the children of Israel to offer their oblations unto Jehovah" (i. 1, and cp vii. 38 with i. 2). 2. A record of the consecration of Aaron and his sons to the priestly office (viii -ix), an official act prescribed during Moses' first sojourn in Sinai (Ex xxix), which established the priesthood and was the precedent for future ordinations. To this record an account of the punishment of Nadab and Abihu for illegal approach was appended, together with legislation which was enacted to meet deficiencies revealed in the laws on this occasion (Lev x). 3. A directory of ceremonial purity (xi -xvi), containing laws concerning foods that defile, diseases or natural functions that render unclean, and the ceremonial national purification (already prescribed, Ex xxx 10). This directory is ascribed to Moses as the representative of Jehovah (Lev xi 1, etc.), when Israel was in the wilderness (xiv 34; xvi 1). 4. The law of holiness (xvii-xxvi), statutes concerning holiness of life, given by Moses (xvii 1, etc.), at Sinai (xxv 1, xxvi 46; cp. xxiv 10). These several collections are followed by an appendix on vows, tithes, and things devoted (xxvii). Occasionally a law is repeated in a new connection and for a different purpose. At times also the legislation is interrupted by the narrative of events that led to enactments (x 1-7, 12-20, xxi. 24, xxiv 10-23). Possibly some laws, but certainly not all, that were framed after the departure from Sinai were inserted for the sake of convenience in their proper place among the laws relating to the same subject.

Throughout the book but one sanctuary (xix 21 et passim) and one altar for all Israel are recognized (i 3, viii 3; xvii. 8, 9), and the sons of Aaron are the sole priests (i 5). The Levites are only incidentally mentioned (xxv. 32, 33). Variations in the laws or their statement as found in Leviticus and Deuteronomy are intelligible when it is remembered that 1. Leviticus is a manual for the priests, to guide them through the technicalities of the ritual; while Deuteronomy is primarily not a law book at all, but a popular address to instruct the people in their own duties and to exhort them to fidelity. Deuteronomy omits matters of detail which concern priests only. 2. The laws of Leviticus are dated at Sinai an entire generation before the addresses contained in Deuteronomy were delivered at Shittim. Accordingly the legislation of Leviticus is presupposed in Deuteronomy. This is the standpoint of the Bible.

The essentials of the legislation of Leviticus are reflected in the history in the early recognition of the Aaronic priesthood. So far as the evidence reaches, the priests were sons of Aaron exclusively (Deut. x. 6; Josh. xiv. 1; xxi. 4 and 18 with 1 Kin. ii. 26; Judg. xxi. 27, 28; 1 Sam. i. 3; ii. 27, 28; xiv. 3; xxi. 6 with 1 Chron. xxiv. 3; 1 Sam. xxii. 10, 11, 20; xxiii. 6; and 2 Sam. viii. 17 with Ezra vii. 3 and 1 Chron. xxiv. 3). The Levites are sojourners and subordinate (Judg. xvii. 7-9; xix. 1; 1 Sam. vi. 15; 2 Sam. xv. 24). Compare also the one house of the Lord (Judg. xviii. 31; xix. 18; 1 Sam. i. 7, 24; iii. 3; iv. 3), and the feast of the Lord, at the tabernacle visited by all Israel (Judg. xxi. 19; 1 Sam. i. 3; ii. 14, 22, 29); see further the articles PRIEST, HIGH PRIEST, LEVITES, ALTAR, DEUTERONOMY.

Lib'er-tines [freedmen].

A section of the Jewish community who had a synagogue at Jerusalem, and were among the foes of the first martyr, Stephen (Acts vi. 9). They were probably Jews, who, having been taken prisoners in battle by Pompey and other Roman generals, had been bondsmen at Rome, but were afterwards restored to liberty.

Lib'nah [whiteness, pellucidity].

1. An encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. xxxiii. 20). Situation unknown.

2. A city in the lowland between Makkeh and Lachish (Josh. x. 29-31), captured by Joshua (30, 39; xii. 15). It was situated in the territory allotted to Judah (xv. 42), and was subsequently assigned to the descendants of Aaron (xxi. 13; 1 Chron. vi. 57). When Jehoram, son of Jehoshaphat, was king, Libnah revolted against Judah (2 Kin. viii. 22; 2 Chron. xxi. 10). Sennacherib, king of Assyria, warred against it (2 Kin. xix. 8; Is. xxxvii. 8). The father of Hamutal, the mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah, was from this place (2 Kin. xxiii. 31; xxiv. 18; Jer. lii. 1). Exact situation is unknown.

Lib'ni [white, pure].

1. Son of Gershon, and grandson of Levi. He was founder of a minor tribal family or father's house (Ex. vi. 17; Num. iii. 18, 21; xxvi. 58).

2. A Levite, family of Merari, house of Mahli (1 Chron. vi. 29).

Lib'y-a and Lib'yans.

A rendering of Put (Jer. xlvi. 9; Ezek. xxx. 5; xxxviii. 5 in A V) and Lubim (Dan. xi. 43). A country and its inhabitants in the western part of Lower Egypt or on its borders. The people are said to be distinguished by the Egyptians as Tehenu; later Pit, Phaiat, probably equivalent to the Hebrew Put; and Rebu or Lebu, that is in Hebrew Lubim, and others. The Libya of the Romans was an immense and vaguely defined tract extending from the Nile delta and valley westward across the entire African continent. It comprised all north Africa west of Egypt, except the small Greek settlements of Cyrene and Barca, and the Phœnician colonies of Carthage, Utica, and Hippo. It was nearly all a sandy desert, studded here and there with oases, on which palms grew. Its tribes were brave, but were not very formidable, owing to their being scattered and unable to unite. The Romans divided the African region bordering the Mediterranean as far west as the Syrtis Major, or the country between Egypt and the province of Africa, into Libya Marmarica in the east and Libya Cyrenaica or Pentapolis in the west. The latter was formed with Cyrene into a province in 67 B.C. Its capital was Cyrene, and it was from this western province that representatives were present at Jerusalem on Pentecost (Acts ii. 10; cp. Antiq. xvi. 6, 1).

Lice.

The rendering of the Hebrew Kinnam or Kinnim (Ex. viii. 16-18; Ps. cv. 31), referring to some small insect noxious to man. Josephus understood the word to mean lice (Antiq. ii. 14, 3). The Septuagint renders it by sknps, an aphid or other small insect that sucks or gnaws. R. V. margin translates it sandflies or fleas.

Lic'tor. See PRÆTOR.

Lieu-ten'ant. See SATRAP.

Lign-al'o'es [wood or tree aloes]. See ALOES.

Lig'ure.

The rendering of the Hebrew Leshem, a gem, the first stone in the third row of the high priest's breastplate (Ex. xxviii. 19). This translation is derived from the Septuagint, Vulgate and Josephus (War v. 5, 7); but it is impossible to identify the ligurium of the ancients with any known gem. The R. V. renders the Hebrew word by jacinth or amber.

Lik'hi [characterized by knowledge].

A Manassite, family of Shemida (1 Chron. vii. 19).

Lil'y.

1. The rendering of the Hebrew words Shoshan, Shoshannah, and Shushan. The plant so designated is found in pastures where sheep and gazelles feed (Song ii. 16; iv. 5; vi. 3), and among thorns (ii. 2), besides being cultivated in gardens (vi. 2). It was so much at home in valleys that it was designated the lily of the valleys (Song ii. 1). It was a sweet-scented plant, dropping a myrrh-like perfume (v. 13). The Hebrew word was rendered krinon by the Greek translators. The krinon is a plant which grows beside the water (Ecclus. i. 8) and among the grass of the field (Mat. vi. 28). It is often mentioned in connection with frankincense and the rose (Ecclus. xxxix. 13, 14). It is the type of a life of beautiful deeds. The high priest, coming forth from the sanctuary is compared with it (1. 8). It excels Solomon in his glorious array (Mat. vi. 29).

The words shushan and krinon were not always used with reference to the lily in its modern scientific sense; but included with the true lily various plants that resemble the lily. The lotus was known to the ancient Egyptians by the name of seshum, and is called by Herodotus krinon (ii. 92). The ordinary word for a lily in Arabic is still sûsan; but it is used generically rather than specifically, including the tulip and even the anemone and ranunculus. What varieties of lily were anciently cultivated in the gardens of Palestine is not known. In the fields the scarlet Turk's cap (Lilium chalcedonicum) grows sparingly. Besides the true lily, other genera of the order Liliaceæ, as hyacinths and tulips, grow in profusion in the spring. A fine, dark violet flower, known as sûsan, is found far and wide in the Hauran. Thomson describes a splendid iris, which he calls the Huleh lily, growing among the oak woods around the northern base of Tabor and on the hills of Nazareth. The flower is dark purple and white. He believes that it is the lily referred to by Jesus. Red anemones are so marked a feature of the valleys of Palestine in the spring that various travelers, Tristram included, have suggested that Anemone coronaria, the red variety of which is very common, was probably the lily of the N. T., while others would identify the anemone with the rose of Sharon. See ROSE.

Scarlet Turk's Cap (Lilium chalcedonicum)

Lime.

A material prepared by burning limestone, shells, and other calcareous substances (Is. xxxiii. 12; Amos ii. 1), and used for making mortar and plaster, and for whitewashing walls (Deut. xxvii. 2, in E. V. plaster; Mat. xxiii. 27; Acts xxiii. 3). See MORTAR.

Lin'en.

1. Fine linen is the rendering of the Hebrew word shesh, white, applied to a stuff of which vestments were made. It was in it that Joseph was arrayed by Pharaoh's order (Gen. xli. 42). Of this material also were made the curtains, veil, and door hangings of the tabernacle (Ex. xxvi. 1, 31, 36), and the hangings for the gate of the court and for the court itself (xxvii. 9, 16, 18). The distinguishing attire of the high priest consisted of the ephod, breastplate, robe of blue, and the gold plate on the miter; and of these the ephod and breastplate contained fine linen (Ex. xxviii. 6, 15). Other official garments were common to the high priest and the ordinary priest, the tunic, girdle, breeches, and headdress (Ex. xxviii. 40-42; xxxix. 27-29; cp. Lev. xvi. 4). The head-dress, however, of the high priest was a miter or turban, while a simple cap appears to have been worn by the ordinary priest. Of these four articles of priestly dress, the girdle was embroidered, consisting largely of linen (Ex. xxxix. 29). The three other garments were made of fine white linen exclusively (xxviii. 39; xxxix. 27, 28). On the margin of Gen. xli. 42 and of Ex. xxv. 4 the R. V. substitutes cotton. On the margin of Ex. xxviii. 39 the R. V., referring to the coat and miter of the high priest, substitutes silk. The same Hebrew word is translated marble in Esth. i. 6 and Song v. 15 (where the reference is to pillars), and silk in Prov. xxxi. 22.

2. The Hebrew word bad is a synonym for shesh, but is more general in its meaning, hence it is rendered merely linen (Ex. xxviii. 42 with xxxix. 28). It sufficiently described the material of the priest's raiment, when there was no need to explicitly state the quality of the stuff (ibid.; Lev. vi. 10; xvi.

4). Of it was made the plain ephod worn by the boy Samuel, by the priests at Nob, and by David on the occasion of removing the ark (1 Sam. i. 18; xxii 18; 2 Sam. vi. 14). In it the man with the inkstand in Ezekiel's vision, and Daniel's heavenly comforter were clothed (Ezek. ix. 2; Dan. x. 5).

3. The rendering of the Hebrew Pishteh, flax, the material of which the goods are made being thought of (Jer. xiii. 1) It is used in contrast to woolen clothing (Lev. xiii. 47; Deut. xxii 11). It describes the material of the priestly garments, the headtires, breeches, and girdles (Ezek. xlv. 17, 18).

4. The rendering of the Hebrew Bug, which occurs only in the later books, and of the Greek Bussos. Of this material were made the robe, not the ephod, which David wore at the removal of the ark (1 Chron. xv. 27), the veil of the temple in part, the other stuffs employed being blue, purple, and crimson (2 Chron. iii 14), the clothing of the Levites who were musicians at the dedication of the temple (v. 12), the cords which fastened the hangings in Ahasuerus' palace (Esth. i. 6), the state dress of Mordecai (viii. 15), the garments of the rich man at whose gate Lazarus sat (Luke xvi. 19), and of the luxurious city of Babylon (Rev. xviii. 16), and the bright and pure raiment of the Lamb's wife (xix. 8).

Shesh is originally an Egyptian word, in old Egyptian shenti; bss is the Aramaic equivalent (cp. Targ. Onk. Gen. xli 42), and bussos is etymologically the same word as bss. It is interesting to note that Ezekiel uses shesh for goods imported from Egypt, and bss for stuffs that came from Syria. Whether the words denote linen or fine cotton cloth, or comprehend both, is much debated. Linen and cotton were employed in Egypt from the earliest times for mummy cloths.

5. The rendering of the Hebrew word Etan, from 'atan, to bind (Prov. vii. 16, in R. V. yarn). It was imported from Egypt, where the most skillful manufacturers of linen lived.

6. Linen yarn is the rendering of the Hebrew word Mikeh in A. V. of 1 Kin. x 28; 2 Chron. i. 16. R. V. renders it a drove. Septuagint and Vulgate regarded the Hebrew word as composite, and rendered it "and out of Koe," which was a place near Egypt, according to Eusebius.

7, 8. The rendering of the Greek word Sindon, a fine Indian cloth, muslin, later linen. A tunic or perhaps a sheet might be made of it (Mark xiv. 51), and in this material the body of Jesus was wrapped for burial (Mat. xxvii. 59). It is a synonym of othomoi, though more special in meaning (Luke xxiii 53 with xxiv 12; John xix 40; xx. 5, 7). In classical Greek the latter word means either genuine linen or sail cloth.

9. The rendering of the Greek Lanon, linen (Rev. xv 6, A. V. and margin of R. V.). The text of R. V. has precious stones, from another reading lithon.

Lin'tel.

The transverse piece of wood or other material constituting the upper part of a doorway or casement (Ex. xii. 22), called in Hebrew Mashkoph.

1. Lintel is also the rendering of the Hebrew 'Ayil, a ram, in 1 Kin. vi. 31. It may denote a projecting lintel or post. The Hebrew word occurs eighteen times in an architectural sense in Ezek. xl. and xli., where it is rendered post (ver. 9, etc.), with jamb on the margin of R. V.

2. The rendering of the Hebrew Kaphtor, in A. V. of Amos ix 1 and Zeph. ii. 14, which is translated chapter in R. V. In Ex. xxv. and xxxvii., where it occurs sixteen times, it is rendered knob in both versions.

Li'nus.

A Christian at Rome who joined Paul in sending salutations to Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 21). According to Irenæus and Eusebius, he was the first bishop of Rome. See BISHOP. No lofty preeminence was attached to the office, for he is mentioned without distinction between two other members of the church at Rome.

Li'on.

The Felis leo of naturalists. The lion is diffused over the whole of Africa and portions of southern Asia, as far east as the province of Guzerat in India. It was formerly found in Greece, but does not now occur wild in that country or anywhere in Europe. In Scripture times it was common in Palestine. The Hebrews had no fewer than six words to designate it in different states or at successive stages of growth. The ordinary words were 'ai yeh and 'ar, which occur eighty times in the O. T. Allusion is made to the lion's strength (2 Sam. i. 23; Prov. xxx. 30) and courage (2 Sam. xvii. 10; Prov. xxviii 1), to his teeth (Joel i. 6), to his tendency to crouch before springing on his victim (Gen. xlix. 9), to his tendency to prey on sheep, calves, and other beasts (1 Sam. xvii. 34; Is. xi. 6, 7), or upon man (1 Kin. xiii. 24; Jer. ii 30), and to his roaring (Job iv. 10; Prov. xx. 2; 1 Pet. v 8). He is represented as lurking in thickets (Jer. iv. 7), forests (v 6), or other coverts (xxv. 38). A special haunt of his appears to have been among the trees and bushes fringing the Jordan (xlix. 19). Of the living creatures seen by Ezekiel in vision one had the face of a lion (Ezek. i. 10; x. 14). The first of the four living creatures seen by John was like a lion (Rev. iv 7). Our Lord is called the Lion of the tribe of Judah (v. 5; cp. Gen. xlix. 9).

Liz'ard.

Any small lacertilian reptile. It was called l'ta'ah by the Hebrews, and was regarded as unclean (Lev. xi. 30). The R. V. understands the four animals associated with it to be the gecko, the land crocodile, the sand lizard, and the chameleon; but states on the margin that the words are of uncertain meaning, but probably denote four kinds of lizards. Lizards abound in Palestine and the adjacent countries. The number of species is very great. In the woods and on cultivated ground the green lizards are the most beautiful, especially Lacerta viridis and L. lersii. Of the same family (Lacertidae), but of a different genus (Zootica), are the wall lizards, which appear in warm weather in multitudes, crawling over walls, rocks, and stony ground. Other families of ocelliglossate lacertilians are represented in Palestine, as the Scincidae, Zonuridae, Agamidae, and Monitoridae. The first of these contains the skinks or sand lizards (Lev xi. 30; in A. V. snail). They chiefly inhabit desert districts, are generally small and of the yellowish color of the desert, are as common as the true lizard, but unlike it do not climb, and hide themselves under stones or by burrowing rapidly in the ground. The family of Zonuridae is represented by the glass snake (Pseudopus pallasi). Its hind legs are rudimentary, so that it looks much like a snake. It is black, and attains a length of two or two and a half feet, of which the tail forms two-thirds. Closely related to this family are the Agamidae, containing Uromastix spinipes. This reptile inhabits the sandy deserts of Africa and Arabia, and is common in the wilderness of Judaea. It attains a length of two feet. Its body is green in color, spotted with brown. It has a powerful tail, encircled with rows of strong spines, which it uses as a weapon of defense. The Hebrew name was sab, rendered great lizard (Lev xi. 29, in A. V. tortoise). The Arabs still call it dabb. The family of Monitoridae or Varanidae contains the monitors, of which the land crocodile of the ancients (Lev. xi. 30; in A. V. chameleon), commonly known as the land monitor, the varan el-and of the Arabs (Psammotatus scincus), is common in southern Judaea, the peninsula of Sinai, and the sandy parts of Egypt. It attains a length of four or five feet, and has a long snout, sharp, pointed teeth, and a long, tapering tail. The water monitor, varan el-bahr (Hydrosaurus niloticus), is slightly larger than its congener of the land, and is readily distinguished from it by the high keel along the whole length of its tail. Both reptiles are extremely rapid in their movements, and are strong, fully justifying their supposed Hebrew name koah, strength. They feed on small lizards and jerboas, and devour the eggs and young of the crocodile with avidity. They are eaten by the natives.

Loaf.

A mass of bread. It was made of the flour of barley (2 Kin iv. 42; John vi. 9) or wheat (Lev. xxiii. 17 with Ex. xxxiv. 22), round in shape (Ex. xxix. 23; Judg. vii. 5, in Hebrew kukkar, disc), and of a size convenient for baking and carrying with one (1 Sam. x. 3; Mat. xiv. 17; John vi. 9). See BREAD and SHOWBREAD.

Lo-am'mi [not my people].

The symbolic name of the prophet Hosea's second son by his wife Gomer (Hos. i. 8, 9).

Loan.

Anything, especially money, that is lent. In the early ages of the Hebrew nation loans were not sought for the purpose of obtaining capital, but for the necessities of life. The Israelites were commanded to open their heart to their brother, who had fallen into poverty, and to lend him sufficient for his need (Deut. xv. 7-11). They were forbidden to charge interest for any loan to a poor Israelite (Ex. xxii. 25, Lev. xxv. 35-37). But unto a foreigner they might lend on interest (Deut. xxiii. 20), and the poor Israelite might sell himself as a servant (Lev. xxv. 39; 2 Kin. iv. 1). If a pledge was asked from a poor Israelite for a loan, the creditor was not to go into the debtor's house to obtain it, but to remain outside and allow it to be brought out to him. If the pledge was a garment, it was to be returned to the owner before the evening, as probably it might be part of his sleeping attire (Ex. xxii. 26, 27). No one was to take the upper or nether millstone as a pledge, thus preventing the debtor and his family from grinding corn for their daily food (Deut. xxiv. 6). Nor could anyone take a widow's garment (17). Finally, when the seventh year, called the year of release, came, the debt was to be forgiven (xv. 1-11). The practice of suretyship, however, unfortunately grew up (Prov. vi. 1), and in later times interest was sometimes exacted for loans, although the practice was condemned by the prophets (Jer. xv. 10; Ezek. xviii. 13). The beneficent regulations of the law were systematically ignored after the exile, and Nehemiah took vigorous measures to terminate the abuse (Neh. v. 1-13). The Roman law was a marked contrast in its severity to that of Moses. By a law of the twelve tables a creditor could put his insolvent debtor in fetters and cords. Doubtless with allusion to the ordinary procedure Jesus describes the lord of a debtor as commanding that he, his wife, his children, and all that he had, be sold in liquidation of the debt (Mat. xviii. 25), and, when he had abused leniency which was shown him on his appeal for mercy, be delivered to the torturers till he should pay all that was due (34). In the time of Christ banking was a regular institution (Mat. xxv. 27; Luke xix. 23). A public building was provided in Jerusalem, where documents relating to loans, whether interest-bearing or not, might be deposited (War ii. 17, 6). See BANK.

Lock.

A fastening for a door (Judg. iii. 23), evidently in ancient as in modern times, consisting of a short bolt of wood, which slides through a groove in an upright piece attached to the door and enters a socket in the door-post. Above the groove in the upright are holes containing small iron or wooden pins. When the bolt is thrust into the socket, these pins drop into corresponding holes in the bolt and hold it in place. The key is furnished with a like number of projections, and, when introduced into a hollow in the bolt underneath the pins, raises them and allows the bolt to be shoved back. When the lock is inside, a hole through the door admits the hand with the key, and even the hollow in the bolt is often large enough to admit the hand (Song v. 5).

Lo'cust.

The rendering of the Hebrew word 'Arbeh and the Greek Akris. The insect referred to is evidently the migratory locust (Edipoda migratoria), or in some cases possibly an allied insect, Edipoda cinerescens, Acridium peregrinum, or other species. The locust is two inches or more in length. It is a winged, creeping thing. Like other insects of the order Orthoptera, it has four wings. Those of the anterior pair are narrow, while those of the posterior pair are broader, folded up when not in use, and transparent. It has six legs, on four of which it walks, while the hindmost pair, which are much longer than the others and equal to the body in length, it uses for springing (Lev. xi. 21, 22). The mouth is furnished with cutting jaws, by means of which it nips off leaves and blades of grass. They were clean insects (ibid.), and John the Baptist ate them, as many Orientals did before him and still do (Mat. iii. 4). They are prepared by being slightly roasted, dried in the sun, and salted. When used the head, wings, legs, and intestines are commonly removed, and only the fleshy portion is eaten. The locust is exceedingly destructive to vegetation, and locusts blown into the valley of the Nile by the east wind, constituted the eighth Egyptian plague (Ex. x. 4, 5, 12, 15, 19). In some passages, as Judg. vii. 12 and Jer. xlv. 23, the A. V. renders 'arbeh grasshopper; the R. V. uniformly translates it locust. The locust is distinguished from the grasshopper by the shortness of its antennae. It must not be confounded with the harvest fly, which is commonly called locust in the United States.

Many other words refer to different species of locusts difficult to identify, or some of them may mean the migratory locust in different stages of development (Lev. xi. 22; Joel i. 4). The eggs of the various species of locust are deposited in April or May, in a cylindrical hole excavated in the ground by the female. They are hatched in June. The young insect emerges from the egg a wingless larva. It enters the pupa state, when it has rudimentary wings enclosed in cases. It is more voracious in this stage of its development than at any other period. In another month it casts the pupa or nymph skin, and has become the imago or perfect insect.

Lod [perhaps, strife, contest].

A town of Benjamin, built by the sons of Elpaal, a man of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 12), and generally mentioned in connection with Ono (Neh. xi. 35). It was inhabited after the Babylonian captivity (Ezra ii. 33; Neh. vii. 37), and is believed to have been the Lydda of the Greek period (1 Mac. xi. 34); see LYDDA. It still exists as Ludd, about 11 miles southeast of Joppa. In it are the remains of the church of St George, the Christian martyr of Nicomedia and adopted in the fourteenth century as the patron saint of England, who was said to have been a native of the place.

Lo-de'bar [perhaps, without pasture].

A place in Gilead (2 Sam. ix. 4, 5; xvii. 27), probably the same as Lidebir (Josh. xiii. 26, R. V. margin). See DEBIR 4.

Lodge.

A shelter erected for the watchman of a garden for occupation during the time of ripe fruit (Is. i. 8; in xxiv. 20, A. V. cottage, R. V. hut). Not improbably the structure intended is the kind built among the branches of a tree or, where trees are lacking, upon posts, and consisting of a rude floor, a roof of mats or branches, and sides of branches.

Log [depth]

A Jewish measure of capacity used specially for oil (Lev. xiv. 10, 12, 15, 21, 24). The rabbins believe it to have contained twelve hins, so that it equaled the 720th part of an homer or about three gills.

Lo'is.

Timothy's grandmother, a woman of unfeigned faith (2 Tim. i. 5).

Look'ing-glass. See MIRROR.

Lord.

When used of God and printed in small letters with only the initial a capital, it is usually the rendering of the Hebrew 'Adon, master (Ex. xxiii. 17; Ps. cxiv. 7), much more frequently of 'donay, properly my master (Ex. iv. 10; Is. xl. 10), or of the Greek Kyrios, master, sir (Mat. i. 20). When printed in small capitals, it represents the Hebrew YHWH, Jehovah, the most sacred and incommunicable name of God, used of himself alone (Gen. ii. 4). See JEHOVAH.

Lord of Hosts. See HOST.

Lord's Day.

The day specially associated with the Lord Jesus Christ. The expression occurs but once in the N. T., where John says, "I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day" (Rev. i. 10). Various interpretations have been offered. 1.

John, it is said, is speaking of the Sabbath or seventh day of the week, which God himself has called "My holy day" (Is. lviii. 13). But if he intended the seventh day, it is strange that he did not use the customary designation. 2. It is held to be the day of Christ's birth. But that day is unknown, and it was not known or observed by the primitive church. 3. It is contended that the expression Lord's day is the same as the day of the Lord in 2 Pet. iii. 10, where it undoubtedly means the day of the second advent, and John would state that he was rapt, in vision, to the day of judgment. But John is apparently dating his vision. In the preceding sentence he mentions the place where he was at the time he received the revelation, the isle of Patmos; and declares the cause of his being on that island. In this sentence he states the day when he had the vision. It is also to be noticed that he does not speak of the day of the Lord, which is the constant designation of the day of the second advent, but uses the adjective kuriakē; a distinction which was observed ever afterwards between the day of the second advent and the first day of the week when Christ rose from the dead. 4. It has been thought possible that John means the anniversary of the resurrection. But none of the early fathers can be quoted either for this interpretation or for this use of the designation Lord's day. 5. Friday or crucifixion day, which, however, seems to have had no special honor from the apostles, this being reserved for 6. Sunday or resurrection day. On the resurrection day itself our Lord appeared to his disciples (Luke xxiv 13-49; John xx 1-25). After eight days, which in ordinary usage meant a week, Jesus a second time honored the first day of the week (John xx 26). Since Pentecost occurred fifty days after the second day of unleavened bread (Lev xxiii. 11, 15, see WEEKS, FEAST OF), it probably fell on the first day of the week in the year of Christ's crucifixion; and so the effusion of the Holy Spirit took place on the first day of the week (Acts ii 1). The Christians at Troas in Paul's time seem to have regarded that day as the stated one on which they were accustomed to assemble to break bread (Acts xx. 7). On the same day of the week the Christians were to lay by them in store the money which they designed to give in charity (1 Cor. xvi 2). These passages, aided by reasonings on more general principles, have led the great majority of Christians to consider the Lord's day a day set apart by the example of our Lord and his apostles for sacred purposes, and standing in a certain relation to the Sabbath of the ten commandments: see SABBATH. It may be added that some members of the primitive church made no distinction between days, including Jewish festivals and Sabbaths and possibly the first day, rightly or wrongly esteeming every day alike. They were not to be harshly judged, they were acting out of the fear of God (Rom. xiv. 5). Some of the Jewish converts continued to keep the seventh day and the Jewish festivals. It was a matter of liberty (Col. ii. 16), so long as the convert did not regard the observance as necessary to salvation (Gal. iv. 10).

Lord's Supper.

The name given by Paul to the commemorative ordinance instituted by our Lord on the evening preceding his crucifixion (1 Cor. xi. 20). Paul's account is the earliest record of the institution of the supper by at least two or three years. It was written probably early in A. D. 57, just twenty-seven years after the supper was instituted. The apostle had introduced it five years earlier, when he organized the Corinthian church and "delivered unto them" the ordinance (23). He pledges his own truthfulness and authority for the correctness of his account by saying, "I received and I delivered"; and he refers to the source of his information: he had not been an eyewitness of the event, he had not been present at the institution of the supper, but he had received from the Lord what he had delivered unto them. These words are capable of two interpretations: either Paul had been granted a special communication direct from the risen Lord, or else he had received the account from the Lord through the Lord's apostles, participants in the first supper. Matthew an eyewitness and Mark, the companion of Peter who was present at the institution of the supper, also record the circumstances; and so does Paul's companion, Luke. Wishing to fulfill all righteousness and to honor the ceremonial law whilst yet it continued, Jesus made arrangements to eat the passover with his disciples (Mat. xxvi 17-19). As the paschal lamb was killed in the evening, and its flesh eaten the same evening, the paschal feast necessarily took place in the evening (Mat. xxvi 20). Wine mixed with water had come into use on such occasions, because that was regarded as the best way of using the best wine (cp 2 Mac. xv. 39). When, therefore, our Lord was about to follow up the supper by the communion, there was wine mixed with water on the table. So also was there unleavened bread. He and his disciples were sitting (Mat. xxvi 20), by which is meant that, after the custom of that time, they half sat, half reclined on couches (Mark xiv. 18, R. V. margin). When the paschal feast was finished, Jesus took bread and blessed it, at the same time rendering thanks for it, and, giving it to the disciples, said: "This is my body which is given for you: this do in remembrance of me." And the cup in like manner after supper, saying: "This cup is the new covenant in my blood, even that which is poured out for you" (Luke xxii. 19, 20, R. V.), "which is shed for many unto remission of sins" (Mat. xxvi. 28, R. V.). The object for which the Lord's Supper was instituted was to keep him in remembrance (Luke xxii. 19). It was to show forth the Lord's death till he come (1 Cor. xi. 25, 26). The feast was not confined to the apostles nor to the Jewish Christians, but was celebrated in the churches of the gentiles also, for instance at Corinth (1 Cor. x. 15-21). It was understood to be the privilege of the church for all time. The table on which the bread was placed was known as the Lord's table (x. 21); the cup of wine retained the old name which it bore at the Jewish passover, cup of blessing (x. 16), and was also called the cup of the Lord (21; xi. 27).

Lo-ru'ha-mah [not having obtained mercy].

The symbolic name of the prophet Hosea's daughter by his wife Gomer (Hos. i. 6, 8).

Lot, I.

The use of the lot to determine doubtful questions was much in vogue among the nations of antiquity (Esth. iii. 7; Jon. i. 7; Mat. xxvii. 35). Stones or inscribed tablets or the like were put into a vessel and, having been shaken, were drawn out or cast forth. The act was commonly preceded by prayer, and was an appeal to God to decide the matter (Acts i. 23-26; Iliad iii. 316-325; vii. 174-181). In the early history of the Jewish people God was pleased to use the lot as a method of making known his will, so that the weighty statement was made in Prov. xvi. 33, "The lot is cast into the lap; but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord." The land of Canaan was divided among the twelve tribes by lot (Josh. xiv. 2; xviii. 6); for the method, see CANAAN. On one occasion Saul and Jonathan stood on one side and Jonathan cast lots against the people. The king and his son being thus singled out, they cast lots with each other, Jonathan being finally pointed out by this method of inquiry (1 Sam. xiv. 40-45). The courses of the priests, etc., were settled by lot (1 Chron. xxiv. 5, seq.). By casting lots after prayer the question was decided whether Joseph Barsabbas or Matthias should be Judas Iscariot's successor in the apostleship (Acts i. 15-26). This method of selection was not repeated by the apostles after the descent of the Holy Spirit.

Lot, II. [covering, or myrrh].

Son of Haran, Abraham's brother, and consequently nephew to the patriarch himself, whom he accompanied from Mesopotamia to Canaan (Gen. xi. 31; xii. 5), and to and from Egypt (xiii. 1). Like his uncle, he acquired much cattle; and his herdsmen and those of Abraham quarreled over the pasturage. Abraham proposed that he and Lot separate, and generously invited Lot to choose first. Lot, seeing that the hills were less fertile than the valley of the Jordan, chose the latter, and became a resident in Sodom. He did not take into account the character of the people among whom he was going to settle, and the probable effect of their evil example on his family, though he maintained his own integrity among them and was distressed from day to day by the sight and the story of lawless deeds (2 Pet. ii. 8). During the invasion of Chedorlaomer and his confederate kings, Lot was made prisoner, and owed his release to the courage and skill of Abraham (Gen. xiii. 2-xiv. 16). When two angels were sent to Sodom to warn him of its approaching destruction, the conduct of the mob toward these strangers showed how ripe the city was for destruction. Lot was saved from its overthrow; but his wife, looking back, was killed, being overwhelmed by a shower of falling salt. His sons-in-law, probably prospective ones (xix. 14, R. V. margin, cp. 8), remained behind, and perished (xix. 1-29; Wisd. x. 6-9). Soon afterwards, under the influence of wine, Lot unconsciously became a participant in abhorrent deeds. The Moabites and Ammonites were his descendants (30-38).

Lo'tan.

A tribe of Horites, dwelling in mount Seir (Gen. xxxvi. 20) and governed by a chieftain (29).

Love' Feasts.

The rendering of the Greek Agapai in 2 Pet. ii. 13, R. V. (on margin and in A V. deceptions). In Jude 12 the rendering is feasts of charity. They were entertainments held in churches in connection with the Lord's Supper. Chrysostom states that after the early community of goods had ceased, the wealthier members brought contributions of food and drink to the church, of which, at the conclusion of the services and after the celebration of the Lord's Supper, all partook, the poorest not excepted, by this means helping to promote the principle of love among Christians. As the purity of the church declined and ceremony increased, scandals arose in connection with these feasts. The council of Laodicea, A. D. 320, and that of Carthage, A. D. 397, forbade them to be held in churches; so did the council of Orleans, A. D. 541, that of Trullo A. D. 692, and that of Aix-la-chapelle A. D. 816; but all these councils together did not quite succeed in extinguishing the love feasts' excessive tenacity of life in the western church, while in the Greek church they still continue to exist. Of more modern religious denominations, love feasts were revived by the Moravians. John Wesley introduced them into the great organization which he founded. They exist also among the Sandemianians.

Low'land or Sheph'e-lah; variously rendered in A. V. by the vale, the valley, the low country, the plain.

The region of low hills between the plain of Philistia and the high central range of Palestine. It is described by Eusebius (in his Onomasticon under Sephêla) as "all the low country about Eleutheropolis [the modern Beit Jibrin] toward the north and west;" but in O. T. times the term comprehended the low, hilly country lying to the east and south as well. The hills rise to a height of from 500 to 800 feet, with a few higher summits. On their slopes the olive flourishes. The district is separated from the central Judæan range by a series of valleys which run north and south from Ajalon to near Beer-sheba; and it is itself cut by several wide, fertile valleys which lead from the Judæan ridge to the sea. It was assigned, as part of their inheritance, to the tribe of Judah; and when they found that they had too much territory, a small portion of it in the north was allotted to Dan (Josh xv. 33 seq; xix. 40 seq.). It included such notable places as Adullam, Beth-shemesh, Gezer, Eg-lon, Lachish, and part of the valleys of Ajalon, Sorek, and Elah (33 seq: 1 Sam. xvii 1, 2, 2 Chron. xxviii 18).

Lu'bm.

An African people from whom Shishak, king of Egypt, drew part of his army for the invasion of Palestine (2 Chron xii 3, xvi. 8; cp Dan xi 43, Nah iii 9), doubtless the primitive Libyans.

Lu'cas. See LUKE.

Lu'ci-fer [the light bearer or bringer].

The planet Venus, as the morning star. With the exception of the sun and moon, Venus is the brightest object in the sky. It appears as a morning or an evening star according as it is west or east of the sun, returning to the same position about every nineteen months. As the former, Venus is the harbinger of daylight. The prophet likened the splendor of the king of Babylon to Lucifer, son of the morning (Is xiv. 12; in R. V. day-star), and Jesus calls himself the bright, the morning star (Rev. xxii. 16; cp 2 Pet. i 19). The application of the name Lucifer to Satan, the rebel angel hurled from heaven, has existed since the third century, especially among poets. It is based on the erroneous supposition that Luke x 18 is an explanation of Is. xiv. 12.

Lu'ci-us.

1. A Roman official who in the year 174 of the Seleucidæan era, 139-8 B. C., issued letters in favor of the Jews to various kings subject to Rome (1 Mac xv. 16). He is entitled a consul, which identifies him with Lucius Calpurnius Piso, one of the consuls for the year 139 B. C. It is possible, however, that he was the prætor Lucius Valerius who conducted the proceedings in the Roman senate which led to their making a league of friendship with the Jews, to the issuance of the aforementioned letters, and in the days of Hyrcanus II. to action favorable to the Jews (Antiq. xiv. 8, 5).

2. A Christian from Cyrene, who was a teacher in the church at Antioch (Acts xiii. 1). He is commonly supposed to have been the kinsman of Paul, who at Corinth joined with the apostle in sending salutations to the brethren at Rome (Rom xvi. 21).

Lud.

1. A people classed among the Semites (Gen x 22); believed to be the Lydians (Antiq. i. 6, 4; compare order of enumeration in Gen.), occupying, however, a wider territory than Lydia in western Asia Minor. It is not clear in what manner the Lydians were related to the Semites, whether by blood or by conquest. According to Herodotus (i. 7), their first king was a son of Nimus and grandson of Belus, that is, he was descended from the Assyrians.

2. A people related to the Egyptians (Gen. x 13), also the country which they inhabited. They are mentioned as bowmen in the armies of Egypt and Tyre (Jer xlvi. 9; Ezek xxvii. 10; xxx 5). Libyans is too broad a translation (Jer xlvi. 9, A. V.); though the Ludim are doubtless to be sought in northern Africa, west of the Nile.

Lu'dim [plural of Lud]; see LUD 2.

Lu'hith [perhaps, made of planks].

A Moabite town approached by an ascent (Is xv. 5; Jer xlviii 5) according to Eusebius and Jerome, Louietha, between Areopolis, that is Rabbath Moab, and Zoar.

Luke, in A. V. once Lucas (Philem. 24) [N. T. Greek Loukas, probably an abbreviation of Latin Lucanus or perhaps Lucilius].

A friend and companion of St. Paul, who joined him in sending from Rome salutations to the Colossian church (Col. iv. 14) and to Philemon (Philem. 24). In the former place he is described as "the beloved physician" and in the latter place as one of the apostle's fellow-laborers. He was also with Paul in Rome at a later time when 2 Timothy was written (2 Tim. iv. 11), and then the apostle gives a touching tribute to his friend's fidelity in the words "Only Luke is with me." These are all the notices of Luke by name in the N. T., for he must not be identified with the Lucius of Acts xiii. 1 nor with the one mentioned in Rom. xvi. 21; see LUCIUS. We find, however, in the second century the tradition already established that Luke was the author of the Third Gospel and of The Acts, both of which were certainly written by the same hand (Acts i. 1). Accordingly we may learn more of him from The Acts, in which he intimates his presence with Paul during certain portions of the latter's missionary journeys by the use of "we" or "us" in the narrative (Acts xvi. 10-17; xx. 5-xxi. 18; xxvii 1-xxviii 16). From these passages it appears that Luke joined Paul on the second missionary journey at Troas and went with him to Philippi. Again on the third journey Luke rejoined the apostle at Philippi and went Lute. See PSALTERY.

Luz [almond tree].

1. A Canaanite town, afterwards Bethel (Gen. xxviii 19; xxxv 6; xlviii 3; Josh. xviii. 13; Judg 1. 23). In Josh. xvi 2 it is distinguished from Bethel and located to the west. See BETHEL.

2. A town in the Hittite country, built by an inhabitant of Luz in mount Ephraim, who betrayed that town to the Israelites and was allowed by them to depart with his family uninjured (Judg 1 22-26). Site unknown. About 12 miles southeast by east of Sidon is the town Luezeh, and 4½ miles west by north of Banias is the ruin Luweiziyeh.

Lyc-a-o'ni-a [popularly interpreted as pertaining to king Lycaon or abounding in were-wolves]

An elevated, rugged, inland district of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Galatia, on the south by Cilicia and Isauria, on the east by Cappadocia, and on the west by Phrygia. It was mainly suitable for pasture only. Its peculiar dialect, probably mingled Greek and Syriac, was still spoken when Paul visited the district and preached in three of its cities, Iconium, Derbe, and Lystra (Acts xiii. 51-xiv 23, especially 11).

Ly'ci-a [explained as pertaining to Lycus, son of Pandion (Herod i 173)]

A province of Asia Minor, jutting southward into the Mediterranean Sea, and bounded on the north by Caria, Phrygia, Pisidia, and Pamphylia. Paul on his last voyage to Jerusalem passed Rhodes, an island off its western coast, and landed at Patara, within its limits, where he took ship for Phoenicia (Acts xxi 1, 2). On his voyage to Rome he landed at Myra, another city of Lycia, whence he sailed in an Alexandrian vessel bound for Italy (xxvii. 5, 6).

Lyd'da.

A village of considerable size near Joppa (Acts ix 38; Antiq. xx. 6, 2), probably the town called Lod in the O. T. The gospel early took root in it (Acts ix 32). Shortly before 153 B. C. the town with the district about it formed a distinct government in connection with Samaria, but in 145 B. C. it was transferred to Judea (1 Mac. xi. 34; cp. 28; x. 30, 38). Peter visited it, and his cure of Æneas through the name of Jesus resulted in a large increase of disciples (Acts ix. 33-35). It was burnt by Cestius in the time of Nero, but was soon rebuilt (War ii. 19, 1). See LOD.

Lyd'i-a [nominally from Ludos, its reputed founder (Herod i. 7)].

1. A region on the western coast of Asia Minor, with Sardis for its capital. Thyatira and Philadelphia were within its limits. It was very fertile and had a mild climate, and consequently it was densely populated. The customs of its inhabitants were Semitic in character, and their religion was apparently a mingling of Syrian and Phrygian worship (Duncæer). The state rose to power about 689 B. C., under Gyges, when the Greeks on the coast and the tribes of Asia Minor were subdued. In 549 B. C. Croesus, the last king, was defeated by Cyrus, and Lydia became a Persian province. It never regained independence. Antiochus III., of Syria, was forced to cede it to the Romans (cp 1 Mac. viii 8). Many Jews dwelt there (Antiq. xii 3, 4), and Christian churches were founded (Rev. i 11).

2. A woman of Thyatira, a town of Lydia, though it is not known whether this was the origin of her name. Thyatira was noted for its dyeing, and Lydia made her living in Philippi, to which she had removed, by selling purple dyes or dyed goods. She was a worshiper of God before Paul arrived at Philippi. She received the gospel of Christ gladly, and, though by birth an Asiatic, became Paul's first convert in Macedonia and Europe. At her urgent invitation Paul and his missionary associates took up their abode with her; and when Paul and Silas were released from prison, to which they had been consigned after a riot of which they were the innocent cause, they returned to her house (Acts xvi. 14, 15, 40).

Ly-sa'ni-as [ending sadness].

A tetrarch of Abilene in the fifteenth year of Tiberius (Luke iii. 1). Some critics have thought that Lysanias, son of Ptolemy, who ruled Chalcis in Coele Syria during the years 40 to 34 B. C. (Antiq. xiv. 13, 3, xv. 4. 1), gave name to this tetrarchy, and that Luke is in error. But the highest authorities explain the facts in a very different manner. Lysanias who ruled Chalcis is never called tetrarch, and Abila nowhere appears in his dominions. From Antiq. xv 10, 1-3, it appears that the house or territory of Lysanias was hired by Zenodorus about 25 B. C., became known as the country of Zenodorus, lay between Trachonitis and Galilee, chiefly about Paneas and Ulatha, and hence apparently did not include Chalcis in Coele Syria, and strictly speaking was distinct from Batanea, Trachonitis, and Auranitis. These districts were bestowed on Herod the Great and passed to his son Philip the tetrarch, Augustus confirming to him Batanea, Trachonitis, Auranitis, and part of the house of Zenodorus (xvii. 11, 2) which included Paneas (8, 1). In A. D. 37 the emperor Caligula made Herod Agrippa king of the tetrarchy of Philip and added the tetrarchy of Lysanias (xviii. 6, 10). This latter tetrarchy had its capital at Abila, some eighteen miles northwest of Damascus, and was distinct from the kingdom of Chalcis (xix 5, 1; xx. 7, 1; War ii. 11, 5). In the reign of the emperor Tiberius the region about Abila was ruled by a tetrarch named Lysanias (see ABILENE), in exact agreement with Luke's statement. Although far north, it may have been the remaining part of the country of Zenodorus, which after his death and the division of his land, as before mentioned, had been formed into a tetrarchy or kingdom under a younger Lysanias, perhaps of the same line as the former ruler of Chalcis.

Lys'is-as.

1 A general of the army of Syria during the reigns of Antiochus Epiphanes and Antiochus Eupator. When Antiochus Epiphanes went to Persia about 165 B C, he appointed Lysias, who was of royal blood, viceroy during his absence, with the duty of quelling the Jewish insurrection under the Maccabees (1 Mac iii 32-37). After operating through others, Lysias found it necessary to take the field himself; but he was defeated by Judas with great loss (38-40, iv 1-22, 28-35). When the news of Antiochus' death arrived in 163 B C, Lysias seized the reins of government and ruled in the name of the young Antiochus, although the late king had named Philip for regent during the minority of the heir to the throne (vi 14-17). In this capacity Lysias undertook another campaign against the Jews. He gained a victory over Judas and laid siege to Jerusalem; but the news that Philip was on his way from Persia to claim the regency, compelled him to make terms of peace with the Jews and return to Antioch (vi 28-63). He maintained himself successfully against Philip, but was put to death in 162 B C by Demetrius I (vii. 1-4).

2. Roman commandant at Jerusalem, who rescued Paul from the mob of Jews (Acts xxii. 24). See CLAUDIUS LYSIAS.

Lys'tra.

A city of Lycaonia and a Roman colony, where Paul cured a man crippled from birth, and would have been worshiped as a god had he not refused. It was there also that he was stoned and left for dead (Acts xiv 6-21; 2 Tim. iii 11). Either at Lystra or Derbe he first met Timothy (Acts xvi. 1, 2). The site is Zoldera, one mile north of Khatyn Sera and twenty-two miles south-southwest of Iconium.

M.

Ma'a-cah, in A. V. often Maachah, and in R V of Josh xiii. 13 Maacath, the archaic (Canaanite) spelling [compression, oppression].

1 A place in Syria (2 Sam x 6, 8), sometimes called Aram-maacah or Syria-maacah (1 Chron. xix 6, 7); see ARAM 2 (4). Its inhabitants were descended from Nahor (Gen. xxii 24).

2. Wife of Machir, the son of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii. 15, 16).

3 A concubine of Caleb, the son of Hezron (1 Chron. ii 48).

4. Wife of Jehiel and ancestress of king Saul (1 Chron. xiii. 29; ix. 35).

5 Daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur. She became one of David's wives and mother of Absalom (2 Sam iii 3).

6 Father of Hanan, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi 43).

7. Father of the ruler of the Simeonites in David's reign (1 Chron. xxvii 16).

8 Father of Solomon's royal contemporary Achish of Gath (1 Kin ii 39); see ACHISH.

9 Wife of Rehoboam, and daughter, or in view of 2 Chron. xiii 2 perhaps, the granddaughter, of Absalom (1 Kin xv 2; 2 Chron. xi. 20-22), and mother of king Abijah. After the death of the latter, she remained queen-mother (gubrah); but her grandson Asa took this position from her because she had made an abominable image for an Asherah (2 Chron. xv 16 R V). She is called Michajah in 2 Chron. xiii. 2: but this is probably a textual corruption, for in the seven other places where her name occurs it is Maacah.

Ma-ac'a-thite in A V Maachathite, but in Deut iii 14 Maachathi, the Hebrew form instead of the English.

A descendant of a person named Maacah, or a native or inhabitant of the Syrian kingdom of Maacah or of the town of Beth-maacah in Naphtali (Josh. xii. 5; 2 Sam xxiii 34).

Ma'a-chah. See MAACAH.

Ma-ach'a-thi. See MAACATHITE.

Ma'a-dai [perhaps, wavering]

A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x 34).

Ma-a-di'ah [ornament of Jehovah].

A chief of the priests who returned from the Babylonian captivity (Neh. xii 5, 7). In the next generation, a father's house among the priests, which occupies the same position in the corresponding catalogue, bears the name Moadiah (ver 17). The reason for this traditional variation is not yet clear. Perhaps the name should always be pronounced Moadiah.

Ma'ai.

A priest who blew a trumpet at the dedication of the second temple (Neh. xii. 36).

Ma'a-leh-a-crab'bim. See AKRABBIM.

Ma'a-rath [a place bare of trees].

A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv 59), doubtless north of Hebron and near Halhul.

Ma'a-reh-ge'ba [place destitute of trees at Geba]

A place adjacent to Geba (Judg. xx 33, R. V.). On the margin it is translated the meadow of Geba or Gibeah; in the text of A. V. the meadows of Gibeah.

Ma'a-sai, in A. V. Ma-as'i-ai [perhaps, work of Jehovah]

A priest of the family of Immer (1 Chron. ix. 12). The name may be an abbreviation of Maaseiah by curtailment or possibly another form of that word; or perhaps it is an accidental transposition of the letters of Amasai.

A family, also called Asmonæan from one of its ancestors, which ruled Judæa from 166 B. C. to 37 B. C.; see ASMONÆAN. The title Maccabeus, in A. V. Maccabeus, was first given to Judas, third son of Mattathias (1 Mac. ii. 4), but at an early date it was transferred to the entire family and to others who had a part in the same events. The origin and meaning of the term have eluded research. It is usually derived from makkabah, a hammer, either in allusion to the crushing blows inflicted by Judas and his successors upon their enemies, or perhaps because a cap worn by Judas was shaped like a hammer at its top point. It has also been explained as composed of the initials of the Hebrew words in the sentence, "Who is like to thee among the gods, Jehovah?", or in the sentence, "What is like my father?", or as being the Hebrew word makbi, extinguisher. None of these interpretations is, however, more than a conjecture. The first of the family mentioned is Mattathias, an aged priest, who, driven to desperation by the outrages of Antiochus Epiphanes, raised a revolt against him and fled to the mountains, followed by those who were zealous for the faith of Israel. Mattathias died about two years afterwards, but the revolt was carried on by his five sons. Judas, the third son, was the first military leader, 166 B. C. By avoiding pitched battles, and harassing the Syrians by vigorous and persistent guerrilla warfare, he and his devoted band defeated and routed every detachment of the Syrian army sent against them. He retook Jerusalem, purified the temple, and restored the daily sacrifice. A feast to celebrate this restoration was instituted and was kept annually thereafter. This was the winter feast of dedication alluded to in John x 22. Judas fell in battle 160 B. C., whereupon his younger brother Jonathan, who was already high priest, assumed command of the army. About this time John the eldest brother was captured and killed by the children of Jambri (1 Mac xi 36), and shortly before this another brother, Eleazar, had been crushed to death underneath an elephant which he had wounded in battle. During the leadership of Jonathan the Syrians were occupied with civil war, so that not only was Judaea left in peace, but the favor of the Jews was sued for, and Jonathan was able to strengthen his position. He made a treaty with the Romans and also with the Spartans. He was treacherously slain by Tryphon, a Syrian general, in 143 B. C. On his death the leadership fell to Simon, the last remaining son of Mattathias. The most important event that fell under his rule was the granting of Jewish independence by the Syrian king Demetrius II. Coins were struck bearing the name of Simon, and contracts were dated "in the first year of Simon high priest and governor." Simon and two of his sons were treacherously slain by his son-in-law Ptolemy, in Dok near Jericho 135 B. C. The one son who escaped, John, assumed the power and was known as John Hyrcanus. He was a shrewd and vigorous ruler and enlarged his province. He conquered the Edomites and merged them in the Jewish people. After a long and prosperous reign he died a natural death, and was succeeded by his son Aristobulus, a cruel and unprincipled man who killed his mother and brother. He changed the theocracy into a kingdom, calling himself king, but retained at the same time the high-priesthood. After a reign of one year he was succeeded by a brother, Alexander Jannæus, during whose reign the country was torn by the dissensions of the Sadducees and Pharisees. He had a troubled reign of 27 years, and was followed by his widow Alexandra, who reigned for 9 years. She left two sons, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, who quarreled about the succession. Hyrcanus was established as high priest while Aristobulus seized the civil authority. Civil war broke out. The Romans interfered, and at first upheld Aristobulus, but later deposed him and carried him to Rome. Hyrcanus was nominally king, but the real ruler was Antipas, or Antipater, an Idumæan, who had been appointed procurator of Judaea under Hyrcanus by the Romans. A period of quarrels and dissensions among the members of the reigning family followed, during which time Antipater steadily grew in influence and power with the Romans, until, the Maccabæans falling into disfavor, the crown of Judaea was given to Antipater's son, Herod. For 1, 2, 3, and 4 Maccabees, see APOCRYPHA.

Mac-e-do'ni-a.

A country lying immediately to the north of Greece. Little is known of it prior to 560 B. C., and for more than 200 years afterwards it possessed no special interest. But under Philip of Macedon (359-336 B. C.) and his yet more celebrated son Alexander the Great (336-323 B. C.), it rose to world-wide power and imperial importance, see PHILIP I and ALEXANDER I. Under his successors the empire was divided, and the country declined, till in 168 B. C. it was conquered by the Romans, and in 142 B. C. became a Roman province. Macedonia is not mentioned by name in the O. T., but the Macedonian empire is referred to in Dan. ii. 39, vii. 6; viii. 5, 8. In 1 Mac. i. 1 Chittim is Macedonia. Paul, summoned in a vision by a man of Macedonia, on his second journey, passed from Asia into Europe, and preached the gospel in that continent first on Macedonian soil. At this time he passed through the Macedonian towns of Neapolis, Philippi, Amphipolis, Apollonia, Thessalonica, and Berea (Acts xvi. 9-xvii. 14). When Paul departed, Silas and Timothy continued the work (xvii. 14, 15; xviii. 5). Paul revisited the region (xix. 21, 22; xx. 1-3; cp. 2 Cor. ii. 13; vii. 5; 1 Tim. i. 3). Gaius and Aristarchus, Macedonians, were Paul's companions in travel, and were in danger on his account during the riot at Ephesus (Acts xix. 29). Secundus, also a Macedonian, was one of those who waited for him at Troas, when for the last time he was to leave Philippi on his way to Jerusalem (xx. 4). Paul's converts in Macedonia made a collection for the poor Christians of the Jewish capital (Rom. xv. 26). They also ministered to the wants of the apostle himself (2 Cor. viii. 1-5), the Philippians being the most prominent in the work of charity (Phil. iv. 15).

Mach-ban'nai, in A. V. Mach'ba-nai [pehaps, clothed with a cloak].

One of the Gadite heroes who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 13).

Mach'be-na, in A. V. Machbenah [a bond or cloak].

A town of Judah, to judge from the context (1 Chron. ii. 49). See CABBON.

Ma'chi.

Father of the spy from the tribe of Gad (Num. xiii. 15).

Ma'chir [sold]

1. The firstborn and only son of Manasseh (Gen. i. 23; Josh. xvii. 1). His mother was an Aramitess (1 Chron. vii. 14). He was the founder of the family of the Machintes, which would have been the sole family of Manasseh. But as posterity increased, new families were set apart from the main line through the firstborn; and thus Machir became one among the families of Manasseh (Num. xxvi. 29). The family, called collectively Machir, was a man of war, and subjugated Gilead. This district was accordingly assigned to the family for its inheritance (Num. xxxii. 39, 40; Josh. xvii. 1). and was given by Moses. The name of Machir was once used poetically for the whole tribe of Manasseh, west as well as east of the Jordan (Judg. v. 14).

2. A son of Ammiel, in Lo-debar, east of the Jordan (2 Sam. ix. 4, 5), who brought provisions to David during the rebellion of Absalom (xvii. 27).

Mach'mas. See MICHMASH.

Mach-na-de'bai.

A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 40).

Mach-pe'lah [duplication, doubling]

A place before Mamre, where was a field with trees and a cave belonging to Ephron, a Hittite (Gen. xxiii. 9, 17, 19). The place was purchased by Abraham for 400 shekels of silver in order to use the cave as a sepulcher for Sarah, his wife. He himself was buried there by his sons, Isaac and Ishmael (xxv. 9, 10). There also Isaac and Rebekah were buried, so likewise were Leah and Jacob (xxxv. 29; xlvii. 28-31; xlix. 29-33; i. 12, 13), and perhaps others of whom we have no record. There were monuments to the patriarchs at Hebron in the time of Christ (War iv. 9, 7). The cave is probably correctly identified as the one which undoubtedly lies beneath the great mosque at Hebron. Christians have all along been excluded from the mosque and the cavern beneath; but the Prince of Wales on April 7th, 1862, the Crown Prince of Prussia in November, 1869, and the two sons of the Prince of Wales, one of whom is now King George, on April 5th, 1882, were permitted to make an imperfect examination. On the slope of the hill looking towards the west stands the Haram, a sacred enclosure, in form an oblong lying northwest and southeast, surrounded by walls of similar masonry to those of early date around the temple area at Jerusalem, and measuring externally about 197 feet in length and 111 feet in breadth. The ancient Christian church, which completely filled the southeastern end of the enclosure, has been converted into a mosque. In the mosque, close to its northwestern wall and about ten feet southwest of the main entrance, is a round opening, about a foot in diameter, through the stone flooring. Through this hole a glimpse is had into a shaft about twelve feet square and fifteen feet deep, with a door in the southeastern wall. This chamber is supposed to be an anteroom to the double cave situated immediately to the southeast under the floor of the mosque. Two entrances to the cave are marked in the flagging of the mosque, but they cannot be opened without tearing up the pavement. Their position would indicate that they afforded access to the cave through its roof of rock. The floor of the mosque and the courtyard in front are fifteen feet higher than the street which skirts the Haram on the long southwestern side. In the northwestern corner of the enclosure is a shrine sacred to Joseph, but he was buried at Shechem (Josh. xxiv. 32).

Ma'dai.

A people descended from Japheth (Gen. x. 2; 1 Chron. i. 5), doubtless the inhabitants of Media.

Ma'di-an. See MIDIAN.

Mad-man'nah [dunghill].

A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 31; 1 Chron. ii. 49); perhaps identical with Beth-marcaboth (q. v.).

Mad'men [dunghill].

A town in Moab (Jer. xlviii. 2).

Mad-me'nah [dunghill].

A town near Jerusalem and on the north (Is. x. 31). Not identified.

Mad'ness.

1. Weakness or disorder of the intellect, rendering a person void of right reason (Deut. xxviii. 28). David, when feigning to be mad, made marks on the doors of the gate and let the spittle fall down upon his beard (1 Sam. xxi. 13, 14, where the two principal Hebrew synonyms are used). It may manifest itself in hallucinations (Acts xii. 15), or in wild raving (1 Cor. xiv. 23), or even in violence, such as hurling about firebrands and arrows (Prov. xxvi. 18). Its symptoms are temporarily produced by drink (Jer. xxv. 16; h. 7).

2. A state of uncontrollable emotion, as infatuation (Jer. i. 38) or fury (Ps. cii. 8; Luke vi. 11; Acts xxvi. 11).

Ma'don [contention, strife].

A town of northern Canaan, whose king was in confederacy with the king of Hazor Josh. xi. 1-12; xii. 19). Site unknown. On the survey map it stands with a query at Madin, 5 miles west by north of Tiberias.

Mag'a-dan.

A locality into the borders of which Jesus went after crossing the sea of Galilee (Mat. iv 39, in A. V. Magdala). It seems to have been on the western shore of the lake and may have included Magdala (cp. Mark viii 10).

Mag'bish [congregating]

A person or town, it is uncertain which (Ezra ii. 30). If a place, its site is unknown.

Mag-da-la [probably, a tower].

A town which, according to the Talmud, stood on the western shore of the sea of from the east to worship the infant Jesus (Mat. ii 1, R. V. margin). The Magi were a priestly caste, numerous enough to be regarded as one of the six tribes of Media (Herod. i. 101). When the Persians conquered the Medes, the Magi retained their influence in the new empire. An attempt on their part to seize the crown led to a dreadful slaughter of them, notwithstanding which their power soon revived (iii. 79). They worshiped the elements, fire, air, earth, and water, especially the first. The only temples they had were fire temples, generally on house tops, where they kept the sacred element burning night and day. What to do with the dead was a question which, with their views, involved much perplexity. The corpse could not be burned, buried, cast into Mejdel and the Plain of Gennesaret, looking North.

Galilee, near Tiberias and Hammath, and within less than a Sabbath day's journey of the water. It exists in the wretched village el-Mejdel, scarcely 3 miles north of Tiberias. In Mat. xv 39 the R. V., following the best manuscripts, substitutes Magadan (q. v.). See also MAGDALENE.

Mag-da-le'ne [of Magdala] Mag-da-le'ne is the Greek pronunciation, like Abilene; Mag-da-lene is the English pronunciation, like Damascene, Gadarene, Nazarene.

A designation of one of the Marys, implying that she came from some Magdala, probably from the village now called el-Mejdel, on the western shore of the sea of Galilee, about 3 miles north-northwest of Tiberias. The word Magdalene makes no such imputation on the moral character of Mary as is now conveyed by the term Magdalen.

Mag'di-el [honor of God].

A duke descended from Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 3; 1 Chron. i 54).

Mag'i [Greek Magoi, the plural of Magos; Behistun inscription Magushu].

The religious caste to which the wise men belonged, as their title indicates, who came water, or left to decay in the air without defiling an element. It was therefore exposed to be devoured by carrion-loving birds or beasts (Herod. i. 140, who probably errs in speaking of its after-burial, Strabo xv 3, 20). To do this in the least offensive manner they erected towers called towers of silence, with transverse bars at the top, on which vultures and ravens might stand while they did their melancholy work. The Magi wore as sacerdotal vestments a white robe, with a head-dress consisting of a tall felt cap, with lap-pets at the side which concealed the jaws. They claimed to be mediators between God and man, intervening in all sacrifices (Herod. i 132; vii. 43). They interpreted dreams and omens and claimed the gift of prophecy (i 107, 120; vii 19, 37, 113). They were diligent in killing such animals as were regarded as belonging to the bad creation (i. 140). The foreigner was apt to observe the religious doctrine and priestly functions of the Magi less attentively than their incantations; and in process of time the Greeks bestowed the epithet Magos on any sorcerer who employed the methods and enchantments of the East. The Jew Bar-jesus was a Magus (Acts xiii 6, Greek text and R. V. margin), and so was Simon, often called Magus, of Samaria (viii. 9).

Ma-gi'cian [remotely from Greek Magoi, Magi]

A man who pretends to have preternatural powers, which he has obtained by the study of an occult science or the practice of a black art in connivance with evil spirits, and which he calls magic (cp. Acts xix. 19); see SORCERER. In the Bible magician is the rendering of hartom, one of the class of sacred scribes, who were skilled in writing and acquired vast information (Dan i. 20), and who often claimed occult knowledge, practiced magic (Ex. vii. 11), and undertook to interpret dreams (Gen. xli. 8; Dan ii. 10). The Egyptian magicians who withstood Moses were two in number, and their names were Jannes and Jambres (2 Tim. iii. 8).

Ma'gog.

A people descended from Japheth (Gen. x. 2), at one period inhabiting a northern land (Ezek. xxxviii. 2, 15). Josephus identified them with the Scythians (Antiq. i. 6, 1), and his identification is commonly accepted. The final struggle of heathenism with the kingdom of God is prophetically portrayed by Ezekiel under the figure of an invasion of the land of Israel by the hordes of the king of Magog and their overthrow. Ezekiel's description is referred to and its imagery is borrowed by John (Rev. xx. 8, 9). See GOG.

Ma-gor-mis'sa-bib [fear round about]

A prophetic name given to Pashhur, a priest and governor of the temple who ill-treated the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. xx. 3).

Mag'pi-ash [apparently moth slayer]

One of the chiefs of the people who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 20).

Ma'ha-lah See MAHLAH 2

Ma-ha'la-lei, in A V and in N. T. of R. V. Ma-ha-la'le-el, in A V of N. T. Ma-le'-le-el [praise of God]

1. An antediluvian patriarch in the line of Seth (Gen. v. 12-17; Luke iii. 37).

2. One of the tribe of Judah, family of Perez, who lived in Jerusalem after the captivity (Neh. xi. 4).

Ma'ha-lath [sickness, anxiety, grief].

1. A musical term (Ps. liii. : lxxxviii. titles); which, judged by Hebrew etymology, refers to sadness. The words al mah' lath lamnoth (Ps. lxxxviii. title) then mean "mournfully to chant."

2. Daughter of Ishmael and a wife of Esau (Gen. xxviii. 9). Called also Bashe-math (q. v.).

3. Daughter of Jerimoth and one of Rehoboam's wives (2 Chron. xi. 18).

Ma'ha-li. See MAHLI.

Ma-ha-na'im [two camps].

The name given by Jacob to a place east of Jordan where the angels of God met him, apparently in two detachments, just after he had finally parted from Laban and before he crossed the Jabbok (Gen. xxxii. 2). It was on the boundary line between the tribes of Gad and Manasseh (Josh. xiii. 26, 30). It was afterwards assigned to the Merarite Levites (xxi. 38; 1 Chron. vi. 80). Commencing as a sacred spot, it ultimately became a fortified city. It was Ish-bosheth's capital (2 Sam. ii. 8, 12, 29). David retired thither while his rebellious son Absalom was in possession of Jerusalem (xvii. 24, 27; xviii. 24, 33; xix. 32; 1 Kin. ii. 8). Ahinadab the son of Iddo was Solomon's purveyor in the region (iv. 14). The site has not been identified. Robinson and long before him the Jewish traveler Moses hap-Parchi, about 1315, suggested Mahneh, about 4 miles east of ed-Deir. Tristram prefers Birket Mahneh, which he locates about 21 miles southeast of Gadara and 22 southwest of Edrei.

Ma'ha-neh-dan [camp of Dan].

A place behind, that is west of, Kirjath-jearim (Judg. xviii. 12), between Zorah and Eshtaol (xiii. 25), so named when the Danite spies encamped at the spot.

Ma'ha-rai [impetuous]

A Netophathite, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 28, 1 Chron. xi. 30). He was David's captain for the tenth month (xxvii. 13).

Ma'hath [seizing or instrument of seizing]

1. A Kohathite Levite, descended by the line of Zephaniah, Tahath, and Abiasaph (1 Chron. vi. 35). He was an ancestor of Samuel (33).

2. Another Levite, one of the overseers, who looked after the tithes and freewill offerings in Hezekiah's reign (2 Chron. xxxi. 13). Probably he was the son of Amasai, a descendant of Kohath (xxix. 12).

Ma'ha-vite.

A designation of unknown meaning appended to the name of Eliel, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi. 46). The passage is probably corrupt, for the word is plural and yet joined to the singular.

Ma-ha'zi-oth [perhaps, vision of significance].

A Levite, a descendant of Heman (1 Chron. xxv. 4). He obtained the twenty-third lot among the singers (30).

Ma'her-shal'al-hash-baz [spoil speedeth, prey hasteth].

The words which Isaiah was directed to display on a public tablet and have duly witnessed, and a year later was told to give as a name to his second son. They predicted the speedy conquest of Damascus and Samaria by the king of Assyria (Is. viii. 1-4). The preliminary formality drew public attention to the enigmatical words and attested that God was preparing and revealing the event a year before its occurrence.

Mah'lah, in A. V. once Mahalah (1 Chron. vii. 18) [disease].

1. Daughter of Zelophehad (Num. xxvi. 33; xxvii. 1).

2. Another Manassite, whose mother was Hammoleketh (1 Chron. vii. 18).

Mah'li, in A. V. once Mahali (Ex. vi. 19) [sick, weak].

1. A Levite, son of Merari and brother of Mushi. He founded a tribal family or house (Ex. vi. 19; Num. iii. 20, 33; xxvi. 58). His grandsons married their cousins (1 Chron. xxiii. 22).

2. A Levite, family of Merari, house of Mushi (1 Chron. vi. 47; xxiii. 23; xxiv. 30).

Mah'lon [sickly].

Elder son of Elimelech and Naomi, and the first husband of Ruth (Ruth i. 2; iv. 10).

Ma'hol [dancing, joy].

Father of Heman, Chalcol, and Darda, three noted wise men (1 Kin. iv. 31).

Mah-se'iah, in A. V. Maaseiah [Jehovah is a refuge].

An ancestor of Jeremiah's friend, Baruch, and of the chief chamberlain, Seraiah (Jer. xxxii. 12; li. 59).

Ma'kaz [an end].

A town whence one of Solomon's purveyors drew supplies (1 Kin. iv. 9). Site unknown.

Ma'ked, in A. V. once Maged.

A town of Gilead, in which Jews were shut up by the heathen (1 Mac. v. 26). It was captured by Judas Maccabæus, and the Jews were released (36). Hitzig identifies it with Maḳad, a town which he locates on the border of the Hauran, near Edrei.

Mak-he'loth [assemblies, especially for the worship of God].

An encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. xxxiii. 25, 26). Site unknown.

Mak-ke'dah [perhaps, a place of shepherds].

A Canaanite town in the lowland, taken by Joshua (Josh. xv. 41). Near it was a cave (x. 16). The site has not been identified. Eusebius located it 8 Roman miles east of Eleutheropolis. But as this location would be in the mountains, his statement, if correct, must be interpreted as meaning northeast or southeast.

Mak'tesh [a mortar, a trough, a hollow].

A locality at Jerusalem (Zeph. i. 11). The Targum identifies it with the Kidron valley; another supposition is that it was the valley separating the temple from the city.

Mal'a-chi [my messenger, or messenger (of Jehovah)].

A prophet, the writer of the last book of the O. T. (Mal. i. 1). Nothing is known of his history except what may be learned from his book. As the name means my messenger

(so in iii. 1), some have supposed it to be, not the proper name, but the title of a prophet, perhaps of Ezra. But as each of the eleven preceding minor prophecies has its author's name prefixed, there is a strong presumption that it is so in the present case also, and that Malachi was the actual name of the prophet who penned the book. It may be divided into the following sections: 1. God's special love for Israel, shown in his choice of Jacob instead of Esau (i. 2-5), was not requited. a. The priests and people (6, 14) dishonored God by presenting blemished offerings (6-14); punishment threatened for this departure from the norm established by God for the priesthood and once realized (ii. 1-9); b. The people dealt treacherously against their brethren, intermarrying with the heathen (11) and putting away their own wives (14, 16) and doing deeds of violence (ii. 10-17). 2. Judgment imminent. God's messenger is about to prepare the way, the Lord himself will suddenly come to his temple, the messenger of the covenant shall come as judge and purify Levi from dross and visit evil doers (iii. 1-6; cp. Ex. xxiii. 20-23, Mat. xi. 10). 3. Call to repentance; for then the Lord will come in blessing and judgment, putting to nought the complaint that he makes no distinction between the good and the evil. Those who have turned from sin to God will be his peculiar treasure, but the wicked shall be burned as stubble (iii. 7-iv. 3). Exhortation to remember the law of Moses, and announcement of the mission of Elijah to prepare for the terrible day of the Lord (iv. 4-6, Mat. xvii. 10-13; Luke i. 17).

When the prophecy was delivered the Jewish people were not under a king, but under a governor (Mal. i. 8), doubtless one appointed by the Persian emperor (Neh. v. 14). Zerubbabel's temple was standing, as was the altar, and sacrifices were being offered as in the olden time (i. 7-10); hence Malachi is later than Haggai and Zechariah. But the outburst of religious life which had immediately followed the return from Babylon, and had resulted in the rebuilding first of the sanctuary and then of the fortifications of Jerusalem, had had time to expend its force. Priests and people were corrupt. This condition suits the time of Nehemiah (Neh. xiii.). The generally accepted date, which originated with Vitrings, is 420 B. C. Davidson prefers 460 to 450 B. C.

Mal'cam, in A. V. Malcham [regnant, rule].

1. A Benjamite, son of Shaharsaim and Hodesh (1 Chron. viii. 9).

2. The chief deity of the Ammonites (Jer. xlix. 1, 3, in A. V. their king; Zeph. i. 5; perhaps Amos i. 15, where it is rendered their king). See MOLECH.

Mal-chi'ah, in A. V. once Melchiah (Jer. xxi. 1) [Jehovah is king].

A royal prince, into whose dungeon the prophet Jeremiah was cast (Jer. xxxviii. 6). It is natural to identify him with the father of the official Pashhur mentioned in ver. 1 and xxi. 1.

For others, see MALCHIAH.

Mal'chi-el [God is king].

A son of Beriah and grandson of Asher, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. xli. 17; Num. xxvi. 45).

Mal-chi'jah, in A. V. often Malchiah [Jehovah is king].

1. A Levite, family of Gershon, house of Shimei (1 Chron. vi. 40).

2. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David, and became the fifth course when David distributed the priests into divisions (1 Chron. xxiv. 1, 6, 9). Apparently members of a subdivision of his family, viz., the house of Pashhur, returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra ii. 38). He is also probably referred to in 1 Chron. ix. 12 and Neh. xi. 12, where a priestly line is traced back through Pashhur to one of this name. The royal prince Malchiah of Jeremiah xxxviii. 6 (and hence probably of ver. 1) is a different person.

3. A royal prince (Jer. xxxviii. 6) See MALCHIAH.

4, 5. Two sons of Parosh, both induced by Ezra to put away their foreign wives (Ezra x. 25).

6. A son of Harim, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 31). He joined with another Hebrew in repairing part of the wall of Jerusalem and the tower of the furnaces (Neh. iii. 11).

7. A son of Rechab. He also repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 14).

8. A goldsmith who repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 31).

9. A priest who with others officiated at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 42); perhaps, one of those who assisted Ezra when the law was explained to the people (Neh. viii. 4).

10. A priest who, doubtless in behalf of a father's house, signed the covenant (Neh. x. 3).

Mal-chi'ram [the king, i. e. God, is exalted].

A son of king Jehoiachin (1 Chron. iii. 18).

Mal-chi-shu'a, in A. V. Melchi-shua in 1 Samuel [the king, i. e. God, is salvation].

A son of king Saul (1 Sam. xiv. 49; 1 Chron. viii. 33, ix. 39). He was killed at the battle of Gilboa (1 Sam. xxxi. 2).

Mal'chus [Greek of Semitic maliku, king].

The high priest's servant whose ear Peter cut off (John xviii. 10).

Ma-le'le-el. See MAHALALEL.

Mal'lo-thi.

A son of Heman (1 Chron. xxv. 4). He obtained by lot the leadership of the nineteenth course of singers (26).

Mal'low.

The rendering of the Hebrew Malluah, salt plant (Job xxx. 4, A. V.). Since genuine mallows are mucilaginous and not saline, the R. V. alters the name of the plant to saltwort; see SALTWORT.

Mal'luch [reigning or counselor].

1. A Levite, family of Merari, house of Mushi (1 Chron. vi. 44).

2. A chief of the priests, who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 2, 7). A father's house bore his name in the next generation (ver. 14, R. V.). In the latter passage the form Malluchi, in itself an unessential variation, is probably due to dittography. The final letter of Malluchi is the initial letter of the following word, and moreover is not found in the Septuagint. The consonants of Malluchi are written in the Hebrew text, but were read Meluch (A. V. and margin of R. V.).

3, 4. A son of Bani and a son of Harim, each of whom was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 29, 32).

5, 6. A priest and a chief of the people who signed the covenant (Neh. x. 4, 27).

Mal'lu-chi. See MALLUCH 2.

Mam'mon [Greek from Aramaic mamon, mamona, wealth, riches].

A personification of wealth (Matt. vi. 24; Luke xvi. 9, 11, 13).

Mam're [fatness, strength].

1. The town or more probably district of Hebron (Gen. xxiii. 19; xxxv. 27), to the west of Machpelah (xxiii. 17). A grove was there, near Hebron, where Abraham several times resided (xiii. 18; xiv. 13; xviii. 1, etc.). In Josephus' time an aged terebinth was pointed out as Abraham's tree, 6 stades or $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile from Hebron (War iv. 9, 7); in the fourth century, one at Ramet el-Khulil, 2 Roman miles north of Hebron, which Constantine enclosed within the walls of a basilica. The remains of this building are called the house of Abraham. The tree which now claims the honor of being Abraham's oak, and which was already celebrated as such in the sixteenth century, is a genuine oak (Quercus pseudococcifera). Its trunk has a girth of 26 feet at the ground, and its branches extend over an area of 93 feet in diameter (Thomson). It stands a little more than a mile northwest of Hebron, near the head of the wady Sebta.

2. An Amorite chieftain who dwelt at Mamre and who with his brothers, Eshcol and Aner, helped Abraham to retake the captives and the spoil carried off by Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv. 13, 24). He was probably designated by the name of the district over which he ruled.

Man. See ADAM.

Man'a-en [Greek form of Menahem, counselor, comforter]. Manahem is another Greek form of the Hebrew name.

A Christian prophet or teacher in the church at Antioch. He had been brought up with Herod the tetrarch as his companion (Acts xiii. 1, A. V.), or was his foster brother, brought up at the same mother's breast (R. V.). He may have been a descendant, or at least a relative of Manahem, the Essene, who predicted to Herod the Great, when yet a schoolboy, that he would obtain the kingdom. When the prophecy was fulfilled, Herod held him and his sect in high esteem (Antiq. xv. 10, 5).

Man'a-hath [rest].

1 A son of the Honte, Shobal (Gen. xxxvi. 23); perhaps even a place inhabited by a branch of the tribe of Shobal (1 Chron. i. 40).

2 A place to which Benjamites of Geba were carried captive by their fellow-tribesmen (1 Chron. vii. 6). Descendants of Salma, of the family of Caleb, tribe of Judah, probably formed half the population of it or of another place of the name (ii. 54); see MANAHATHITES.

Ma-na'hath-ites, in A. V. Manahethites

The inhabitants of a place or of the descendants of a man Manahath (1 Chron. ii. 54). To judge by the context, a place is intended. For Manahethites in ver. 52, A. V., see MENTHOTH.

Ma-nas'seh, in A. V. of N. T. Manasses, the Greek form [making to forget].

1 The elder son of Joseph. He was born in Egypt, his mother being Asenath, daughter of Poti-phares, priest of On. In race, therefore, he, like his brother Ephraim, was half Hebrew, half Egyptian (Gen. xli. 50, 51). When Jacob desired to bless the two boys, Joseph took Ephraim in his right hand, toward Jacob's left, and Manasseh in his left, toward Jacob's right; but the dying patriarch crossed his arms, so as to lay his right hand on Ephraim's head and his left on that of Manasseh, intimating prophetically that while both sons should become ancestors of great peoples, Ephraim should excel (xlviii. 8-21).

2 The tribe which descended from Manasseh. It consisted of seven tribal families, of which one was founded by his son Machir and the remaining six sprang from his grandson Gilead (Gen. i. 23; Num. xxvi. 28-34; Josh. xvii. 1, 2). At the first census in the wilderness the tribe numbered 32,200 fighting men (Num. i. 34, 35); at the second, which was taken thirty-eight years later, 52,700 (xxvi. 34). After Moses had defeated Sihon king of Heshbon, and Og king of Bashan, one-half the tribe of Manasseh joined with the tribes of Reuben and Gad in requesting permission to settle east of the Jordan, and obtained the leave they sought, on condition of going armed before their brethren, who had not yet obtained settlements, and aiding in the war west of the Jordan (xxxii. 33-42; cp. 1-32; xxxiv. 14, 15; Deut. iii. 12, 13; xxix. 8; Josh. xii. 4-6; xviii. 7). They observed the conditions laid down (Josh. i. 12-18; iv. 12); and when the war had been successfully fought out, were honorably dismissed to the territory they had chosen. A temporary misunderstanding about the building of an altar at one time threatened unpleasant consequences, but on explanation being given, matters were amicably arranged (xxii. 1-34). The region given to the half-tribe of Manasseh east of the Jordan comprehended part of Gilead and all Bashan (Deut. iii. 13-15), Mahanaim in one direction being on its boundary line (Josh. xiii. 29-33). It is between 65 and 70 miles from east to west, by 40 or more from north to south. It is mostly a table-land of 2500 feet elevation, one of the richest parts of Palestine, and to this day the granary of a large part of Syria. It is studded with ruined towns. The other half of the tribe crossed the Jordan and had their inheritance in central Palestine, west of the river. It was bounded on the south by Ephraim, on the northwest by Asher, and on the northeast by Issachar. Its southern boundary ran by Janoah and Taanath-shiloh, near Shechem, and along the northern bank of the brook Kanah to its entrance into the Mediterranean (Josh. xvii. 5-10). But the children of Ephraim had cities in the midst of the inheritance of the children of Manasseh (xvi. 9), and, on the other hand, Manasseh had various towns, viz., Beth-shean, Ibleam, Dor, Endor, Taanach, and Megiddo, within the territories of Issachar and Asher (xvii. 11; cp. 1 Chron. vii. 29). The Manassites, however, failed to expel the Canaanite inhabitants of the cities just named, but eventually put them to tribute (Josh. xvii. 12, 13; Judg. i. 27, 28). Levitical cities were allotted from Manasseh as from the other tribes, including Golan in Bashan in the region east of the Jordan, one of the six cities of refuge (Josh. xx. 8; xxi. 27). The hero and judge Gideon was a Manassite, and the most eminent man the tribe produced (Judg. vi. 15; cp. 35; vii. 23). Some Manassites joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 19, 20). No fewer than 18,000 offered him their services during his reign at Hebron (31, cp. 37). The eastern Manassites, in conjunction with the two tribes east of the Jordan, waged war with the Hagarites and took possession of their country. They were themselves carried into exile by Tiglath-pileser (v. 18-26). Some Manassites came to Asa when they saw that the Lord was with him (2 Chron. xv. 9); men of the same tribe also attended the great passover in Hezekiah's reign and also in Josiah's reign (xxx. 1, 10, 11, 18; xxxi. 1; xxxiv. 6, 9).

3 An intentional modification of the name Moses (Judg. xviii. 30, A. V.); see JONATHAN 1.

4 Son and successor of good king Hezekiah. He ascended the throne about the year 698 B. C., when he was only twelve years of age. He undid the work of reformation which had been carried out in the former reign. He established the high places, built an altar to Baal, and reared an Asherah; made altars for the worship of the host of heaven within the two courts of the temple, and caused one of his sons to pass through the fire. Prophets warned him, but he paid no attention to their threatenings. Instead of listening, he shed much innocent blood throughout every part of Jerusalem. The victims were doubtless chiefly those who, retaining their fidelity to Jehovah, opposed Manasseh's reactionary religious measures (2 Kin. xxi. 1-16). Tradition makes Isaiah one of these, which is possible but doubtful. As a penalty for his wickedness, God left him to his enemies. Two kings of Assyria, Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal, report receiving tribute from him. The Assyrian king by whom he was carried captive to Babylon (2 Chron. xxxiii. 11) was probably Ashurbanipal, who crushed his rebellious brother Shamash-shumukin, king of Babylon, about 647 B. C. and placed the forfeited crown on his own head. Manasseh repented, and was after a time restored to his kingdom. He put away the idols which had been his ruin, and restored the worship of Jehovah. He also added to the fortifications of Jerusalem (2 Chron. xxxiii. 12-19). After a reign of fifty-five years, a longer one than any other king of Judah had enjoyed, he died about the year 642 B. C., leaving his son Amon to ascend the throne (2 Kin. xxi. 17, 18, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 20). For the Prayer of Manasseh, see APOCRYPHA 12.

5 and 6. A son of Pabath-moab and a son of Hashum, each of whom was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x 30, 33)

Mandrake (Mandragora officinalis).

Man'drake.

The rendering of the Hebrew Duda'im, amatory plants. They were supposed to act as a love philter (Gen. xxx. 14-16; on margin of R. V. love apples). They are odoriferous (Song vii. 13). The mandrake (Mandragora officinalis) is a handsome plant of the Solanaceae (night shade) order. It has wavy leaves and pale violet, white, or deep blue flowers. Its fruit is small and yellow. The forked root bears a slight resemblance to the human body. It is found in the Jordan valley and along the rivers running into it, in the plains of Moab and Gilcad, and in Galilee.

Ma'neh. See WEIGHTS.

Man'ger.

A feeding place for cattle, a crib or trough, in Greek Phatnē (Luke i 7, 12, in xiii. 15 rendered stall, cp Is. i 3). Mangers are ancient (Iliad x. 568; xxiv. 280; Herod. ix 70). In Palestine the stable is usually in the owner's house, a portion of the interior being set apart for the cattle and furnished with mangers built of small stones and mortar in the shape of a box.

Man'na [what is it? or rather, it is manna, since an article called mannu was already known to the Egyptians and was imported from the peninsula of Sinai]

A food on which the Israelites mainly subsisted during the forty years' sojourn in the wilderness. It was first bestowed in the wilderness of Sin, in the second half of the second month, when the people murmured, owing to the deficiency of food. The descent of manna was described as a raining of bread from heaven (Ex. xvi. 1-4, 12; Ps. lxxviii. 24, cv. 40). In the morning, when the dew was gone up, there lay upon the face of the wilderness a small round flake, small as the hoarfrost on the ground. When the children of Israel saw it for the first time they said one to another: "It is manna," for they did not know what it really was. And Moses said unto them: "It is the bread which the Lord hath given" (Ex. xvi. 13-15; Num. xi 9). It was white like coriander seed, with a yellowish tinge and resinous appearance like bdellium, and tasted like wafers made with honey or like fresh oil (Ex. xvi. 31; Num. xi. 8). It was ground in mills, beaten in mortars, boiled in pots, and made into cakes (Num. xi 8). The people were directed to gather an omer a day (about 5.8 pints) for each member of their households, and not to attempt to keep any till the morrow. Some of the people disobeyed this injunction, but the hoarded manna decayed and stank. On the sixth day two omers were gathered for each person, as none descended on the Sabbath (Ex. xvi. 22-30). An omerful, which evidently was preserved from decay, was kept by Aaron and his successors to show future generations the nature of the food on which the Israelites had subsisted in the wilderness (32-34); see HIGH PRIEST. A year after it was first given, at the same season, the people are mentioned as having it, and again toward the end of the forty years. It is referred to because the people were murmuring against the food (Num. xi. 4-9; xxi 5), but the boon which they failed to appreciate was not withdrawn. It was continued during the whole of the forty years' desert wanderings (Ex. xvi. 35; Deut. viii. 3, 16; Neh. ix 20; Ps lxxviii 24), and did not cease till the day after the Israelites had crossed the Jordan, encamped at Gilgal, and begun to eat of the produce of Canaan (Josh. v. 10-12). The question has been mooted, Was manna a substance for the first time created in the wilderness, or was it a natural product miraculously multiplied? Various plants exude a manna-like substance, either emanating spontaneously from the plant itself or produced by the puncture of an insect. The Tamarix mannifera, a variety of the Tamarix gallica, does so, and grows in the peninsula of Sinai. The exudation is dirty yellow in color, but white when it falls on stones. It melts in the heat of the sun. It is produced during a period of from six to ten weeks, the height of the season being June. Alhagi maurorum and A. desertorum, two species of camel's thorn, also exude a manna-like substance, and there are other manna-bearing plants. The Arabs use plant manna of different kinds as butter and honey. But the present yield of the entire peninsula is less than half a ton in the best years. It is never made into bread. Moreover, if taken in more than the most limited quantities it is purgative. So that even if it were produced abundantly, there would be great difficulty in identifying it with the manna of Scripture.

Ma-no'ah [rest, quiet].

A Danite belonging to the village of Zorah, and father of Samson (Judg. xiii 1-25).

Man'slay-er. See MURDER.

Man'tle.

The large, sleeveless, outer garment or, as a rendering of the Hebrew M'at, an occasional garment worn between the tunic and the outer garment. See CLOTHING.

Ma'och [oppression].

Father of Achish, king of Gath (1 Sam. xxvii 2). See ACHISH.

Ma'on [dwelling, habitation, abode].

1. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv 55), the residence of Nabai (1 Sam. xxv. 2), now Ma'in, about a mile and a half south from Carmel of Judah, and 8½ south of Hebron. In the wilderness in the vicinity of Maon David and his men for a time took refuge (1 Sam. xxiii 24, 25).

2. Son of Shanmai, of the tribe of Judah, and ancestor of the inhabitants of Beth-zur (1 Chron. ii. 45). Maon may indeed in this passage possibly be used collectively for the inhabitants of the town of this name (cp. Bethlehem, ver. 54), and that Maon is immediately called the father of Beth-zur may be paralleled by 1 Chron. i. 8, 9, 11, 13.

3. A people that oppressed Israel (Judg. x. 12). The English versions translate Maonites. See MEUNIM.

Ma'o-nites. See MAON 3 and MEUNIM.

Ma'ra [bitter, sad of spirit].

The name chosen by Naomi to express her bereavements (Ruth i 20).

Ma'rah [bitter, bitterness].

A fountain of bitter water in the wilderness of Shur on the route to Sinai, at which the Israelites halted when three days or a little more had elapsed after their passage of the Red Sea. The badness of the water, and perhaps its scantiness, opened their eyes to the hardships which they might expect; and they murmured. Moses was directed by God to cast a certain tree into the waters, whereby they were rendered palatable, either miraculously or through the chemical and medicinal properties of the tree (Exod. xv. 23-26; Num. xxxiii 8, 9). Since the days of Burckhardt, Marah has been generally located at 'Ain Hawarah, about 47 miles from Suez, and a few miles inland from the Red Sea, from which it is separated by a range of hills. The well measures about 20 feet across, but is much wider at the bottom. Its depth is perhaps 25 feet. The soil of the region abounds in soda, and the water of the well is consequently salty and bitter. The principal rival claimant to Hawarah has been wady Ghurundel, which, however, is generally regarded as Elhm. The recent identification of the site of Pithom with Tell el-Maskhuta leads to the inference that Marah may be 'Ayun Musa, the wells of Moses, a group of springs 7½ miles south-southeast of Suez and 52 south-southeast of Pithom. The water of some of these springs is drinkable, but of others, very bitter and nauseous. The Arabs do not like their camels to partake of it.

Mar'a-lah [trembling, reeling].

A frontier village of Zebulun toward the sea (Josh. xix 11). Not identified.

Mar-an ath'a, in A. V. Maran-atha. See ANATHEMA MARAN-ATHA.

Mar'ble.

Limestone, especially in a crystalline condition, which is capable of taking polish. It was called in Hebrew shayish and shesh, from its brightness, and in Greek marmaros. It was used for columns and costly pavements (Esth. i. 6; Song v. 15), and was employed in Solomon's temple (1 Chron. xxix. 2). Josephus, in describing the walls of this edifice, mentions that they were built of white stone, but does not specify the kind of stone (Antiq. viii 3, 2). White, yellow, and red marble is obtained in Lebanon, but a choicer variety came from Arabia. Red and white marble was employed in the Greco-Roman period for palatial buildings in tion to Peter is confirmed by the many vivid particulars which it contains, which seem to be due to the reminiscences of an eyewitness (e. g. i. 40; ii. 1-4; iii. 5; v. 4-6; vi. 39, 40; vii. 34; viii. 33; x. 21; xi. 20); by its superiority to the other Gospels in those sections where Peter alone was an eyewitness or competent to give a full account (cp. the account of Peter's denials); and, as Eusebius noticed, by its silence regarding matters which reflect credit on Peter (Mat. xvi. 17-19; Luke v. 3-10). This reported dependence on Peter must not be pressed, however, to the exclusion of other sources of information; for Mark had abundant opportunities to learn from other eyewitnesses besides Peter, and from other members of the primitive Christian community, such as his kinsman Barnabas and Paul and the disciples who frequented his mother's house (Acts xii. 12, 17). In the ancient church Mark was supposed by some, as, for example, Augustine, to have abbreviated Matthew; but this is impossible, since he adds many details which are not in Matthew. Others believe that Matthew and Luke drew from Mark. However that may be, the opinion now generally held is that Mark itself is quite independent of the other gospels. The most probable view is that all three of the synoptic gospels were independent of one another. The verbal agreement between them rarely extends to an entire verse, and these agreements are to be explained by the writers all using very largely the language in which the apostolic reports of Christ's words and deeds were circulated among the churches. Tradition states that Mark wrote his Gospel at Rome either shortly before or shortly after Peter's death. If so, it must be dated A. D. 65-68. On other grounds also scholars now generally assign it to about that period, shortly before the fall of Jerusalem.

Mark's Gospel was evidently written primarily for gentiles. This appears, e. g., in his explanations of places and customs and terms (i. 9; iii. 17; v. 41; vii. 3, 4, 11, 34, xii. 42; xiv. 12; xv. 22, 42, etc.). He uses also a good many Latin words in Greek form, which may indicate that his book was originally published, as tradition states, at Rome. Unlike Matthew, he says nothing of Christ's relation to the Mosaic law, but few allusions to the fulfillment of prophecy are noted, and there is an almost total absence of quotation from the Old Testament.

Mar'riage.

Marriage is a divine institution, constituted at the beginning before the origin of human society. The Creator made man male and female, and ordained marriage as the indispensable condition of the continuance of the race (Gen. i. 27, 28). He implanted social affections and desires in man's nature. He made marriage an ennobling influence, powerfully contributing to the development of a complete life in man and woman. He declared it to be not good for man to be alone and provided a help meet for him (Gen. ii. 18). Abstinence from marriage is commendable at the call of duty (Mat. xix. 12; 1 Cor. vii. 8, 26), but its ascetic prohibition is a sign of departure from the faith (1 Tim. iv. 3).

Monogamy is the divine ideal. The Creator constituted marriage as a union between one man and one woman (Gen. ii. 18-24; Mat. xix. 5, 1 Cor. vi. 16). He preserves the number of males practically equal to the number of females in a nation.

Marriage is a permanent relation (Mat. xix. 6). The Creator has indicated the permanence of the relation by making the growth of affection between husband and wife, as the years pass, to be a natural process, invariable under normal conditions. Moral ends require that the relation be permanent: the disciplining of husband and wife in obedience to the obligations which spring from their relations to each other, and the adequate training of children to obedience and virtue. It cannot be dissolved by any legitimate act of man. It is dissolved by death (Rom. vii. 2, 3). It may be dissolved on account of adultery (Mat. xix. 3-9). Protestants, following Paul, teach that it may be dissolved by willful, deliberate, final desertion (1 Cor. vii. 15). It is probable, however, that in those times desertion was accompanied by adulterous or marital consorting with another person. The marriage of persons divorced on improper grounds is forbidden (Mat. v. 32; xix. 9, 1 Cor. vii. 10, 11). In the sight of God, a civil tribunal cannot annul a marriage; it declares whether the marriage has been sinfully annulled by one or both of the persons concerned.

Among the antediluvians, Adam, Cain, Noah, and his three sons appear each as the husband of one wife. But polygamy was already practiced, Lamech having two wives (Gen. iv. 19); and the purity of marriage was impaired by men allowing themselves to be governed by low motives in the choice of wives (vi. 2). Polygamy was unwisely adopted by Abraham, when he thought that he must needs help God to fulfill his promise (Gen. xvi. 4). Isaac had one wife. Jacob took two wives and their maids. Moses, who was correcting abuses not suddenly abolishing them, permitted the Israelites, on account of their dullness of spiritual perception and their enslavement to the customs of the age, to put away their wives for a less fault than the gravest breach of marital fidelity; and he did not forbid polygamy, but discouraged it. He regulated what he found; but the record of the primitive period showed that the state of things among the Israelites was not the ordination of the Creator. Moses' service to the cause of matrimony consisted in setting a higher ideal by establishing the degrees of consanguinity and affinity within which marriage is proper (Lev. xviii.), discouraging polygamy (Lev. xviii. 18, Deut. xvii. 17), securing the rights of inferior wives (Ex. xxi. 2-11; Deut. xxi. 10-17), restricting divorce (Deut. xxi. 19, 29, xxiv. 1), and requiring purity in the married life (Ex. xx. 14, 17; Lev. xx. 10, Deut. xxii. 22). Polygamy continued to be practiced more or less by wealthy individuals after the time of Moses, as by Gideon, Elkanah, Saul, David, Solomon, Rehoboam, and others (Judg. viii. 30, 1 Sam. i. 2; 2 Sam. v. 13; xii. 8; xxi. 8; 1 Kin. xi. 3). The evils of polygamy are exhibited in Scripture by the record of the jealousies of the wives of Abraham and Elkanah (Gen. xvi. 6; 1 Sam. i. 6), and beautiful pictures are presented of the felicity of marriage between one man and one woman (Ps. cxxxviii. 3, Prov. v. 18; xxxi. 10-29, Eccl. ix. 9, cp. Eccles. xxvi. 1-27).

In the family to which Abraham belonged marriage was permitted with a half-sister and with two sisters (Gen. xx. 12, xxi. 26). Marriage with a full sister was not rare in Egypt, and was allowed in Persia (Herod. iii. 31). Marriage with a half-sister by the same father was permitted at Athens, and with a half-sister by the same mother at Sparta. The Mosaic law prohibited alliance with persons so closely related by blood as these and with others less near of kin (Lev. xviii. 6-18); but in case a man died childless, his brother took the widow (Deut. xxv. 5). Such marriage was ordained, but it was not compulsory. The Roman law was not unlike the Hebrew. It declared marriages to be incestuous, "when the parties were too nearly related by consanguinity—that is, by being of the same blood, as brother and sister; or by affinity—that is, by being connected through marriage, as father-in-law and daughter-in-law."

The selection of a wife for a young man devolved on his relations, especially on his father (Gen. xxi. 21; xxiv., xxxviii. 6, 2 Esd. iv. 47), though sometimes the son made known his preference and the father merely conducted the negotiations (Gen. xxxiv. 4, 8; Judg. xiv. 1-10). Only under extraordinary circumstances did the young man make the arrangements (Gen. xxix. 18). Likewise it was the consent of the maid's father and eldest brother that was sought, it not being necessary to consult her (Gen. xxiv. 51; xxxiv. 11). Occasionally a parent looked out an eligible husband for a daughter or offered her to a suitable person in marriage (Ex. ii. 21; Josh. xv. 17, Ruth. i. 1, 2, 1 Sam. xviii. 27). Presents were given to the parents, and sometimes to the maiden (Gen. xxiv. 22, 53, xxix. 18, 27; xxxiv. 12; 1 Sam. xviii. 25). Between betrothal and marriage all communication between the affianced parties was carried on through a friend deputed for the purpose and termed the friend of the bridegroom (John iii. 29).

The marriage itself was a purely domestic affair, without definite religious services, though probably the espousal was ratified by an oath (Prov. ii. 17; Ezek. xvi. 8; Mal. ii. 14). After the exile it became customary to draw up and seal a written contract (Tob. vii. 14). When the day appointed for the wedding arrived, the bride bathed (cp. Judith x. 3, Eph. v. 26, 27), put on white robes, often richly embroidered (Rev. xix. 8; Ps. xlv. 13, 14), decked herself with jewels (Is. lx. 10, Rev. xxi. 2), fastened the indispensable bridal girdle about her waist (Is. iii. 24; xlix. 18; Jer. ii. 32), covered herself with a veil (Gen. xxiv. 65), and placed a garland on her head. The bridegroom, arrayed in his best attire, with a handsome headress and a garland on his head (Song iii. 11; Is. lx. 10), set out from his home for the house of the bride's parents, attended by his friends (Judg. xiv. 11; Mat. ix. 15), accompanied by musicians and singers and, if the procession moved at night, by persons bearing torches (1 Mac. ix. 39, Mat. xxv. 7; cp. Gen. xxxi. 27; Jer. vii. 34). Having received his bride, deeply veiled, from her parents with their blessing and the good wishes of friends (Gen. xxiv. 59, Ruth. iv. 11; Tob. vii. 13), he conducted the whole party back to his own or his father's house with song, music, and dancing (Ps. xlv. 15, Song iii. 6-11; 1 Mac. ix. 37). On the way back they were joined by maidens, friends of the bride and groom (Mat. xxv. 6). A feast was served at the house of the groom or of his parents (Mat. xxii. 1-10; John ii. 1, 9), but if he lived at a great distance the feast was spread in the house of the bride's parents (Mat. xxv. 1), either at their expense or the groom's (Gen. xxix. 22; Judg. xiv. 10, Tob. viii. 19). The groom now associated with his bride for the first time (John iii. 29). In the evening the bride was escorted to the nuptial chamber by her parents (Gen. xxix. 23; Judg. xv. 1; Tob. vii. 16, 17), and the groom by his companions or the bride's parents (Tob. viii. 1). On the morrow the festivities were resumed, and continued for one or two weeks (Gen. xxix. 27; Judg. xiv. 12, Tob. viii. 19, 20).

The spiritual relation between Jehovah and his people is figuratively spoken of as a marriage or betrothal (Is. lxii. 4, 5; Hos. ii. 19). The apostasy of God's people through idolatry or other form of sin is accordingly likened to infidelity on the part of a wife (Is. i. 21; Jer. iii. 1-20; Ezek. xvi.; xxiii.; Hos. ii.), and leads to divorce (Ps. lxxiii. 27; Jer. ii. 20; Hos. iv. 12). The figure is continued in the N. T.; Christ is the bridegroom (Mat. ix. 15; John iii. 29), and the church is the bride (2 Cor. xi. 2; Rev. xix. 7; xxi. 2, 9, xxii. 17). The love of Christ for the church, his solicitude for her perfection, and his headship are held up as the standard for imitation by husbands and wives (Eph. v. 23-32).

Mar'se-na.

One of the seven princes of Persia who were permitted to see the king's face (Esth. i. 14). He was perhaps the celebrated Mar-donius, the cousin of Xerxes and one of his chief advisers in the early part of his reign (Herod. vii. 5, 9). The third consonant in the Hebrew form of his name is samech, which represents a sound not always distinguished from a dental. See PRINCE.

Mar'tha [lady, mistress].

Sister of Mary and Lazarus of Bethany (John xi 1, 2). The three were tenderly attached to Jesus. Martha loved him and desired to make him comfortable and show him respect in her house. Mary gave evidence of a deeper appreciation by her hunger for the words of truth that fell from his lips; and when Martha would have him rebuke Mary for not assisting her to attend to his external wants, Jesus taught that he himself regarded the inward craving of his followers for spiritual fellowship with him as more essential than their concern for his external honor (Luke x. 38-42). Both sisters were sincere believers (John xi. 21-32). The house where Jesus was received is called Martha's (Luke x. 38); and the supper which was given to him at Bethany, at which Lazarus was present and Martha again served, where Mary anointed his feet (John xii 1-3) was at the house of Simon the leper (Mat xxvi 6; Mark xiv 3). From these facts it has been inferred that Martha was probably the wife or widow of Simon.

Ma'ry [N. T. Greek Maria and Mariam, from Hebrew Maryam, Miriam. Also Latin Maria].

Six women of the name mentioned in the New Testament

1. Mary the (wife) of Clopas or Cleophas, a Mary so designated in John xix 25 "Wife," according to a method of Greek speech, is not found in the original Greek, but is properly supplied both by A. V. and R. V. Clopas of the R. V., Cleophas of the A. V., is apparently to be identified with Alphæus (Mat. x. 3; Mark iii 18; Luke vi. 15), the two names being variant forms of the same Aramaic original. He and Mary were thus the parents of the apostle James the Less, who had also a brother Joses (Mat. xxvii 56; Mark xv. 40; Luke xxiv 10). Those who understand the Lord's "brethren" to have been his cousins on his mother's side, suppose that this Mary was a sister of the Virgin, and that John (xix. 25) mentions only three women at the cross. But it is unlikely that two sisters should have had the same name, and other considerations make the cousin theory improbable; see BRETHREN OF THE LORD. In that case John mentions four women at the cross. One of them was Mary the wife of Clopas; but, beyond the fact that her husband and sons were, like herself, disciples of Jesus and that probably one of her sons was an apostle, we know nothing more of her. Besides being at the cross, Mary was one of the women who followed the body of Jesus to the tomb (Mat. xxvii 61), and on the third day took spices to the sepulcher, and to whom the risen Saviour appeared (Mat. xxviii. 1, Mark xv. 47. xvi 1; Luke xxiv. 10). See No 2 of this article; also ALPHÆUS, JAMES.

2. Mary the Virgin; the Virgin Mary. All the authentic information about her comes from Scripture. We are told that, in the sixth month after the conception of John the Baptist, the angel Gabriel was sent from God to Nazareth, a city or village of Galilee, to a virgin named Mary, who was residing there and who was betrothed to a carpenter named Joseph (Luke i. 26, 27). Joseph is explicitly declared to have been a descendant of David. Mary is not so described; but many believe that she too was of Davidic lineage, because she was told that her child should receive "the throne of his father David," also because our Lord is said to have been of "the seed of David according to the flesh" (Rom. i. 3; 2 Tim. ii. 8; cp. Acts ii. 30), and again because, in the opinion of many scholars, the genealogy of Christ given by Luke (iii. 23-38) is through his mother, in which case Mary's father is supposed to have been Heli. However this may be, Gabriel hailed Mary as a highly favored one, and announced to her that she should have a son whose name she should call Jesus. "He," said the angel, "shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Most High" and the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David; and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end" (Luke i. 32, 33, R. V.). When Mary asked how this could be, since she was a virgin, she was told that it would be wrought by the power of the Holy Ghost, "wherefore also that which is to be born shall be called holy, the Son of God" (Luke i. 35, R. V.). These expressions revealed to Mary that she was chosen to be the mother of Messiah, and with humble piety she accepted the honor which God was mysteriously to confer upon her. For her comfort she was informed by the angel that her kinswoman Elisabeth was also to become a mother, whereupon Mary hastened to the village of Judah where Zacharias and Elisabeth lived. At her coming Elisabeth was made aware of the honor intended for Mary, and broke out into an inspired song of praise. Thereupon Mary also gave voice to a hymn of thanksgiving ("The Magnificat," Luke i. 46-55). We learn from all this the profound piety and solemn joy with which these holy women contemplated the power and grace of God which was through their offspring to fulfill the ancient promises to Israel and bring salvation to the world. Mary remained under the protection of Elisabeth until just before the birth of John, when she returned to Nazareth. Soon after the cause of her condition was revealed in a dream to Joseph, who at first had thought of quietly putting her away from him (Mat. i. 18-21). He was directed to marry her and to call the name of the child Jesus, "for it is he that shall save his people from their sins." It was pointed out also to him that Isaiah had predicted that Messiah would be born of a virgin. Joseph reverently obeyed. He "took unto him his wife, and knew her not till she had brought forth a son and he called his name Jesus" (Mat. i. 24, 25, R. V.). By this marriage Mary was protected, her mysterious secret was guarded, and her child was born as the legal son of Joseph, and therefore through him heir of David. The birth, however, took place at Bethlehem. A decree of Augustus that all the world should be enrolled was being carried out in Palestine, and compelled Joseph, being of Davidic descent, to repair to David's city to be enrolled. Mary accompanied him. Finding no room in the inn, or khan, they were compelled to lodge in a stable, perhaps, however, one that was then not being used by cattle. There Jesus was born, and his mother "wrapped him in swaddling clothes, and laid him in a manger" (Luke ii. 7). With reverent, trustful awe Mary heard the shepherds relate the vision of angels which they had seen and the song of peace which they had heard heralding the Saviour's birth. Of course, she did not know that her child was God made flesh. She only knew that he was to be Messiah, and with true piety she waited for God to make his mission clear. On the fortieth day after the birth Mary went, with Joseph and Jesus, to Jerusalem to present the child to the Lord and to offer in the temple the offering required by the law (Lev. xi. 2, 6, 8) from women after childbirth. The fact that her offering is said to have been that required of poor people—a pair of turtle doves or two young pigeons—indicates the humble circumstances of the family. When, however, the parents brought in the child, they were met by the aged Simeon who rejoiced over the birth of Messiah, but foretold to Mary that she should have great sorrow because of what would happen to him (Luke ii. 35). After this Joseph and Mary appear to have returned to Bethlehem and to have lived in a house (Mat. ii. 11). There Mary received the wise men from the east who came to worship Jesus (Mat. ii. 1-11). Soon after she fled with Joseph and the child to Egypt, and afterwards by divine direction they returned to Nazareth. There she must have devoted herself especially to the rearing of the child of promise who had been committed to her care and of whose future she must have thought continually. One glimpse of Mary's character is given us when Jesus was twelve years old. She was in the habit piously of attending with Joseph the yearly passover (Luke ii. 41), though this was not specifically required of Jewish women (Ex. xxii. 17). With like piety Joseph and Mary took Jesus with them, as soon as he reached the age when it was customary for children to attend, and his delay in the temple and his words when his parents found him with the doctors, were the occasion of increased awe to his parents. "His mother kept all these sayings in her heart" (Luke ii. 51). Mary did not understand how great her child really was nor how he was to fulfill his mission. It was hers reverently and trustfully to rear him for God's service, and this she did so long as he was under her. If the "brethren of the Lord" (see BRETHREN OF THE LORD) were, as is probable, the children of Joseph and Mary, born after Jesus, Mary was the mother of a large family. We read also of Christ's sisters (Mark vi. 3). But nothing further is recorded of Mary until the beginning of Christ's public ministry. She then appears at the marriage in Cana (John iii. 1-10). She evidently rejoiced in her son's assumption of Messianic office and fully believed in him. But she ventured improperly to direct his actions, and thus elicited from him a respectful but firm rebuke. Mary must understand that in his work she could share only as a follower. While as her son he gave her reverence, as the Messiah and Saviour he could only regard her as a disciple, needing as much as others the salvation he came to bring. A similar truth was brought out on the next occasion on which she appears (Mat. xii. 46-50; Mark iii. 31-35; Luke viii. 19-21). While Jesus was teaching on the great day of parables, Mary with his brethren desired to see him. Perhaps they wished to restrain him from a course which seemed to be bringing upon him opposition and peril. His reply again declared that the spiritual bond between him and his disciples was more important than any human tie. "For whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, he is my brother, and sister, and mother" (Mat. xii. 50, R. V.). While Christ pursued his ministry, Mary and his brethren appear to have still lived in Nazareth. As no mention is made of Joseph, it is natural to suppose that he had died. But at the crucifixion Mary appears with other women at the cross. Unlike his brethren (John vii. 5) she had always believed in her son's Messiahship, and therefore it is not strange to find that she followed him on the last fatal journey to Jerusalem. With a mother's love, as well as with a disciple's sorrow, she beheld his crucifixion, and to her Jesus spoke in the hour of his suffering. He gave her to the care of his beloved disciple John, and "from that hour that disciple took her unto his own home" (John xix. 25-27). After the ascension she was with the apostles in the upper room in Jerusalem (Acts i. 14), and this is the last notice of her in Scripture. We do not know the time or manner of her death. The tomb of the Virgin is shown in the valley of the Kidron, but there is no reason to believe in its genuineness. Later legends were busy with her name, but none contain trustworthy information. As presented in Scripture, she is simply a beautiful example of a devoted and pious mother.

3. Mary Magdalene. The designation given to this Mary (Mat. xxvii. 56, 61; xxviii 1; Mark xv. 40, 47; xvi. 1, 9; Luke viii 2; xxiv. 10; John xix. 25; xx 1, 18) doubtless indicates that she was a resident of Magdala, on the southwestern coast of the sea of Galilee. Out of her Jesus had cast seven devils (Mark xvi. 9; Luke viii 2), and she became one of his most devoted disciples. The old belief that she had been a woman of bad character, from which the current use of the word Magdalen has arisen, rests merely on the fact that the first mention of her (Luke viii 2) follows closely upon the account of the sinful woman who anointed the Saviour's feet in a city of Galilee (Luke vii. 36-50). This, however, is hardly sufficient proof. What form her terrible malady had taken we do not know. She became a disciple during the early Galilean ministry, and was one of those who joined the little company of Christ's immediate followers, and ministered to him of her substance (Luke viii. 1-3). She was one of the women at the cross (Mat. xxvii 56; Mark xv 40; John xix 25) and observed the Lord's burial (Mat. xxvii 61). Early on the third day she, with Mary the wife of Clopas and Salome, went to the sepulcher to anoint the body of Jesus (Mark xvi 1). Finding the stone rolled away she quickly returned to the city and told Peter and John that the body of Jesus had been taken away (John xx 1, 2). Then, following the apostles, she returned again to the garden and lingered there after they had gone. To her first Jesus appeared (Mark xvi. 9; John xx. 11-17), and she reported his resurrection to the other disciples (xx. 18). Nothing further is known of her history.

4. Mary of Bethany. A woman who, with her sister Martha, lived in "a certain village" (Luke x. 38) which John reveals to have been Bethany (John xi. 1; xii. 1), about a mile east of the summit of the mount of Olives. On the first occasion when Jesus is recorded to have visited their house (Luke x. 38-42), Mary appears as eager to receive his instruction. Martha requested Jesus to bid Mary help her in serving the entertainment, but he replied: "But one thing is needful: for Mary hath chosen the good part, which shall not be taken away from her" (Luke x. 42, R. V.). John (xi.) further relates that Mary had a brother named Lazarus whom the Lord raised from the dead. When Jesus reached the house, after Lazarus had been four days dead, Mary at first "still sat in the house" (John xi. 20, R. V.), but afterwards was summoned by Martha to meet the Lord who had called for her (ver. 28). As Martha had done, Mary exclaimed, "Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died," and the grief of the sisters deeply moved the sympathetic Saviour. Afterwards, six days before his last passover (John xii. 1), Jesus came to Bethany, and a supper was made in his honor in the house of Simon the leper (Mark xiv. 3). While it was in progress Mary brought an alabaster box of pure ointment, very costly, and, breaking the box, poured the ointment on the head of Jesus (ibid.), and anointed his feet, wiping them with her hair (John xii 3). It was an act of rare devotion, testifying both to her gratitude and to her sense of the high dignity of him whom she honored. Judas, and some other of the disciples, were disposed to find fault with the waste; but Jesus commended the act and declared that "whosoever the gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, that also which this woman hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial of her" (Mat. xxvi 6-13; Mark xiv 3-9). He looked upon her act also as a loving, though doubtless unintentional, consecration of him to his approaching sacrifice (John xii 7, 8).

5. Mary the mother of Mark. The Christian woman in whose house the disciples had met to pray for the release of Peter, when he was imprisoned by Herod Agrippa, and to which Peter at once went when delivered by the angel (Acts xii 12). Her son was the author of our Second Gospel, see MARK. She was evidently in comfortable circumstances (13), and her house is supposed to have been one of the principal meeting places of the early Jerusalem Christians. According to A V. in Col. iv. 10 she was the sister of Barnabas; but R V correctly translates "cousin" instead of "sister's son," and it does not appear whether Mark's relationship to Barnabas was on his father's or his mother's side. Nothing is told us of Mary's husband.

6. Mary of Rome. A Christian woman at Rome to whom Paul sent his salutation (Rom xvi. 6). The A. V. reads "who bestowed much labor on us," implying that Mary at one time had greatly assisted the apostle. The R. V., however, properly reads "who bestowed much labor on you." Mary had thus been an active worker in the Christian cause at Rome. Beyond this reference we know nothing of her.

Mas'a-loth. See MESALOTH

Mas'chil [attentive, intelligent, or rendering intelligent].

A Hebrew word occurring in the titles of Ps. xxxii, xlii, xlv, xlv, lii, liii, liv, lv, lxxiv, lxxviii, lxxxviii, lxxxix, and cxlxi. It doubtless means either a didactic poem

(cp. Ps. xxxii. 8, "I will instruct," same word radically), or else a reflective poem.

Mash.

A branch of the Aramæans (Gen. x. 23). Called in 1 Chron. i. 17 Meshech, and essentially so in the Septuagint of Gen. x. 23. This is due to its confusion by copyists with the more familiar name; or else, if the original text, it points to an intermingling of Japhetic and Semitic people in Meshech.

Ma'shal. See MISHAL.

Ma'son.

A workman skilled to hew and saw stones into shape for building purposes and erect walls (2 Sam. v. 11; 1 Kin. vii. 9; 1 Chron. xxii. 2; 2 Chron. xxiv. 12). The art made great progress among the ancient Egyptians; as the pyramids, built under the fourth dynasty, and numerous temples show. The Hebrews served in brick and mortar while they were in bondage in Egypt (Ex. i. 11, 14); but there is no mention of their being employed in shaping and laying stones. In Solomon's time the Phœnicians had more skill in the art than the Hebrews, who as yet had not had occasion to erect great structures of stone, and Phœnician masons were accordingly hired to build the temple and Solomon's palace. They managed blocks of stone 12 and 15 feet in length and even longer, and proportionately broad and high (1 Kin. vii. 10). But they were doubtless Hebrew workmen who afterwards erected walls and fortresses, built aqueducts and reservoirs, arches and bridges, and fashioned columns (2 Chron. xxxiii. 14; Ezra iii. 10; Song v. 15; Antiq. xv. 11, 2). They also understood the use of the plummet (Amos vii. 7; Zech. iv. 10; Is. xxviii. 17).

Masons at Work in Ancient Egypt

Mas'pha. See MIZPEH 2 and 5.

Mas're-kah [a vineyard].

An Edomite city (Gen. xxxvi. 36; 1 Chron. i. 47). Exact site unknown.

Mas'sa [carrying, a load, a burden].

A tribe descended from Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 14; 1 Chron. i. 30; cp. Prov. xxx. 1 and xxxi. 1, R. V. margin); generally identified with the Masani, a tribe of the Arabian desert near the Persian Gulf (Ptol. v. 19, 2), north-east of Dumah. The Assyrian inscriptions mention Mas'u, as the name may be read, with Tem'u and Niba'átu, cp. Gen. xxv. 13, 15.

Mas'sah [testing, temptation].

A name given by Moses to the place at Horeb where the smitten rock yielded water, because the Israelites there in unbelief put Jehovah to a test (Ex. xvii. 7; Ps. xcv. 8, 9, R. V.; and also Deut. xxxiii. 8, where the thought is expressed that Jehovah tested the fidelity of the Levites in the person of Moses). In Ex. xvii. 7 the place is called Meribah also; possibly so in the two other passages already cited, where, however, two distinct events and places may be in the writer's mind. The name Massah alone is used in Deut. vi. 16; ix. 22; and used of this event, it would seem, since Israel's rebelliousness against Jehovah soon after leaving Egypt (ix. 7), and apparently before reaching Horeb (8), is dwelt upon, and the event at Massah is mentioned in the same breath with similar events that occurred in the immediate vicinity of Horeb (22). See MERIBAH.

Ma-thu'sa-la. See METHUSELAH.

Ma'tred [driving forward].

The mother-in-law of Hadar, king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 39; 1 Chron. i. 50).

Ma'tri [rainy].

A Benjaminite family, from which sprang Kish and his son king Saul (1 Sam. x. 21).

Mat'tan [a gift].

1. A priest of Baal slain before the altar of that god during the revolution which led to the death of Athaliah and the elevation of Joash to the throne of Judah (2 Kin. xi. 18; 2 Chron. xxiii. 17).

2. Father of Shephatiah (Jer. xxxviii. 1).

Mat'ta-nah [a gift].

One of the stations of the Israelites in or near the Moabite territory (Num. xxi. 18, 19). The Greek texts differ variously from the Hebrew; hence possibly the word Mattanah was not in ver. 19 originally, and in ver. 18 is a common noun and part of the last line of the song, thus: And from a wilderness a gift.

Mat-ta-ni'ah [gift of Jehovah].

1. A singer, son of Heman, in David's time (1 Chron. xxv. 4, 16).

2. A Levite, of the sons of Asaph, and founder of a branch of the family (2 Chron. xx. 14). Probably he himself is mentioned in 1 Chron. ix. 15, and Neh. xiii. 13; and the representative of the house in Neh. xii. 8; cp. Ezra ii. 41; Neh. xi. 17, 22; xii. 25.

3. A Levite descended from Asaph. He was one of those who aided king Hezekiah in his work of religious reformation (2 Chron. xxix. 13).

4. A son of king Josiah. He was placed on the throne and his name was altered to Zedekiah by Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kin. xxiv. 17); see ZEDEKIAH.

5-8. Four Hebrews, a son of Elam, a son of Zattu, a son of Pahath-moab, and a son of Bani, who were induced by Ezra to put away their foreign wives (Ezra x. 26, 27, 30, 37).

Mat'ta-tha [gift].

A son of Nathan and grandson of king David (Luke ii. 31).

Mat'ta-thah. See MATTATTAH.

Mat-ta-thi'as [Greek form of Mattithiah, gift of Jehovah (see Septuagint, 1 Chron. ix. 31; xxv. 3)].

1 and 2. A name borne by two ancestors of Christ, separated from each other by five generations, who lived after the time of Zerubbabel (Luke iii. 25, 26).

3. A priest, founder of the Maccabee family (1 Mac. ii. 1-70). See MACCABEE.

4. Son of Absalom, and a captain in the army of Jonathan Maccabæus. He distinguished himself at the battle of Hazor by remaining at the side of Jonathan when all the other captains save one had fled (1 Mac. xi. 70). He was perhaps a brother of Jonathan, son of Absalom (xiii. 11).

5. Son of Simon Maccabæus. His father, his brother, and he were treacherously murdered by his brother-in-law in the castle of Dok (1 Mac. xvi. 14). See JUDAS.

Mat-tat'tah, in A. V. Mat'ta-thah [gift].

A son of Hashum, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 33).

Mat'te-nai [bestowment]

1. A priest, head of the father's house Joiarib in the time of Joiakim (Neh. xii. 19).

2 and 3. Two Hebrews, a son of Hashum and a son of Bani, each of whom was induced to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 33, 37).

Mat'than [gift]

A near ancestor of Joseph, and in law of Christ (Mat. i. 15).

Mat'that [gift].

Two ancestors of Christ; the one near, the other quite remote (Luke iii. 24, 29).

Mat'thew [N. T. Greek Maththaios or Matthaios, from Hebrew Mattithyah, gift of Jehovah].

A publican or taxgatherer, in the service either of the Roman or Herodian government, stationed at Capernaum. While sitting at "the place of toll" (R. V.) he was called by Jesus to become his follower and, leaving his business, he immediately obeyed (Mat. ix. 9; Mark ii. 14; Luke v. 27). He was afterwards appointed one of the twelve apos-ties (Mat. x. 3; Mark iii. 18; Luke vi. 15). Mark and Luke give his name as Levi and state that his father was named Alphaeus. Either he had originally two names, as was not uncommon among the Jews, or he received the name Matthew when he became a Christian, as Simon did that of Peter. He is always called Matthew in the lists of apostles and as the author of our First Gospel. The acceptance by Jesus of a publican as a disciple evidently led others of the outcast classes to follow him and increased the opposition of the Pharisees. This appears at the feast which Matthew gave to Jesus soon after his conversion, when many "publicans and sinners" were present, and when, in answer to the criticism of the Pharisees, the Lord made the famous reply, "I am not come to call the righteous but sinners to repentance" (Mat. ix. 10-13; Mark ii. 15-17; Luke v. 29-32). Matthew himself does not say that the feast was in his house (Mat. ix. 10), but Mark (ii. 15) and Luke (v. 29) do, and Luke adds that it was a great feast. Some have identified Matthew's father Alphaeus with the father of James the Less, but Matthew and James are not joined together in the lists of apostles as other pairs of brothers are. The identification is therefore to be rejected. Matthew finally appears among the apostles after Christ's resurrection (Acts i. 13), but the N. T. gives no further information about him. Tradition states that he first preached among the Jews, and from the character of his Gospel, this is not improbable.

The Gospel according to St. Matthew is the first of our four gospels. It was from the beginning of the post-apostolic age universally ascribed to this apostle. Its contents may be arranged as follows:

1. The descent, birth, and infancy of the royal Messiah (i. and ii.). The special object of this section is to set forth Jesus as the son of David and the Christ of prophecy.

2. Introduction to the public ministry of Christ (iii. 1-iv. 17), relating the preparatory work of the Baptist, the baptism and temptation of Jesus, and the latter's settlement in Capernaum in accordance with prophecy.

3. The Galilean ministry of Christ (iv. 18-ix. 35). This important section begins with Christ's call of the four leading disciples (iv. 18-22), and a summary description of his teaching and healing, and of his fame throughout Palestine (iv. 19-25). Then follows, as an example of his teaching, the sermon on the mount (v.-vii.), to which is appended a collection of incidents, mostly miracles, which illustrated his teaching (viii. 1-ix. 34).

4. The mission of the apostles (ix. 36-x. 42); beginning with an account of Christ's compassion on the shepherdless people, his appointment of the twelve, and his instructions to them.

5. Christ in conflict with increasing opposition (xi. 1-xv. 20), comprising the inquiry of the Baptist and Christ's discourse concerning John, together with other remarks occasioned by popular unbelief: the opposition of the Pharisees, beginning with the Sabbath controversy and culminating in the charge that Jesus was in league with Beelzebub, together with Christ's reply and his refusal to give them a sign; the visit of his mother and brethren; a collection of the parables of Jesus spoken at this time: his (second) rejection at Nazareth; Herod's inquiry and the death of the Baptist; the feeding of the 5000 and walking on the water; Christ's final rupture with the Pharisees in Galilee and his denunciation of their formalism.

6 Christ's retirement from Capernaum and instruction of his disciples (xv. 21-xviii. 35); comprising the healing of the daughter of the woman of Canaan the feeding of 4000, refusal of a sign and warning against the leaven of the Pharisees and Sadducees, the confession and rebuke of Peter, Christ's first prediction of his death, the transfiguration and the cure of the demoniac boy; the return to Capernaum, the provision of tribute money, and instruction of the disciples concerning the humble, self-denying, loving, and forgiving spirit of true discipleship.

7. The closing ministry of Christ in Perea and Judæa (xix. xx.); comprising instructions about divorce, blessing the children, the rich young ruler, the parable of the laborers in the vineyard, the ascent to Jerusalem, with another prediction of his death, the request of James and John, and the healing of Bartimæus at Jericho.

8 The last week of Christ's ministry (xxi.-xxviii.), comprising the triumphal entry and the cleansing of the temple; the withering of the barren fig tree, the deputation from the sanhedrin; the parables of the two sons, the wicked husbandmen, and the marriage of the king's son; the questions of the Pharisees, Sadducees, and a lawyer, with Christ's question in reply concerning the son of David; woes against the scribes and Pharisees, the eschatological discourse on Olivet, followed by the parables of the virgins and of the talents and a description of the last judgment. Then follow the treachery of Judas, the last passover, the agony in Gethsemane, the arrest and trial of Jesus before the sanhedrin, Peter's denials, the remorse of Judas, the trial before Pilate, and the crucifixion and burial. The last chapter relates the appearance of Jesus to the women, the report of the Roman watch, and the gathering of Christ with his disciples on a mountain in Galilee, when he gave them the commission to preach his gospel to the world and promised to be always with them.

The arrangement of this Gospel is chronological only in general outline. In the second half, indeed, beginning with xiv. 6, it follows with seldom a deviation what is probably the true order of events, but this is because that order naturally agreed with the evangelist's object. His primary motive was to arrange his matter topically. He wished especially to present the teaching of Christ concerning the nature of the kingdom of heaven and the character of its disciples, the miracles by which he illustrated his teaching and revealed his authority, and the fruitless opposition to him of the Pharisees, representing current Judaism. Hence the large place which he gives to the teaching of Jesus. Hence, too, his habit of grouping together both instructions upon certain subjects and incidents which illustrated the teaching; thus the sermon on the mount (v. 1-vii. 29) is followed by the record of works of healing which were wrought at different times and places (viii. 1-ix. 34), the parables of chap. xiii. are followed presently by a series of mighty deeds (xiv. 1-36), and the discourse rebuking Pharisaic traditions (xv. 1-20) is followed by a tour of mercy through a gentle region (21-39). He sets forth Jesus as the royal Messiah, who brought about the fulfillment of law and prophecy, and established in the church, by his redeeming work and spiritual teaching, the true kingdom of God, which is meant to embrace all nations. The fulfillment of prophecy is frequently noted i. 22, 23; ii. 5, 6, 15, 17, 18, 23, iii. 3; iv. 14-16; viii. 17; xi. 10; xii. 17-21; xiii. 14, 15, 35; xxi. 4, 5; xxvi. 24, 31, 56; xxvii. 9, 35), and there are about a hundred quotations, more or less formal, from the O. T. While Matthew wrote from the Hebrew point of view, he brings out the destination of the gospel for the gentiles (e. g. viii. 10-12; x. 18; xxi. 43; xxii. 9; xxiv. 14; xxviii. 19), represents the opposition to Christ of current Judaism (e. g. v. 20-48; vi. 5-18; ix. 10-17; xii. 1-13, 34; xvi. 1-20; xvi. 1-12; xix. 3-9; xxi. 12-16; xxiii. etc.), and shows by his explanations of terms (i. 23; xxvii. 33), places (ii. 23; iv. 13), Jewish beliefs (xxii. 23) and customs (xxvii. 15; see also xxviii. 15), that he wrote not merely for Jews, but for all believers.

That the author of this Gospel was really the apostle Matthew is attested by the unanimous tradition of the ancient church. The tradition is confirmed (1) by the conclusive evidence, furnished by the contents, that the writer of this Gospel was a Jewish Christian emancipated from Judaism; (2) by the improbability that so important a book would have been attributed to so obscure an apostle without good reason; (3) by the likelihood that a publican would keep records; (4) by the modest way in which the writer speaks of the feast given by Matthew to Jesus (ix. 10; cp. Luke v. 29).

Ancient tradition also affirmed that Matthew wrote his Gospel originally in Hebrew. Papias, bishop of Hierapolis in Phrygia, writing about A. D. 140, says: "Matthew composed the logia in the Hebrew dialect, and each one interpreted them as he was able" (Eusebius, hist. eccl. iii. 39, 16).

Papias probably means that in former days, before his time, each one interpreted these Aramaic logia in his private reading as best he could. It may be fairly inferred also from Papias' words that he had the Gospel of Matthew in Greek; and there is no evidence that he had ever seen a copy of Matthew in Aramaic. Some scholars reject the tradition of an original Hebrew; others suppose that the Greek is a translation, or that Matthew issued two gospels, one edition in Hebrew or Aramaic, the other in Greek. Many modern scholars think that Matthew wrote in Hebrew merely a collection of the sayings of Jesus, which are incorporated in our Greek Gospel together with historical matter taken from Mark. On this theory the Gospel of Matthew, by whomsoever the narrative and the discourses were combined, is history of the first rank, since it comprises a report of Jesus' sayings by one who heard them and a record of Jesus' acts as they were narrated by an eyewitness. The theory is, however, confronted (1) by the testimony of antiquity that our Greek Gospel is by Matthew; (2) by the use made of the term logia in the New Testament, by Philo, and by the early fathers (Acts vii 38; 1 Pet. iv. 11, R. V.), and its constant application to inspired books, either in whole or in their parts (Rom iii 2; Heb v. 12); (3) by the fact that the dependence of our Matthew on Mark is an unproven hypothesis (see MARK and GOSPEL); and (4) by the utter improbability that an original gospel contained discourses only, and not other historical matter, words of Jesus and no acts, and especially that it did not contain an account of the passion of Christ. Whatever, therefore, may be thought of the tradition that Matthew wrote in Hebrew, our Gospel in Greek must certainly be attributed to him. He was quite competent to write it as it is, since most of the recorded words and deeds fell under his own observation.

The date of composition is probably to be assigned to A. D. 60-70. The baptismal formula (Mat. xxviii. 19), which has been regarded as evidence of a late date, is matched by a similar formula in a benediction (2 Cor. xiii. 14); and the word church for an organized body (Mat. xviii 17) was early used, being so employed by Stephen, Paul, and James (Acts vii. 38; xx 28; Jas v. 14). The fall of Jerusalem seems not to have occurred (Matt. v. 35; xxiv. 16). The most ancient tradition, that of Irenaeus (about A. D. 175), assigns it to the period when Peter and Paul were preaching the gospel in Rome (Hær. iii. 1, 1). The place of its composition is unknown. The acquaintance with it shown by post-apostolic writers in widely scattered localities proves that it obtained, as soon as it was published, general circulation.

G. T. F. (supplemented).

Mat-thi'as [probably a variant form of Mattathias, gift of Jehovah (see Septuagint, 1 Chron. xxv. 21, A)].

One of those disciples who companied with the followers of Christ from the time of Christ's baptism and was a witness of the resurrection. He accordingly had qualifications for the apostleship. The question whether he or another disciple with similar qualifications should fill the place in the number of the Twelve made vacant by the treachery of Judas was submitted to God by prayer; and when lots were given, Matthias was chosen, and he was at once numbered with the apostles (Acts i. 21-26). Nothing more is known of his history.

Mat-ti-thi'ah [gift of Jehovah].

1. A Levite, son of the singer Jeduthun (1 Chron. xxv. 3), and himself one of the musicians of the sanctuary who played the harp (xv. 18, 21). He was afterwards made head of the fourteenth of the courses into which the musicians were divided by David (xxv. 21).

2. A Levite of the sons of Korah, family of Kohath. He was the eldest son of Shalum, and was placed in charge over the things that were baked in pans (1 Chron. ix. 31).

3. A son of Nebo, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 43).

4. A priest or Levite who supported Ezra when he addressed the returned exiles regarding the law (Neh. viii. 4).

Mat'tock.

An instrument for loosening the soil, shaped like a pickaxe or hoe with two blades in different planes, the cutting edge of one resembling that of an axe, and the other that of an adze. It is used specially for grubbing up the roots of trees. In the O. T. mattock is the rendering of: 1. The Hebrew Mah'-e-shah, cutting instrument, in 1 Sam. xiii. 20, 21. Mah'-resheth, a similar word from the same root, occurs in ver. 20, and is believed to denote the plowshare. Both of these implements were made of metal. 2. The Hebrew Ma'der, dressing instrument. It was used in digging and dressing vineyards (Is. vii. 25).

In 2 Chron. xxxiv. 6 the Hebrew is believed to be corrupt, and for mattock of the A. V., the R. V. substitutes ruins.

Maul.

The rendering of the Hebrew Mephis, breaker, a weapon of war (Prov. xxv. 18).

Maz'za-roth.

A feature of the starry heavens (Job xxxviii. 32). The margin of both English versions interprets it as the signs of the zodiac, equivalent to the Hebrew Mazzaloth (2 Kin. xxiii. 5, margin). The parallel passage, Job ix. 9, suggests that the Mazzaroth are a constellation of the southern sky, a cluster among the stars that are chambered in the south. Other interpretations have also been proposed.

Mead'ow.

1. The rendering of the Egyptian word Ahu, in A. V. of Gen. xii. 2, 18. The word denotes reed-grass or, as it is rendered in Job viii. 11, flags.

2. The rendering of the Hebrew Ma'areh (Judg. xx. 33, A. V.); see MAAREH-GEBA.

Me'ah [a hundred].

A tower at Jerusalem not far from that of Hananeel and the sheep gate (Neh. iii. 1; xii. 39); see JERUSALEM II 3

Meal Offer-ing. See OFFERINGS.

Meals.

The Israelites ate in the morning and in the evening (Ex. xvi. 12; 1 Kin. xvii. 6; John xxi. 4, 12). This custom did not forbid a morsel at other hours. Laborers partook of a light repast at noon (Ruth ii. 14). Later the ascetic Essenes did with two meals, the first at the fifth hour or eleven o'clock in the morning, and the other in the evening (War ii. 8, 5). Among the stricter Jews of the time of Christ, the fast of the night was not broken by a meal on an ordinary day before nine o'clock, which was the hour of prayer (Acts ii. 15), and on the Sabbath food was not served before twelve o'clock, when the service in the synagogue was over (Life 54). The chief meal of the day took place in the evening (War i. 17, 4; Life 44; cp. Gen. xix. 1-3; Ex. xii. 18; Ruth ii. 7). Feasts were sometimes spread at noon by the Egyptians and Syrians (Gen. xliii. 16; 1 Kin. xx. 16).

designated highest, middle, and lowest respectively, the highest being to the right of the servants as they approached the table. Generally, only three persons occupied a couch, but occasionally four or five. The body lay diagonally on the couch, the head being near the table and the feet stretched out toward the back of the couch. The left elbow rested on a cushion and supported the upper part of the body. The right arm remained free. The head of the person reclining in front of another rested on or near the breast of him who lay behind (John xiii. 23; xxi. 20). The three positions on each couch were also termed highest, middle, and lowest, the highest person being the one who had nobody at his back. The position of honor (Mat. xxiii. 6, R. V.) was the highest place on the highest couch. Women took their meals with men, occasionally at least (Ruth ii. 14; 1 Sam. i. 4, Job i. 4).

The Hebrews and Greeks, like the modern Arabs, washed their hands before eating (Mat. xxvi. 23; Ibad. x. 577; Odys. i. 136), since generally there was a common dish into which the hand of each was dipped. This cleanly custom became a ritual observance with the Pharisees, and as such was condemned by Christ (Mark vii. 1-13). A blessing was asked before the meal by Samuel (1 Sam. ix. 13), by Christ (Mat. xiv. 19, xv. 36; xxvi. 26), and by the early Christians (Acts xxvii. 35). It was also customary among the Jews in the time of Christ (cp. War ii. 8, 5).

Romans at Meal.

As to the posture at meals, the ancient Hebrews, like the ancient Egyptians and Greeks (Iliad x. 578; Anab. vi. 1, 3) and modern Arabs, were in the habit of sitting, probably on mats spread on the floor or ground (Gen. xxvii. 19; Judg. xix. 6; 1 Sam. xii. 5, 24; 1 Kin. xiii. 20). Reclining on couches came into use later (Esth. i. 6; vii. 8; Ezek. xxiii. 41; John xxi. 20), and probably prevailed in the Greco-Roman period (Mark vii. 4; in A. V. tables). Three couches were ordinarily placed about a table, being arranged so as to form three sides of a square and leave the fourth side open for the admittance of servants with the dishes. The couches were

A piece of bread served as a spoon and was dipped into the bowl of grease or meat, or the thick soup or pottage was ladled with the hollow hand into a dish. Occasionally separate portions were served in the same manner to each (Ruth ii. 14; 1 Sam. i. 4; John xiii. 26). Prayer after meals developed out of Deut. viii. 10 (War ii. 8, 5).

At pretentious meals on festive occasions, when a large company of guests gathered about the table, greater ceremony was observed. It was courteous to receive the guest with a kiss (Luke vii. 45), and indispensable to provide water for him to wash his feet and hands with (Gen. xviii. 4, xix. 2; Luke vii.

44; John ii. 6). He came in his best attire, of course, and often with the hair, beard, feet, and sometimes clothes, perfumed (Amos vi. 6; Wisd ii. 7). Occasionally he was anointed at the house of the host (Luke vii 38; John xii. 3). The participants at the feast sometimes wore a wreath on the head (Is. xxviii.

Washing the Hands before or after a Meal

1; Wisd ii 7, 8; Antiq xix 9, 1) They were arranged according to rank (1 Sam ix. 22; Luke xiv 8; and so in Egypt, Gen xliii. 33). Portions of food were placed before each (1 Sam i 4), and the guest of honor received a larger or choicer share (5; ix. 24; so in Egypt, Gen. xliii. 34) A ruler was sometimes appointed to preside at the feast, taste the viands, and direct the proceedings (Ecclus xxxii 1, 2; John ii 9, 10) The banquet was rendered merrier by music (Is.

Modern Orientals at a Meal.

v. 12; Ecclus. xxxii 5, 6), singing (2 Sam. xix. 35; Amos vi 4-6), dancing (Mat. xiv. 6; Luke xv. 25), and riddles (Judg. xiv. 12). These customs receive illustration from the manner of feasts among the Greeks. The guests were apt to be placed according to rank, and the guest of honor received the choicest food (Herod. vi 57; Iliad vii. 321). At the conclusion of the meal garlands and various kinds of perfumes were given to the guests, and wine was served. Ordinarily a governor, chosen from among the company (Anab. vi. 1, 30), presided. His command was law. He tasted the food and drink before they were placed on the table, directed the servants, fixed the proportion in which the wine and water were mixed, and determined the quantity which each of the company should drink. He also proposed the amusements. The pleasure was heightened by songs, and by the spectacle of dancing (Plato, Sympos 11, Legg. 671; Anab. vi 1, 3-13).

A gruesome custom existed among the Egyptians, according to Herodotus (ii 78). At the banquets of the wealthy the image of a dead body in a coffin was carried round and shown to each of the company with the remark: "Look upon this, then drink and enjoy yourself; for when dead you will be like this."

Me-a'rah [a cave].

A place near Sidon (Josh. xiii. 4); commonly, but without certainty, identified with a district of caves, on the top of Lebanon, east of Sidon, known as Mughar Jezzim or caves of Jezzim. Conder suggests Mogheiriyeh, 6 miles northeast of Sidon.

Measure.

I. MEASURES OF LENGTH.

The unit was the cubit, 18 inches or more; see CUBIT.

4 fingers = 1 handbreadth;

3 handbreadths = 1 span;

2 spans = 1 cubit.

The finger, accordingly, was $\frac{3}{4}$ inch.

In the Greco-Roman period distance was measured by miles and stades. 5000 Roman feet = 1 Roman mile = 1478.7 meters = 4851.43 English feet. Eight stadia (Luke xxiv 13, rendered furlong) were loosely reckoned to the mile; although theoretically the stadion was 600 Greek feet or 625 Roman feet, the length of the race course at Olympia.

II. MEASURE OF AREA.

Acre is the rendering of the Hebrew Semed, yoke, and Ma'nah, furrow (1 Sam. xiv. 14; Is v. 10). The Roman actus, furrow, was 120 Roman feet in length, and the jugerum, yoke, was a piece of land two actus long by one actus broad or less than $\frac{3}{4}$ of an acre. Probably the Hebrew acre was not very different.

MEDEBA FROM THE SOUTHWEST

Kindness of Professor Libbey

III MEASURES OF CAPACITY.

The unit was the ephah for dry substances and the bath for liquids, the ephah and the bath being of equal capacity (Ezek. xlv. 11), and containing a trifle more than 3 pecks, 5 quarts, U. S. dry measure, or 8 gallons, 1 quart, 1½ pints, U. S. wine measure. See EPHAIH.

Liquid Measure

12 logs = 1 hin;

6 hins = 1 bath;

10 baths = 1 homer, or cor (Ezek. xlv. 14).

The log, accordingly, contained a trifle over .9 pint or about 3¾ gills, and the hin about 5 quarts, 1½ pints. A third part, Hebrew shalish (Ps. lxxx. 5, Is. xl. 12, rendered measure) was probably the third of a bath, and hence corresponded to a seah. The Greek measure metrētēs (John ii. 6, rendered firkin) contained in Athens 39.39 liters or 41.61 U. S. liquid quarts.

Dry Measure

6 kabs = 1 seah

3 seahs or measures } 1 ephah (Ex. xvi. 36, Num. xv. 4, or Septuagint)

10 omers or tenth parts } = 36, Num. xv. 4, Septuagint)

10 ephahs = 1 homer (Ezek. xlv. 11)

The kab was equivalent to about 3¾ pints, and the seah to 9¾ quarts. The Greek choinix (Rev. vi. 6, rendered measure) is estimated at 1.094 liters or .99301 quart. The Roman modius (Mat. v. 15, rendered bushel) contained 948 imperial peck, or 7.82 U. S. dry quarts.

Meat Offer-ing. See OFFERINGS.

Me-bun'nai [built]

A Hushathite, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 27). The name is probably to be read Sibhecai, in accordance with xxi. 18 and 1 Chron. xi. 29; xxvii. 11.

Me-che'rath-ite.

A person related by birth or residence to Mecherah (1 Chron. xi. 36). No person or place called Mecherah is known. The passage in Chronicles must be compared with 2 Sam. xxiii. 34.

Me-co'nah, in A. V. Mekonah [foundation, place].

A town in the territory of Judah (Neh. xi. 28), named in connection with Ziklag and other towns of the extreme south. Not identified.

Me'dad [love]

A man who, though not present at the tabernacle when the Spirit was imparted to the elders, yet received the gift (Num. xi. 26-29). See ELDAD.

Me'dan.

A tribe descended from Abraham and Keturah and mentioned in connection with Midian (Gen. xxv. 2; 1 Chron. i. 32). Wetzstein observes that the Arabian geographer Yakut mentions a wady Medân near the ruined town of Dedân (cp. Gen. xxv. 3).

Mede, in A. V. once Median (Dan. v. 31).

A person belonging to the Median nationality; a native or an inhabitant of Media (2 Kin. xvii. 6; Esth. i. 19; Is. xiii. 17; Dan. v. 28, 31).

Med'e-ba, in 1 Mac. Medaba [water of quietness]

An old Moabite town mentioned with Heshbon and Dibon in Num. xxi. 30. It was allotted to the tribe of Reuben (Josh. xiii. 9, 16). During the reign of David it was held for a time by the Ammonites, who with their Aramaean allies were defeated there by Joab (1 Chron. xix. 7). It reverted to the Moabites (Moabite Stone 30, Is. xv. 2). John Maccabeus was seized and slain here by sons of Jambri or Ambri, a powerful family of the town. The act was revenged by his brothers Jonathan and Simon (1 Mac. ix. 36-42, Antiq. xiii. 1, 2 and 4). John Hyrcanus took the town after a siege lasting nearly six months (9, 1). The ruins are still called Mâdeba, and are situated about 16 miles east by south of the mouth of the Jordan, and 6 to the south of Heshbon. They are on an eminence, from which the city extended eastward into the plain. There are remains of a city wall, and of temples and other buildings, with Greek, Roman, and Phœnician inscriptions. At the southeast angle of the city is a fine tank or reservoir 120 yards square, and in the vicinity are many caves which have been used as cisterns.

Me'di-a.

A country in Asia lying east of the Zagros mountains, south of the Caspian Sea, west of Parthia, and north of Elam. Its length was about 600 miles, its breadth about 250, and its area about 150,000 square miles. But when the empire was at the greatest it extended beyond these limits, especially in the northwest. A great part of Media proper was a table-land 3000 feet high. The rest consisted of seven parallel mountain chains running from the northwest to the southeast, with fertile and well-watered valleys between. The pasturage was excellent, and the country was noted for its horses. The early inhabitants were in all probability a non-Aryan and non-Semitic race, who were conquered by Aryans, the Madai of Gen. x. 2 (cp. Herod. 7, 62). The history of Media begins to be known in the ninth century B. C. Berosus the Babylonian, it is true, makes the Medes, about 2458 B. C., capture Babylon and establish there a Median kingdom, which lasted 224 years; but it is not known on what authority his statement rests. About 535 the country was probably invaded by Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, and later by Shamshi-Ramman his son, who reigned from 823-810, and by Rammannirari, who was king from 810-781, with the result that the Medes became tributaries of Assyria. Tiglath-pileser conquered and annexed districts of Media. When Sargon captured Samaria, 722 B.C., he placed Israelites in the cities of the Medes (2 Kin. xvii. 6; xviii. 11). About 710 the Medes themselves were more thoroughly conquered by Saigon, who exacted from them a tribute of the fine horses for which Media was celebrated. Sennacherib also boasts of tribute received from Media, and Esarhaddon placed governors in the country. In all this there is no trace of the Medes forming a united nation under one king (contrary to Herod. i. 96, seq.). Under Phraortes, 655-633 B.C., Media became a formidable power. About 625 his son Cyaxares allied himself with Nabopolassar of Babylon, besieged and captured Nineveh, and thus terminated the great Assyrian empire (cp. Antiq. x. 5, 1). The victors divided the spoil between them, the share of Cyaxares being Assyria proper and the countries dependent on it toward the north and northwest. The marriage of Nebuchadnezzar, son of Nabopolassar, with Amytis or Amytis, daughter of Cyaxares, cemented the alliance between Babylonia and Media, and greatly strengthened both monarchies. When Cyaxares died, in 593, his son Astyages became king. In his old age, about 550 the Persians, whose country lay south and southeast of Media, successfully rebelled, and Cyrus their leader became king of Media and Persia. The conquerors and the conquered were both of the fine Aryan race, and they became a dual nation, Medo-Persia. In 330 B.C. Media became a part of Alexander's empire. After this conqueror's death it was united to Syria (1 Mac. vi. 56), and later it formed a part of the Parthian empire.

In the Hebrew Scriptures the Medes are introduced as at least one of the nationalities which should take part in the capture of Babylon (Is. xlii. 17, 18; cp. also Jer. l. 11, 28); and Elam and Media are named as the two countries from which the conquerors of Babylon should come (Is. xxi. 2, 9). On the capture of the great city by the Medo-Persians under Cyrus in 539, Darius the Mede took the kingdom of Babylon (Dan. v. 31; cp. 28). The Medo-Persian empire is the second kingdom (Dan. ii. 39), the bear (vii. 5), and the two-horned ram (viii. 3-7, 20). One horn was higher than the other, and the higher came up last (ver. 3); in other words, the Median power came first, but the Persian, which followed, surpassed it in strength.

Med'i-cine.

Egypt was early renowned for medical knowledge and skill. Cyrus of Persia sent to Egypt for an oculist, and Darius had Egyptian physicians at Susa (Herod. iii. 1, 129). For each disease there was a practitioner (Herod. ii. 84). They embalmed (Gen. i. 2); they treated diseases of the eye and feet (Herod. iii. 1, 129); women practiced midwifery (Ex. i. 15). They had many medicines (Jer. xlvi. 11). Even the word chemistry is perhaps derived from Kam-t, the ancient name of Egypt. In Greece the physicians of Crotona enjoyed the highest reputation, while those of Cyrene in Africa stood next (Herod. iii. 131).

The physician and his coadjutor the apothecary are mentioned in the writings of the Hebrews, beginning as early as the exodus from Egypt (Ex. xv. 26; 2 Chron. xvi. 12; Jer. viii. 22; Mat. ix. 12; Mark v. 26; War. ii. 8, 6; and Ex. x. 35; Neh. iii. 8; Ecc. x. 1; Eccles. xxxviii. 8). The means and medicines which they employed for effecting cures were bandages (Is. i. 6), applications of oil and of oil mingled with wine, and baths of oil (Is. i. 6; Luke x. 34; Jas. v. 14; War. i. 33, 5), salves and poultices (2 Kin. xx. 7; Jer. viii. 22), roots and leaves (Ezek. xlviii. 12; War. ii. 8, 6), and wine (1 Tim. v. 23). "The Lord created medicines out of the earth; and a prudent man will have no disgust at them" (Eccles. xxxviii. 4).

Med-i-ter-ra'ne-an Sea [midland sea].

The sea which lies between Europe and Africa. In Scripture it is referred to simply as the sea, since it was the chief one in the current thought of the Hebrews (Num. xiii. 29; Acts x. 6); or it is called the great sea (Num. xxxiv. 6; Josh. xv. 47), or the hinder or western sea (Deut. xi. 24; Joel ii. 20; in A. V. utmost and uttermost), or the sea of the Philistines (Ex. xxiii. 31). The Greeks and Romans usually spoke of it as the sea or our sea; after the O. T. period they termed it the sea on this side of the pillars of Hercules (Aristotle), or the internal sea (Pliny). The designation Mediterranean is late. Its length is 2000 miles, and its narrowest part is between Sicily and the African coast, where it is only 79 miles in width. In O. T. times the Phœnician navigators were acquainted with it in its entire extent from Syria to the straits of Gibraltar or, using the Greek designation, to the pillars of Hercules.

Me-gid'do, once Megiddon (Zech. xii. 11) [place of troops].

An important town in Palestine, mentioned as Mejdai among the towns captured by Thothmes III. of Egypt in the twenty-second year of his reign. When the Israelites entered Canaan, Megiddo had a native king, who was slain by Joshua (Josh. xii. 21). It was within the limits of the tribe of Issachar; but was assigned to the Manassites, who, however, failed to drive out the Canaanite inhabitants (xvii. 11; Judg. i. 27; 1 Chron. vii. 29). It had waters, doubtless some stream, in its vicinity (Judg. v. 19), and was not far from Taanach and Beth-shean (i. 27; 1 Kin. iv. 12). Solomon strengthened its hered to the calf worship of Jeroboam I. He reigned ten years, from about 747 to 738 B. C. inclusive, and was succeeded on the throne of Israel by his son Pekahiah (2 Kin. xv. 17, 22).

Me'nan. See MENNA.

Me'ne.

The first word of the inscription written by a hand on the wall at Belshazzar's feast: MENE, MENE, TEKEL, UPHARSIN (Dan. v. 25). These mysterious words are Aramaic. They are rendered on the margin of R. V. "Numbered, numbered, weighed, and divisions;" Pharsin being the plural of the noun p'nes, Mene being the regular passive participle of its verb in the Peal species, and Tekel being regarded as likewise a passive participle, with the vocalization which is traditionally given to it changed from tekil to tekel to conform to the sound of mene. These letters were not vocalized as written on the wall, and might have been pronounced in a variety of ways. Even if the correct pronunciation had occurred to one of the wise men as among several possibilities he had no means of establishing the correctness of his reading or of interpreting the words. Daniel solved the enigma (25-28). How difficult it was to determine the true pronunciation is illustrated by the proposal which has been made by scholars to regard Mene as the absolute state of the noun manya', maneh, and to read the words "A maneh, a maneh, a shekel and half manehs," or "Numbered have been a maneh, a shekel, and half manehs." The words as thus read have been sometimes understood as symbolizing under the figure of weights that a worthy person (Nebuchadnezzar, the virtual founder of the empire) had been succeeded by an inferior ruler (Belshazzar), and that the empire was about to be divided into halves.

Me'ni [fate, destiny]

The name of the god of destiny, whom idolatrous Hebrews worshiped (Is. lxxv. 11, margin). In the text the English versions prefer the alternative interpretation of the word, regarding it as a common noun and not a proper name.

Men'na, in A. V. Menan.

An ancestor of Christ, who lived shortly after the time of David (Luke iii. 31).

Me-nu'hoth [apparently, the resting places]

A place, if the present Hebrew text is correct, of which half the inhabitants were descended through Shobal from Caleb of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 52, R. V.). The name, if vocalized as in the present Hebrew text, would not give rise to the gentile adjective of ver. 54, which is rendered Manahathites. Perhaps, therefore, Menuhoth should be read Manahath (q. v.).

Me-on'e-nim [augurs].

The augurs' oak or terebinth stood near

Shechem (Judg. ix. 37; not plain, as in A. V.). See remarks under MOREH.

Me-on'o-thai [my habitations].

A man of Judah, the father of the inhabitants of Ophrah (1 Chron. iv. 14).

Meph'a-ath [beauty].

A town of the Reubenites (Josh. xiii. 18), given to the Merarite Levites (xxi. 37; 1 Chron. vi. 79). In Jeremiah's time it was in the hands of the Moabites (Jer. xlviii. 21). Site unknown.

Me-phib'o-sheth [destroying shame].

1. Son of king Saul by Rizpah, the daughter of Aiah. He was executed at the instance of the Gibeonites (2 Sam. xxi. 8, 9).

2. The son of Jonathan. He was five years old when the tidings came of his father's and his grandfather's death at Gilboa. Under the influence of panic, the nurse took him up in her arms and fled with him, but in her flight she let him fall, so that he became lame in both his feet (2 Sam. iv. 4). For a long time he lived at Lo-debar, east of the Jordan, whence David called him to court to show him kindness for his father Jonathan's sake, restoring to him the estates of Saul and appointing him a place at the royal table (ix. 1-13). During the rebellion of Absalom he remained at Jerusalem, and was accused by his servant Ziba of disloyalty. David believed the accusation and transferred Mephibosheth's estates to Ziba. After the return of David, Mephibosheth attempted to clear himself of the charge, and David restored half the estates to him, but he declared that he did not wish the property, since he had his desire in the restoration of the king (xvi. 1-4, xix. 24-30). He had a son Micha (ix. 12), through whom the race of Jonathan was perpetuated. In 1 Chron. viii. 34, ix. 40, Mephibosheth is called Merib-baal, a striver is the Lord or perhaps, striver against Baal. This was probably his original name, bosheth, shame, being substituted for baal, lord, by later writers when the word Baal had become distasteful through association with idolatry.

Me'rab [increase]

Saul's elder daughter (1 Sam. xiv. 49). Her father promised her in marriage to David, and then, breaking faith, gave her as a wife to Adriel the Meholathite (xviii. 17-19). Their five sons were given up by David to the Gibeonites to be put to death for the sin of Saul (2 Sam. xxi. 8, margin; cp. Greek of Lucian, Peshito).

Me-ra'iah [contumacy, stubbornness].

A priest, head of the father's house Seraiah in the days of Joakim, a generation after the exile (Neh. xii. 12).

Me-ra'ioth [rebellions].

1. A priest, son of Zeraiiah (1 Chron. vi. 6, 7, 52). He lived while the house of Eli had charge of the tabernacle.

2. A priest, son of Ahitub and father of the younger Zadok of the high-priestly line (1 Chron. ix. 11; Neh. xi. 11). He seems to have lived about half a century before the exile.

3. A father's house among the priests in the days of Josakim (Neh. xii. 15). See MEREMOTH Me-ra'ri [bitter, unhappy].

Son of Levi, and founder of one of the three Levitical families (Gen. xlii. 11; Ex. vi. 16; Num. xxvi. 57).

Me-ra'rites.

One of the three great families of the tribe of Levi. They were descended from Merari. In the wilderness they encamped on the north side of the tabernacle (Num. iii. 35), had under their charge its boards, bars, pillars, sockets, and vessels (36; iv. 29-33), and were under the direction of Ithamar, the youngest son of Aaron (iv. 23). To enable them to carry these materials there were assigned to them four wagons and eight oxen (vii. 8). They were subdivided into the Mahlites and the Mushites (iii. 20, 33); and at the first census in the wilderness numbered 6200 males from a month old and upward (33, 34), being fewer in total number than the other families of Levi. Of these, 3200 were from 30 to 60 years old (iv. 42-45), a larger proportion than in the other families. The cities assigned to them numbered twelve, of which four were in the tribe of Zebulun, four in that of Reuben, and four in that of Gad; one of them, Ramoth-gilead, being a city of refuge (Josh. xxi. 34-40; 1 Chron. vi. 63, 77-81). They were reorganized by David (1 Chron. xxiii. 6, 21-23). They had a due part with their fellow Levites in the musical service of the sanctuary, holding six of the twenty-four offices (1 Chron. vi. 31, 44; xxv. 3). Members of the family are mentioned among those who aided in cleansing the temple in Hezekiah's reign (2 Chron. xxix. 12), and a small, but notable, company of them returned with Ezra to Jerusalem after the exile (Ezra viii. 18, 19).

Mer-a-the'im [twofold rebellion].

A symbolical name for Babylon (Jer. 1. 21).

Mer'cu-ry, in A. V. Mer-cu'ri-us.

A deity worshipped by the Romans and, under the name of Hermes, by the Greeks also. He was the herald of the gods, and specially attended upon Jupiter. He was quick in his movements, was a good speaker, and was credited with having been the inventor of letters, of music, and of other arts. Paul and Barnabas were looked upon as gods by the people of Lystra, when the cripple was healed at the apostle's word; and as Paul was the chief speaker, they took him for Mercury and Barnabas, whom he accompanied, for Jupiter (Acts xiv. 12).

Mer'cy Seat.

The covering of the ark; called in Hebrew Kapporeth, covering (especially if not exclusively in the sense of atonement), and in Greek ἱλαστήριον, propitiatory (Ex. xxvi. 34; Heb. ix. 5). Its name did not suggest a mere lid, but brought to mind the act and place of atonement and the accomplished atonement. The rendering mercy seat is therefore a happy one, adopted by Tyndale from Luther. It was made of pure gold; its length was two and a half cubits, and its breadth a cubit and a half. On each side of it and wrought as one piece with it stood a cherub, with its face toward the other cherub, but bent downward toward the mercy seat, and with outstretched wings, so that a wing of each extended over the mercy seat and met that of the other cherub. Between these cherubim Jehovah's glory was manifested, and there Jehovah communed with his people (Ex. xxv. 17-22; xxx. 6; Num. vii. 89). There was a similar arrangement in Solomon's temple (1 Kin. vi. 23-25, viii. 6-11; 1 Chron. xxviii. 11). Once a year, on the great day of atonement, the high priest, after he had offered a sin offering for himself, entered the most holy place and burnt incense, symbol of accepted worship, in the presence of Jehovah, which rose and enveloped the mercy seat in a cloud. He then sprinkled the blood of the sacrificed bullock on and before the mercy seat. Having sacrificed the goat that was the sin offering for the nation, he carried its blood also beyond the veil, into the most holy place, and sprinkled it upon and before the mercy seat. He made atonement for the sins of himself and the nation in the presence of the covenant law, which was written on the tables of stone and was lying in the ark, and of Jehovah, who dwelt between the cherubim (Lev. xvi. 2, 13-17).

Me'red [rebellion]

Son of Ezzrah, who was reckoned as belonging to the tribe of Judah. He had a daughter of Pharaoh to wife and probably also a Jewess (1 Chron. iv. 17, 18, R. V.).

Mer'e-moth [elevations].

1. A chief of the priests, who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 3, 7). In the next generation a father's house among the priests, enumerated in the corresponding position in the catalogue, bears the name Meraioth (ver. 15). One of the two names is probably a misreading of mem or jod.

2. A priest, son of Uriah. He was employed to weigh the silver and gold brought by Ezra from Babylon (Ezra viii. 33). He repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 4, 21), and is probably the person of the same who sealed the covenant (x. 5).

3. A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 36).

Me'ras.

One of the seven princes of Persia and Media who saw the king's face in the reign of Ahasuerus (Esther i. 14).

Mer'i-bah [contention, strife].

1. A common noun used once, perhaps oftener, in addition to Massah to designate the place at Horeb, near Rephidim, where the people strove with Moses (Ex. 17) for water, and God gave them drink from the rock (1-7). The word is not found in this passage in the Vulgate, but is attested by other ancient versions.

2. A second locality, namely, Kadesh-barnea in the wilderness of Zin, where also the people strove with Moses and with Jehovah and water was miraculously brought from the rock (Num. xx. 3, 13, 24, xxvii. 14; Deut. xxxii. 51). The waters of this Meribah are the waters of strife, which are mentioned in the A V of Ps. cvi. 32 and Ezek. xlvii. 19, xlviii. 28. For strife the R V. in its text of the first passage substitutes Meribah, in the second Meriboth-kadesh, and in the third Meribath-kadesh. This event may well be referred to in Ps. lxxxix. 7, where it is God who proves Israel; and in Deut. xxxiii. 8, where God proves Levi and where Meribah is mentioned with Massah; and in Ps. xcv. 8, R V., where also Meribah is mentioned with Massah (see MASSAH). It is to be noted that there is nothing surprising, under the circumstances, in the outbreak of discontent at the scarcity of water, which was experienced more than twice or thrice. The localities are different and quite far apart. The time is different. The conduct of Moses is very different on the two occasions.

Mer-ib-ba'al. See MEPHIBOSHETH.

Mer-i-bath-ka'desh [contention at Kadesh] and Meriboth-kadesh [contentions at Kadesh].

A station of the Israelites in the wilderness (Ezek. xlvii. 19; xlviii. 28, R V.). See MERIBAH 2.

Mer'o-dach [Assyrian and Babylonian Marduk].

The patron deity of Babylon (Jer. i. 2). See BEL.

Mer'o-dach-bal'a-dan, in 2 Kin. xx. 12 Berodach-baladan [Merodach has given a son]. Berodach may be a copyist's misspelling for Merodach, or represent the approximation of sound between m and b in Babylonian.

A king of Babylon, son of Baladan (2 Kin. xx. 12), of the dynasty of Bit-Yakin. He was a man of great ability, courage, and enterprise. The dynasty had its capital at Bit-Yakin, in the marshes near the mouth of the Euphrates, a district which was the ancestral home of the Chaldean tribe. Merodach-baladan succeeded to this petty throne. About 731 B C he did homage to Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria, but when, in 722, the Assyrian army was absent carrying on the siege of Samaria, and news reached Babylonia that the king of Assyria had died or been murdered, Merodach-baladan took the opportunity of becoming king of Babylon. Sargon, king of Assyria, recognized him in 721. He reigned eleven years. In 712, or thereabouts, Merodach-baladan sent the embassy to Hezekiah, which, traveling with the ostensible object of congratulating Hezekiah on his recovery (2 Kin. xx. 12-19; 2 Chron. xxxii. 31; Is. xxxix. 1-8), was really designed to invite him to join in a confederacy with the rulers of Babylon, Susiana, Phoenicia, Moab, Edom, Philistia, and Egypt for a grand attack on the Assyrian empire. Sargon suspected what was going on, attacked his enemies individually before they had time to unite, and vanquished them one by one. In 710 Sargon took Babylon, and in 709 Bit-Yakin, capturing Merodach-baladan at the latter place. Some time after Sargon's death Merodach-baladan was again free, and in 704 or 703 he reentered Babylon, and slew the Assyrian viceroy, who was then its ruler. But his second reign lasted only from six to nine months. He was defeated and driven from Babylon to Bit-Yakin by Sennacherib, Sargon's son and successor. In 700, in connection with the revolt of a Chaldean called Nergal-ushezib or Shuzub, Merodach-baladan raised his head again. Sennacherib took the road to Bit-Yakin, but Merodach-baladan avoided battle and fled to a town in the midst of the sea. Sennacherib again prevailed, quelling the revolt in 698. In 697 he attacked the last refuge of Merodach-baladan, which was a fragment of territory given him by the Elamites. The Assyrian king employed Phoenician ships for the purpose. Merodach's small settlement, which he had abandoned, was captured and burnt, and he was not able to raise his head again. Though he may have ultimately failed in his enterprises, yet he had not lived in vain. The Chaldeans, whose chief he was, and who seem to have been a Semitic race, became from his days the dominant caste in Babylon.

Me'rom [a height, a high place].

By the waters of Merom Joshua defeated the kings of northern Canaan and their allies (Josh. xi. 5, 7), who according to tradition had pitched their camp near Beroth (the wells, or have Beroth and Merom become confused? see BETH) in upper Galilee, not far from Kedesh (Antiq. v. 1, 17). These waters are usually identified with a lake on the Jordan, 11 miles north of the sea of Galilee, or with the streams that flow through its basin. This lake is 4 miles long by 3½ broad, its surface lies 689 feet above the sea of Galilee, and it is almost certainly the body of water called by Josephus the lake Semichontis (Antiq. v. 5, 1, War. iv. 1, 1). It occupies the southern portion of a very marshy basin about 15 miles long by 5 broad. The basin is now called the Huleh and the lake Baheiret el-Huleh or lake of the Huleh. Huleh, an Arabic name given also to the plain south of Hamath, perhaps echoes the name of the district Ulatha, between Trachonitis and Galilee (Antiq. xv. 10, 3)

Me-ron'o-thite.

An inhabitant of Meronoth (1 Chron. xxvii. 30; Neh. iii. 7) Meronoth has not been identified.

Me'roz [probably, a place of refuge].

A town which gave no assistance in the fight with Sisera (Judg. v. 23). Its site is unknown, though el-Murussus, a ruin about $4\frac{1}{2}$ miles northwest of Beth-shean, has been suggested, or Kefr Misr, on the southern slope of mount Tabor, $6\frac{1}{2}$ miles northwest of el-Murussus.

Mes'a-loth, in A. V. Masaloth [perhaps, from Hebrew m'saloth, ascents, stairs].

A place in the district of Arbela (1 Mac. ix. 2). Josephus understood it to be the region of fortified caves at Arbela in Galilee, which were only to be reached by steps (Antiq. xii. 11, 1).

Me'sech. See MESHECH.

Me'sha, I.

The limit in one direction of the region occupied by the descendants of Joktan (Gen. x. 30). Not identified. Mouza, on the eastern coast of the Red Sea, about 100 miles from the straits of Bab el-Mandeb, Bischa in northern Yemen, the district Mesene at the northwestern end of the Persian Gulf, and Massa (cp Septuagint and Gen. xxv. 14) have been suggested.

Me'sha, II. [perhaps, retreat, withdrawal].

A Benjamite, a son of Shaharaim by his wife Hodeah (1 Chron. viii. 8, 9).

Me'sha, III. [salvation].

1. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Caleb. He was ancestor of the inhabitants of Ziph (1 Chron. ii. 42).

2. A king of Moab, son of Chemosh-melech. He rendered to king Ahab the tribute of 100,000 lambs and as many rams, namely their wool (2 Kin. iii. 4). Ahab was slain at the battle of Ramoth-gilead about 853 B. C., which probably took place in the early spring, "the time when kings go forth to war," and Ahaziah thereby became sole king. The discomfiture of Israel and Judah at Ramoth-gilead and the death of Ahab were the signal to Mesha to refuse the tribute of this year, the second of Ahaziah (Antiq. ix. 2, 1), to Israel (2 Kin. i. 1). Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, returned from Ramoth-gilead to Jerusalem, say in May, and undertook a religious reformation of the nation (2 Chron. xix.). After this work of reform had begun (xx. 1), the Ammonites and Moabites, in alliance with the Edomites, who had been persuaded to revolt, invaded Judah. Jehoshaphat defeated the allies and reduced Edom to its former subjection, and a time of peace ensued (30). Ahaziah died at the end of this year, perhaps in December or January or later, and Jehoram his brother succeeded him (2 Kin. i. 17). The next year, 852 B. C., or later, Jehoram, desiring to render Moab again tributary, asked aid of Jehoshaphat (iii. 7). The latter probably wished to chastise the Moabites still further for their invasion of Judah, and, therefore, although he had been rebuked for allying himself with ungodly Ahab and Ahaziah, consented, for Jehoram had exhibited signs of godliness by a considerable reformation (2) Jehoram advanced with his confederates, Jehoshaphat and an unnamed Edomite king, round the southern end of the Dead Sea. The allied armies almost perished with thirst, but Elisha bade them dig trenches, predicting that water would come. It flowed into the valley early in the morning; and as the ruddy light of the sun shone on it, the Moabite king, doubtless Mesha, thinking it was blood and inferring that the three invading armies had quarreled and turned their swords against each other, carelessly advanced with his forces to take the prey. He was routed, and the Israelites entered his land and beat down his cities (24, 25). At Kir-hareseth, seeing that the battle was too sore for him and failing in a desperate attempt to break through the lines of the enemy, he took his eldest son and heir apparent and offered him as a burnt offering to Chemosh on the city wall. The besiegers apparently felt that they were in part responsible for occasioning this human sacrifice and that they had incurred the wrath of God, and they raised the siege and returned to the land of Israel without resubjugating Moab (25-27). The Moabite stone was erected partly for the purpose of commemorating this revolt and its successful issue; see MOABITE STONE.

Me'shach.

The name given by the prince of the eunuchs at Babylon to Mishaël, one of the three faithful Jews afterwards saved from the fiery furnace (Dan. i. 7; ii. 49; iii. 13-30).

Me'shech, in A. V. once Mesech (Ps. cxx. 5). A people descended from Japheth (Gen. x. 2). They traded in the Tyrian markets in slaves and vessels of brass (Ezek. xxvii. 13). They were allies of Tubal, and allies or subjects of Gog, the prince of Rosh, Meshech, and Tubal (Ezek. xxxii. 26; xxxviii. 2, 3; xxxix. 1, R. V.). Meshech and Tubal are associated together in the Assyrian inscriptions as they are in the Bible. In the days of Tiglath-pileser, about 1120 B. C., and Shalmaneser, 859-825, the land of Musku, that is Meshech, lay in the mountains to the north of Assyria and bordered on Tabal, that is Tubal, in the west. They were gradually driven northward to near the Black Sea. Herodotus calls the two races the Moschoi and Tibarenoi, and locates them in the mountains southeast of the Black Sea (Herod. iii. 94; vii. 78). The Moschoi dwelt between the source of the Phasis and Cyrus rivers (Pliny vi. 4).

Me-shel-e-mi'ah [Jehovah recompenses].

A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar and Korah. He and his sons were doorkeepers of the sanctuary (1 Chron. ix. 21; xxvi. 1). In xxvi. 14 he is called Shelemiah.

Me-shez'a-bel, in A. V. Meshezabeel [God sets free].

1. Father of a certain Berechiah (Neh. iii. 4).

2. One of those who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 21).

3. A man of Judah, family of Zerah (Neh. xi. 24).

Me-shil'le-mith [recompense, retribution]. See MESHILLEMOTH 2.

Me-shil'le-moth [recompenses].

1. An Ephraimite, father of that Berechiah who urged the release of the captives brought from Judah by Pekah's army (2 Chron. xxviii. 12).

2. A priest descended from Immer (Neh. xi. 13), called Meshillemth in 1 Chron. ix. 12.

Me-sho'bab [restored].

One of the Simeonite princes who seized upon the pasture lands near Gedor (1 Chron. iv. 34-41).

Me-shul'lam [a friend].

1. A Benjamite, descended from Shaharaim through Elpaal (1 Chron. viii. 17).

2. A leading man among the Gadites in the reign of Jotham (1 Chron. v. 13).

3. An ancestor of Shaphan the scribe (2 Kin. xxii. 3).

4. A priest, son of Zadok, and father of the high priest Hilkiah who lived in Josiah's reign (1 Chron. ix. 11; Neh. xi. 11). See SHALLUM 7.

5. A Kohathite Levite who with others helped faithfully to superintend the workmen who repaired the temple in Josiah's reign (2 Chron. xxxiv. 12).

6. A priest, son of Meshillemth of the house of Immer (1 Chron. ix. 12).

7. A son of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii. 19).

8. A Benjamite, father of Sallu (1 Chron. ix. 7; Neh. xi. 7).

9. Another Benjamite, son of Shephatiah (1 Chron. ix. 8).

10. A chief man whom, with others, Ezra sent from the river of Ahava to secure Levites to go to Jerusalem (Ezra viii. 16).

11. One of those who busied themselves, probably adversely, in the matter of inducing the Jews who had married foreign wives to put them away (Ezra x. 15).

12. A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 29).

13. A son of Berechiah. He helped to repair two portions of the wall of Jerusalem, at the second of which he had a chamber (Neh. iii. 4, 30). Johanan, son of Tobiah the Ammonite, married his daughter (vi. 18).

14. Son of Besodeiah. He with another returned exile repaired the old gate of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 6).

15. One of those who stood on Ezra's left hand while he read and explained the law to the people (Neh. viii. 4).

16. A priest who, doubtless in behalf of a father's house, sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 7).

17. A chief of the people who did so (Neh. x. 20).

18. One of the princes of Judah who marched in the procession at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii 33).

19. A priest, head of the father's house Ezra in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. xii. 13).

20. Another priest at the same date, head of the father's house Ginnethon (Neh. xii. 16).

21. A porter who lived at the same date (Neh. xii. 25).

Me-shul'le-meth [a female friend]

Wife of king Manasseh, and mother of king Amon (2 Kin. xxi. 19).

Me-so'ba-ite. See MEZOBAITE.

Mes-o-po-ta'mi-a [land between rivers].

The rendering, borrowed from the Septuagint, for the Hebrew Aram-naharaim; see ARAM 2, (1). It is a Greek name which appears after the time of Alexander the Great. The Greek and Roman geographers used the term for the whole country between the Euphrates and Tigris rivers, excluding the mountainous region where the rivers take their rise and ordinarily also the low-lying plain of Babylonia in the other direction. Thus limited, its upper portion is hilly and fertile and its lower part, especially toward the Tigris, is a salt desert. Mesopotamia is now called by the Arabs Jezireh or the island.

Some of its inhabitants were present on that day of Pentecost on which the Holy Spirit descended (Acts ii 9). Stephen includes Ur of the Chaldees in Mesopotamia (vii 2).

Mes-si'ah, in A. V. of N. T. Messias (John i. 41; iv. 25), the Greek form [anointed one].

A Hebrew word, to which the Greek word Christos answers. It was applicable to any person anointed with the holy oil; as the high priest (Lev. iv. 3, 5, 16; 1 Sam. xii. 3, 5, Hebrew) or the king (2 Sam. i. 14, 16). The title is given to the patriarchs Abraham and Isaac and to the Persian king Cyrus, as chosen ones to administer the kingdom of God (Ps. cv. 15; Is. xlv. 1). When God promised David that the throne and scepter should remain in his family forever (2 Sam. vii. 13), the title acquired a special reference and denoted the representative of the royal line of David (Ps. ii. 2; xviii. 50; lxxxiv. 9; lxxxix. 38, 51; cxxxii. 10, 17; Lam. iv. 20; Hab. iii. 13). And when prophecy began to tell of a king who should appear in this line and be the great deliverer of his people (Jer. xxiii. 5, 6), whose goings forth are from of old, from everlasting (Mic. v. 2-5), and who should uphold the throne and kingdom of David forever (Is. ix. 6, 7), the title of the Messiah, par excellence, naturally became attached to him (Dan. ix. 25, 26; Targum Onkelos, Num. xxiv. 17-19), and ultimately became a customary designation of him, being as common as the title son of David (John i. 41; iv. 25; and in the form Christ, Mat. i. 1 et passim).

The term Messianic prophecy denotes all prophecy which treats of the person, work, or kingdom of Christ, whether it does so with express mention of Christ or speaks of the future salvation, glory, and consummation of God's kingdom without mention of the mediator. The term Messianic times does not refer exclusively to the period when Christ lived on earth. It generally comprehends the dispensation which Christ inaugurated and conducts as mediatorial king, whether viewed in its entirety or in some of its aspects.

Met'als.

The metals used in ancient times were gold, silver, iron, copper, lead, and tin (Num. xxxi. 22); see the several articles. Perhaps antimony was employed for coloring the eyelids and eyebrows. See PAINT.

Me-theg-am'mah [probably, bridle of the mother city, i. e. jurisdiction of the metropolis].

A town taken by David from the Philistines (2 Sam. viii. 1). The reference is doubtless to Gath and its suburbs (1 Chron. xviii. 1).

Me-thu'sa-el. See METHUSHAEL.

Me-thu'se-lah, in A. V. of N. T. Mathusala [perhaps, man of a weapon].

Son of Enoch and father of the Sethite Lamech (Gen. v. 21-27). If the number of years which are assigned to him refer to his own individual life, he is notable for having lived to a greater age than any other man recorded in history. See CHRONOLOGY.

Me-thu'sha-el, in A. V. Me-thu'sael [man of God].

Son of Mehujael, and father of Lamech, of the race of Cain (Gen. iv. 18).

Me-u'nim, in A. V. also Mehunim and Mehunims [plural of the gentile adjective from Maon, denoting the people of Maon].

A people whose capital was probably the city of Ma'an, 12 miles southeast of Petra. They inhabited mount Seir (2 Chron. xx. 1, emended text, with 10; cp. Septuagint). A body of them were smitten by the Simeonites near Gedor, where they dwelt as strangers (1 Chron. iv. 39-41). They are mentioned in connection with Philistines and Arabians (2 Chron. xxvi. 7). Some of them, probably captives of war and their descendants, served at the temple in Jerusalem as Nethinim (Ezra ii. 50; Neh. vii. 52). They are mentioned in Judg. x. 12, according to the Hebrew text, where the Septuagint has Midian. The Meunim are identified by the Septuagint with the Minæans. If the identification be correct, they are only a northern settlement of that people.

Mez'a-hab [waters of gold].

An ancestress of the wife of Hadar, king of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 39; 1 Chron. i. 50); or perhaps a district, of which Matred was a native. The R. V. hyphenates the name.

Me-zo'ba-ite, in A. V. Mesobaite.

Apparently a gentile adjective, as in the English and Greek versions (1 Chron. xi. 47); but the Hebrew text is evidently corrupt.

Mi'a-min. See MIJAMIN.

Mib'har [choice].

One of David's mighty men, son of Hagri or better a Hagrite (1 Chron. xi. 38); see remarks about the text under Bani.

Mib'sam [sweet odor].

1 A tribe descended from Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 13; 1 Chron. i. 29).

2. A Simeonite (1 Chron. iv. 25).

Mib'zar [a fortification, a stronghold].

An Edomite chieftain (Gen. xxxvi. 42; 1 Chron. i. 53).

Mi'ca, in A. V. Micha once Micah (1 Chron. ix. 15) [evidently, like Micah, an abbreviation of Micaiah, who is like Jehovah? (cp. Mic. i. 1 with Jer. xxvi. 18 R. V. and 2 Chron. xxxiv. 20 with 2 Kin. xxii. 12)]. A variant Hebrew spelling yields the English form Micah, cp. 2 Sam. ix. 12 with 1 Chron. viii. 34.

1. A son of Mephibosheth (2 Sam. ix. 12). The interchangeable form of the name, Micah, is given him in 1 Chron. viii. 34, 35; ix. 40, 41.

2. A Levite who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 11).

3. A Levite descended from Asaph (1 Chron. ix. 15, Neh. xi. 17, 22; and xii. 35, where the form Micaiah is used).

Mi'cah, in A. V. thrice Michah (1 Chron. xxiv. 24, 25) [who is like Jehovah?]. See MICA.

1 A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Uzziel (1 Chron. xxiii. 20; xxiv. 24, 25).

2 An Ephraimite who stole from his mother 1100 shekels of silver, about 725 dollars, but afterwards gave them back again. His mother dedicated 200 of them to the Lord for images. A graven and a molten image were made of them and placed in the house of Micah, and Micah consecrated his son to be priest. A Levite chanced to pass that way, and Micah embraced the opportunity to secure an accredited minister at the sanctuary. A Levite, though not a priest, was better than the layman, Micah's son. The Levite consented for hire to minister before Jehovah in a house of images, contrary to the second commandment. Sometime afterwards, migrating Danites passed that way, allured the Levite to go with them, and carried off Micah's images, despite his protestations (Judg. xvii, xviii).

3 A son of Merib-baal (1 Chron. viii. 34, 35; ix. 40, 41); see MICA 1.

4. A Reubenite who lived several generations before 730 B. C. (1 Chron. v. 5).

5. Father of Abdon. He was born before Josiah's reign (2 Chron. xxiv. 20; 2 Kin. xxii. 12, where the form Micaiah is used); cp. ACHBOR 2.

6. A descendant of Asaph (1 Chron. ix. 15, A. V.); see MICA 3.

7. A Morashtite, a native apparently of Moreseth-gath (Mic. i. 14), a town believed to have been in Judah, not far from Gath and for a time a dependency of the Philistine city. He prophesied in the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah (Mic. i. 1; and Jer. xxvi. 18, where the form Micaiah is used). He therefore began his career a little later than his contemporaries Hosea and Isaiah (cp. i. 1 with Is. i. 1 and Hos. i. 1). He spoke upon the same great themes as Isaiah and so similarly that, as Calvin has said, Micah was, as it were, Isaiah's colleague.

Micah's style is simple; not rugged but elegant. He is plain-spoken in the rebuke of sin (i. 5; ii. 1, 2; vi. 10-12). His transitions of thought are often abrupt, but a logical connection is seldom difficult to discern. He is fond of the interrogation (i. 5, ii. 7; iv. 9; vi. 3, 6, 7, 10, 11), uses irony (ii. 11), introduces a metaphor, and retains it and carries it forward (i. 6, iii. 2, 3, 6, iv. 6-8, 13; vi. 10, 11, 14, 15), and delights in paronomasia or play upon words, employing it largely in the first chapter and perhaps allowing it to determine the form of the concluding paragraph of the book. That paragraph is spoken in praise of Jehovah, and is based on the rhetorical question, "Who is a God like unto thee?" the prophet closing his prophecy by publishing the claim with its ground which his own name makes.

Micah drew confidence and strength from the character of God, as revealed in the ten commandments, in his dealing with Israel, and in individual experience (ii. 7; vi. 3-5; vii. 15). God himself does justice and loves mercy, and he requires these traits in his people. The promises of God were also a source of strength and sweet encouragement to the prophet. He knew that Israel's security lay in God's purpose to save his people according to the promise made to Abraham (vii. 20) and centered in the son of David (v. 2-6; cp. Luke i. 72-75). The foes of the kingdom cannot prevail. Chapter v. is based on the same truth as Ps. ii., and, like the sweet message of forgiveness and restoration (vii. 8-20), rests upon God's word.

The book of Micah is the sixth of the minor prophets. Its author prophesied in the reigns of Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah (i. 1). Its contents also show that it was written after the reigns of Omri and Ahab (vi. 16), at the time when Assyria was the power which the Israelites dreaded (v. 5, 6), and in part at least while Samaria and the northern kingdom were still in existence (i. 6, 14); but how long before the fall of Samaria the words of i. 5-7 were uttered cannot be determined, for from the time of Uzziah and Jotham the prophets were foretelling the approaching doom of Samaria (Hos. i. 6; iii. 4; v. 9; Amos. vi. 6; iii. 12; v. 1-3, 27;

vi. 1, 7-11, 14; Is vii 8, 9; viii. 4) and the desolation of Judah (Hos v. 10; Amos ii 4; Is. vi. 1, 11-13; vii 17-25). The allusion to the desolation of Bashan and Gilead may indicate a period later than 733-732 B C, when Tiglath-pileser ravaged that territory and deported its inhabitants (Mic vii. 14, where the days of old refer to the occupation of the region by Israel from the time of the conquest onward, cp. 14 with 20). The prophecy of iii. 12 was spoken during the reign of Hezekiah (Jer. xxvi. 18), though Micah may have discoursed on this theme before.

The prophecies of Micah, although they refer especially to Judah and were spoken to the people of the southern kingdom, yet concern all Israel (Mic i. 1, 5-7, 9-16). The abrupt transitions indicate that the book is rather a summary of the prophet's teaching than a series of distinct discourses. The expression "Hear ye," repeated three times, serves to mark the beginning of three divisions, each of which likewise ends with a message of hope. I Judgment upon Samaria for its incurable disposition toward idolatry (i 2-8), and upon Judah as involved in like guilt (9-16). Woe upon the oppressors of the people and prophecy of the ruin and captivity of the nation (ii 4, 5) as a punishment for the unrighteousness and injustice of its representative men (11-11). Yet a remnant shall be restored (12, 13). II. Denunciations passing into prophecies of salvation Rebuke of the civil and religious authorities for heartless indifference to truth and right and for the mercenary character of their doctrine and government (iii 1-11); the consequent abandonment of Zion by Jehovah to the power of its foes (12); but the ultimate exaltation of Jehovah's kingdom in moral influence among men and in peace, prosperity, and power (iv. 1-8). But at present dismay, helplessness, captivity (9, 10), followed by the overthrow of its enemies for their sinful opposition to Jehovah (11-13). But at present discomfiture for Zion (v 1), until he shall come forth unto God that is to be ruler in Israel, whose goings forth are from of old, from everlasting (2-4). This foreordination of God regarding the Messiah secures the deliverance of Zion from the Assyrians (5, 6; cp Is vii 4-16), and is the pledge and potency that guarantees the survival of God's people throughout the ages and their ultimate triumph over all foes and attainment of conformity to God's ideal (Mic v. 7-15). III. Jehovah's controversy with the people as a whole, not with the wealthy and the official classes only (vi 1-5), explaining the requirements of true religion (6-8; see also Is. i. 11-17), lamenting its absence and the presence of its very opposite (Mic vi. 9-vii. 6), and closing with the prophet's own confidence in a glorious future due to the forgiving grace of Jehovah and his faithfulness to his covenant with Abraham (7-20).

2-4, but is more closely connected than in the corresponding passage in Isaiah with the verses which immediately follow Joel expresses a similar thought (Joel iii 10). Isaiah certainly quoted his words, as the introduction, "And it shall come to pass," shows; and he may have cited them from Micah. But the verbal variations between Isaiah and Micah, and between these prophets and Joel, may be explained by supposing that each adopted a traditional prediction current in his day. At any rate God's people of old had authoritative prophecy upon which they relied, and favorite passages which they quoted, just as Christians of to-day have.

The integrity of the text of Micah has been impugned. The evidence used as proof of interpolation consists mainly in the following facts, frequently reinforced by a denial that the style is Micah's. I Exile is presupposed (ii 12, 13, vii 7-20, Wellhausen). But surely Micah might look forward to an exile of the people, for 1. On the theory of the Mosaic origin of the addresses in Deuteronomy, it was natural for Micah to look forward to the exile of the people. As foreseen and foretold, sin meant national weakness and ruin; and this condition in that age of the world had for its ordinary result subjugation by the great world powers and deportation into slavery (Deut xxviii. 31-37, 47-53; cp Is i 19, 20). 2. The exile of Judah, or at least of the upper classes, is taught in admittedly genuine passages of Micah, and an exile undoubtedly of the nation as a whole is clearly announced by Isaiah (Mic i 15, 16; ii 3-5, 10; Is v 13; vi. 11-13; vii. 3; a remnant shall return, x 21). A forward look to the exile is therefore quite in place in the prophecy of Micah. Critics of this trend, who regard the context as genuine, reject the clause in iv. 10 where Babylon is mentioned as a place of exile. It is called a gloss; and it may certainly be omitted without injury to the sense. But (1) so may many clauses admittedly genuine be omitted without destroying the connection. And (2) Isaiah speaks of Babylon as a place of exile, in a prophecy which Micah may have had in mind (Is xxxix 6, 7). Once again Isaiah, having before his mind's eye the children of Israel scattered throughout the inhabited world, mentions Shinar, i. e., Babylon, as one of the lands of the exile (xi. 11). This portion of the chapter, like the clause in Micah, is excised, primarily because of this reference to Babylonian exile. II Messianic elements: the reassembling of Israel and their triumphant breaking forth under the leadership of their king (Mic ii. 13); the peace and prosperity of Zion in the Messianic period, and the accession of the gentiles (iv. 1-8); and the person of the Messiah (v 2-8). But these thoughts were unquestionably contemporary with Micah (Hos. xi. 8-11, not to refer to disputed passages in Hosea; Is ii. 2-4, iv. 2-6, ix 1-7 [Heb viii. 23-ix. 6]; x. 20-22, xi. 1-10; see also Amos ix. 11-15, and the remarks on its genuineness). III. The universalism which finds expression in Jehovah's relation to the gentile world. The answer to this objection is: 1. The presuppositions are not wanting in Micah's own thought, as reflected in passages admittedly genuine (1-2). 2. A universalistic conception appears in Amos' denunciation of Jehovah's punishment upon the nations for their hostility to the kingdom of God (Amos, chaps. 1 and 11); in the attitude of Jehovah to Damascus, Egypt, and Assyria, proclaimed by Isaiah; and in the writings ascribed to J and E, contemporary with Micah, in which mention is made of God's moral government of the world (Gen i-xi; xviii. 25, etc.). IV. The eschatological ideas of a world attack upon Zion and its failure, in contrast with the prophecy of the overthrow of Zion by its enemies (Mic iv 11-13 with iii 12). The two ideas are, however, not inconsistent. The conflict of the world power with Judah is viewed by Micah, as by other prophets of his own time and later, from two points: Jehovah gives up his people to the sword and to captivity because of their sins; but in so far as the hostility of the world is directed against Zion in its religious significance, it is a struggle against Jehovah and must issue in the destruction of the opposing nations (Is. i. 19, 20, viii. 5-8 and 9, 10; x. 5-7 and 12-16; comp Is iii 8, 24-26; v 13, 26-30). No sword formed against her shall prosper. The progress of the Assyrian advance into Judah under Sennacherib in the days of Isaiah and perhaps of Micah, and its failure, offered a striking illustration of the twofold principle here proclaimed as a truth valid for all time (2 Kin xviii. 13-xix. 37; cp xviii 11, 12 and xix. 4-7; Vos, Presb., and Ref'd Rev. x. 305). V. Condemnation of the pillars and the Asherim, which were used in the popular worship, but were not condemned until the high places were made an object of attack by the prophets, that is, after the Deuteronomic reform. But 1. Notice the implication that the addresses in the book of Deuteronomy are not Mosaic in their origin. 2. The attitude of Micah is that of his predecessor Hosea. The very building of pillars is condemned by Hosea (Hos. x 1, 2). And Hosea condemns all idols and must, therefore, have opposed the images of the goddess Asherah (cp ii 5, 13; iv 12, 17; viii 4-6; and Mic i 7). 3. The entire passage Mic v. 9-14 is similar to Is ii 6-8. VI. The transitions from threatening to promise (Mic. ii. 12, 13; iv 1-8; vii 7-20). This sequence is, however, customary among the prophets. It is their uniform habit after denouncing doom to illumine the darkness with a ray of promise, and thus encourage the godly to stand fast and strive and hope. It is, however, the habit of those critics who bring forward the objection mentioned to excise these passages of promise, or many of them, and thus trim the prophecies to suit a theory.

Several remarks that bear on the genuineness of chapters vi and vii may be thrown loosely together. The thought of the exiles scattered far and wide (Mic vii 12) is not surprising in a contemporary of Isaiah; and the hope that the walls of Jerusalem will be rebuilt (vii 11) is natural after one has pictured the enemy treading down Zion as the mire of the streets (10). Over against Ewald's assignment of chapters vi and vii to the time of Manassah (a date, it will be observed, which need not fall outside of Micah's lifetime) may be placed Cornill's opinion that everything in these chapters applies well to the time of Ahaz. The anticipation of exile (vii. 7-20), and the ravaging of the kingdom by its foes, yet their submission (vi 13-16; vii 16, 17), and the transition from threatening to promise, characterize chapters i-v equally with vi and vii. Chapters vi and vii form a natural advance from the denunciation of the official representatives of the nation (i-iii. to Jehovah's controversy with the people as a whole (vi, vii). The figure of Jehovah in controversy with Israel was familiar to the prophets of this period (Hos. iv 1, xii 2; cp Is i 2-24), and to refer to events of Israel's early history, as in vi 4, 5, vii 15, 20, was a common practice with Micah (i 15, v 6), Hosea, and Isaiah. As the prophecies of chapters i-v resemble Isaiah's utterances, so chapter vi resembles Is. i.

Mi-ca'iah, in A V Micaiah except in 1 Kin xviii 8-28, 2 Chron xviii 6-27 [who is like Jehovah?]

1 Daughter of Uriel of Gibeah, wife of Rehoboam, and mother of king Abijah (2 Chron xiii 2). According to xi 20, Abijah's mother was Maacah, daughter of Absalom. Micaiah is probably a corruption of Maacah, for so Abijah's mother is always called elsewhere, and she was probably granddaughter of Absalom and daughter of Uriel by his wife Tamar, Absalom's daughter. See MAACAH 9.

2. A prophet, son of Imlah. Being desired by Ahab to concur in the favorable prediction given by the prophets of Baal regarding Ahab's expedition against Ramoth-gilead, he did what was required of him, but with such transparent insincerity that he was adjured to speak the truth, on which, in the name of Jehovah, he predicted the death of Ahab in the coming fight. The order was given to make him a prisoner till the event should prove his unfavorable vaticination to be untrue (1 Kin xxii. 8-28; 2 Chron xviii. 6-27).

3. One of Jehoshaphat's princes sent by him to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. xvii. 7).

4. The prophet, better known as Micah (Jer. xxvi. 18, E. R. V., see A. R. V. margin).

Mich'ri [valuable].

A Benjamite (1 Chron ix 8)

Mich'tam [engraving, inscription].

A word occurring in the titles of Psalms xvi; lvi-lx. It has been understood as meaning: 1. Concealed, secret, hence a mystery or a hitherto unknown composition 2 (Golden psalm. 3 Epigram, a poem intended, like an inscription, to record memorable thoughts, and often indulging in refrains. The last opinion has most support.

Mid'din [extensions].

A village in the wilderness of Judah (Josh. xv 61). Site unknown

Mid'i-an, in A. V. of N. T. Madian [strife, contention].

1. A son of Abraham by Keturah, sent away with gifts into the wilderness, and in whom the Midianites were linked with Abraham. The person and tribe form one conception (Gen. xxv 1-6)

2. A region in the Arabian desert near the Ælantic gulf, occupied by the Midianites (Gen xxv 6). It was bordered by Edom on the northwest. Its boundaries were never demarked, and doubtless shifted considerably at different periods; but all the region referred to in the O. T. as dominated by the Midianites is found within an area which measures about 175 miles from north to south. About the time of the exodus Midian controlled the pasture lands east of Horeb in the peninsula of Sinai (Ex. iii. 1). A district adjacent to Moab and near the Amorite kingdom, whose capital was Heshbon, was occupied by Midianites, who had been settled there for some time (Gen xxxvi 35; Num. xxii. 4; xxv 1, 6; Josh xii 21). The intervening region east of Edom to the Red Sea doubtless belonged to Midian. The Midianites who were routed in the valley of Jezreel fled in this direction, and Gideon in pursuing them passed Succoth and the Gadite town of Jogbehah (Judg vii. 5, 10, 11, cp Gen xxxvii 25, 28). In David's time a royal refugee from Edom found temporary asylum in Midian, probably southeast of Edom, before he went into Egypt (1 Kin xi. 17, 18). The center of population was east and southeast of the Ælantic gulf of the Red Sea, where the name has lived from age to age and is still preserved in the ruins called Madyan.

Mid'i-an-ites.

A people of the desert (Gen. xxv. 2, 6; Num x. 29-31; Is. lx. 6; Hab. iii. 7; Judith ii. 26). Five families of them sprang from Midian (Gen. xxv. 4). Of these five, the name of Ephah has been identified with much probability with a name on the Assyrian inscriptions of the 8th century before Christ, which denotes a tribe of northern Arabia. Midianite merchants, who were with the caravan of Ishmaelites coming from Gilead, bought Joseph and carried him to Egypt (Gen. xxxvii. 25, 28). The father-in-law of Moses was a Midianite (Ex. iii 1). Midianites joined with Moabites in hiring Balaam to curse the Israelites and afterwards seduced the people to idolatry and licentiousness (Num xxii. 4, 6; xxv). The Israelites were consequently directed to make war on them. They did so, killing the five kings of Midian with all the male population of the district and the married women (xxxv) These kings were allies or vassals of Sihon, king of the Amorites (Josh. xii. 21). In the period of the judges, Midianites, in conjunction with the Amalekites and the children of the east, entered Canaan, with their cattle and their tents, like locusts for multitude, everywhere appropriating the crops, and reducing to the greatest distress those who had sown them. After the oppression had lasted for seven years, God raised up Jerubbaal, or Gideon, to deliver the now repentant people. The decisive battle was fought in the plain of Jezreel. It resulted in the complete defeat of the foreign oppressors. Their two princes, Oreb and Zeeb, were taken and put to death; and later their two kings, Zebah and Zalmunna, shared the same fate. The land had rest, then, for the normal period of forty years (Judg vi-viii, ix 17; Psalm lxxxiii 9-12; Is. ix 4; x 26)

Mig'dal-el [tower of God].

A fortified city of Naphtali (Josh. xix 38). Its identification with el-Mejdel, that is Magdala, on the sea of Galilee, is contrary to the order of enumeration. Its site is probably Mujeidil, 12½ miles northwest of Kades, i e. Kedesh, and 11 miles north-northwest of Yaron, i e. Iron.

Mig'dal-gad [tower of Gad or fortune]

A town in or near the lowland of Judah (Josh xv 37). El-Mejdel has been suggested, inland 2½ miles east, slightly north, from Ashkelon. This location would be in the country of the Philistines.

Mig'dol [tower; in Egyptian makthal, tower].

An encampment of the Israelites while they were leaving Egypt. It was near the sea (the Red Sea according to Ex. xv. 4, 22; Deut xi. 4); was before Pi-hahiroth and before Baal-zephon (Ex. xiv. 2; Num. xxxiii. 7). After the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, Jews fled to Egypt and took up their abode in a place called Migdol (Jer xlv 1; xlv 14). If the marginal reading of Ezek. xxix 10; xxx 6 is correct, Migdol was in the extreme north of Egypt. Ancient authors mention a Migdol or Magdolon 12 miles distant from Pelusium, on the northeastern frontier of Egypt, and the Makthal most frequently mentioned on the Egyptian monuments was situated near the Mediterranean Sea (Ebers). Brugsch identifies this place with Tell es-Samût, and regards it as the site of the encampment of the Israelites. But this situation does not harmonize with the location of the camp on the Red Sea, as the term Red Sea is understood. Other fortresses on the frontier, however, went by the name of Migdol (Ebers). Naville has expressed the opinion that Migdol was at the present station of the Serapeum, midway between lake Timsah and the Bitter Lakes; while Ebers locates it at the southern end of the Bitter Lakes, near the Persian monument. Here the gulf of Suez at the time of the exodus was narrow and probably shallow. It was also liable to be driven back by an east wind, so as temporarily to leave a dry way at a particular spot.

Mig'ron [possibly, a precipice]

A village of Benjamin, south of Aiath and north of Michmash (Is. x 28). The site may be marked by the ruins Makrun. Saul once camped in its vicinity, in the outermost part of Gibeah (1 Sam. xiv 2). If the site of Gibeah is Tell el-Fûl, as is commonly believed, or perhaps even if Gaba is intended, and if the text of 1 Sam. xiv 2 is pure, there would seem to have been two Migrons, one north and the other considerably south of Michmash.

Mil'a-min, in A V sometimes Miamin [from or on the right hand]

1. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house by the time of David, and became the sixth of the twenty-four courses into which David distributed the priests (1 Chron. xxiv 1, 6, 9).

2. A chief of the priests who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. xii 5, 7). In the next generation a father's house among the priests bore the name Miniamin (ver 17). The difference between these names is unessential, being wholly external; in one form the letter nun is assimilated, in the other it is not.

3. A son of Parosh, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x 25).

4. A priest who, doubtless in behalf of a father's house (cp. number 2), sealed the covenant in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. x. 7). Perhaps it was he who was one of the trumpeters at the dedication of the wall (xii. 41); see MINIAMIN 3, and for form of the name see under 2 of this article.

Mik'loth [rods]

1. A military captain in David's reign, who was on duty with another captain in the second month (1 Chron. xxvii. 4).

2. A Benjamite, of the family of Jeiel of Gibeon (1 Chron. viii. 32; ix. 37, 38).

Mik-ne'iah [possession of Jehovah].

A Levite of the second degree, a gate keeper of the ark, who played the harp in David's reign (1 Chron. xv. 18, 21).

Mil'a-lai [eloquent].

A Levite who played a musical instrument at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 36).

Mil'cah [counsel or counselor].

1. A daughter of Haran and sister of Lot. She became the wife of Nahor and the mother of Huz, Buz, Kemuel, Chesed, Hazo, Pildash, Jidlaph, and Bethuel (Gen. xi. 29; xxii 20-23). She was the grandmother of Rebekah (xxii 23, xxiv 15, 24).

2. A daughter of Zelophehad (Num. xxvi. 33).

Mil'com. See MOLECH

mile [thousand (paces)].

In the only passage of the Bible in which the word occurs (Mat. v 41) the Roman mile is intended, containing 1000 paces of 5 Roman feet each, and equivalent to 4851 43 English feet, or about $\frac{1}{3}$ of an English mile.

Mi-le'tus, in A V once Miletum.

A seaport to which Paul came a day after he had been at Trogyllum (Acts xx. 15). Thither he summoned the elders of the church at Ephesus, to give them exhortations and bid them farewell (17-38). At Miletus Trophimus was once left when he was sick (2 Tim. iv 20, in A V Miletum). The city was on the seacoast of Ionia, about 36 miles south of Ephesus, and near the boundary line between that region and Caria. It had a celebrated temple of Apollo, and was the birthplace of the philosophers Thales and Anaximander, and perhaps of Democritus. Scarcely any relics of the city now remain.

MILK.

An important article of diet, especially in the East. The milk of cows (2 Sam. xvii 29; Is. vii 22), sheep (Deut. xxxii 14), goats (Prov. xxvii. 27), and camels (cp. Gen. xxxii. 15) was and is still used. The milk of the camel is excellent, being rich and strong, but not very sweet. Milk was used in its natural state and as curds and as cheese (Deut. xxxii. 14; Judg. v 25; 2 Sam. xvii 29). It was kept in skin bottles, and served in dishes (Judg. iv 19; v. 25).

Mill.

In Palestine and neighboring lands the mill was a simple machine, consisting of two round millstones (Deut. xxiv 6). In the mill in use among the people to-day, the stones are generally made of basalt, about a foot and a half in diameter and from two to four inches thick. The nether stone is slightly convex on the top. It has a peg in the center, about which the upper stone revolves. This upper stone is slightly concave on the under side in order to fit on the nether stone, and is pierced by a hole in the center which receives the peg and into which the grain is dropped by hand. It is turned by means of an upright handle near the circumference. The meal falls over the edge of the nether stone into a cloth spread underneath or into a platter. The work of grinding is laborious and menial. It was performed by the women (Ecc. xii. 3, R. V. margin; Mat. xxiv. 41), slave women (Ex. xi. 5; Is. xlvii. 2), and prisoners (Judg. xvi. 21). In ordinary Jewish households, however, it was not regarded as at all degrading for the female portion of the family to grind meal every morning for a day's consumption, rising up for the purpose, at least in winter, long before daybreak. If the millstone was taken away, the family was left without ground grain till it was returned, on which account it was forbidden by the Mo-ra-ic law to take the mill or the upper millstone to pledge, for he taketh (a man's) life to pledge (Deut. xxiv. 6). The cessation of the sound of grinding betokens utter desolation (Jer. xxv. 10; Rev. xviii. 22).

A larger mill, constructed on the same principle, but turned by an ass, was also in use (Mat. xviii. 6, R. V. margin).

Min'let.

A cereal (Panicum miliaceum), in Hebrew dohān, in Arabic duhn. Ezekiel was bidden to use it as an ingredient of the bread which he was ordered to prepare (Ezek. iv. 9). It is extensively used in western and southern Asia, northern Africa, and southern Europe. The stalks make an excellent fodder for cattle, while the grain is fed to poultry, and affords a nutritious and palatable food for man. It is possible that under the Hebrew dohān other allied species of cereals may be included, and especially Sorghum vulgare, the Indian millet, a taller grass much cultivated in India and southwestern Asia, and known to the natives as doua.

Min'lo [filing, terrace].

1 A house, i e probably a fortress, at Shechem (Judg. ix. 6, 20).

2 A bastion at Jerusalem, in existence in the time of David, rebuilt by Solomon, and strengthened by Hezekiah as a precaution against the expected siege by the Assyrians (2 Sam. v. 9; 1 Kin. ix. 15, 24; xi. 27; 2 Chron. xxxii. 5). Its site is unknown. It was in or at the city of David, apparently intended to cover the old Jebusite stronghold (2 Chron. xxxii. 5). General considerations lead to the conjecture that it may have stood on the southwestern hill, on the north-eastern corner, on the spur that overlooked the Tyropæon valley and faced the temple.

Mine.

The operation of mining, by which gold, silver, iron, copper, and precious stones were obtained, is graphically described in Job xxviii. 1-11. The Egyptians carried on mining operations from an early period. As early as the fourth dynasty they discovered copper in wady Maghārah, in the peninsula of Sinai, and commenced mining and smelting operations, which continued for many years. Work was suspended during the domination of the Hyksos, but was resumed under Thothmes III, and was carried on under Ramses II, who is commonly believed to have been the Pharaoh of the oppression. The miners were criminals, prisoners of war, and slaves, working under the whip of the taskmaster and often in fetters. The mines had broad, low openings. The shaft penetrated to a considerable depth. The roof was supported by pillars of stone which the miners left and by timber of acacia wood. The gold and silver mines of Spain were celebrated (1 Mac. viii. 3). Canaan was described to the expectant Israelites as a land whose stones are iron, and out of whose hills thou mayest dig brass (Deut. viii. 9); but there is no account of their having carried on mining operations in Palestine. That the Hebrews understood how to drive shafts is shown by the tunnel which they cut from the fountain of the Virgin to the pool of Siloam. Iron mines now exist on Lebanon.

Min'a-a-min [from or on the right hand].

1. One of those who, under the direction of a Levite, Kore, took charge of the free-will offerings in the temple and distributed them to the Levites during Hezekiah's reign (2 Chron. xxxi. 15).

2 A father's house among the priests in the days of the high priest Jolai-kim (Neh. xii. 17); see MIJAMIN 2.

3 A priest, one of those who blew trumpets at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 41); see MIJAMIN 4.

Min'is-ter.

1. A personal attendant and helper, not a menial, in Hebrew m'shaveth, in Greek ὑπερέτης. Joseph, the slave, when raised to a position of honor and trust in his master's household, ministered unto him (Gen. xxxix. 4). Abishag was given honorable and influential place by David, and she ministered unto him (1 Kin. i. 4, 15). Joshua attended Moses, took charge of the first tent of meeting, and succeeded Moses in office (Ex. xxiv. 13; xxxiii. 11; Josh. i. 1). Ehsha attended Elijah, poured water on his hands, and succeeded him (1 Kin. xix. 21; 2 Kin. iii. 11). The attendant of the synagogue aided the officiating teacher in the service (Luke iv. 20). The disciples attended Jesus and were eyewitnesses (i. 2; Acts xxvi. 16). John Mark attended Paul and Barnabas during a part of the first missionary journey (xiii. 5).

2. A public functionary in the service of the state or of God, in Hebrew m'shareth, in Greek leitourgos, as the priests and Levites in the performance of the duties of the sanctuary (Ex. xxviii. 43; Num. iii. 31; Deut. xviii. 5; Is. lxi. 6. cp. Septuagint; Luke i. 23; Heb. ix. 21), Christ as high priest in the heavenly sanctuary (Heb. viii. 2), Paul in administering the gospel unto the gentiles (Rom. xv. 16). The epithet is applied to the civil magistrate as a public official (xiii. 6). It designates an attaché of the royal court (1 Kin x. 5), often a person of high rank (2 Chron. xxii. 8; Esth. i. 10); and it is used of the angels (Ps. ciii. 21; civ. 4).

3. One engaged in the service of another, and regarded primarily as the master's own representative and servant, and not as acting in behalf of others, in Greek diakonos; for example, a magistrate as the representative of God, an avenger for wrath to him that doeth evil (Rom. xiii. 4). It is used especially for God's minister in the gospel; as Timothy (1 Thes. iii. 2), Paul and Apollos (1 Cor. iii. 5), Tychicus (Eph. vi. 21), Epaphras (Col. i. 7). The term diakonos was also used in a restricted sense for deacon, a church officer with specified duties distinguishing him from a bishop.

Min'i.

A people of Armenia (Antiq. i. 3, 6) inhabiting the district near lake Van, probably between that and lake Urumiah, and adjacent to the kingdom of Ararat on the Araxes. In 830 B. C. Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, pillaged the country of the Minni. In 716 B. C. and again in 715 the king of Minni revolted against Assyria, but in 714 he was anew subdued. The Minni continued to give trouble at intervals, especially during the reign of the Assyrian king Ashurbanipal (668-626); till at length about 606 B. C. they took part with the Medes, Cimmerians, and other nationalities in capturing Nineveh and ending the Assyrian empire. In Jer. li. 27 (R. V.) the kingdoms of Ararat, Minni, and Ashkenaz are described as uniting for the destruction of Babylon.

Min'nith.

A town of the Ammonite country (Judg. xi. 33). It exported wheat to Tyre (Ezek. xxvii. 17). According to Eusebius, there was a village called Manith 4 Roman miles from Heshbon in the direction of Philadelphia.

Min'strel.

A musician (Rev. xviii. 22, in A. V. musician); especially one who sings to the accompaniment of an instrument.

1. The Hebrew word M'naggen, which is rendered minstrel in 2 Kin. iii. 15, signifies a player on a stringed instrument, as harp or lyre. Music was employed by the Hebrews to still excitement; and when Saul was troubled by an evil spirit, David was summoned to the court to act as minstrel (1 Sam. xvi. 14-23). Music, sometimes at least, formed part of the religious exercises of the prophets (1 Sam. x. 5-10); and Elisha summoned a minstrel to play before him while he waited for God to speak to him (2 Kin. iii. 15). The music calmed the prophet's mind, recalled his thoughts from the outside world, and gladdened his spirit "Prophecy," says Maimonides, "dwelleth not in the midst of melancholy nor in the midst of apathy, but in the midst of joy."

2. The minstrels hired by Jairus (Mat. ix. 23, A. V.) were flute players (R. V.), who with singers and wailing women were employed as professional mourners (2 Chron. xxxv. 25; Jer. ix. 17-20; xlviii. 31 with 36).

Mint.

An herb of the genus Mentha, of which there are several species. It is called in Greek 'iduomou, sweet smelling (Mat. xxiii. 23). Horsemint (Mentha sylvestris) is the most common species in Syria, and grows wild on all the hills. It is not known certainly which sort the ancient Israelites cultivated.

Miph'kad, in R. V. Hammiphkad, incorporating the Hebrew article [appointed place].

A gate at Jerusalem, probably of the temple (Neh. iii. 31). see JERUSALEM II 3

Mir'a-cle.

Miracles are wonders, signs, types, powers, works of God (Deut. xi. 3; xvix. 3, Ps. lxxviii. 7, 11, 12, 43; xcv. 9; Mark ix. 39; Luke xxiii. 8; John ii. 11, 23, ix. 3; Acts ii. 22; vi. 8; viii. 13; see R. V.). They are not merely wonderful events; but are also signs, types, powers, works of God. They are not merely supernatural events, like the creation of the world; for God is not represented as bringing the universe into existence as a sign of attestation. Nor are they merely extraordinary providences, which men sometimes term miracles of providence, and which are brought about by secondary means and are not signs; such as the storm which dispersed the Spanish Armada. The locusts which were blown into Egypt by the strong east wind and blown away again by the west wind (Ex. x. 13, 19), and the arrival of quails, which migrate in the spring and supplied the camp of Israel with meat for an evening (xvi. 13) were extraordinary providences, but with additional elements. They were foretold and were intended as signs. The plague of locusts was one of the signs and wonders wrought at Zoan (Ps. lxxviii. 42, 46), and the quails were sent that Israel might know that Jehovah is God and their God (Ex. xvi. 12). In the strict biblical sense, miracles are events in the external world, wrought by the immediate power of God and intended as a sign or attestation. They are possible because God sustains, controls, and guides all things, and is personal and omnipotent. Perhaps the manner of working these deeds in the realm of the physical universe is illustrated by the power of the human will. Man wills, and muscular force is exerted which controls or counteracts nature's laws; as when one hurls a stone into the air against the law of gravitation. Miracles are not to be credulously received, but their genuineness must be tested. The tests are: 1. They exhibit the character of God and teach truths concerning God. 2. They are in harmony with the established truths of religion (Deut. xii 1-3). If a wonder is worked which contradicts the doctrines of the Bible, it is a lying wonder (2 Thes. ii. 9; Rev. xvi 14). 3. There is an adequate occasion for them. God does not work them except for great cause and for a religious purpose. They belong to the history of redemption; and there is no genuine miracle without an adequate occasion for it in God's redemptive revelation of himself. 4. They are established, not by the number of witnesses, but by the character and qualifications of the witnesses.

The miracles of the Bible are confined almost exclusively to four periods, separated from each other by centuries; the time of 1. The redemption of God's people from Egypt and their establishment in Canaan under Moses and Joshua. 2. The life and death struggle of the true religion with heathenism under Elijah and Elisha. 3. The exile, when Jehovah afforded proof of his power and supremacy over the gods of the heathen, although his people were in captivity (Daniel and his companions). 4. The introduction of Christianity, when miracles attested the person of Christ and his doctrine. Outside of these periods miracles are rare indeed (Gen. v 24). They were almost totally unknown during the many centuries from the creation to the exodus.

The working of miracles in the apostolic age, although not confined to the apostles (Acts vi 8; viii 5-7), were the signs of an apostle (2 Cor. xii. 12; Heb. ii 4, cp. Acts ii. 43, Gal. iii. 5).

Mir'iam [obstinacy, rebellion]

1. Sister of Aaron and of Moses (Ex. xv. 20, Num. xxi 59). It was probably she who watched over the ark which contained the infant Moses (Ex. ii 4-8). After the passage of the Red Sea, she took a timbrel and led the Israelite women with timbrels and with dances, saying: "Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously, the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea" (xv. 20, 21). She was a prophetess (ibid.), and she and her brothers were chosen by God to be leaders of the Hebrew people (iv. 15, 29, 30; Mic. vi. 4); but she instigated Aaron, and they made Moses' marriage with a Cushite woman the occasion of murmuring against his superior position and influence. They claimed that God had spoken by them as well as by Moses. For this insubordination to the will of God, she was made a leper as white as snow, but owing to the intercession of Moses was speedily healed (Num. xii 1-16; Deut. xxiv 9). She died, and was buried in Kadesh (Num. xx 1).

2. A man of Judah, descended from Ezra (1 Chron. iv 17).

Mir'mah, in A. V. Mirma [deceit].

A Benjamite, son of Shaharaim by his wife Hodesh (1 Chron. viii 10).

Mir'ror

A polished surface intended to reflect objects, especially the face (Wisdom vii 26; 2 Cor. iii 18; Jas. i. 23). Ancient mirrors were made of molten brass or other alloy of copper (Ex. xxxviii 8; Job xxxviii 18), and were round, oval, and square, and often provided with a handle. If they acquired rust spots, they were polished anew (Ecclus. xii. 11). They lacked the perfection of the modern glass, and the image in them was less clear and true (1 Cor. xiii 12). As the material was metal, R. V. substitutes mirror for glass, the rendering of A. V. Opinion is divided as to whether mirrors or transparent garments are referred to in Is. iii 23.

Later, in the West, mirrors were sometimes made of tin. Praxiteles, in the time of Pompey, is said to have been the first to make them of silver. They were even made of gold.

Mis'gab [high place, the high fort]

An unidentified Moabite city (Jer. xlviii. 1).

Mish'a-el [who is God?]

1. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Uzziel (Ex. vi. 22, Lev. x. 4).

2. One of Daniel's three companions, called by the Babylonians Meshach (Dan. i. 6, 7, 11, 19; ii. 17; 1 Mac. ii 59).

3. One of those who stood by Ezra when he preached to the people (Neh. viii. 4).

Mi'shal, in A. V. once Misheal (Josh. xix. 26) [prayer]

A village of Asher (Josh. xix. 26), given with its suburbs to the Levites of the Gershonite family (xxi. 30). It is called in 1 Chron. vi. 74 Mashal. Not identified.

Mi'sham [swiftness].

A Benjamite, a son of Elpaal, who with his brothers built Ono and Lod (1 Chron. viii. 12).

Mi'she-al. See MISHAL.Mish'ma [hearing].

1. A tribe descended from Ishmael (Gen. xiv. 14; 1 Chron. i. 30). The name perhaps lingers either in Jebel Misma', midway between Damascus and Jauf, or in the other Jebel Misma', about 150 miles due east of Taima.

2. A descendant of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 25).

Mish-man'nah [fatness].

One of the Gadites who came to David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 10).

Mish'ra-ites.

A family which was connected with Kirjath-jearim (1 Chron. ii. 53).

Mis'par, in A. V. Mizpar; but the original edition of A. V. had the correct spelling, Mispar [a narrative, a number].

One of those who returned with Zerubabel from captivity (Ezra ii. 2). In Neh. vii. 7 the feminine form is used, Mispereth.

Mis-pe-reth. See MISPAR.

Mis-re-photh-ma'im [burnings or elevations at the waters].

A place to which Joshua pursued the kings defeated at the waters of Merom (Josh. xi. 8), on the frontier of the country of the Zidonians (xii. 6). It is now commonly, and probably correctly, identified with the ruins and the fountain el-Musheirifeh, 11 miles north of Acre, and $\frac{1}{2}$ mile from the sea, at the foot of Ras en-Nakurah.

Mite.

A small coin, worth about $\frac{1}{4}$ cent (Mark xii. 42). See MONEY.

Mi'ter.

The headdress or turban, called in Hebrew misnepheth, which was worn by the high priest. It was made of fine linen. Its distinguishing characteristic was a golden plate inscribed with the words Holiness to the Lord, and affixed in front by a blue-colored lace (Ex. xxviii. 4, 36-39; Lev. xvi. 4; Ezek. xxi. 26, in A. V. diadem), see HIGH PRIEST, and for Zech. iii. 5 see DIADEM.

Mith'kah, in A. V. Mithcah [sweetness].

An encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. xxxiii. 28, 29).

Mith'nite.

Probably an inhabitant of a town called Methen (1 Chron. xi. 43).

Mith're-dath [given by Mithra, the animating spirit of fire].

1. Treasurer under Cyrus, king of Persia, through whom the sacred vessels were restored to the Jews (Ezra i. 8).

2. One of those who in the reign of Artaxerxes Longimanus complained that the Jews were rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem (Ezra iv. 7).

Mit-y-le'ne.

A city between Assos and Chios visited by Paul (Acts xx. 13-15). It was the capital of the island of Lesbos in the Grecian Archipelago, and was noted for being the birth-place of the poet Alceus, the statesman Pittacus, and the poetess Sappho. It is still called Mitylen.

Mi'zar [smallness].

A hill on the eastern side of the Jordan, probably within sight of the peaks of Hermon (Ps. xlii. 6). Exact situation unknown.

Miz'pah and Mizpeh [watchtower].

1. The name given to the cairn north of the Jabbok, called Galeed or heap of witness, to indicate the special thing to which it bore witness, namely, that God is the watcher between the covenanting parties (Gen. xxxi. 44-49), see GALEED.

2. A town in Gilead, east of the Jordan (Judg. x. 17; xi. 11); probably identical with Mizpeh of Gilead (xi. 29) and with Ramath-mizpeh or height of Mizpeh (Josh. xii. 26), otherwise known as Ramoth in Gilead or Ramoth-gilead (Deut. iv. 43, 1 Kin. iv. 13) and Ramah (2 Kin. viii. 28, 29). It was situated in the territory of Gad, on the boundary (Josh. xii. 26), assigned to the Levites (xxi. 38), and appointed a city of refuge (Deut. iv. 43; Josh. xx. 8). Jephthah dwelt here (Judg. xi. 34), and it was the residence of the taxgatherer for one of the twelve districts into which Solomon divided the country (1 Kin. iv. 13). To gain and hold possession of it battles were fought between Israel and the Syrians (1 Kin. xxii. 3 seq.; 2 Kin. viii. 28). It was taken and burned by Judas Maccabeus (1 Mac. v. 35, in A. V. Maspha). According to Eusebius, it lay 15 Roman miles west of Philadelphia, on the Jabbok. It is commonly identified with es-Salt, about 10 miles east of the mouth of the Jabbok and the crossing of the Jordan at Damieh, but the ruined town of Jal'ud, about 6 miles north of es-Salt, has strong claim to be the site.

3. A place at the foot of mount Hermon (Josh. xi. 3), not identified. The land of Mizpah is probably the same as the valley of Mizpeh (8).

4. A village in or near the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv. 38), commonly identified with Tell es-Safi, $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles north-northwest of Beit Jibrin. Eusebius located it north of Eleutheropolis, that is, Beit Jibrin, in the direction of Jerusalem.

5. A town of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 26), not far from Ramah (25; 1 Kin. xv. 22) and over against Jerusalem (1 Mac. iii. 46, in A. V. Maspha). The tribes were summoned to it at times for conferences (1 Sam. vii. 5-17; x. 17; Judg. xx. 1-3; xxi. 1, 5, 8). It was fortified by Asa as a defense against the northern tribes (1 Kin. xv. 22; 2 Chron. xvi. 6). After the destruction of Jerusalem, the Babylonian governor fixed his residence here (2 Kin. xxv. 23-25; Jer. xl. 6-16; xli. 1-16). It was inhabited after the captivity (Neh. iii. 7, 15, 19). Robinson believed its site to have been either at Neby Samwil, which means prophet Samuel, or at Tell el-Fül, conspicuous eminences north of Jerusalem, but he decides in favor of the former. This identification has received cordial acceptance. The place is 2935 feet above the sea level, and about 4 miles north-northwest of Jerusalem, from which it is distinctly seen.

6 An unidentified place in Moab (1 Sam. xxii. 3).

Mis'peh. See MIZPAH.

Mis'ra-ilm [dual form of miṣrān, probably, defense, defended land].

Egypt, the dual form pointing to the two countries of Upper and Lower Egypt, settled by descendants of Ham (Gen. x. 6); see EGYPT.

Mis'zah [possibly, fear].

The chief of a tribe in the land of Edom, a descendant of Esau, and also of Ishmael (Gen. xxxvi. 3, 4, 13, 17, 1 Chron. i. 37).

Mna'son.

An early disciple from Cyprus, who accompanied Paul on his last journey from Caesarea to Jerusalem, and with whom the apostle was to lodge (Acts xxi. 16).

Mo'ab [scarcely, water of a father; probably, desire].

1. Son of Lot by an incestuous union with his elder daughter (Gen. xix. 37).

2 The descendants of Moab, Lot's son, closely related to the Ammonites (Gen. xix. 37, 38). They were conquered by Ramses II. (inscription on base of statue at Luxor). They had become numerous before the time that the Israelites crossed the Red Sea (Ex. xv. 15); had taken possession of the country from the plain of Heshbon unto the wady Kurah, which emerges at the southern end of the Dead Sea, and formed the boundary of Moab toward Edom; and with their kindred the Ammonites had absorbed and destroyed the remnants of the stalwart race which had previously occupied the country east of the Jordan (Deut. ii. 10, 11, 19-21; cp. Gen. xiv. 5). Shortly before the arrival of the Israelites, Sihon, king of the Amorites, had wrested from them the pasture land north of the Arnon, though the country was still remembered as the land of Moab, confining Moab for a time to the country south of the Arnon (Num. xxi. 13-15, 26-30). The Moabites showed a commercial friendliness to the migrating Israelites (Deut. ii. 28, 29), but refused them permission to pass through their land (Judg. xi. 17; cp. Deut. xxiii. 4). Because, doubtless, of the kinship between the Moabites and Israelites, Moses was forbidden to attack them (Deut. ii. 9; cp. 19). Nevertheless, the king of Moab, alarmed when the Israelites encamped in his vicinity, sent for Balaam to curse them (Num. xxii-xxiv; Josh. xxiv. 9). For this hostile attitude the Israelites were commanded to exclude them from the congregation to the tenth generation, and to maintain a coldness and indifference toward them forever (Deut. xxiii. 3-6; Neh. xiii. 1). The last encampment of the Israelites before they crossed the Jordan was at Shittim in the plains that lay within the old bounds of Moab (Num. xxii. 1-Josh. iii. 1). While they were there, Moabite and Midianite women seduced them to licentious idolatry (Num. xxv. Hos. ix. 10). Early in the time of the judges Eglon, king of Moab, invaded Canaan, established his seat of government at Jericho, and oppressed the Israelites of the adjacent hill country 18 years until he was assassinated by Ehud (Judg. iii. 12-30, 1 Sam. xii. 9). Elimelech sojourned in Moab, and thence came his two daughters-in-law, Ophrah and Ruth. Ruth married Boaz and became the ancestress of David (Ruth i. 22, iv. 3, 5, 10, 13-17, Mat. i. 5-16). Saul warred with the Moabites (1 Sam. xiv. 47), and David, when a fugitive from Saul, put his father and mother in charge of the king of Moab (xxii. 3, 4). After David became king, he overcame the Moabites, laid them under tribute, and doomed a large proportion of them to death (2 Sam. viii. 2, 12; 1 Chron. xviii. 2, 11). The Moabites were subject to Omri and his son but on the death of Ahab they rebelled, and neither of Omri's grandsons, Ahaziah, who was incapacitated for the attempt by a fall, nor Jehoram was able to subdue them (2 Kin. i. 1; iii. 4-27; Moabite Stone). Jehoshaphat was king of Judah at that time, and the Moabites formed a confederacy with the Ammonites, Edomites, and others for the invasion of Judah, but the allies turned their weapons against each other, and Judah did not need to strike a blow (2 Chron. xx. 1-30, cp. Ps. lx. 8, lxxxiii. 6; cviii. 9). The year that Elisha died, bands of Moabites invaded the kingdom of Israel (2 Kin. xiii. 20). They paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser and Senacherib, kings of Assyria. They entered Judah in the reign of Jehoiakim (2 Kin. xxiv. 2). Many of the towns north of the Arnon had reverted to Moab (cp. Is. xv.). The prophets denounced the Moabites often as types of the enemies of the kingdom of God (Is. xv.; xvi.; xxv. 10; Jer. ix. 26; xxv. 21; xxvii. 3; xlviii.; Ezek. xxv. 8-11; Amos ii. 1, 2, Zeph. ii. 8-11). Some of the Jews, who fled from Jerusalem when Nebuchadnezzar invaded Judah, took refuge in Moab, but returned when Gedaliah was appointed governor (Jer. xl. 11). Nebuchadnezzar subjugated the Moabites (Antiq. x. 9, 7). They disappear henceforth from history as a nation, though still existing as a race (Ezra ix. 1; Neh. xiii. 1, 23; Antiq. i. 11, 5). Alexander Jannæus placed them under tribute (Antiq. xiii. 13, 5).

3. The country occupied by the Moabites It was bounded on the west by the Dead Sea. It was separated from Edom on the south by the wady Kurahi, known in its upper course as the wady el-'Ahsy. This fact is learned from the towns which are mentioned as situated in Moabite territory. On the east lay the desert (Num. xxi. 11). The northern boundary which the Amorites and Israelites recognized was the Arnon (Num. xxi. 13; Deut. ii. 36; iii. 12; Josh. xii. 1; Judg. xi. 18), but the Moabites at an early date possessed (Num. xxi. 26), and always regarded as theirs and frequently occupied, a considerable district north of the river (Is. xv., Moabite Stone 8-30). Moab is chiefly a rolling plateau, about 3200 feet above the level of the sea, and is well adapted for pasturage. The western edge descends abruptly to the Dead Sea, and the face of the bluff is cut by deep valleys. The shore of the Dead Sea is comparatively fertile from the great abundance of springs.

The field of Moab was the territory of Moab (Gen. xxxvi. 35; Num. xxi. 20, R. V.). The plains of Moab were those parts of the Arabah or level valley of the Jordan which at one time were included within the bounds of Moab. They lay on the east of the river, opposite Jericho, and along the eastern shore of the Dead Sea (Num. xxii. 1; xxxiii. 48, 49).

Mo'ab-ite Stone.

An inscribed stone found within the territory of Moab, and recording Moabite history. On the 19th of August, 1868, the Rev. F. Klein, a German in the employ of the Church Missionary Society, was encamped at Dhibān, the ruins of the ancient Moabite town of Dibon, when he was informed by a sheik that within ten minutes' walk from his tent there lay an inscribed stone. Proceeding to the spot, he found lying on its back a slab of black basalt, three feet ten inches high, two feet broad, and a foot and two and a half inches thick, rounded at the top and the bottom to nearly a semicircle. The inscription consisted of thirty-four lines of writing in an unknown character, running across the stone, about an inch and a quarter apart. He at once set on foot negotiations for its transfer to the Berlin Museum. Unhappily, M. Clermont-Ganneau, of the French Consulate, also attempted to obtain it for the Paris Museum. This ran it up to a nearly prohibitory price. Then the Arabs fell to fighting over the expected money. The dispute settled nothing, so kindling a fire under the stone, and pouring water on it when it was hot, they broke it into fragments, which they distributed among the several granaries, to act as blessings to the grain. Prior to the destruction, a messenger from M. Clermont-Ganneau had obtained a squeeze of the inscription, but having to escape precipitately on horseback and crumpling up the paper while it was still wet, it broke into seven pieces, and was not of much use. Better squeezes of the two larger portions of the broken stone were afterwards obtained by a messenger from Sir Charles Warren and by another from M. Clermont-Ganneau, and finally a number of fragments of the stone itself reached Jerusalem, and are now some in Paris and others in London. With the aid of the squeezes the pieces were put together. It was found that of about 1100 letters, 669 in all, or less than two-thirds, had been recovered, and that the language was akin to Hebrew. The inscription is as follows:

To judge from Mesha's own words, the stele was a memorial commemorative not merely of his recovery of independence for Moab from Israel, but of his glorious and successful reign as a whole (l. 4, 31), erected late in his reign, after the death of Ahab, after the humiliation of that house also, and not improbably after the extinction of the line of Omri by Jehu, and the entrance of Israel into its period of dire distress (l. 7).

The Hebrew records date the revolt of Moab after the death of Ahab (2 Kin. i. 1; iii. 5) a date which conflicts with a usual understanding of the inscription, to the effect that the revolt occurred in the middle of Ahab's reign. But the statements of the stone may be readily interpreted in harmony with the Hebrew account, and that in one of two ways:

1. The two accounts may be combined. The capture of the frontier town of Medeba was effected by Mesha about the middle of Ahab's reign (l. 8); but the Moabite king did not attempt actually to throw off the Israelitish yoke until after Ahab's death.

2 Or, better, in accordance with the well-known custom of the times, whereby the royal descendants of Omri, as of other founders of dynasties, were designated simply as his sons; in view of the ascription of round forty years to the occupation of Medeba by the Israelites; in view of Moabite grammar, whereby the collocation beth nun he in line 8 may be properly rendered his sons; and in view of the probability which arises from Mesha's own words that he was acquainted with the final overthrow of Omri's sons; lines 7 and 8 of the inscription may be translated: "Now Omri had taken possession of all the land of Medeba, and [Israel] dwelt therein during his days and half the days of his sons, forty years" This is the same story as told by the Hebrew writers The revolt of Moab did actually occur midway in the reign of Omri's sons, as it were dividing their reign in twain, and lending in Moabitish eyes an aspect to the latter half of their rule far different from the former. See OMRI and MESHA.

Mo-a-di'ah [perhaps, host of Jehovah]

A father's house among the priests in the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. xii. 17); see MAADIAH.

Mo'din [informers or prognosticators, prognostication (cp Is. xlvii 13)].

The native town of the Maccabees (1 Mac ii 1), with the family tomb where Matathias and two of his sons, Judas and Jonathan, were buried (ii 70: ix 19; xiii. 25). It stood on the edge of the plain of Philistia (xvi. 4, 5), and the tomb was visible from the sea (xiii 29). The town was still in existence in the time of Eusebius and Jerome, in the vicinity of Diospolis, that is Lydda. The Talmud states its distance from Jerusalem at 15 Roman miles The site is disputed. Hitzig located it at el-Burj, 2½ miles south of Midieh; and Robinson, following mediæval pilgrims, at Latrun. The more recent suggestion of Forner has been favorably received, that the site is Midieh, hard by the road to Jerusalem via Beth-horon, about 6 miles from Lydda and 18 from Jerusalem. One half mile north of the ruined village of Midieh, and about the same distance west of the modern village rises a hill, from the summit of which vessels on the sea are visible and where the foundations of a stately tomb have been found.

Mol'a-dah [birth, origin].

A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 26), assigned to the Simeonites (xix. 2; 1 Chron iv 28). It was inhabited after the captivity (Neh. xi. 26). It is doubtless the town known in the Greek period as Malatha, in Idumæa, to which Herod Agrippa I., during the earlier and less prosperous period of his life, retired in debt and in depression of spirits (Antiq. xviii 6, 2). The Onomasticon locates Malatha 4 Roman miles from Arad and on the road from Hebron to Aila, that is Elath. Robinson is commonly followed in his identification of it with Milh, on the Roman road $7\frac{1}{2}$ miles southwest of Arad, where there are vestiges of an extensive town with important wells. It is about 14 miles east by south from Beersheba, and 22 south by west from Hebron.

Mole.

1. The rendering of the Hebrew Tinshe-meth (Lev. xi 30, A V.) See CHAMELEON.

2 The rendering of the Hebrew words H^{phor} peroth, digging of holes or digging of rats (Is ii. 20). The two words are better regarded as one, H^{pharparoth}, diggers. These may be rats or moles. It is believed that no species of Talpa, the genus to which the common mole (T europæa) belongs, exists in Palestine, its place being taken by the mole rat (Spalax typhlus), which is probably the animal intended by Isaiah. This animal is very common in the Holy Land, living underground in small societies. It resembles the mole in appearance, but is not of the same order, being a rodent feeding on vegetables, chiefly bulbs, whereas the mole is insectivorous. It is larger than the mole, being eight or more inches long. It is silvery gray in color, is tailless, and has only minute or rudimentary eyes.

Mo'lech, in A V. twice Moloch, a spelling introduced into the English version through the Greek text of Amos v. 26 and its quotation by Stephen in Acts vii. 43. The Hebrew text and R V. have "your king" in place of Moloch [reigning one, king].

A deity worshiped by the children of Ammon (1 Kin xi 7). The article is prefixed to his name where it occurs in the Hebrew, indicating that the word is not a proper name, but an appellative preserving its meaning of reigning one. He was known also as Milcom (1 Kin xi. 5, 33) and Malcam (Jer. xlix 1, 3, R V.; Zeph. i. 5; and R V margin 2 Sam. xii. 30; 1 Chron. xx. 2), proper names formed by the familiar terminations om and am. He was an aspect of Baal (Jer. xxxii. 35), whose name is a common noun likewise and signifies lord. Baal was worshiped with human sacrifices at Tyre under the name of Melcart, king of the city; and an exceedingly detestable feature of Molech's worship was the burning of children to him in the fire. The practice was in vogue early; and when the Israelites were at Sinai and expected soon to be neighbors of the Ammonites, the law was enacted that if any man made or permitted his children to "pass through the fire to Molech" he was to be put to death (Lev xviii 21; xx. 1-5). Nevertheless Solomon in his old age erected an altar to Milcom, being led into this idolatry by the Ammonite wives whom he loved; and in the following centuries children were burnt to Molech in the valley of Hinnom at the high place of Topheth (Ps cvi 38; Jer. vii 31: xix. 4, 5; Ezek. xvi. 21; xxiii 37, 39; cp. Is. xxx. 33). Ahaz burnt children of his there (2 Chron. xxviii 3), and Manasseh made at least one of his sons to pass through the fire (2 Kin xxi 6). The northern Israelites were also guilty of this hideous rite (2 Kin xvii 17; Ezek xxiii 37). Josiah destroyed the altars which Solomon built on the mount of Corruption to this false divinity and other heathen gods, and defiled the high place of Topheth (2 Kin. xxiii 10, 13).

Mol'ten Sea or Bra'zen Sea

A great basin made by Solomon of brass which David had taken as booty (1 Chron xviii. 8). It stood in the inner court of the temple between the altar of burnt offering and the sanctuary, somewhat toward the south; and was intended for the priests to wash their hands and feet in before entering the sanctuary or approaching the altar (1 Kin vii 39; 2 Chron. iv 6; Antiq viii 3, 6, cp. Ex xxx. 18-21). It was round, 10 cubits in diameter and 5 in height, and held 2000 baths (1 Kin vii 23, 26, in 2 Chron iv 5 incorrectly 3000). The brim curved outward like a cup, and the sides were ornamented with two rows of knobs underneath the brim (1 Kin vii 24, 26). It was not an exact hemisphere, but its sides bulged out like a tulip, as appears from the statement of its capacity and from the comparison of it to a lily. It stood upon twelve brazen oxen, in four groups of three each, facing the four quarters. Ahaz took it down from the oxen (2 Kin xvi. 17); and finally, when Nebuchadnezzar captured Jerusalem, he broke the basin in pieces (xxv. 13, 16; Jer. xxvii. 19-22).

Mon'ey.

Money was early coined by the Greeks and the peoples of Asia Minor within the sphere of Greek influence. Staters, made of an alloy of gold with silver called electrum, were struck in Lydia in Asia Minor and silver coins at Ægina as early as 700 to 650 B. C. In the rest of western Asia and in Egypt people were content to use gold and silver in bars, rings, and other forms, probably stamped with the value, but not issued by authority (Josh vii. 21; and cp. name of talent, kikkar, circle). In business transactions reliance was not placed on the stamp, but the quantity was determined by weighing (Gen. xliii. 16; xliii. 21); cp. WEIGHTS. Counting was rarely resorted to (2 Kin. xii. 11), and then only to form a general estimate. Shekel in the early period does not mean a coin bearing an authoritative stamp, but a certain weight (shekel) of silver. The weights formed a series in the denomination of talent, maneh, shekel, gerah, and beka or half shekel; see WEIGHTS. Darius Hystaspis, 521-486 B. C., is credited with the introduction of coinage into Persia (Herod iv 166), whereby the Jews became acquainted with coins. The ordinary daric (Ezra ii 69; in A. V. dram) was a thick gold coin, showing on one side the king, kneeling and holding a bow and a javelin. On the reverse was an irregular square, doubtless the mark of the punch with which the lump of metal was driven into the die. It was worth about five dollars; see DARIC. After the fall of the Persian empire, the Greek system came into vogue in Palestine, and money was reckoned by talents and drachmas (1 Mac. xi. 28; 2 Mac. iv 19).

Silver Half Shekel of Year 1.

In the year 141-140 B. C., Simon Maccabæus obtained the right to coin money for his nation with his own stamp (1 Mac. xv 6), and issued silver shekels and half shekels and perhaps copper half, quarter, and sixth shekels. The silver coins show a vase on the obverse with the date above and the legend "shekel (or half shekel) of Israel;" and on the reverse a branch bearing flowers encircled by the words "Jerusalem the holy." The small copper coin of John Hyrcanus, which is represented in the accompanying cut, bears on the obverse within a wreath of olive the inscription, "Jehohanan the high priest, head and friend of the Jews." The reverse has a Greek symbol, the united cornucopias, between which is a pomegranate. Herod the Great and his successors down to Herod Agrippa II issued copper coins, but only with Greek legends.

Copper Coin of Herod Antipas, Tetrarch of Galilee.

The money of the Greeks, however, continued to circulate along with the Jewish coinage. The coins consisted of drachmas and tetradrachmas. The silver drachma (Luke xv 8, R. V. margin) in the time of the Herods and the procurators was equivalent to the Roman denarius and worth about 16 cents, the silver stater or tetradrachma (Mat xvii 27, margin), struck by the Greek cities of Syria and Phœnicia, was worth about 66 cents, but soon afterwards became much debased. The lepton was a small copper coin (Luke xii. 59; xxi 2, rendered mite), not the lepton of the Greek system, but the smallest copper coin in circulation, worth about $\frac{1}{4}$ cent and equal to half the quadrans (Mark xii. 42). The name denotes small. It was a Jewish coin, for only Jewish money was allowed to be offered in the temple; and it was probably a copper coin issued by John Hyrcanus or other Maccabæan prince. The didrachma, which corresponded to the half shekel (Mat xvii. 24, margin), was probably not in circulation or but little used in Palestine. The talent employed in Palestine (1 Mac. xi 28; Mat xviii. 24) was the Attic talent, which Alexander had made the lawful standard throughout his empire and which afterwards maintained its supremacy. It was not a coin, but money of account; was divided into minas (1 Mac. xiv 24; Luke xix. 13-25, rendered pound); and it consisted of 60 minas or 6000 drachmas. It suffered great depreciation, the drachma falling off from about 67.5 grains to about 55 grains or 16 cents under the early Cæsars.

With the advent of the Romans in Palestine, the money of the Romans had also come into circulation. The denarius (Mat. xviii 28; rendered penny) was a silver coin. In the time of the empire its obverse almost invariably bore the head of the reigning sovereign or of some member of the imperial family. From the time of Augustus to that of Nero, its standard weight was 60 grains, equivalent to about 17 cents. It was the tribute money payable by the Jews to the imperial treasury (Mat. xxii. 19). The assarion (x. 29; Luke xii. 6, rendered farthing), the Greek name of the Roman as, was a small copper coin, the value of which was reduced in 217 B. C. to $\frac{1}{16}$ of a denarius or to about 1 cent. The quadrans (Mat. v. 26; Mark xii. 42; rendered farthing) was the fourth part of an as, or $\frac{1}{4}$ cent. The procurators of Judæa were also accustomed to coin money. They issued copper pieces in the name of the imperial family and with the legend in Greek letters. The coin which is represented in the accompanying cut bears the name of Tiberius Claudius Caesar Germanicus written in Greek on the margin, and in the center two palm branches laid crosswise with the date, "year 14," between them. The reverse contains the name of the emperor's wife, Julia Agrippina. It was struck in A. D. 54, during the procuratorship of Felix.

The gold coin which was current in Palestine during the N. T. period was the Roman denarius aureus, generally termed simply aureus (Antiq. xiv. 8, 5, rendered pieces of gold), which passed for 25 silver denarii.

by Eleazar, the priest, and Simon, the prince, during the first revolt, A. D. 66-70. Silver shekels and quarter shekels and copper coins with various devices and old Hebrew inscriptions were issued. The shekel of Simon, of which a copy is here given, shows on the obverse a palm tree and the legend "Simon, prince of Israel," and on the reverse a vine and "Year one of the redemption of Israel." On the suppression of this revolt and the capture of Jerusalem, coins were struck in Rome with the image and name of the emperor Vespasian on the obverse, and a female copper coins after the fall of Jerusalem. The one depicted dates from the reign of Titus. It bears the head of the emperor, his name and titles, on the obverse; and on the reverse a winged victory holding a wreath and a palm branch, and the date, "year 26 of king Agrippa." During the second revolt, which was headed by Bar-cocheba, A. D. 132-135, shekels and quarter shekels of silver and also of copper, with old Hebrew inscriptions, were again coined. The shekel shows a tetrastyle temple on the obverse, probably a conventional representation of the beautiful gate of the temple at Jerusalem. At the sides of it appears the word Simon, perhaps the personal name of the leader of the revolt; while above it a star is introduced, doubtless in allusion to the surname of the leader, Bar-cocheba, son of a star. To obtain quarter shekels the Roman denarius was re-struck, which at this time so nearly equalled the quarter shekel in value that it could be substituted for it without inconvenience.

Mon'ey Chan-gers.

When a census was taken every Israelite, whether rich or poor, who had reached the age of twenty years, was required to pay half a shekel into the treasury of the Lord as an offering to make atonement (Ex. xxx. 13-15). Later it was customary, according to Mamonides, to pay this poll tax annually. Besides this tax, pious Israelites made free-will offerings, which they cast into chests placed in the court of the women (Mark xii. 41). This money must be in native coin; and as several currencies circulated in Palestine in the time of Christ, and as multitudes of Jews from foreign lands visited Jerusalem at the passover, bringing the coin of their country with them, need arose of facilities for exchanging foreign for native money. The business of the money changer sprang up. They had stalls in the city; and as the feast approached they were admitted to the precincts of the temple and placed their tables in the court of the gentiles. The premium paid for half a shekel was, according to the Talmud, a kollubos, equal to twelve grains of silver and worth about three cents. From this premium the money changer was called a kollubistēs (Mat. xxi. 12), and from the table at which he sat a trapezitēs (Mat. xxv. 27). On two different occasions Jesus overturned the tables of the money changers and drove the cattle dealers from the court, because their presence and too often their dishonesty and avarice were incompatible with the sanctity of the place and with the quiet which is necessary for worship (John ii. 14-16; Mat. xxi. 12, 13).

Month.

In Egypt the Israelites were acquainted with a year of twelve months of thirty days each, with five additional days to produce conformity with the solar year of 365 days (Herod. ii. 4), and in the account of the flood the months are reckoned at thirty days each (Gen. vii. 11, 24; viii. 3, 4). Afterwards, however, the Hebrews appear to have used a lunar month. This may be gathered (1) from the two words for month which denote respectively new moon and lunation and indicate the original measurement; (2) from passages like Gen. i. 14; Ps. civ. 19; Eccles. xliii 6-8; (3) from the observance of the day of the new moon by special offerings to Jehovah (Num. x. 10; xxviii. 11-14; 2 Chron. ii. 4); and (4) from the coincidence between the passover, which was always celebrated on the evening of the fourteenth day of the month, and the full moon (Ps. lxxxi. 3-5); see further Antiq. in 10, 3 and 5; iv. 4, 6, and article YEAR. A lunation requires a little more than twenty-nine days and a half. The months would accordingly average twenty-nine and thirty days alternately. When, however, a month is spoken of generally, thirty days are meant (cp. Num. xx. 29; Deut. xxxiv. 8 with xxi. 13). The months were commonly distinguished by number. The names of only four Hebrew months are found in Bible narratives relating to the period before the captivity. They are the first month, Abib (Ex. xiii. 4, etc.); the second month, Zif (1 Kin. vi 37); the seventh, Ethanim (viii. 2); and the eighth, Bul (vi. 38). After the captivity the names in common use among the Babylonians and other Semites were employed. See YEAR.

Moon.

The principal luminary of the night (Gen. i 16; Ps. cxxxvi 9), relied upon to measure time, marking off moons or months, and regulating the day of the passover, and thus aiding in regulating the feasts of the year (Gen. i. 14; Ps. civ. 19; Eccles. xliii 6, 7; Antiq. iii 10, 5). Almost all the nations with which the ancient Hebrews came into contact worshiped the moon. Ur of the Chaldees, from which Abraham emigrated, and Haran, where he settled for a time and where Jacob dwelt for twenty years, were noted seats of the moon's worship. When Abraham removed to Canaan, he had neighbors who worshiped the moon (cp. with caution ASHTORETH and SINAI). The Egyptians sacrificed the pig to the moon, when the disk was at its full (Herod. ii 47). In the time of the Assyrian and Babylonian invasions of Palestine, the Hebrews came again into contact with people who regarded the moon as one of the great gods. At this time the worship of the moon and other heavenly bodies made serious inroads on the religion of Jehovah (2 Kin. xxi. 3; xxiii 4, 5; Jer. vii. 18; viii. 2). The moon was adored by a kiss of the hand (Job xxxi 26, 27), with the burning of incense (2 Kin. xxiii. 5). In heathen temples the moon was often represented by the crescent as a symbol and by an image in the form of a human being. This heathenism had its check in the sublime doctrine of Jehovah. The sun and moon were made by the God of Israel, were created for the useful purpose of giving light, and were serviceable to man in affording a convenient measurement of time.

Different from the worship of the moon was the childish conception that the varying appearance of the moon from night to night at its rising, during its course across the sky, and at its setting, which are due to atmospheric and astronomic conditions, presaged political occurrences. The aspect of the moon may indicate weather probabilities; but the folly of basing predictions of national events on such phenomena was pointed out by the prophets (Is. xlvii. 13). The Hebrews seem to have shared in the widespread belief, apparently justified by the statements of travelers in equatorial regions, that the moon may affect the health and under circumstances produce evil consequences to muscles and nerves. But the child of God can safely intrust himself to the watchful care of Jehovah (Ps. cxxi. 6).

As the months were lunar, the new moon marked the beginning of the month; and the day of the new moon, being the commencement of a natural division of time, was observed as a holy day. No set convocation seems to have been prescribed; but additional sacrifices were offered (Num. xxviii. 11-14), trumpets were blown (Num. x. 10; Ps. lxxx. 3), ordinary labor was suspended (Amos viii. 5), and the day offered favorable opportunity for religious instruction (2 Kin. iv. 23; Ezek. xli. 1, 3). It was kept with joy and feasting (1 Sam. xx. 5; Judith vii. 6). The new moon of the seventh month marked the beginning of the seventh recurrence of a fixed portion of time, and consequently fell under the Sabbath law, and was observed as such in addition to the usual worship on the day of the new moon (Lev. xxiii. 24, 25; Num. xxix. 1-6). After the exile this celebration assumed the character of a new year's festival.

The advent of the new moon was calculated at an early period (1 Sam. xx. 5, 18). The Babylonian astrologers watched for it on the evening when it was expected to be seen, in order to take note of its appearance. According to the Talmud, the sanhedrin assembled seven times a year early in the morning of the thirtieth day of the month. Watchmen were stationed on the heights about Jerusalem to watch for the new moon and report it as soon as seen. When the evidence of its appearance was deemed sufficient, the sanhedrin pronounced the word M'kuddash, it is consecrated, and the day became the first of the new month, leaving twenty-nine days for the preceding month. If fogs or clouds prevented the moon from being discerned, the day was reckoned as the thirtieth and the new month began on the morrow. The announcement of the new moon was made to the country at large by lighting a beacon fire on the mount of Olives, which was repeated by similar signals from other mountain tops. The Samaritans are said to have thwarted this plan by kindling fires prematurely. In consequence the signals were discontinued, and the announcement of the new moon was made by messengers.

Moph. See MEMPHIS.

Mo'ra-sh-tite, in A. V. Morashtite.

A native or inhabitant of Moresheth, as was the prophet Micah (i. 1; Jer. xxvi. 18); see MORESHETH-GATH.

Mor'de-cai [perhaps, Persian, signifying little man, or the common Babylonian name, a diminutive or hypocoristic form of Mero-dach (see ESTHER)]

1. A Benjamite, son or descendant of Jair, son of Shimei, son of Kish (Esth. ii. 5). The relative clause which as verse 6 follows this genealogy may refer to the last name of the series (cp. 2 Chron. xxii. 9), and state that Kish, a Benjamite, was carried into exile with king Jeconiah in 598 B. C.; or the clause may relate to an earlier name in the list, for example, to Jair (cp. Gen. xxiv. 47), in which case Mordecai was a descendant of Jair, a Benjamite, who was carried away to Babylonia with Jeconiah. He brought up Hadassah or Esther, his uncle's daughter, adopting her as his own after her father and mother had died. She acted under his direction in the series of events which ended by making her queen of Persia as wife of Ahasuerus (Esth. ii. 7-20). This king was Xerxes, who reigned from 486 to 466 B. C. Through Esther Mordecai informed the king of a plot against his life, and the two conspirators were executed (21-23). When Haman was the king's favorite, Mordecai declined to prostrate himself before him, refusing to pay the customary civility because of Haman's unprincipled character or perhaps because Haman was an Agagite. The insulted dignity determined to wreak vengeance not on Mordecai alone, but on the entire Jewish people, and the king granted him leave (iii. 5-11). One night Ahasuerus could not sleep, and to relieve the tedium of his waking hours, he desired that the book recording the chronicles of the kingdom should be read to him by his attendants. The conspiracy came up in the part read, and the king remembered that he had done nothing for his deliverer. When morning dawned he requested Haman, who had come to ask permission to hang Mordecai, to take that faithful subject, array him in royal apparel, and conduct him through the streets of the city (Susa) mounted on a horse belonging to the sovereign, and to proclaim before him as he went along: "Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king delighteth to honor." This was the commencement of Haman's fall, and of a series of events which resulted in the death of Haman and his sons, and the promotion of Mordecai to be the second man in the empire (Esth. vi.-x). Some interpreters would identify Mordecai with the eunuch Matacas or Natacas, who, according to Ctesias, was the chief favorite of Xerxes.

2. A Jew who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7).

Mo'reh [archer, or the first rain, or teacher].

1. A terebinth or oak tree and grove near Shechem (Gen. xii. 6; Deut. xi. 29, 30), which most probably took its name from an archer or teacher who at one time or other dwelt there. Abraham encamped by it when he arrived in Canaan from Mesopotamia, and erected an altar there to Jehovah who appeared unto him. It was probably the tree under which Jacob buried the amulets and idols that his family had brought with them from Haran, and where Joshua erected a stone to commemorate the covenant which the people renewed there, and whither the men of Shechem went to make Abimelech king (Gen. xxxv. 4; Josh. xxiv. 26, though slightly different words are used for terebinth in these two passages from that employed in Gen. xii. 6; Judg. ix. 6). The identity of the tree with the oak or terebinth of the augurs near Shechem is not so obvious (Judg. ix. 37).

2. A hill in the valley of Jezreel to the north of the spring of Harod (Judg. vii. 1). Not positively identified. Jebel Duhy, or Little Hermon, about 8 miles northwest of mount Gilboa and 1 mile south of Nain, has been suggested.

Mor'esh-eth-gath [possession of Gath or of a wine press].

A town mentioned in connection with places in Judah, and therefore evidently situated in the same region (Micah i. 14). Jerome located it in the vicinity of Eleutheropolis. Gath in the name is generally supposed to denote the Philistine city and to indicate that Moresbeth was near it. Perhaps the town was the home of the prophet Micah (i. 1).

Mo-ri'ah [the meaning is unknown. The definite article prefixed to the word shows that it is not a proper name and that it does not contain the divine name Jehovah; and the orthography further shows that the word does not mean "appearance or provision of Jehovah"].

1. A district of country, on one of whose hills Abraham prepared to sacrifice Isaac; probably the region lying round about the hill of the same name on which the temple was afterwards built, and taking its name from that hill or from some circumstance common to both it and the hill (Gen. xxi. 2; Antiq. i. 13, 1 and 2). The Samaritans, and after them a few modern scholars like Bleek, Tuch, Stanley, identify Moreh near Shechem with Moriah (see Samaritan text) and Gerizim with the scene of Abraham's sacrifice. The Samaritan identification doubtless rests on the fact that Abraham did build an altar at Moreh (Gen. xii. 6, 7), and the identification was encouraged by the desire to enhance the religious glory of their country. But the etymology of Moreh and Moriah is different.

2. The hill on which was the threshing floor of Ornan the Jebusite. David purchased the floor and erected an altar on it, and Solomon made it the site of the temple (2 Sam. xxiv. 18 seq.; 2 Chron. iii. 1). The original hill has been much altered artificially and part of its slopes are hidden beneath accumulated rubbish and embankments, but its general contour has been determined. Mount Moriah stood between the Kidron and Tyropeon valleys, and lifted its summit directly opposite the mouth of that ravine which forms the western branch of the latter valley. On the north a slight depression separated it from the narrow neck of land which connected it with the main plateau. It is difficult to state exact dimensions; to call its original area 600 feet from north to south by 300 from east to west may be not far from the truth. Its highest point is now, according to Warren, 2448 feet above the ocean. Other platforms are 2430 and 2420 feet, from which the east and west slopes very rapidly fall.

Mor'tar I.

A vessel in which grain and spices are pounded with a pestle (Num. xi. 8; Prov. xxvii. 22). The Arabs of the present day use stone mortars in which to pound wheat for making kubby, their national food, and the sound of braying the grain with the pestle may be heard at all hours in the towns.

Mor'tar II.

A substance used to bind bricks or stones together in a wall. Various materials were used. 1. Mud or clay without lime (Nah. iii. 14), frequently employed by peasants in Palestine. 2. Mortar properly so called, consisting of sand and lime mixed with water, which was employed in building the better class of houses (cp. Ezek. xiii. 10). Palestine is a limestone country, and lime is easily obtained (Is. xxxiii. 12). 3. Bitumen in regions like Babylonia where clay and lime are scarce (Gen. xi. 3, R. V. margin). The walls of houses were (Lev. xiv. 42) and still are daubed or plastered with mud or mortar, often mixed with straw and pebbles, to protect them against the weather. The mortar used for this purpose in Egypt consists of one half clay, one quarter lime, and the rest ashes and straw.

Mo-se'rah, in A. V. Mosera [bond, fetter].

An encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness near Bene-jaakan (Deut. x. 6). In Num. xxxiii. 30, the plural form Moseroth is used as the name of the place. The site is unknown; but it was near mount Hor, by the border of Edom (Num. xx. 23; xxxiii. 37; with Deut. x. 6), in the country of the Horites (cp. Gen. xxxvi. 20, 27 with 1 Chron. i. 42). Jebel Madara sounds much like Mosera; but is not the exact equivalent, if the Arabic spelling has been correctly reported by travelers. See HOR.

Mo-se'roth. See preceding article.

Mo'ses [from the Egyptian mes or mesu, extraction, a son].

The great Hebrew leader and legislator. He was a Levite, family of Kohath, house of Amram (Ex. vi. 18, 20). Jochebed is called the mother of Moses (ver. 20); but this expression is doubtless to be understood in the sense of ancestress, Amram and Jochebed being founders of the tribal house into which Moses was born; see EGYPT. The edict requiring the Hebrew male children to be cast into the Nile brought Moses into imminent peril of his life. But his mother saw that he was a goodly child, or, as Stephen words it, exceeding fair (Acts vii. 20); and she hid him three months in her house. When she could hide him no longer, she placed him within an ark of bulrushes, which had been daubed with bitumen and pitch to render it water-tight; put it among the flags on the river's bank; and posted Miriam, then a young girl, to watch the result. By and by Pharaoh's daughter, attended by her maidens, came to the river to bathe. Her name was Thermuthis, according to Josephus (Antiq. ii 9, 5). Eusebius calls her Merris, which sounds like Meri, one of the younger daughters of Ramses II. The rabbins identify her with Bithiah (1 Chron. iv. 18). She espied the ark, and had it opened. She saw by the features and color of the infant that he was a Hebrew. He wept and she was touched with pity. At this critical moment Miriam stepped forward, and with admirable tact asked: "Shall I go and call thee a nurse of the Hebrew women, that she may nurse the child for thee?" The princess bade her go, and the child's mother was called and the infant committed to her care. When he was weaned he was taken to Pharaoh's daughter, who adopted him and called him Moses. The name was doubly fitting, the child having been drawn from the water and being adopted as a son (Ex. ii. 1-10). The adopted son of a princess required a princely education, and Moses became instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians (Acts vii. 22), who were then unsurpassed in civilization by any people in the world. This was designed to fit him for high office under the government, if not even for the Egyptian throne. But in God's intention it was to prepare him for the leadership of the Hebrews. He was possessed of great natural ability, and the training which he received schooled him for the great work for which he was destined. He became familiar with court life and intercourse with princes, with the grandeur and pomp of religious worship and with ritualistic conventionalities and symbolism, with letters and the literary ideas of the time. He witnessed the administration of justice, and he acquired a general acquaintance with the arts which were practiced in civilized life. He remembered, however, his origin, believed the promises which had been made to the Hebrew people, and before the close of his sojourn in Egypt he had discovered the call of God to him to be the judge and the deliverer of the Israelites. Going out to observe the state of his countrymen, he saw one of them struck by an Egyptian. Moses killed the oppressor, and hid his body in the sand. Another day he tried to reconcile two Hebrews who were striving together, on which the one who was in the wrong insolently asked: "Who made thee a prince and a judge over us? intendest thou to kill me, as thou killedst the Egyptian?" Moses was alarmed to find that his deed of the previous day had become known, and on learning that it had reached the ears of Pharaoh, who said that he would kill him for it, fled from Egypt to the land of Midian. He had refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, had cast in his lot with the people of God, and had assumed the position of deliverer and judge (Ex. ii. 11-15; Acts vii. 24-28; Heb. xi 24, 25). He was now forty years old (Acts vii. 23). On arriving in Midian, Moses aided the daughters of Jethro to water their flocks. This act introduced him to Jethro, who was a priest. Jethro showed him hospitality, furnished him with employment, and gave him one of his daughters to wife. She bore Moses two sons, Gershom and Eliezer (Ex. ii. 22; iv. 20; xviii 3, 4). He remained in Midian forty years (Acts vii. 30), intimately associated with a people who were descended from Abraham and perhaps worshipped the God of Abraham (cp Ex. xviii 10-12). This period was likewise a time of preparation. He enjoyed close fellowship with a leading man of the Midianites, a man of sound judgment (Ex. xviii) and a priest. Here Moses widened his acquaintance with religious thought and forms of worship. He learned the roads of the wilderness, its resources, climate, and mode of life of its inhabitants. Amid its solemn grandeur and in its deep solitude he had opportunity for reflection. At the close of this period he was astonished to see a bush burning and yet remaining unconsumed. As he turned aside to look more narrowly at a sight so unique, he received an authenticated call from Jehovah, and the objections were overcome which he raised on the ground of insufficiency for the work (Ex. iii 11), inability to tell the people in what character God would manifest himself for their deliverance (13), lack of credentials to secure the recognition of the people (iv 1), and lack of eloquence to persuade (10). These difficulties were removed; and Moses acquiesced, but unwillingly. God was displeased, and promised that Aaron should help Moses (14). Moses took his wife Zipporah and his sons to return to Egypt (20). Two sons had been born to him. One of them, doubtless the younger, he had not circumcised, because Zipporah regarded the rite as bloody. In yielding to her in this matter Moses had shown himself unfaithful in his own household and unfit for his high commission. God was displeased with this neglect of the sign of the covenant; and now, as Moses was returning to Egypt with his family, God brought him nigh unto death at the inn. But Zipporah discerned the cause and, desirous of saving her husband's life, at once took a knife and performed the operation, saying, "A bridegroom of blood art thou to me" (Ex. iv. 24-26). Arriving in Egypt, Moses repeatedly, in conjunction with Aaron, conveyed to Pharaoh the divine commands, the rejection of which brought on the obstinate king and his people the succession of judgments known as the ten plagues (v.-xiii. 16). When the departure from Egypt took place, it was Moses who, under divine guidance, led the people. At Sinai he was admitted to intimate relations with God. God allowed all the people to hear his voice in articulate words; but he permitted Moses to see him manifested and he spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend (Ex. xxiv. 9-11; xxxiii 11, 17-23; xxxiv 5-29), and he revealed his will to Moses from time to time for the instruction of his people, as he did afterwards to the successive prophets. In communion with God Moses obtained the statutes based on the ten commandments (see THEOCRACY). Immediately afterwards, during a sojourn of forty days on the mount, he was made acquainted with the form, dimensions, and materials of the tabernacle and its furniture (see TABERNACLE), and received from God the two tables of stone; but on finding that in his absence the people had taken to worshipping a golden calf, he dashed the tablets to the ground as he neared the camp and broke them in his righteous indignation and in token of the fact that the covenant, of which they were the fundamental law, had been annulled by the sin of the people. He then inflicted punishment upon the people; and all who had not held aloof from the place of idolatrous worship, or had not retired when reminded of their sin by the act of Moses, in their obstinacy were exposed to death at the hands of the Levites who offered themselves as executioners. Having acted symbolically and judicially, Moses now acted mediocrally and interceded for the people, and God promised that his angel should accompany the host. Moses was again called into the mountain, and the portions of the covenant respecting the service of God, which had been grossly violated in a fundamental principle, were singled out and emphasized, and he received two other tables inscribed like the first (xix, xx; xxxii.-xxxiv). On each of these occasions he fasted forty days and nights (Ex. xxiv 18; xxxiv 28; Deut. ix. 9, 18), as Elijah afterwards did (1 Kin. xix. 8), both in this respect foreshadowing the similar fast of our Lord (Mat. iv. 2). The name of Moses is forever associated with the laws given at Sinai and during the subsequent desert wanderings (see LEVITICUS and NUMBERS).

When Moses came down from mount Sinai, after the second sojourn of forty days, with the tables of the law in his hand, the skin of his face shone, sending forth beams (Hebrew, horns), and the people were afraid to come nigh him (Ex. xxxiv. 29, R. V. margin). Moses called to them, and they returned to him; and he spake with them and gave to them all that the Lord had spoken with him. "And tull Moses had done speaking with them, he put a veil on his face. But when Moses went in before the Lord to speak with him, he took the veil off, until he came out" (33, 34, A. V.). The R. V., following the Septuagint and Vulgate and correctly rendering the Hebrew, says just the contrary: "And when Moses had done speaking with them, he put a veil on his face." He did not wear the veil while speaking either with the people or with the Lord. He wore the veil, not to hide the splendor (A. V.), but to conceal the vanishing away of the splendor (R. V.); and he wore it until he returned to the presence of the Lord, where the light of his countenance was rekindled. Moses "put a veil upon his face, that the children of Israel should not look steadfastly on the end of that which was passing away" (2 Cor. iii. 13, R. V., cp. 7).

In the second year of the sojourn of the Israelites in the wilderness, Moses is mentioned as having married a Cushite woman (Num. xii 1). Zipporah may have died during the preceding year, although her death is not recorded (cp Ex. xviii. 2). Among the later Jews the story ran that the Cushite woman was an Ethiopian princess named Tharbis, who had fallen in love with Moses on the occasion of his leading an Egyptian army into Ethiopia, while he was still a member of Pharaoh's household (Antiq. ii. 10, 2). The tale is evidently a fabrication. The marriage took place in the wilderness, when Miriam and Aaron were jealous of Moses' superiority in public affairs. They were leaders of the host, directors of the national life, and prophets as well as Moses; and on this ground they claimed that their opposition to Moses' marriage with the foreigner should have been heeded by him. The Cushite woman was probably one of the mixed multitude which accompanied the Israelites in the flight from Egypt (Ex. xii. 38).

Shortly after leaving Kadesh, Korah and other princes rebelled against the authority of Moses and Aaron, but were signally punished by God (Num. xvi); see KORAH. At the second encampment at Kadesh, Moses and Aaron grievously sinned (Num. xx.). When bidden by God to speak unto the rock that it give forth its water, Moses said to the assembled people: "Hear now, ye rebels; shall we bring you forth water out of this rock?" The brothers failed to observe their subordinate position. They claimed to be the leaders and providers of the people, whereas it was God who had led the Israelites from Egypt and had fed them for forty years in the wilderness. They took to themselves the honor which belonged to God alone. When called upon to act for God, they acted in their own name, and used for their own glory the power delegated unto them. For this sin of treason they were denied the privilege of conducting the people into the promised land. It was a sore chastisement to Moses, but it made no change in the fidelity of this great servant of the Lord. After the condemnation he was faithful, as he had been before. He started the people once more on their march to Canaan. He led Aaron up mount Hor, stripped him of his official robes, and transferred his office to Eleazar, thus himself aiding in carrying out the death sentence. When the people were bitten by the fiery serpents, he interceded with God for them, and at God's bidding erected the brazen serpent and bade his dying countrymen look and live. He led the armies of Israel into the territory of Sihon and Og, and conquered it for Israel. When the camp was pitched in a valley in the mountains of Abarim, and glimpses of the land of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were obtained, the pent-up emotions of Moses' soul again, as on other unrecorded occasions since his transgression found relief in prayer: "O Lord God, thou hast begun to show thy servant thy greatness, and thy strong hand: . . . Let me go over, I pray thee, and see the good land that is beyond Jordan, that goodly mountain, and Lebanon." But the answer came: "Let it suffice thee; speak no more unto me of this matter . . . for thou shalt not go over Jordan" (Deut iii. 24-27). The camp was moved and pitched at Shittim in the valley, and Moses put his house in order that he might die. He delivered a parting address to the people; see DEUTERONOMY. He led Joshua, whom God had appointed to succeed him, before the high priest in the presence of the congregation, placed his hands upon him, and, giving him a charge, transferred to him the office which he himself had so honorably and efficiently filled for forty years. He afterwards led Joshua to the door of the tabernacle to receive a charge from God. Then he taught the people a song that they might have words of religious wisdom in their memory and on their tongues, bestowed his farewell blessing on the several tribes, ascended mount Nebo and viewed the promised land from its summit, and died. He was 120 years old, yet was his eye not dim nor his natural force abated. God buried him near by (Deut. xxxiv).

It was during the forty years in the wilderness that the principal literary work of Moses was done. He kept a record of the encampments (Num. xxxiii.), made a note of events, such as the battle with Amalek (Ex. xvii. 14), committed the statutes founded on the covenant law to writing (xxiv. 4-7), preserved a copy of his farewell address (Deut.

xxxi 24). He had also the richness, vividness, and depth of thought requisite for writing Hebrew poetry, which is very simple in its structure and a ready vehicle for fervid utterance. The most spontaneous of his poems, written under the intense feeling of the moment, was the song which he uttered when Pharaoh was overthrown in the Red Sea (Ex. xv. 1-18). Moses ascribes the glory to Jehovah (1-3), describes the event (4-12), anticipates its effect upon the enemies of Israel (13-15), and discerns in it a guarantee that Jehovah will bring Israel into the promised land (16-18). The song may have been composed in a few moments. Ps xc is the product of a quieter mood and of reflection. His didactic song, embodying the religious lessons of the preceding forty years, was prepared with the design of its being committed to memory by the people (Deut xxxii; cp. xxxi 19, 22). His farewell blessing of the tribes, like the farewell words of Jacob to his sons, was also cast in poetic form (Deut xxxiii). Moses had literary ability; in these several forms of literature he had predecessors among the Egyptians; and especially did he have also the stimulus afforded by their literary ideas and the example of their histories, and the incentive of the awakened national life of the Hebrews, and the stirring events amid which he lived to lead him to write a connected history of his people, such as is found in the Pentateuch. For his authorship of that work see PENTATEUCH.

As the organizer of a nation Moses under the guidance of God provided Israel with civil and religious institutions. These institutions were timely in the sense that both kinds were regarded by the peoples of that day as normal and essential to a state, their character corresponded to the ideals of the age, and they represented the highest moral and religious truth possessed by men. The laws were not as a whole novel. The constitution consisted of ten commandments. It had long been known to Israel that idolatry, proscribed by the second commandment, was abhorrent to Jehovah (Gen xxxv. 2). There is evidence that the Sabbath day was instituted long before the fourth commandment was promulgated at Sinai. Long also before Israel heard the law at Sinai, murder, adultery, theft, and false witness-bearing were universally held to be crimes punishable by man. The significance of Israel's constitution lay in the fact that recognized moral obligations were made the fundamental law of the kingdom, and that the tenth commandment probed back of the outward act into the inner nature of man and located the source of sin in the evil desires of the heart. The main portion of the Book of the Covenant consists of statutes based on the covenant law of the Decalogue (Ex. xxi. 1-xxiii. 19). In certain cases at least old laws were reaffirmed and ancient customs were made laws of the kingdom. The codex of Hammurabi (see AMRAPHEL) enables the student to trace more of the ordinances back into the period before Moses than he had previously been able to do; and it shows also that the idea of codification, which is so marked a feature of the Book of the Covenant, had dawned upon man centuries before the time of Moses. The ecclesiastical legislation of Moses was also timely; providing a sanctuary with the ground plan of the prevalent type of Egyptian temple, as an edifice stable, symmetrical in its proportions, and employing the approved symbolism of the day in its appointments and ritual, with a priesthood and priestly organization and priestly functions in general like those of contemporary nations. It was a sacred house and a worship that embodied the good in the religious thought and practice of the civilized world, that were intelligible alike to Israelite and gentile, and were distinguished by monotheism and spirituality, and by the exhibition of the way in which the sinner may approach the holy God. Moses was inspired, but a body of laws and a form of worship entirely hidden from the foundation of the world were not revealed to him. Moses was a prophet, and was inspired as other prophets were inspired. Under the influence of the Holy Spirit he was made an infallible communicator to his fellow-men of the mind and will of God. He spent days in personal communion with God, who enlightened his mind concerning God and the nature of the kingdom, led him infallibly to discern the laws appropriate to the condition of the people and adapted to discipline them in the spirit of the kingdom, and prompted and controlled and enabled him to frame legislation and found institutions, more or less out of old materials and on old models indeed, yet distinguished from all analogies among contemporary peoples by the exhibition of the spiritual nature and holiness of God, by the extrication of man's conduct from civil relations merely and bringing it into relation to God also, and by the power to lift the secular life into the true service of God.

Moses had the wisdom of a statesman. He observed the opposition to him which was manifested in his own family (Num. xii.), the jealousy of other tribes and his own to the pre-eminence of himself and Aaron (xvi.), the worldly considerations by which the people were actuated (xxxii.), their lack of faith in Jehovah at critical moments, and their readiness to lapse into idolatry. He meditated on these weaknesses which threatened the national existence; and when he came to prepare his farewell address he insisted upon the law of the one altar and upon the spirituality of religion as the great means under God of overcoming these defects by deepening the moral life on the one hand, and on the other hand by preserving purity of worship and doctrine, binding the people together as one nation, and making their own religion a grander spectacle than the ceremonies at heathen shrines; see ALTAR and DEUTERONOMY. After his death the greatness of Moses was universally recognized, and his reputation grew as the centuries went by. He had, moreover, the distinguished honor of being permitted to reappear as the representative of O. T. law, with Elijah, the representative of O. T. prophecy, to hold converse with Jesus on the mount of transfiguration (Mat. xviii. 3, 4).

Moth.

An insect proverbial for its destruction of clothing (Job xiii. 28; Mat. vi. 19; Jas. v. 2). Its larva feeds upon wool (Is. li. 8), and out of the same substance builds itself a house or case, in which it lives (Job xxvii. 18), protruding its head while eating. The clothes moth (Tinea) is intended, of which several species, as T. pellionella and vestianella, feed on fur and wool.

Mount.

1. A mountain. The word is now used almost exclusively in poetry or as part of a compound name, as mount Carmel, mount Tabor, mount Zion, mount of Olives (1 Kin. xviii. 19; Ps. xlviii. 2; Zech. xiv. 4); see CARMEL, ZION, etc.

2. A mound, especially one raised against the wall of a besieged city by the assailing army (Jer. vi. 6; Dan. xi. 15; and R. V. of 2 Sam. xx. 15; 2 Kin. xix. 32), and on which the battering ram was placed (Ezek. xxvi. 8, 9); see illustration under LACHISH. In Is. xxix. 3 a different Hebrew word is used, which R. V. renders fort.

Moun'tain.

Of the mountains in or near Palestine the loftiest was mount Hermon. Then followed the Lebanon range. Compared with those towering elevations such hills as mount Zion, mount Moriah, mount Carmel, mount Tabor, etc., were very inferior eminences (Deut. in. 25). Mountain is a natural image for eternal continuance (Deut. xxxiii. 15; Hab. iii. 6), for stability (Is. liv. 10), for difficult, dangerous, wearisome paths in life (Jer. xiii. 16), for insurmountable obstacles (Zech. iv. 7, Mat. xxi. 21).

Mount of Con-gre-ga'tion.

A mountain in the farthest north (Is. xiv. 13); the reference probably being to a conception common in ancient mythology and current among the Babylonians, that the gods assembled on a mountain of the north. That the Babylonians located the mountain in the north may at least be inferred by analogy, but the evidence is confined as yet to this passage, where the king of Babylon is the speaker.

Mourn'ing.

The mourning of the oriental was and is ostentatious. Public expression was given to grief principally by removing ornaments and neglecting the person (Ex. xxxiii. 4; 2 Sam.

xiv. 2; xix. 24; Mat. vi. 16-18), rending the clothes by slitting the tunic at the throat or tearing the coat or the outer mantle (Lev. x. 6; 2 Sam. xiii. 31; Joel ii. 13), shaving the head or plucking out the hair (Ezra ix. 3; Jer. vii. 29), putting on sackcloth (Joel i. 8), sprinkling ashes or dust on the head (2 Sam. xv. 32), fasting (Ps. xxxv. 13), weeping and lamenting (Joel i. 8, 13). Several of these modes were usually combined (Gen. xxxvii. 34; 2 Sam. iii. 31, 32; xiii. 19; xv. 32; Ezra ix. 3, 5; Job i. 20; Jer. xli. 5). Friends came to the house of mourning, and flute players and professional mourners, chiefly women, were also employed, who made loud lamentations (Jer. ix. 17, 18; Mat. ix. 23; Acts ix. 39); see MINSTREL. As at the present day, funeral feasts were given to the crowds that assembled at the funeral (Jer. xvi. 7; Baruch vi. 32). After the funeral women came forth very early in the morning to visit the grave, as they are still accustomed to do, and to pray, weep and sob or chant hymns or beat their breasts (Mark xvi. 1, 2). Many of them are professionals; but others are sincere mourners, relatives of the deceased and their sympathizing friends (John xi. 31). Customs, in general similar, prevailed in Egypt, Persia, and Scythia (Herod. ii. 66, 85, iv. 71; viii. 99; ix. 24).

The period of mourning varied. It was thirty days for Aaron and Moses (Num. xx. 29; Deut. xxxiv. 8), and seven days for Saul (1 Sam. xxxi. 13). The Egyptians observed seventy days for Jacob, and seven more days were devoted to public mourning for him at the threshing floor of Atad (Gen. i. 3, 10).

Mouse.

A small rodent quadruped, Mus musculus and other allied species of the family Muridæ. It was an unclean animal (Lev. xi. 29), but was eaten by Israelites in Isaiah's time, who gave themselves up to heathenism and paid no attention to the Mosaic law (Is lxvi. 17). The field mouse (Arvicola arvalis) was destructive to crops (1 Sam. vi. 5). The Hebrew word for mouse, 'akbar, is a comprehensive one, including not merely the genus Mus, but most of the family Muridæ, with many animals from other families having either an affinity or an analogy to the typical mice. The Arabs include the jerboa under the designation 'akbar, and they eat it, and various other mouse-like animals, such as sand rats, which belong to the sub-family Gerbillinæ, and dormice, of the related family Myozidæ.

Mo'za [a going forth, issue].

1. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Caleb (1 Chron. ii. 46).

2. A descendant of Jonathan (1 Chron. viii. 36, 37).

Mo'zah.

A town of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 26). Not identified. The name is etymologically different from Beit Mizza, a ruined village, about 5 miles west-northwest of Jerusalem.

Mul'ber-ry Tree.

A tree of the same order as the fig. It is cultivated in Syria for the sake of its leaves, on which the silkworm feeds. A cooling drink is made from its berries, the juice being expressed, sweetened with honey, and flavored with spices. The juice of the berries was shown to elephants to prepare them for battle (1 Mac. vi. 34; cp. 3 Mac. v. 2). A mulberry is mentioned in N. T. under the name of sycamine.

Mulberry is the rendering of the Hebrew Baka', weeping, distilling; a tree which grew near Jerusalem and of which the leaves rustled in the wind (2 Sam. v. 23, 24; 1 Chron. xiv. 14, 15). In these passages and in Ps. lxxxiv. 6 the margin of R. V. has balsam tree. Royle suggested that the tree intended is that called bak by the Arabs, or rather shayrat al-bak, the guat tree, which he identifies with the poplar. Two species of poplar are common along the banks of streams and in moist soil in Palestine, the white poplar and the Euphrates poplar, but there is no etymological connection between bak and baka'.

Mule.

A graminivorous animal, called in Hebrew pered (1 Kin. xviii. 5). The mule is a hybrid between the horse and the ass. It is often mentioned with horses (Ps. xxxii. 9), and was much used for riding and for carrying burdens (2 Sam. xiii. 29; 2 Kin. v. 17; 1 Chron. xii. 40). It is not mentioned before the time of David, but was in common use from his days onward. The Tyrians obtained mules in Armenia (Ezek. xxvii. 14).

In A. V. of Gen. xxxvi. 24 the Hebrew plural yemim is translated mules; but it should rather be rendered hot springs, as it is in the Vulgate and in R. V. In A. V. of Esth viii. 10, 14 rekeesh is rendered mule, in 1 Kin. iv. 28 dromedary. R. V. substitutes swift steed.

Mup'pim.

A son of Benjamin (Gen. xlv. 21); see SHEPHUPHAM.

Mur'der.

Just after the deluge it was enacted that whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed: for in the image of God made he man (Gen. ix. 6). The avenger of blood had the right to put the murderer to death (Num. xxxv. 19); but if the manslayer reached a city of refuge he was temporarily safe. The cities of refuge were not instituted for the benefit of the deliberate murderer; they were designed for the man who had accidentally committed manslaughter (Num. xxxv.) Even if the deliberate murderer had fled for asylum to the altar, and probably taken hold of its horns, he was to be taken from it and put to death (Ex. xxi. 14; cp. 1 Kin. ii. 28-34). At the city of refuge the manslayer was given a trial. The concurrent testimony of at least two witnesses was required to convict him of murder (Num. xxxv. 30; Deut. xvii. 6). If guilty of deliberate murder, no ransom was accepted (Num. xxxv. 31), he was delivered to the avenger of blood to be slain (19; Deut. xix. 12). If acquitted, he was granted asylum in the city. See CITY OF REFUGE.

Mu'shi.

A Levite, son of Merari, and the founder of a tribal family or house (Ex. vi. 19; Num. ix. 20, xxvi. 58; 1 Chron. vi. 19, 47; xxiii. 21, 23, xxiv. 26, 30).

Mu'sic.

Music is ancient (Gen. iv. 21). Among the Hebrews, Miriam and her companions took timbrels and danced and sang praises to on musical instruments, and danced (Jer. xxv. 10; 1 Mac. ix. 39; Luke xv. 25). Marriage processions, as they passed through the streets, were accompanied with music and song (Jer. vii. 34). Women and maidens welcomed the victorious warrior on his return home with music, song, and dance (Judg. xi. 34; 1 Sam. xviii. 6). Kings had their court musicians (2 Chron. xxxv. 25; Ecc. ii. 8). The accession of a king and his marriage and his feasts were made joyous with music (2 Sam. xix. 35; 1 Kin. i. 40; Ps. xlv. 8, R. V.). The shepherd might have his harp (1 Sam. xvi. 18). The mind might be quieted and refreshed by music (1 Sam. x. 5; xvi. 16; 2 Kin. iii. 15). Psalms might be sung to the accompaniment of the harp (Ps. xcii. 1-3; cxxxvii. 2, cp. Amos vi. 5).

The musical instruments of the Hebrews were of three classes: stringed instruments, wind instruments, and instruments of percussion. Stringed instruments consisted of a body of wood with strings of gut, and were played with the fingers of one or both hands or were struck with a plectrum of wood, ivory, or metal. They were chiefly the harp and psalter. The harp was in general use among the people both for worldly and sacred music; the psalter was commonly, though not exclusively, reserved for religious purposes. The psalter was tuned to the soprano register, the harp an octave lower (1 Chron. xv. 20, 21). The wind instruments were chiefly flutes or pipes and horns. The pipe was often played with other instruments (1 Sam. x. 5; 1 Kin. i. 40; Is. v. 12; xxx. 29; Eccles. xl. 21), was employed to lead dancing (Mat. xi. 17), and was played at weddings (1 Mac. ii. 45; Rev. xviii. 22). It was specially the instrument of lamentation (Jer. xlviii. 36; Mat. ix. 23, R. V.; Warrin. 9.5). The Bible does not mention its use in the temple service, not even in 1 Mac. iv. 54; but it was used in sacred music (1 Sam. x. 5) and was heard in processions of worshippers march-the Lord for his deliverance of the Israelites at the Red Sea (Ex. xv. 20). The people danced and sang in idolatrous worship about the golden calf (Ex. xxxii. 6, 18). In family feasts and religious festivals they sang, played ing to the house of God (Is. xxx. 29), and in the later temple it had an assigned place, especially at the passover and feast of tabernacles. The ram's horn, or an imitation of it, was sometimes used to increase the noise of other instruments (1 Chron. xv. 28; 2 Chron. xv. 14; Ps. xcvi. 6, rendered trumpet), but was generally blown by itself. Its principal employment was not in music, but for military purposes and to make proclamations. Straight, narrow, silver trumpets, about a cubit in length, and called hagofrah, were used by the priests to announce festivals, to call the congregation, and on advancing to battle (Num. x. 1-10). They were rarely blown by laymen (Hos. v. 8; perhaps, 2 Kin. xi. 14 and 2 Chron. xxiii. 13). Of the instruments of percussion the timbrel or tabret was the popular instrument; it was usually played by women and was employed on festive occasions, especially to beat time at the dances and for singers (Gen. xxxi. 27; Ex. xv. 20; Judg. xi. 34, Ps. lxxxii. 2). Cymbals of brass were used in the temple service (1 Chron. xv. 19).

Music was cultivated by the companies which gathered about the prophets (1 Sam.

288 were trained musicians, who were depended upon to lead the less skilled body of assistants (1 Chron. xxv. 7, 8). They were divided into twenty-four courses, containing twelve trained musicians each. Of these courses four belonged to the family of Asaph, six to that of Jeduthun, and fourteen to that of Heman. The orchestra which accompanied the singing consisted of stringed instruments, but cymbals were also used, being probably struck by the chief musician to beat time (1 Chron. xv. 19-21). It appears from this passage that the proportion of psalteries to harps was eight to six. In Herod's temple there were ordinarily two psalteries, nine harps, and one cymbal, and on certain days pipes were added. The participation of priests with trumpets in the orchestra of stringed instruments was exceptional (2 Chron. v. 12, 13; vii. 6). In the second temple the trumpets, when blown in connection with the regular orchestra, were

x. 5), various instruments being employed as an orchestra. It is not mentioned as belonging to the service of the tabernacle in the early period. David introduced it into the worship at the sanctuary, and Solomon promoted it (2 Sam. vi. 5, 14; 1 Kin. x. 12; 1 Chron. xv., xvi.). Hezekiah and Josiah paid special attention to its restoration (2 Chron. xxix. 25; xxxv. 15). David was assisted in his work by Asaph, Heman, and Ethan or Jeduthun, three masters of music. A choir of singers and musicians, with Asaph at its head, was formed of Levites, and stationed before the ark at the tabernacle on Zion, while Heman and Jeduthun, with their choirs, were assigned to the old tabernacle at Gibeon (1 Chron. xvi. 4-6, 39-42). These three choirs were afterwards united in the temple. In David's reign they numbered 4000 members (1 Chron. xxiii. 5), of whom heard only in the pauses or as responsive music (Ezra iii. 10, 11). The musicians stood on the east of the great altar (2 Chron. v. 12). In Herod's temple they occupied a broad staircase, which led from the court of Israel to the court of the priests. In this later temple a choir of boys, standing at the foot of the stairs, lent their higher voices to the song of the Levites.

Little is known of the character of the music. The Hebrews had a scale of eight tones. Their sacred choirs probably sang in unison the same simple melody, divided into two parts, the one an octave higher than the other, and representing the male and female voices, and were accompanied by the instruments in the same tones (1 Chron. xv. 20, 21). Melodies are probably named in the titles of Ps. ix., xxii., xlv., lvi., lvii., and others. Antiphonal and responsive singing was practiced (Ex. xv. 21; Neh. xii. 31-43) and was often heard in the temple service (Ezra iii. 10, 11; Jer. xxxiii. 11); several psalms were arranged for this purpose, e. g., xxiv. 7-10; cxxxvi. The congregation seldom, if ever, joined in the singing in the first temple, but at its close they united in saying amen (1 Chron. xvi. 7, 36). In the Herodian temple the people sometimes participated by singing responses.

Mustard.

A garden herb (Luke xiii. 19), which in comparison with other herbs becomes a great tree (Mat. xiii. 32; Mark iv. 32), on whose branches the birds rest for the sake of obtaining its seeds. Its seeds are, hyperbolically speaking, less than all seeds (Mat. xiii. 32). The largeness of the plant grown from seeds so small illustrates the increase of the kingdom of heaven from a very small beginning. The mustard seed was employed proverbially by the Jews, just as it was by Jesus (Mat. xvii. 20; Luke xvii. 6), to denote anything very minute. The common mustard of Palestine is Sinapis nigra or black mustard. It grows wild, attaining the height of a horse and rider, as travelers have noticed. It is also cultivated in gardens for its seed, which is used as a condiment. Those who seek another identification generally consider the mustard of Scripture to have been Salvadora persica, the type of the natural order Salvadoraceae or Salvadorads. Royle, who supported this view, says that it has a succulent fruit, tasting like garden cress. It is, however, small, and apparently confined to the low valley of the Jordan; and it is not an herb.

Muth-lab'ben [die for the son].

An expression of doubtful meaning in the title of Ps. ix. It probably indicates a familiar melody.

Myn'dos, in A. V. Myndus.

A small town of Caria, situated on the sea-coast (Herod. v. 33). It was not far from Halicarnassus, for Alexander led a detachment of troops across the intervening country in one night. In the time of Simon Macchabeus it was subject to Rome (1 Mac. xv. 23). Its site is probably marked by the small sheltered port of Gumishlu.

My'ra.

A city of Lycia, where Paul, when a prisoner on his way to Rome, changed ships (Acts xxvii. 5, 6). Myra was one of the principal cities of Lycia. It stood some two miles from the sea, and was built on and about a cliff, at the mouth of the gorge leading into the interior mountain region. It is now called Dembra.

Myrrh.

1. A fragrant substance, called in Hebrew mor, in Greek smurna. It was an ingredient in the oil with which Aaron and his sucsors were anointed (Ex. xxx. 23). Beds and garments were perfumed with it (Ps. xlv. 8; Prov. vii. 17; Song iii. 6), and an oil of myrrh was used in the purification of women (Esth. i. 12). The magi brought it from the east to present to the infant Jesus (Mat. ii. 11). At the crucifixion it was offered to him in wine, probably to deaden pain (Mark xv. 23), and was an ingredient in the spices designed for anointing his body (John xix. 39). It was used for embalming the dead (Herod. ii. 86). The tree which produced it grew in Arabia (iii. 107; Pliny xii. 16). The plant which produced it was probably Balsamodendron myrrha. It is a small tree, with odoriferous wood and bark, short spiny branches, trifoliate leaves, and plum-like fruit. It grows in Arabia Felix, and furnishes the myrrh of commerce.

2. The rendering of the Hebrew Lot (Gen. xxxvii. 25; xlii. 11). Myrrh is not a happy translation; it should have been ladanum (R. V. margin), called by the Greeks lēdon and ladanon, and by the Arabs lādan, which is cognate with the Hebrew lot. It is a highly fragrant resin, containing a volatile oil, and is produced by Cistus creticus and various other species of rock rose. It grows in parts of Syria.

Myr'tle.

A tree, called in Hebrew h'das. It grew in the mountains near Jerusalem, and booths were made of its branches at the feast of tabernacles (Neh. viii. 15). It is mentioned also in Is. xli. 19; lv. 13; Zech. i. 8, 10, 11. The tree is undoubtedly the common myrtle (Myrtus communis), which grows in Palestine.

My'si-a.

A province in the extreme northwest of Asia Minor; bounded on the north by the Propontis, now sea of Marmora, on the south by Lydia, on the east by Bithynia, and on the west by the Hellespont. The Troad lay within its limits. Paul and Silas passed through it to Troas, one of its cities (Acts xvi. 7, 8). Assos, to which Paul sailed to meet his associates, was another (xx. 13). A third was Pergamos, one of the seven churches in Asia (Rev. i. 11; ii. 12-17).

My'ster-y.

A word borrowed from the heathen religion, in which a mystery was a secret and peculiar doctrine, which distinguished one religion from another, and found expression in rites, ceremonies, and purifications to which only initiated persons were admitted. The word does not imply that the doctrine is incomprehensible. In the N. T. it denotes a secret hidden from the world till the appointed time (Rom. xvi. 25), or until man has been prepared by the Spirit of God to receive and appreciate it (Mark iv. 11), which forms a characteristic and essential doctrine and finds expression in the life (1 Tim. iii. 16).

N.

Na'am [sweetness, pleasantness].

A son of the celebrated Caleb (1 Chron. iv. 15).

Na'a-mah [sweet, pleasant].

1. Daughter of Lamech, and sister of Tubalcain (Gen. iv. 22).

2. An Ammonitess, a wife of Solomon and the mother of king Rehoboam (1 Kin. xiv. 21, 31; 2 Chron. xii. 13).

3. A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv. 41). Not identified.

Na'a-man [pleasantness, delight].

1. A grandson of Benjamin, a son of Bela and founder of a family (Gen. xlii. 21; Num. xxvi. 40).

2. Commander of the army of Ben-hadad, king of Damascus. He was an able general, and had won deliverance for the Syrians, but he was a leper. In Syria leprosy did not exclude from human society, as it did in Israel, though it was a loathsome disease. In one of the Syrian raids into the Israelite territory, the soldiers had brought away a little maid, who became a slave to Naaman's wife. This girl expressed to her mistress the wish that Naaman were with Elisha in Samaria, as the prophet would heal him of his leprosy. The speech of the maiden was reported to her master, who resolved to seek a cure from Elisha. His sovereign, the king of Syria, wrote a letter of introduction for him, and sent him to the king of Israel to be cured. When the Israelite ruler received it he thought that the real intention of his correspondent was to pick a quarrel and declare war. Elisha reassured the king, and desired that Naaman should be sent to him, when he would learn that there was a prophet in Israel. When he came with his horses and chariot to Elisha's door, the prophet in order to humble his pride and teach him that he owed his cure not to man, but solely to the power of God, did not appear, but sent out a message that he should dip seven times in the Jordan. Naaman, feeling affronted, and despising the means, started for home in a passion, saying, "Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel? may I not wash in them and be clean?" But his servants soothed his temper, and urged him to dip in the Jordan. He did so, and was cured. Filled with gratitude, he wished to reward Elisha. The prophet desired to impress upon the Syrian the freeness of God's blessings, and refused all recompense; but Gehazi, his servant, acted in a very different spirit. Naaman renounced idolatry, and became a worshiper of Jehovah; and he carried home two mules' burden of earth to build an altar to Jehovah. He lived, however, in a heathen community and could not altogether escape outward participation in heathen customs. His king was an idolater, a worshiper of Rimmon; and it was Naaman's official duty to support him when he entered the temple and bowed before the god. The prophet of Jehovah permitted Naaman to fulfill his secular duties, even though to do so involved his assisting his king to perform heathen worship (2 Kin. v.).

Na'a-ma-thite.

A native or inhabitant of Naamah; as Zophar, Job's friend (Job. ii. 11; xi. 1; xx. 1; xlii. 9). The place was probably in Arabia.

Na'a-rah [a girl].

1. A wife of Ashhur, the ancestor of the inhabitants of Tekoa (1 Chron. iv. 5, 6).

2. A town on the boundary line of Ephraim, east of Bethel, and not far from Jericho (Josh. xvi. 7). In A. V. the name is written Naarath. The final th is archaic, and is probably due in the text to the presence of the local ending. The town is doubtless one with Naaran (1 Chron. vii. 28). Archelaus diverted half the water supply of Neara to irrigate the palms of his palace at Jericho (Antiq. xvii. 13, 1). Eusebius mentions a village Noorath, 5 Roman miles from Jericho. A plausible conjecture for the site is on the Nahr el-'Aujah, with its plentiful water; perhaps at the ruin el-'Aujah.

One of David's valiant men (1 Chron. xi. 37; apparently a diverse reading, perhaps the correction, of Paarai, 2 Sam. xxiii. 35).

Na'a-ran. See NAARAH 2.

Na'a-rath. See NAARAH 2.

Na'a-shon. See NAHSHON.

Na-as'son. See NAHSHON.

Na'bal [foolish, wicked].

A sheepmaster, resident in Maon, who pastured his flocks around the village Carmel in Judah, on the confines of the wilderness. His wife's name was Abigail. David and his followers had dwelt for some time in the neighborhood, and had used their might to protect the property of the people from marauding bands of robbers. When Nabal was shearing his sheep, David sent ten young men to solicit assistance for himself and his followers. Nabal sent back a churlish refusal, which so irritated David that he put his men in motion with the intention of cutting off Nabal and every other male belonging to the household. Abigail, who was a clever and judicious woman, made ready a present for David, and, starting promptly, apologized for her husband's conduct, allayed the resentment which it had caused, and prevented the gathering storm from breaking on her home. Returning to her abode, she found a great feast in progress, and her lord completely intoxicated. Next morning, when he was sober, she told him how narrowly he had escaped destruction. He was profoundly affected by the intelligence, and never recovered from the shock which it caused, but died in ten days. After a time, Abigail became one of David's wives (1 Sam. xxv. 1-42).

Nab-a-ths'ans, in A. V. Na'bath-ites. See NEBAIOTH.

Na'both.

An inhabitant of Jezreel, who had a vineyard at that town near one of Ahab's palaces. The king wished to buy it, but its owner would not sell it because it had descended to him from his ancestors. At the instance of Jezebel, Naboth's life was sworn away by suborned witnesses, he and his sons (2 Kin. ix. 26), to whom the vineyard would have descended, were stoned to death, their bodies were left to be devoured by the dogs, and the vineyard was seized by Ahab. This act of violence called down the judgment of God on the guilty king and his yet guiltier wife (1 Kin. xxi. 1-24, xxii. 34-38; 2 Kin. ix. 30-37).

Na'chon. See NACON.

Na'chor. See NAHOR.

Na'con, in A. V. Nachon [prepared, ready].

The designation of a threshing floor at which Uzzah was struck dead for touching the ark (2 Sam. vi. 6), and hence called Perez-uzzah, i. e. breach of Uzzah (8). It is not certain that Nacon is the original spelling of the name; see CHIDON.

Na'dab [of one's freewill, liberal]

1. The eldest of Aaron's four sons (Ex. vi. 23; Num. iii. 2; xxvi. 60; 1 Chron. vi. 3; xxiv. 1). With his brother Abihu, he was granted the privilege of a near approach to Jehovah at Sinai (Ex. xxiv. 1), and was subsequently appointed to the priesthood (xxviii. 1), but both of them afterwards offered strange fire to God, and as a penalty were consumed by fire (Lev. x. 1-7; Num. xxvi. 61). From the fact that a command was immediately thereafter given to Aaron not to drink wine or strong drink when he entered the tabernacle, it may be inferred that Nadab and Abihu had done so, and were under the influence of liquor when they committed the sin which cost them their lives (Lev. x. 9). They both died childless (Num. iii. 4; 1 Chron. xxiv. 2).

2. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 28, 30).

3. A Benjamite, a son of Gibeon and Maachah (1 Chron. viii. 30; ix. 36).

4. Son of Jeroboam I., and his successor on the throne of Israel. He began to reign about 910 B. C. He followed the evil example of his father with respect to calf worship. He led the forces of his kingdom to besiege Gibbethon, but was murdered with his relatives by Baasha, who then mounted the vacant throne. This massacre fulfilled the threatenings of Jehovah against Jeroboam and his house. Nadab reigned less than two full years (1 Kin. xiv. 10, 11, 20; xv. 25, 30).

Nad'a-bath, in A. V. Na-dab'a-tha.

A place, probably a village, in or near Moab (1 Mac. ix. 37; in Antiq. xiii. 1, 4 Gabatha).

Nag'gal, in A. V. Nagge.

An ancestor of Christ (Luke iii. 25).

Na'ha-lal and Nahalol (Judg. i. 30), in A. V. once Nahallal (Josh. xix. 15) [pasture].

A village of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 15), from which, however, that tribe failed to drive out the Canaanite inhabitants (Judg. i. 30). It was assigned to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi. 35). The Jerusalem Talmud says that it was afterwards called Mahlul. Schwarz and Van de Velde identify this with the village of Ma'lûl, 3½ miles west of Nazareth.

Na-ha'li-el [valley and brook of God].

An encampment of the Israelites, between Beer, in the desert east of Moab, and Bamoth, which lay between Dibon and Baal-meon (Num. xxi. 19), and hence probably on one of the northern tributaries of the Arnon. Not identified; although the name is possibly preserved in Encheleth, the valley of the Arnon from the Balua eastward to the mouth of the Seil Sa'ideh, a distance of about 2 miles.

Na-hal'lal. See NAHALAL.

Na'ha-lol. See NAHALAL.

Na'ham [solace, consolation]

Brother of Hodiah's wife (1 Chron. iv. 19, R. V.). The translation of A. V. is impossible.

Na-ham'a-ni [compassionate]

One of those who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. vii. 7).

Na'ha-rai, in A. V. once Nahari (2 Sam. xxiii. 37), a misspelling of late editions from which the original edition of 1611 was free [snoring, snorting].

A Beerothite, Joab's armorbearer (2 Sam. xxi. 37; 1 Chron. xi. 39).

Na'hash [serpent]

1. Father of Abigail and Zeruiah, David's sisters (2 Sam. xvii. 25; cp. 1 Chron. ii. 16). Probably his widow, the mother of Abigail and Zeruiah, married Jesse and became the mother of David. This explanation is better than the assumption that Nahash was the name of Jesse's wife; or, as the later Jews interpreted the passage, that Nahash was another name of Jesse.

2. An Ammonite king who besieged Jabesh-gilead, and when its inhabitants offered to surrender and become tributary, would not accept the proposal unless every man in the place consented to lose the right eye. He determined to put a reproach upon Israel. A week's time was given in which to seek help. Before it expired, Saul, just before elected king, appeared with a relieving army, totally defeated the Ammonites, and saved Jabesh-gilead and its defenders (1 Sam. xi. 1-11). Either this Nahash or a son of his bearing the same name treated David kindly, perhaps because he was at variance with Saul (2 Sam. x. 2).

3. A man who lived in Rabbah of the Ammonites (2 Sam. xvii. 27). He may have been the king aforementioned, or an Israelite who had settled in Rabbah after its capture by David (2 Sam. xii. 29).

Na'hath [descent or quiet].

1. A descendant of Esau and also of Ishmael. He became a chieftain of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 3, 4, 13, 17; 1 Chron. i. 37).

2. A Kohathite Levite (1 Chron. vi. 26); probably the person elsewhere called Tohu and Toah (1 Sam. i. 1; 1 Chron. vi. 34).

3. A Levite, one of those who had charge of the tithes and offerings under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxi. 13).

Nah'bi [concealed].

The representative spy from the tribe of Naphtali (Num. xiii. 14).

Na'hor, in A. V. twice Nachor (Josh. xxiv. 2; Luke in. 34) [breathing hard, snorting].

1. A son of Serug, and grandfather of Abraham (Gen. xi. 24, 25).

2. A son of Terah, and brother of Abraham (Gen. xi. 27). He married his niece Milcah, daughter of Haran and sister of Lot (29). He is not mentioned as emigrating from Ur with Terah, Abraham, and Lot; but later he is found in Mesopotamia at Haran (xxiv. 10; xxv. 43). Eight sons were born to him by Milcah, from whom sprang Aramæan tribes. Four others traced their descent from his concubine (xxii. 21-24). One of his sons by Milcah was Bethuel, who became the father of Rebekah and Laban (xxiv. 15, 29).

Nah'shon, A. V. has once Naashon (Ex. vi. 23), and in N. T. Naasson [enchanting, ominous].

A prince of the tribe of Judah in the early period of the wilderness wanderings (Num. i. 7; ii. 3; vii. 12, 17; x. 14). His sister was married to Aaron, who was of the tribe of Levi (Exod. vi. 23). Nahshon was the grandfather or remoter ancestor of Boaz, Ruth's husband, and the fifth backward in the genealogy of David (Ruth iv. 20-22; 1 Chron. ii. 10-12). This placed him in the ancestry of our Lord (Mat. i. 4; Luke iii. 32, 33).

Na'hum [compassionate].

A prophet born at Elkosh, doubtless a village of Palestine. He prophesied to Judah (i. 15), not to the ten tribes in captivity. The position of the book among the minor prophets, after Micah and before Habakkuk and Zephaniah, is evidence that it was written between the commencement of Hezekiah's and the close of Josiah's reign (Mic. i. 1; Zeph. i. 1); and that the prophet cites the destruction of No-amon in Egypt (iii. 8-10), which was overthrown by the Assyrians in 664 B. C., and predicts the fall of Nineveh (7), which occurred about 606 B. C., narrows the limits within which the composition of the book must be sought to the fifty-eight years intervening between these events. It was a time when the people of Judah were despondent by reason of the persistent invasions of the Assyrians and the captivity of their king.

The theme of the prophecy is the burden of Nineveh (i. 1). The prophet insists on the familiar truth that Jehovah is a jealous God, whose vengeance is certain to fall on his adversaries, but who is a stronghold to those that trust in him (2-8), urges the people to turn a deaf ear to the counsel of those who were speaking against Jehovah's tardiness and advising the abandonment of his service (9-11), declares the unalterable purpose of the Lord to deliver his people (12-14), and exhorts them to unswerving loyalty to their God and the faithful observance of his worship (15). On the basis of this truth, the prophet proceeds to describe the overthrow of the worldly power which was then oppressing the kingdom of God. He pictures the siege of the city (ii. 1-10), and takes occasion to taunt the city which had been as a den of lions (11-13). Returning to the description of the siege, he attributes the judgment which befalls the city to its whoredoms (iii. 1-4). This allusion leads to a change of the figure, and he depicts the punishment as the punishment of a harlot (5-7). He draws attention to the fact that Nineveh is not better than No-amon, which went into captivity (8-10), and he predicts that like No-amon Nineveh shall be destroyed (11-19).

The prophecy opens with an address poetic in character and alphabetic in form (i. 2-15; in Heb. i. 2-11. 1). But it is not an alphabetic psalm of the ordinary kind, in which the verses begin with the letters of the alphabet in their conventional sequence (cp. Ps. cxix.). The prophet has done more. He has allowed the consecutive sounds to introduce topics rather than verses and to follow each other singly or in groups throughout the stately oration. He teaches the ear to listen for certain sounds and to hear them with satisfaction. I. The prophet enunciates a doctrine of Jehovah, God of Israel (sounding aleph in the very first word 'el, God), the doctrine that forms the basal truth of his prophecy, namely, that Jehovah, though slow to anger, yet taketh vengeance on his adversaries (2, 3; aleph beginning important words). Then the prophet describes the majesty and might of Jehovah in nature: he is in the whirlwind and in the storm, and the clouds are the dust of his feet (beth being heard thrice in this part of verse 3); he rebukes the waters that they dry up and vegetation languishes (4, which begins with gimel); the mountains and hills tremble before him (5); he being heard four times in prominent words, and the conjunction vav being used four times also, if that is intentional); the fierceness of his indignation none can withstand (6; the significant words beginning once with zayin and twice with heth in proper order). The truth that has been set forth involves on the one hand the goodness of Jehovah to his people and his knowledge of them (7; facts stated in words beginning with teth and yodh), and on the other hand, the overthrow of evil (8; the principal word being kalah, yielding the two sounds kaph and lamedh and followed twice by that of mem in the word "place"). The climax of doctrine has been reached. II. A new section of the exalted discourse opens, in which the prophet bases prediction on the truth that has been set forth. He reiterates the impotence of opposition to Jehovah: first in the form of a question (9; which in its main part begins with another mem and ends with nun); next as a declaration, repeating the conclusion of the doctrinal section (the consecution of sounds being allowed to recur, kaph being heard once and lamedh twice in the two words that dominate the thought, kalah and lo', and immediately afterwards mem thrice). Then the prophet foretells the destruction of God's foes (10-13; samekh beginning four consecutive words and fairly hissing through verse 10, while ayin snarls four times in consecutive words in verse 11 and four times in the second half of verse 12 and in the first word of verse 13). The prediction of the deliverance of God's people proceeds (14; tsadhe beginning the verse, and qoph being the initial letter of two words at its close). Finally, in view of the truth that has been presented, the prophet exhorts God's people to continue steadfast and undismayed in his service and worship (15; resh and sin and shin being prominent tones, repeatedly heard in the first half of the verse; and tav being the last letter of the verse and the concluding sound of the prophecy which began with aleph). This last verse, both by its thought and rhythm, forms the transition to chap. II.

Daleth and pe are missed from this enumeration; but when the story of the sounds is fully told, these letters are found. The ear is satisfied. It hears that which it awaits. The prophet's exalted utterance begins with aleph in verse 2 and presently beth is heard, while at the end of the verse aleph and beth are sounded together; aleph is twice heard at the beginning of verse 3, followed by gimel and daleth together; then beth is twice heard, followed by daleth; then aleph and beth are taken up again in the characteristic word of the closing statement, followed by a word containing gimel; verse 4 begins with gimel, allows beth to be repeatedly heard, and sounds aleph at the beginning and end of the last clause. In these verses aleph has been heard ten times as a radical letter, beth seven times as such, gimel and daleth each twice; whereas tau has not been heard at all in the first two verses, and sin is not sounded until verse 3. The group of letters from he to yodh is used with more restraint; he indeed begins and ends verse 5, and is often repeated in the verse, and vav is heard at the beginning or end of almost every word; the thought of verse 6 is embodied in a word beginning with zayin and is twice repeated in synonyms beginning with heth; teth is heard at the beginning of verse 7, and the emphatic word that introduces the last clause begins with yodh. The first part of the poem issues in the exultant conclusion that wickedness will be overthrown, and the second part opens with the reiteration of this truth as the basis of prediction and exhortation (verses 8 and 9). Between the two and introductory to the second is a question suggestive of the folly of striving against Jehovah. In each passage the poet plays with the consecutive sounds kaph, lamedh, and mem, while the gist of the question begins with mem and ends with nun. In verses 9-12 the sounds of mem, nun, samekh, ayin, and tsadhe abound, indeed, are dominant notes. Pe is also heard, but quite subordinately and perhaps without intention on the prophet's part, although its occurrence gratifies the expectant ear. In verses 13 and 14 qoph, resh, shin, and tav are allowed prominence; tav, shin, and resh at the end of consecutive syllables (beginning of verse 13), and shin, qoph, resh, qoph, tav at the beginning of syllables in the last four words of verse 14. Verse 15 shows resh in three consecutive words, followed by sin and shin in three consecutive words, and ending with the radical tau.

2 An ancestor of Christ, born scarcely three centuries earlier (Luke iii 25) A. V. uses the Greek form of the name, Naum.

Nail.

1 The horny scale at the end of the finger (Deut. xxi. 12; Dan. iv. 33)

2 A tent pin (Judg. iv. 21), which was of large size and commonly made of wood. Those used to fasten the curtains of the tabernacle were of brass (Ex. xxvii 19).

3 A pin, commonly of metal, used for driving into wood or other material to hold separate pieces together, or left projecting for hanging things on. It might be made of iron (1 Chron. xxii 3), or of gold, or be gilded (2 Chron. iii 9). It was sometimes driven between the stones of a wall (Ecclus. xxvii. 2). Idols were fastened securely in place by nails (Is. xl. 7; Jer. x. 4), and victims were often affixed to the cross by means of a nail driven through each hand and the feet (John xx. 25).

Na'in.

A town where our Lord raised to life the only son of a widow woman (Luke vii. 11-17). It is still called Nain, and is in the northwest corner of the eminence called Jebel Duhy, or Little Hermon, 2 miles west-southwest of En-dor, and 5 miles south-southeast of Nazareth. It is a small hamlet, little more than a cluster of ruins; with ancient sepulchral caverns chiefly on the east of the village.

Na'ioth [habitations].

The quarter in Ramah where the prophets, who gathered about Samuel to work under his direction, dwelt as a community (1 Sam. xix. 18-xx. 1).

The word occurs in this passage only. It was not understood by the ancient translators, and was slightly altered by the Masoretes; hence the versions show confusion. But in the Hebrew text itself there is no wavering. The word is used six times, and without variation. It has the nature of a proper name, being without the article (xix. 23; xx. 1). It is either a feminine singular, of archaic form like Ephrath and Zarephath (so Septuagint in Vatican text and Lucian) or a rarer formation like the noun gazith; or else it is a feminine plural, written defectively because of the previous occurrence of vav, and of the same type as g'vayyah or r'vayyah. It may be related to naveh, habitation (2 Sam. xv. 25; Job v. 3), or nava, habitation (Job viii. 6), as r'vayyah is related to raveh and ravah; or the relation may be that of saday, field, to sadeh. Accordingly, it is well to adhere to the common interpretation habitation or habitations; see PROPHETIC ASSOCIATIONS.

Name.

English names, such as James, Robert, Anne, have a meaning, but it is known only to those who have studied the etymology. In biblical times it was different. The names of persons were not only significant, but as a rule everybody knew the meaning as soon as the name was heard. Sarah, Jacob, Miriam, Jehoshaphat, Martha, Rhoda, Dorcas were intelligible to all.

The name was probably given by the Hebrews on the eighth day after birth (Gen. xvii. 12; xxi. 3, 4; Luke i. 59; ii. 21). The child might be given the name of a natural object; as Terah, wild goat, Leah, wild cow, Jonah, dove, Tamar, palm tree, Tabitha, gazelle. It might receive a name expressive of its physical condition; for example, Shiprah, beauty; or of the parents' hope regarding it, as Noah, rest (Gen. v. 29). Some names were given prophetically, as that of Jesus because he should be a saviour (Mat. i. 21). Many names testified to the piety or gratitude of the parents, as Simeon, hearing (Gen. xxix. 33), or Nathaniah, Jehovah hath given, or Elizur, God is a rock. Others were commemorative of national events, as Ichabod (1 Sam. iv. 21); yet others were family names (Luke i. 59-61; cp. iii. 23-38). When character had developed, a new name was sometimes given as expressive of it; as Israel and Cephas. In the later period, when several languages were spoken in Palestine, a name was often translated and the person was known by two names, as Cephas after the Aramaic, and Peter after the Greek,

Thomas and Didymus, both names meaning twin, Messiah and Christ, both meaning anointed. At this time also names were transformed, the Hebrew Jehohanan became in Greek Joannes, and Joseph became Josés.

Surnames were lacking among the Hebrews; persons were designated by adding to the personal name the name of their city, as Jesus of Nazareth, Joseph of Arimathea, Mary Magdalene, Nahum the Elkoshite; or by a statement of their descent, as Simon son of Jonah; by their disposition, trade, or other characteristic, as Simon Peter, Nathan the prophet, Joseph the carpenter, Matthew the publican, Simon the zealot, and Dionysius the Areopagite. Every Roman had three names; a prænomen, which was his personal name and stood first, a nomen, which was that of his gens or house and stood second, and a cognomen or surname which was that of his family and came last. Thus M. Antonius Felix, the procurator, was Marcus of the clan Antonia and the family called Felix. Frequently only the nomen and cognomen were given, the personal name being omitted; as Julius Cæsar, Pontius Pilate, Claudius Lysias.

Name is often used in Hebrew in the sense of revealed character and essence. God swears by his great name to carry out his purpose (Jer. xlv. 26), that is, he swears by his attested power to accomplish his word. The name of God which is excellent in all the earth (Ps. viii. 1), is that expression of his being which is exhibited in creation and redemption. The name of the God of Jacob which sets the king on high (Ps. xx. 1) is the manifested power of Israel's God. The name of God was in the angel which led Israel through the wilderness (Ex. xxiii. 21), because in him the revealed might and majesty of God himself dwelt. The name of God dwelt in his sanctuary (2 Sam. vii. 13), the place where he manifested himself. To know the name of God is to witness the manifestation of those attributes and apprehend that character which the name denotes (Ex. vi. 3, with 7; 1 Kin. viii. 43; Ps. xci. 14; Is. lii. 6; lxiv. 2; Jer. xvi. 21).

Na-o'mi [pleasant].

Wife of Elimelech, Elimelech went with her and his two sons to sojourn in Moab, because famine prevailed in Judah. The sons married Moabite women. Elimelech and his sons died, and Naomi accompanied by her daughter-in-law Ruth returned to Bethlehem of Judah (Ruth i.-iv.).

Na'phish, in A. V. once Nephish (1 Chron. v. 19) [respiration].

Son of Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 15; 1 Chron. i. 31), and founder of a clan with which the Israelite tribes east of the Jordan were a one time in conflict (1 Chron. v. 18-22).

Naph'ta-li, in A. V. twice Nephthalim (Mat. iv. 13, 15), once Nephtalim (Rev. vii. 6) [obtained by wrestling].

1. Sixth son of Jacob, and second by Bilhah, Rachel's maidservant. Rachel gave him this name because she had wrestled in prayer for God's favor and blessing (Gen. xxx 8).

2. The tribe descended from Naphtali. It was subdivided into four great families which sprang from the four sons of Naphtali (Gen. xlii 24; Num. xxvi. 48, 49). The prince of the Naphtalite tribe early in the wilderness wanderings was Ahira, son of Enan (Num. i. 15; ii. 29; vii. 78, 83; x. 27); at a later period it was Pedahel, son of Ammihud (xxxiv. 28); its representative spy was Nahbi, son of Vophsi (xiii. 14). At the first census in the wilderness its fighting men were 53,400 (i. 29, 30); at the second they were 45,400 (xxvi. 50). The tribe of Naphtali pitched on the north side of the tabernacle, beside those of Dan and Asher (i. 29). Arrived in Canaan, they were one of the six tribes which stood upon mount Ebal to pronounce curses on transgressors of the law (Deut. xxvii. 13; cp. Josh. viii. 33). The territory allotted to them was in northern Palestine. It was bounded on the east by the upper Jordan and the sea of Galilee, on the south by Issachar and Zebulun, and on the west by Zebulun and Asher (Josh. xix. 34). It was a long, narrow strip of land, about 50 miles from north to south, and varying from about 10 to 15 from east to west. It is mostly mountainous (Josh. xx. 7), and is quite fertile. Its boundary ran by mount Tabor (xix. 34), and it numbered Ramah, Hazer, Kedesh, Iron, and Beth-anath among its fortified cities (36-38). The Gershonite Levites had three cities allotted them within its limits; they were Kedesh, Hammoth-dor, and Kartan. The first of them was a city of refuge (Josh. xx. 7; xxi. 6, 32; 1 Chron. vi. 62, 76). Up to the early period of the judges the Naphtalites had not succeeded in expelling the Canaanites from Beth-shemesh and Beth-anath; they had, however, made them tributary. The Naphtalites took a large share in the fighting under Deborah and Barak, being mentioned with Zebulun as having jeopardized their lives upon death in the high places of the field (Judg. iv. 6, 10; v. 18). They also responded to the summons to arms issued by Gideon (vi. 35; vii. 23). A thousand captains, with 37,000 fighting men, came to David at Hebron, to aid him in the contest with Ish-bosheth (1 Chron. xii. 34; cp. 40). Their ruler some time afterwards was Jerimoth, son of Azriel (xxvii. 19; cp. Ps. lxxviii. 27). Ahimaaz was Solomon's purveyor in Naphtali (1 Kin. iv. 15). Hiram, not the Tyrian king, but the skillful worker in metal, was a widow's son of the tribe of Naphtali (vii. 14). The land of Naphtali was ravaged by Benhadad, king of Syria (1 Kin. xv. 20; 2 Chron. xvi. 4), and many of its inhabitants were subsequently carried into captivity by Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria (2 Kin. xv. 29). To these calamities Isaiah alludes, and comforts the afflicted people by intimating in the name of the Lord that the territory now ravaged should one day receive special privilege, so that they who walked in darkness should see a great light (Is. ix. 1-7). This prophecy was fulfilled when our Lord made the region on which the invasion had fallen the special seat of his ministry (Mat. iv. 12-16). Chorazin, Capernaum, and Tiberias were within the limits of what had been Naphtali.

Naph'tu-him [plural of naph'tuhi].

A tribe of Egyptian descent, mentioned between the Libyans of Lower and the Pathrusim of Upper Egypt (Gen. x. 13; 1 Chron. i. 11). Ebers derives the name from na-ptah, the [people] of Ptah, or inhabitants of Middle Egypt, in the district about Memphis, the seat of Ptah's worship. Napata, an ancient capital of Ethiopia, on the Nile near the fourth cataract, has also been suggested.

Naph'kin. See HANDKERCHIEF.

Nar-cis'sus [the narcissus or daffodil].

A Roman, whose household was in the Lord and was greeted by Paul in his letter to the church (Rom. xvi. 11).

Nard. See SPIKENARD.

Na'sor. See HAZOR.

Na'than [he has given].

1. Son of Attai, and father of Zabad, belonging to the house of Jerahmeel, family of Hezron, tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 36).

2. A distinguished prophet in the reign of David and Solomon. The proposal to build the temple was submitted to him by David. At first he was favorable to the project, but afterwards received a message from the Lord directing that not David, but his successor was to have the honor of building the holy house (2 Sam. vii. 1-17; 1 Chron. xvii. 1-15). Nathan was afterwards sent to David to bring him to a sense of his great sin in the matter of Uriah the Hittite. This the prophet did by the parable of the ewe lamb (2 Sam. xii. 1-15; cp. Ps. li. title). In his official capacity as prophet of the Lord he named the young Solomon Jedidiah (2 Sam. xii. 25). With his and Gad's concurrence, or possibly at their instigation, David arranged the musical service for the sanctuary (2 Chron. xxix. 25). When Adonijah aspired to the throne in lieu of Solomon, he sent no intimation of his intention to Nathan, believing probably that the prophet was too loyal to David to be seduced from his allegiance (1 Kin. i. 8-10). Nathan advised Bathsheba to go at once and tell David what had occurred, arranging that he would come in and confirm her words. The plan was carried out, and David gave orders to Zadok the priest, Nathan the prophet, and Benaliah, chief of the bodyguard, to proclaim Solomon (11-45). Nathan wrote a history in which he described the reign of David and part at least of that of Solomon (1 Chron. xxix. 29; 2 Chron. ix. 29).

3. The father of one and brother of another of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 36; 1 Chron. xi. 38); see IGAL.

4. The third of those children of David who were born in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 14). He, or possibly the prophet, was father of Solomon's officials, Azariah and Zabud (1 Kin. iv. 5). His family is mentioned in Zech. xii. 12. Through him David and Jesus Christ are connected by natural lineage (Luke iii. 31); while it is through Solomon that Joseph, the husband of Mary, is connected with David (Mat. i. 6).

5. A chief man with Ezra at the brook of Ahava (Ezra viii. 16).

6. A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 39).

Na-than'a-el [God hath given].

A native of Cana in Galilee, whom Jesus declared to be an Israelite indeed in whom was no guile. His attention was directed by Philip to Jesus as the Messiah of O. T. prophecy. But as Nazareth is not mentioned in O. T. prophecy and besides had a questionable reputation, he felt difficulty in accepting the Messianic claims of one who had been brought up in that town; but he at once yielded to the evidence which the superhuman knowledge of Jesus furnished (John i. 45-51). He was in the boat with Simon Peter when the miraculous draught of fishes was brought in (xxi. 2). The name does not occur in the lists of the apostles given in the first three gospels, but he was probably the same person as Bartholomew.

Other persons of the name are mentioned in O. T., but there the original Hebrew form is used. See NETHANEL.

Na-than-me'lech [the king hath given].

A chamberlain who lived in Josiah's time within the precincts of the temple (2 Kin. xxiii. 11).

Na'um. See NAHUM 2.

Naz-a-rene' [belonging to Nazareth]

1. One born or resident in Nazareth (Mat. ii. 23; R. V. of xxvi. 71; Mark xvi. 6). In Is. xi. 1 the Messiah is called neser or shoot out of the roots of Jesse; an offspring of the royal family indeed, but of that family shorn of its glory and reduced to its original humble condition. He is frequently called the Branch also (Jer. xxiii. 5; xxxiii. 15; Zech. iii. 8; vi. 12). On the most probable interpretation of Mat. ii. 23, the evangelist sees a fulfillment of Isaiah's prophecy in the providence which led the parents of Jesus to take up their residence in Nazareth again and resulted in Jesus being a Nazarene. If Nazareth means protectress or guardian, Matthew finds the fulfillment merely in the similarity of sound and in the low esteem in which the town and its inhabitants were held; but if the name is derived from the same root as neser (see NAZARETH), then Matthew finds the fulfillment in the meaning chiefly (Mat. xxvi. 71, R. V.; Mark xvi. 6, R. V.).

2. A. adherent of the religion founded by Jesus; a Christian. It is used contemptuously (Acts xxiv. 5).

Naz'a-reth [verdant, offshoot; or perhaps protectress (see below)]

A town of Galilee (Mat. ii. 23), where Joseph and Mary lived (Luke ii. 39), and where Jesus was brought up (iv. 16) and spent the greater part of thirty years (iii. 23 with Mark i. 9). He was accordingly known as Jesus of Nazareth (Mat. xxi. 11; Mark i. 24). He was held in favor there (Luke ii. 52; iv. 16); but after he entered on his mission, he was twice rejected by his fellow townsmen (iv. 28-31; cp. Mat. iv. 13; and xiii. 54-58 Mark vi. 1-6). Nazareth stood upon a hill (Luke iv. 29). The town was either small and unimportant or of recent origin; for it is not mentioned in the O. T. or in the Apocrypha or by Josephus. It is still called en-Nâsirah. It lies in a secluded valley in Lower Galilee, a little north of the great plain of Esdraelon, and is about 15 miles west-southwest of Tiberias, 20 south-west of Tell Hum, the reputed site of Capernaum, and 19 southeast of Acre. The valley is about a mile from east to west and, on an average, a quarter of a mile from north to south. The hill on the northwest rises about 500 feet above the valley, and is cut into ravines on its eastern slope. On that eastern declivity stands the village of Nazareth. The houses are better than those in many other villages in Palestine, being made of the white limestone which is conspicuously displayed along all the higher parts of the investing hills. They are prettily situated among fig trees, olive trees, and some cypresses, while down below in the valley are gardens surrounded by hedges of prickly pear. In the midst of the gardens is the fountain of the Virgin, from which Nazareth derives its water, and whither doubtless Mary frequently went to obtain water for her household. Nazareth now contains 4000 or more inhabitants. A considerable majority of them belong to the Greek church; a smaller proportion are Roman Catholics; about one-fifth of all the inhabitants are Mohammedans, and there are also a number of Protestants. There is a fine Franciscan convent. The monks point out many sacred sites in Nazareth, but only the fountain of the Virgin rests on good evidence. The site of the attempted precipitation was probably near the Maronite church, where there are two or three bare scarp, 20, 30, 40, or 50 feet high.

The name Nazareth is written in several forms in the manuscripts of the N. T. Nazareth and Nazaret are the best attested, but the Alexandrian text has Nazareth, and in Mat. iv. 13 and Luke iv. 16 the Sinaitic and Vatican texts have Nazara. The different forms probably represent popular variations of the name in Palestine itself; the town having been called in Aramaic Nās'ra', or with the feminine ending t (th) retained, as was frequently the case in the names of towns (Zarephath, Daberath, Bozkath, Timnath), and pronounced under Hebrew influence. Nāsereth (cp. Aramaic 'gg'ra'' and 'iggereth', a letter) As thus explained, the word is a feminine participle. It is rare for the Semitic sound s to be represented by z in Greek, as this explanation of Nazareth requires; but it is not unparalleled (cp. Zilpah. Hebrew Silpah, Greek Zelpha). The Syriac preserves s, using the form Nās'rath. The Arabs who conquered the country heard the emphatic sibilant and perpetuated the name in the form en-Nāsirah. The Arabic name signifies helper or victor. The derivation of the original name is frequently sought in the Hebrew root naṣar, watch, protect, guard, so that Nazareth means protectress or guardian. But this root in Aramaic, including Syriac, is n'ar. Probably, therefore, the name Nazareth is derived from the root which appears in Hebrew neṣer and Aramaic naṣra', sprout (Targum, Job xxxi. 8), Nazareth accordingly signifying verdant place or offshoot.

Naz'ri-rite, in A. V. Nazarite [separated, consecrated (to God)].

A person, male or female, who was specially consecrated to God. Nazirites probably existed of old among the Hebrews, but their mode of life was brought under the regulations of the law at Sinai. The Nazirite vowed to separate himself unto the Lord for a certain specified period. He did not, however, become a hermit; he continued to live in human society. Nor was he necessarily an ascetic. By the law he must not drink wine or strong drink nor eat any product of the vine during the days of his separation, for from the time of the nomadic patriarchs the vine was the symbol of a settled life and culture, which were quite right in themselves, but were removed from the ancient simplicity of life and manners. See JONADAB. Nor must the Nazirite shave his head. The long hair was the visible sign of his consecration to God; the hair was the glory of the head and the product of the body he had devoted to God; and the cutting of the hair, which God made grow, was popularly regarded as rendering the head in a measure common (cp. Ex. xx. 25; Num. xix. 2; Deut. xv. 19). Finally, the Nazirite must not render himself ceremonially unclean by touching a dead body, even if the corpse should be that of a near relative. When the time approached for his vow to expire, he appeared before the priest, made certain prescribed offerings, shaved off his hair and burned it, after which he might again drink wine (Num. vi. 1-21). One might be a Nazirite for life instead of for a limited period, and might be dedicated to that mode of existence at or even before his birth. This was the case with Samson (Judg. xiii. 4, 5) and with Samuel (1 Sam. i. 11, 28). Samson, however, permitted deviations from not only the law of the Nazirite, but at the same time from other laws and ancient customs and the dictates of refinement. In the time of Amos profane people tempted the Nazirites to break their vow of total abstinence from wine, even offering it to them to drink (Amos ii. 11, 12). After the exile Nazirites became comparatively numerous (1 Mac. ii. 49; War. ii. 15, 1). John the Baptist was consecrated a Nazirite from his birth (Luke i. 15). The prophetess Anna was not unlikely a Nazirite (ii. 36, 37). It seems to have been the Nazirite vow that Paul was induced to take to allay the storm which his friends saw to be gathering against him on his last visit to Jerusalem (Acts xxi. 20-26). Wealthy persons often bore the legal expenses of poor Nazirites (Antiq. xix. 6, 1).

Ne'ah [emotion].

A place on the boundry line of Zebulun (Josh. xix. 13). Site unknown.

Ne-ap-o-lis [new city].

The seaport of Philippi, and the first place in Europe at which Paul touched (Acts xvi. 11; implied also in xx. 6). It was situated on the Strymonian Gulf, 10 miles east-south-east of Philippi. It is now called Kavalla, and is a Turkish city with Greek and Roman ruins in its vicinity.

Ne-a-ri'ah [perhaps, Jehovah hath shaken out (cp. Neh. v. 13; Ex. xiv. 27)].

1. A Simeonite captain, who took part in a successful war against the Amalekites near mount Seir during the reign of Hezekiah (1 Chron. iv. 42).

2. A descendant of Shecaniah (1 Chron. iii. 22, 23).

Ne'bal. See NOBAL.

Ne-ba'loth, in A. V. of Genesis Nebajoth [to the Hebrew ear probably high places].

A tribe descended from Ishmael (Gen. xxv. 13, 16; xxviii. 9; xxxvi. 3; 1 Chron. i. 29) and rich in flocks (Is. lx. 7). In the seventh century B. C. the Assyrians report the presence of the tribe in Arabia, and mention it, as does the Old Testament, in connection with Kedar. They are perhaps to be identified with the Nabathæan Arabs, who, as early as the fourth century before Christ, took possession of mount Seir, and spread thence northeastward into the country east of the Jordan (1 Mac. v. 25; ix. 35) as far as the Hauran and Damascus (Antiq. xiii. 15, 2). The entire country from the Euphrates to the Ælantic gulf of the Red Sea became known as Nabatene (Antiq. i. 12, 4). They were conquered by Pompey in 62 B. C., and in A. D. 105 Trajan converted their kingdom into a Roman province. Their capital was Petra, the ancient Sela. One of their kings, Aretas, is mentioned in 2 Cor. xi. 32.

Ne-bal'lat.

A town of Benjamin inhabited after the captivity (Neh. xi. 34), now Beit Nebála, about 4 miles northeast of Lydda and 1½ north of el-Haditheh, i. e. Hadid, and west by north of Bethel.

Ne'bat [look, aspect].

Father of Jeroboam I. (1 Kin. xi. 26).

Ne'bo [as name of a deity, is Semitic Babylonian Nabú, announcer; as a geographical name it may indicate that the place was a seat of Nebo's worship, or correspond to Arabic naba', and denote elevation].

1 A Babylonian god (Is. xlv. 1), who presided over knowledge and literature. The special seat of his worship was at Borsippa, near Babylon. In Isaiah's time images of Nebo were used as objects of worship (Is. xlv. 1).

2 A peak of the Abarim mountains over against Jericho (Num. xxxiii. 47; Deut. xxxii. 49), and the summit, apparently, of Pisgah (Deut. xxxiv. 1). Its probable site is Jebel Neba, 8 miles east of the mouth of the river Jordan. From its summit, especially from the elevation called Ras Siaghah, there are visible in the clear atmosphere of spring Hermon, at the foot of which lay Dan, and the mountains of Naphtali, and the hill country of Ephraim and Judah, which are bounded, and at Carmel washed by, the hinder sea, and the depression which marks the south country; and the Dead Sea and the Jordan valley.

3. A Moabite town near or on mount Nebo (Num. xxxii. 3). It was rebuilt by the Reubenites (xxxii. 37, 38; xxxiii. 47; cp. 1 Chron. v. 8), but came again into Moabite hands (Moabite Stone, 14; Is. xv. 2; Jer. xlviii. 1, 22). The site is generally believed to be marked by the ruins which are called Nebbeh, and are situated 6 miles southwest of Heshbon.

4 A town mentioned just after Bethel and Ai (Ezra ii. 29; Neh. vii. 33). Not identified. Neither Beit Nûba, 13 miles west-southwest of Bethel, nor Nûba, about 7 miles northwest by north of Hebron, is etymologically identical with it.

Neb-u-chad-rez'zar and Nebuchadrezzar [Nabu-kudurri-usur, Nebo, defend the boundary]. The two forms represent different Hebrew methods of reproducing the name.

Son of Nabopolassar and king of Babylon. His father headed a successful revolt of the Babylonians against Assyria and founded the Babylonian empire in 625 B. C. Pharaoh-necho, who ascended the throne of Egypt in 610 B. C., finding the power of Assyria weakened, marched into northern Syria about 608 B. C., and encroached upon Assyria (2 Kin. xxiii. 29; 2 Chron. xxxv. 20). But Nineveh, the capital of Assyria, was taken by the allied armies of Media and Babylon about 606 B. C., and the Egyptians had to reckon with the new claimants of the Assyrian dependencies.

Nabopolassar sent his son Nebuchadrezzar to meet them. The prince defeated them in 605 B. C. with great slaughter at the battle of Carchemish, drove them back to their own land, and subjugated the intervening regions (2 Kin. xxiv. 7, Jer. xlv. 2). But news arrived that his father was dead. Committing affairs in the west to his generals, he hastened back to Babylon and ascended the throne in 605 B. C. (con. Apion. i. 19). Information regarding his reign is derived chiefly from the Jewish sacred writers, including Nebuchadrezzar's contemporaries Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel, supplemented by notices on inscribed bricks, and the statements of the Babylonian historian Berosus, who lived about 250 years after Nebuchadrezzar. After its subjection, Judah rendered tribute to him for three years and then revolted (2 Kin. xxiv. 1). Nebuchadrezzar returned to Palestine after a while, suppressed the revolt, threw one king in fetters, presently ordered the new king to be carried captive to Babylon, and placed yet another king on the throne (2 Chron. xxxvi. 6, 10), see JEHOIAKIM, JEHOIACHIN, ZEDEKIAH. Zedekiah remained professedly loyal for about eight years; in the ninth year he struck for independence, being assisted by the advance of an Egyptian army (Jer. xxxvii. 5). The ultimate result was that Jerusalem was besieged and taken, 587 B. C., the temple burnt, and the leading inhabitants of the capital and the country carried into captivity (2 Kin. xxiv., xxv.; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 5-21, Jer. xxxix., li). About this time, probably in the seventh year of the Tyrian king Ithobalos and not of Nebuchadrezzar, Nebuchadrezzar began the siege of Tyre, which lasted thirteen years (Ezek. xxix. 18; con. Apion. i. 21; Antiq. x. 11, 1). In his twenty-third year, 582 B. C., he warred against Colesyria, Moab, and Ammon, and deported several hundred Jews (Jer. lii. 30; Antiq. x. 9, 7). Afterwards he chastised Egypt for the part it had taken in the Jewish war. About 572 B. C. he invaded Egypt (cp. Ezek. xxix. 19), and in his thirty-seventh year, 569 or 568 B. C., he again led his army against the Egyptians. It is probable that Nebuchadrezzar carried on other military campaigns, though the record of them is lost. He acted on the policy of transporting the inhabitants of conquered countries to other parts of the empire, and had thus at command much servile labor, which enabled him to carry out important works. He built the great wall of Babylon, erected a magnificent palace for himself, and repaired the great temple of Merodach at Babylon, the temple of Nebo at Borsippa, and many other sanctuaries. He is said to have built hanging gardens to remind his wife Amubia of her native Median hills (con. Apion. i. 19; Antiq. x. 11, 1), and to have constructed near Sippara a huge reservoir for irrigation, reputed to have been 140 miles in circumference and 180 feet in depth, besides canals across the land, and quays and breakwaters on the Persian Gulf. The form of madness from which he suffered when pride overthrew his reason was that called lycanthropy, in which the patient fancies himself one of the inferior animals, and acts as such. Nebuchadnezzar imagined that he had become an ox, and went forth to eat grass like other cattle (Dan. iv.). He reigned more than forty-three years and died after a brief illness in the year 562 B. C., leaving his son Evil-merodach to ascend the throne.

Neb-u-shaz'ban, in A. V. Nebushasban [Nabu-shizibanni, Nebo, save me]

A Babylonian prince who held the office of rab-saris under Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xxxix. 13)

Neb-u-zar-a'dan [Nabu-zir-iddina, Nebo hath given offspring]

The captain of the guard in the army of Nebuchadnezzar, which captured Jerusalem. He was chief in command of the troops which completed the destruction of the city and burnt the temple (2 Kin. xxv. 8-11, 18-21; Jer. xxxix. 9, 10; lii. 12-30; cp. xl. 10: xliii. 6). To the prophet Jeremiah, who had recommended his countrymen to submit to the Babylonians, he, by express orders from the victorious sovereign, showed all kindness (Jer. xxxix. 11-14, xl. 1-5). Five years later he deported a body of Jews (lii. 30)

Nec'ro-man-cy. See FAMILIAR SPIRIT and WIZARD

Ned-a-bi'ah [Jehovah hath impelled or is bountiful]

A son of king Jecooniah (1 Chron. iii. 18).

Nee'dle.

A sharp instrument required for embroidering and sewing (cp. Ex. xxxv. 35; Ecc. iii. 7; Mark ii. 21). The eye was called simply the hole (Mat. xix. 24, Greek). Fancy a camel trying to go through the eye of a needle! Yet this extreme suggestion aptly illustrates the difficulty, or rather impossibility, for them that trust in riches to enter into the kingdom of God (Mark x. 24-26).

Ne'geb, The [dry].

The grazing region lying a few miles south of Hebron (Gen. xviii. 1 with xx. 1; Num. xiii. 22); called in R. V. the South (Gen. xii. 9, R. V. margin). As a physical division of the country, it contrasted with the hill country, the lowland, and the Arabah (Josh. x. 40; xii. 8). The northern part of it was allotted to the tribes of Judah and Simeon (xv. 21-32; xix. 1-9). Notable places in it were Kadesh-barnea (Gen. xx. 1), Beer-lahai-roi (xxiv. 62), Beer-sheba (Josh. vi. 28), Ziklag (xv. 31), and Arad (Num. xxi. 1).

Neg'i-nah and plural Neginoth [playing on a stringed instrument; a stringed instrument].

A musical term occurring in the title of many psalms, where it denotes a stringed instrument, and is so rendered in R. V. (Ps. lxi). Elsewhere the word often means song, music.

Ne-hel'a-mite.

The designation of the false prophet Shemaiah (Jer. xxix. 24). It may be derived from his native place or from an ancestor, it is uncertain which. On the margin of the A. V. it is rendered dreamer.

Ne-he-mi'ah [Jehovah hath consoled].

1 One of the chief men who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7).

2 Son of Azbuk and ruler of half the district of Beth-zur. He repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 16).

3 A Jew of the captivity, son of Hachaliah (Neh. i. i). He was discharging his duty of cupbearer to Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia, when the king observed that he looked sad, and questioned him as to the cause of his sorrow. Nehemiah frankly told him it was the state of ruin in which the city of his fathers' sepulchers, Jerusalem, was lying. He therefore begged permission to go and build again the wall of the city. The king accorded him an escort of cavalry for the journey, gave him letters commanding him to the different Persian governors by the way, and appointed him governor of Judah, as Zerubbabel had been (Neh. i. 1-ii. 9, v. 14). He arrived at Jerusalem in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes' reign, 445 B. C. Ezra the priest was then at the Jewish capital, having come from Babylonia thirteen years previously. Nehemiah, on reaching the capital, made a journey by night around the city and viewed the ruined walls. He now intimated to the people his intention of rebuilding the walls, and solicited their active aid. They gave it with good will, each notable man undertaking a part of the wall (Neh. iii). The neighboring gentile tribes did not like to hear that Jerusalem was being rebuilt, and three of their representatives, Sanballat, the Horonite, Tobiah, an Ammonite, and Geshem, an Arab, put forth active efforts to stop the building. But they could neither circumvent nor intimidate Nehemiah, who resolutely held on his course. The builders also guarded against sudden attack by working with one hand while with the other they carried a weapon (ii. 10; iv. vi.; Eccles. xlix. 13). The wall was rebuilt in fifty-two days (vi. 15), in the year 445 B. C., 75 years after the temple had been completed. Attention was next turned to the instruction of the people (viii.), and a religious revival followed, which led to all the leading men, both of priests and people, sealing with Nehemiah a covenant to worship Jehovah (ix, x.). After governing Judah for twelve years, Nehemiah, in 433 B. C., returned to Susa. He asked for further leave of absence (xiii. 6), and, returning to Jerusalem, seems to have governed it for the remainder of his life, trying to enforce the law of Moses against all who in any way departed from its provisions (xiii. 8-31). Josephus states that he died at a great age (Antiq. xi. 5, 8). A successor, Bagohi by name, was in office in 411 B C (Elephantine papyri). For his connection with the formation of the canon, see CANON.

The Book of Nehemiah stands in the Hagiographa, or third division of the Hebrew Scriptures, immediately after Ezra and before Chronicles. In counting the books of Scripture, the Jews reckoned Ezra and Nehemiah as one book, see EZRA.

Nehemiah, informed of the wretched condition of Jerusalem (i), obtains permission of the Persian king Artaxerxes to visit Jerusalem temporarily as a royal commissioner (ii; cp 6). He incites the people to rebuild the walls (17). The names of the builders (iii). He finds it necessary to arm the builders because of the opposition of the Samaritans (iv). While the wall is in process of construction he corrects abuses among the people (v). The wall is finished notwithstanding all attempts of Sanballat and Tobiah to terrify Nehemiah, and the secret aid furnished these foreigners by nobles of Judah (vi). The city being large, but the population scanty, Nehemiah desires to increase the number of the inhabitants (vii. 4). To this end he gathers together the nobles, the rulers, and the people with the view first of reckoning them by genealogy and then of drafting some to dwell in Jerusalem. The register of them that came up at the first with Zerubbabel (vii. 6-73). It is the register of Ezra ii 1-70. Before the registration was accomplished, the seventh month arrived, which brought the populace to Jerusalem to the feast. The people ask that the law of Moses be read. The reading results in, first, their building booths in which to dwell during the feast (viii), and, second, in repentance of their sins and of their guilt in intermarriage with foreigners (ix). They subscribe or seal a covenant to obey God's law and to abstain from intermarriage with the heathen. A list of those who sealed (x). These religious acts having been performed, the original intention of making a registration of the people and securing additional inhabitants for the city is carried out. Lots are cast to draft one in ten from the country people to dwell in Jerusalem in addition to those already inhabiting the city (xi. 1, 2). A list of the families who dwelt at Jerusalem (3-24). A list of the priests and Levites who returned at the first with Zerubbabel (xii. 1-9). List of high priests from Jeshua to Jaddua (10, 11). A list of the heads of the priestly houses in the generation after the return (12-21). A list of the heads of the Levites at the same time and shortly after (22-26). The dedication of the wall (27 seq.) In the interval during which Nehemiah was absent at the Persian court abuses had grown up: the Levites had been illy provided for (xiii 10), the law of the Sabbath was observed with laxity (15), and intermarriages with foreigners had not entirely ceased (23). These abuses Nehemiah corrected.

Not only does the title assign the authorship of the book to Nehemiah (i. 1), but throughout the book Nehemiah speaks in the first person, except (1) when state documents and their dockets are inserted (x. 1; xii. 26); (2) incidentally in the midst of the account of Ezra's religious work, where the presence of Nehemiah as civil governor lending his official sanction, with other persons of authority, is briefly recorded (viii. 9; and (3) after an allusion to the days of David and Asaph and to the days of Zerubbabel, the days of Nehemiah are mentioned (xii. 47). In this last-mentioned passage the third person was in better taste in this connection than the first person would have been; and besides, the passage is a retrospect, taken after Nehemiah's return from the Persian court, and refers to what took place during the twelve years of his former administration.

It is universally admitted that Nehemiah wrote the main portion of the book. And the prayer of ix 6-38, which in the Septuagint is introduced by the words, "and Ezra said," and which in fact bears traces of being an utterance of Ezra (cp. 10 with Ezra ix 7, 15, 30 with Ezra ix. 1, 2, 11; and 8, 36 with Ezra ix. 9, 15), would be properly inserted without change of phraseology by Nehemiah in his historical work. But the narrative in viii 9 and x. 1 gives to Nehemiah the title of Tirshatha. Tirshatha is doubtless the Persian equivalent of pehah, governor (Ezra ii 63 with Hag. i. 1). The use of the third person in these and other passages is compatible with the theory of Nehemiah's authorship; but the title of Tirshatha given him is not so readily explained on the supposition that Nehemiah wrote the passages, for he elsewhere styles himself, and is referred to as, the pehah (v. 14, 18; xii. 26). Most modern critics believe that traces of another hand are discernible. Still the use of the first person plural in x. 30, 32, 34, a part of the section viii.-x., suggests an eyewitness of the events. If another than Nehemiah had a hand in compiling the book, the question whether this writer was contemporary with Nehemiah or later depends chiefly upon whether the genealogies (xii. 10, 11, 22) are brought down to the reign of Darius Codomannus, king of Persia from 336 to 330 B. C., and to the high-priesthood of Jaddua, who was officiating when Alexander the Great visited Jerusalem (Antiq. xi. 8, 4). If they are brought down to this date, neither Nehemiah nor a contemporary could have penned the words; but if the references to Jaddua merely name him as a youth, and include him because he was the heir to the office of high priest, the passages easily fall within the lifetime of Nehemiah and the reign of Darius Nothus, king of Persia from 424 to 405 B. C. It will be observed that the enumeration of families is assigned to the time of Joiakim, son of Jeshua and great-great-grandfather of Jaddua (xii. 12, 26), and the latest recorded events occurred in the generation before the high-priesthood of Jaddua (xii. 23; xiii. 28). The book was originally reckoned one with Ezra; see EZRA.

Ne'hi-loth [wind instruments] (Ps. v. title).

Ne'hum [consolation].

One of those who returned from the Babylonian captivity (Neh. vii. 7). Called in Ezra ii. 2 Rehum (cp. 3 Esdras v. 8), for which Nehum may be a copyist's error.

Ne-hush'ta [bronze].

Daughter of Elnathan of Jerusalem. She became the wife of Jehoiakim and mother of Jehoiachin (2 Kin. xxiv. 8).

Ne-hush'tan [piece of brass]. See BRAZEN SERPENT.

Ne-i'el.

A frontier village of Asher (Josh xix 27) Not identified. Perhaps the same as Neah (13).

Ne'keb [a hollow, perhaps a pass or a cavern].

A frontier village of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33). The R. V. joins the name with the preceding word, calling the place Adami-nekeb. The Jerusalem Talmud calls Nekeb Siadatha. This name Conder finds lingering, in a corrupted form, in Seiyâdeh, a ruin 3½ miles west by north of the exit of the Jordan from the sea of Galilee. But see ADAMI-NEKEB.

Ne-ko'da [perhaps, distinguished, a herdman].

Founder of a family of Nethinim (Ezra ii. 48, 60).

Nem'u-el.

1. A Reubenite, brother of Dathan and Abiram (Num. xxvi. 9).

2. A son of Simeon (Num. xxvi. 12); see JEMUEL.

Ne'phag [a sprout, an offshoot].

1. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar (Ex. vi. 21).

2. One of the sons born to David in Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 15; 1 Chron. iii. 7; xiv. 6).

Neph'i-lim. See GIANT.

Ne'phiah. See NAPHISH.

Neph'i-sim, or Ne-phu'sim; while in Nephishesim or Nephushesim, two spellings, one with sh, the other with s, are apparently combined in the same word [expanded ones].

A family of Nethinim (Ezra ii. 50; Neh. vii. 52), perhaps originally captives taken from the tribe Naphish (q. v.).

Neph'tha-lim. See NAPHTALI.

Neph'to-ah [an opening].

A fountain on the boundary line between Judah and Benjamin, to the west of Jerusalem (Josh. xv. 9; xviii. 15). It is generally located at 'Ain Lifta, 2 miles northwest of Jerusalem. Porter prefers 'Ain Yalo, 3 miles southwest of Jerusalem. Conder points out that the Jerusalem Talmud identified Neph'toah with En Etam, which he identifies with 'Ain 'Atân, 2½ miles southwest of Bethlehem; but his suggestion has not found favor.

Ne-phu'she-sim and Ne-phu'sim. See NEPHISIM.

Nep'tha-lim. See NAPHTALI.

Ner [a lamp].

1. A Benjamite, son of Abiel and father of Abner (1 Sam. xiv. 51). He or Abner was Saul's uncle (50). If Abner was Saul's uncle, Ner was Saul's grandfather and identical with the following.

2. A Benjamite, son of Jeiel and father or remoter ancestor of Saul's father, Kish (1 Chron. viii. 33; ix. 35, 36). See KISH 2.

Ne're-us [a sea god who, under Poseidon or Neptune, ruled the Mediterranean Sea].

A Roman Christian to whom Paul sent a salutation (Rom. xvi. 15), not improbably the son of Philologus.

Ner'gal.

A heathen deity worshiped by the Babylonians (2 Kin. xvii. 30). The chief seat of his worship was Cuthah. He was ruler of the nether world, and god of war and pestilence; and was represented under the form of a colossal winged lion with a human face.

Ner-gal-sha-re'zer [Babylonian Nergal-sharusur, Nergal, protect the king].

One of Nebuchadnezzar's princes, who held the office of rab-mag (Jer. xxxix. 3, 13). He is supposed to be Nergalsharusur, known to the Greeks as Neriglissar or Nerigolassar, who married a daughter of Nebuchadnezzar, murdered his brother-in-law Evil-merodach, and ascended the throne as the latter's successor (con. Apion. i. 20), reigning from 559 to 556 B. C.

Ne'ri.

An ancestor of Christ and somehow genealogically the father of Sheatliel (Luke iii. 27).

Ne-ri'ah [lamp of Jehovah].

Son of Maaseiah, and father of Baruch and Seraiah (Jer. xxxii. 12; xxxvi. 4; li. 59).

Net.

The net was used by the Hebrews in fowling (Prov. i. 17). Doubtless, as in Egypt, the clap net was used, a familiar form of which consisted of two half hoops or frames covered with netting and attached to a common axis. The trap was spread open flat, and the bait placed in the center. The motion of the bird at the bait released a spring, the two sides closed suddenly, and the bird was caught.

The net was also used in hunting (Is. li. 20). It was cast about the game (Job xix. 6).

or over it (Ezek. xii. 13; xix. 8), or laid to catch the feet (Ps ix. 15; xxv. 15; lvii. 6; Lam. i. 13). Throughout the ancient world, as sculpture and narrative reveal, it was usual to extend nets on stakes so as to inclose a large space as by a fence, a single opening being left as an entrance. Through this gateway various kinds of game were driven, such as hares, boars, deer; and once within the inclosure, they were under control and easily dispatched. Small nets were used to close gaps between bushes or to bar a path. Purse nets were laid, that animals might run into them as into a tunnel and find no exit.

In fishing both drag nets (Hab i. 15; Mat. xiii. 47, 48) and casting nets (iv. 18; John xxi. 6; Herod. i. 141) were used. The Hebrews were acquainted with the common drag net of Egypt (Is. xix. 8). It was quite large, its cords were made of flax, the lower edge was weighted with lead and sunk to the bottom of the river or sea, and the upper edge was floated by pieces of wood; see illustration, article FISHING. This form of net was widely used throughout the world (Homer, Odyssey xxii. 384-387; Pliny, Hist. Nat. xvi. 8, 13).

Ne'ta-im [plantings].

A place in Judah with royal plantations (1 Chron. iv. 23, R. V.).

Neth'a-nel, in A. V. Ne-than'e-el [God hath given]. The Greek form is Nathanael.

1. Prince of the tribe of Issachar at an early period of the wilderness wanderings (Num. i. 8; ii. 5; vii. 18, 23; x. 15).

2. Jesse's fourth son, and David's brother (1 Chron. ii. 14).

3. One of the priests who blew trumpets when the ark was brought up to the city of David (1 Chron. xv. 24).

4. A Levite, father of Shemaiah (1 Chron. xxiv. 6).

5. A son of Obed-edom in David's reign (1 Chron. xxvi. 4).

6. One of the princes whom Jehoshaphat sent to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. xvii. 7).

7. A chief of the Levites in Josiah's reign (2 Chron. xxxv. 9).

8. A son of Pashhur, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 22).

9. A priest, head of the father's house of Jedaiah in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. xii. 21).

10. A priest's son who blew a trumpet at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 36).

Neth-a-ni'ah [Jehovah has given].

1. A son of Asaph (1 Chron. xxv. 2), the head of the fifth course of singers (12).

2. A Levite sent with others by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. xvii. 8).

3. Father of Jehudi (Jer. xxxvi. 14).

4. Father of that Ishmael who assassinated Gedaliah (2 Kin. xxv. 23, 25).

Neth'1-nim, in A. V. Nethinims [given].

Temple servants or slaves given by David and the princes for the service of the Levites (Ezra viii. 20). Prior to their appointment, similar functions seem to have been discharged by the Midianites, whom Moses gave over to the Levites (Num. xxxi. 47), and at a subsequent period by the Gibeonites, whom Joshua assigned as hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of God (Josh. ix. 23). Even after the Nethinim were associated with them or superseded them, the number of the Nethinim may have been too small for the elaborate temple services instituted by David's son and successor, and been increased; for we find in the books of Ezra (ii. 53-58) and Nehemiah (vii. 57-60) the children of Solomon's servants, i. e. slaves, mentioned after and numbered with the Nethinim. Although they were organized by David, it was probably under a different name; for the word Nethinim occurs only in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, with a solitary passage in 1 Chronicles (ix. 2). They discharged the more menial duties required by the temple worship. Of the Nethinim and the children of Solomon's servants, 392 returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 58; Neh. vii. 60), and 220 more with Ezra (Ezra viii. 17-20). The Nethinim seem to have been naturalized foreigners rather than people of true Israelite descent (1 Chron. ix. 2; Ezra ii. 59; Neh. vii. 61), and several of the names on the list of their leading men have a foreign aspect (Ezra ii. 43-54; Neh. vii. 46-56). They were probably descendants of the Midianites and Gibeonites, who have been already mentioned, and of various bands of captives taken in war; they continued to be designated by the name of the prince or tribe from whom they were taken, as the children of Sisera, of Rezin, of Meunim, and of Nephthim (Ezra ii. 48, 50, 53; with 1 Chron. v. 19-21; 2 Chron. xxvi. 7). The children of Tabbaath and Keros, and of Solomon's servants the children of the Sophereth (Ezra ii. 43, 44, 55), which mean the children of the rings, of the weaver's comb, and of the scribal office, apparently denote the official duties in the temple which the men of these classes discharged. Other names are those of progenitors; and yet others seem to be the names of the native places of the captives, as perhaps Nekoda, Harhur, Harsha (ver. 48, 51, 52). Some of them lived on Ophel, a southern prolongation of the temple hill (Neh. iii. 26, 31; xi. 3, 21), others in the villages round about Jerusalem (Ezra ii. 70; Neh. vii. 73). Holding an official position at the temple, although the office was menial, they were exempt from imperial taxation (Ezra vii. 24). They seem to have adopted with some cordiality the covenant made at the instance of Nehemiah to worship Jehovah (Neh. x. 28, 29).

Ne-to'phah [dropping, falling in drops].

A town of Judah, evidently near Bethlehem (1 Chron. ii. 54); Ezra ii 21, 22; Neh. vii. 26). It was the home of two of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii 28, 29). Netophathites with Seraiah at their head were among the men who assembled loyally about Gedaliah, whom Nebuchadnezzar had made governor of Judah on the fall of Jerusalem (2 Kin. xxv. 23; Jer. xl. 8 seq.). Fifty-six of the town's people returned after the exile (Ezra ii. 22). It was not originally assigned to the Levites, but after the return its dependent villages were occupied by certain of them, including singers (1 Chron. ix. 16; Neh xii. 28). On the survey map it is located, with a query, at the ruin Umm Tôba, the Om Tôba of Tobler, and the Autûbeh of Van de Velde, 2 miles northeast of Bethlehem. Beit Nettif has also been suggested. It stands on a rocky crest, 12 miles west of Bethlehem. The distance seems rather great. Neither Umm Tôba nor Beit Nettif is the true counterpart etymologically of Netophah.

Ne-to'pha-thite, in A.V. of Neh xii 28 Netophathi, the Hebrew form being preserved. An inhabitant of Netophah (2 Sam. xxiii. 28).

Net'tle.

1. The rendering of the Hebrew Harul, burning plant, one that inflames. Men driven by want take refuge under it (Job xxx. 7). Along with the stinging nettle, Hebrew kimm'shon, it overspreads the sluggard's unweeded garden (Prov. xxiv. 31). In fact it springs up everywhere when cultivation of the land is neglected (Zeph. ii. 9). The plant cannot be identified. R. V. places wild vetches on the margin.

2. The rendering of the Hebrew Kimmsh in Is xxxiv. 13 and Hos ix. 6. The rabbinical idea that the plant is a nettle has been generally adopted. The Roman or pill nettle (Urtica pilulifera) is found everywhere in Palestine. The Hebrew word itself is probably more general in signification and comprehends a large class of weeds. A modification of the word is kimm'shon (Prov. xxiv. 31), which the English versions render thorns.

New Moon. See MOON.

New Tes'ta-ment.

The second of the two portions into which the Bible is naturally divided. Testament represents the Latin word testamentum, which is used to translate the Greek word diathêkê, covenant (2 Cor iii. 14). The N. T. embodies the new covenant of which Jesus was the Mediator (Heb ix. 15; cp x 16, 17 and Jer. xxxi. 31-34). The first covenant was dedicated with blood (Heb. ix. 19, 20), but was in no sense a testament; the second, while primarily a covenant was also a testament; that is, it was not merely dedicated with blood, but it required the death of the testator to give it force. It would not have had proper efficacy had not Jesus its Mediator died an atoning death.

With the possible exception of Matthew's Gospel, the books of the N. T. were written in Greek. This language had taken deep root in Palestine during the more than three centuries which had elapsed since the conquest of the Holy Land by Alexander the Great; and the merits of the language itself and that of the literature which it enshrined, had given it the widest currency among educated men throughout the Roman empire, though Greece had now for a considerable time lost its political independence.

The original manuscripts of the books of the N. T. and the copies made during the first three centuries have disappeared. Papyrus, which was commonly used for letters (2 John 12), soon wore out, and in the time of Diocletian, A. D. 303, it was customary for the persecutors of Christians to seek for copies of the Scriptures and destroy them. The art of printing was unknown, but transcribers laboriously multiplied copies. The four gospels were most frequently transcribed, and after them the epistles of Paul. The Revelation was copied least often. No fewer than 3791 ancient manuscript copies of the N. T. in whole or in part exist, their abundance markedly contrasting with the small number of the classical writers which have come down to our own day.

Corruptions of the text soon crept in. Copyists were fallible, careless, and often imperfectly acquainted with Greek. Men of the patristic age and later were not governed by the modern demand for scientific exactness, and they handled the text with considerable license. They attempted to improve the grammar and the style, to correct supposed errors in history and geography, to adjust the quotations from the O. T. to the Greek of the Septuagint, and to harmonize the gospels. They incorporated marginal notes, and they added to the gospel narratives incidents obtained from authentic sources, as John vii 53-viii. 1 and Mark xvi 9-20. The various readings which thus originated are very numerous. They number 150,000. Nineteen-twentieths of these are, however, of no authority, being evidently not genuine, and only the merest fraction of the remainder are of any consequence as affecting the sense. The very number of these readings, and the fact that they were made originally in different parts of the world, and from a variety of manuscripts, enables biblical students to detect and eliminate the errors, and approximate to the original text more closely than if the various readings were fewer. This tedious but necessary work has been carried out with untiring energy by textual critics. It is possible indirectly to gain access to the readings in manuscripts which have perished, for there were early versions of the N. T. in different languages, such as the Syriac and Latin, and quotations from the N. T. are found in the writings of the early Christians, especially in Clement of Alexandria and Origen. In most cases these versions and citations were made from manuscripts not now existing, but the translation shows what the original must have been.

The N. T. manuscripts fall into two divisions: Uncials, in Greek capitals; at first without breathings or accents and with no separation between the different words, except occasionally to indicate the beginning of a new paragraph, and very little even between the different lines; and Cursives, in small running hand, and with divisions of words and lines. The change between the two kinds of Greek writing took place about the tenth century. Only five manuscripts of the N. T. approaching to completeness are more ancient than this dividing date. The first, designated by biblical critics A, is the Alexandrian manuscript. Though taken to England by Cyril Lucar, patriarch of Constantinople, as a present to Charles I, it is believed that it was written, not in that capital, but in Alexandria, whence its title. Its date is believed to be the middle of the fifth century. In addition to a large portion of the O. T. and the First Epistle of Clement and part of the Second, it contains the whole of the N. T. except Mat 1-xxv 5; John vi 50-xiii 52, 2 Cor iv 13-xiii 6. The page is divided into two columns, and the text is marked off into chapters, Mark containing forty-eight. The second, known as B, is the Vatican manuscript. It has been in the Vatican library at Rome from 1475 or an earlier period, but not till 1857 was an edition of it published, and that one, by Cardinal Mai, when issued, was uncritical and of little value. But in 1889-90 a facsimile of it came forth, so that now it is fully accessible to scholars. The Vatican manuscript dates from the middle of the fourth century, if not even from an earlier period. Besides most of the O. T., it contains all the N. T. except Heb ix 14, xiii 25, 1 and 2 Tim, Titus, Philem., and Rev. It has three columns to the page, and is divided into short chapters, Matthew having 170. The third, C, or the Ephraem manuscript, is a palimpsest. In the twelfth century the original writing was washed out to make room for the text of several ascetic treatises of Ephraem the Syrian. Traces of the older writing were, however, discernible, and in 1834 the original text was revived by an application of prussiate of potash. It is believed that it belongs to the fifth century, and perhaps a slightly earlier period of it than the manuscript A. It contains portions of the O. T. and five-eighths of the N. T. The lines run across the page. The fourth, D, is the manuscript of Beza, to whom it belonged after it was taken from the abbey of St. Irenæus in Lyons at the sack of the city in 1562. It is commonly dated in the sixth century. It contains the greater part of the Greek text of the gospels and The Acts, together with a Latin translation. It is for the most part the only witness among Greek manuscripts to a type of text which was widely current as early as the second century, and of which the other principal representatives are the Old Latin and the Old Syriac versions. It is written stichometrically, i. e., in single lines containing as many words as could be read at a breath, consistently with the sense. The fifth, called \aleph (the Hebrew first letter, aleph), is the Sinaitic manuscript, obtained in 1844 and 1859 by Tischendorf from the monks belonging to the convent of St. Catherine on mount Sinai. Besides the major part of the O. T., it contains the whole N. T. without a break together with the epistle of Barnabas and a large part of the Shepherd of Hermas. The last twelve verses of Mark are lacking, but it is suspicious that the page where they occur seems to be a cancel. It was made in the fourth century. It has four columns to the page.

The cursive manuscripts, though numerous, are of too late date to stand on the same level for critical purposes as the uncials.

The first printed edition of the Greek N. T. actually published was that of Erasmus, who issued it in 1516. It was reprinted in 1518, a second and more correct edition followed in 1519, a third in 1522, a fourth in 1527. Cardinal Ximenes, the Roman Catholic primate of Spain, had been engaged for some years in preparing an edition of the Greek N. T., but various causes of delay kept it back from the world till 1521 or 1522. From being made at Alcalá, called by the Romans Complutum, it is known as the Complutensian edition. Among other editions of the Greek N. T. which followed, none were more celebrated than those of Robert Stephens of Paris. They appeared in 1546, 1549, 1550, and 1551. Then Beza the reformer came upon the scene, and issued several editions of the Greek N. T. between 1565 and 1604, based on Stephens' third edition (1550), which in turn had been founded mainly on Erasmus' fourth or fifth edition. Stephens' edition of 1550 is the tertius receptus in England, but on the continent of Europe this designation and authority are generally given to the first Elzevir edition, printed at Leyden in 1624. This Elzevir text is mainly that of Stephens' edition of 1550, from which it differs in 278 places, including merely orthographic variations. It was mainly from Beza's edition of 1598 that the A. V. of the English Bible was made.

The division of the O. and N. T. into our present chapters has been generally ascribed to Cardinal Hugo, who died in 1263, a Dominican monk, who used it for his concordance to the Vulgate. Its application in this concordance certainly brought this division into repute, and established the practice of citing by chapters instead of referring to the book merely or to some prominent narrative in the book (cp Mark ii. 26; xii. 26; Rom xi 2); but there is reason to believe that the present division antedates Hugo, and was due to Stephen Langton, archbishop of Canterbury, who died in 1228. The division of the N. T. into our present verses was made by Robert Stephens in the Greek N. T. which he published in 1551. The first English N. T. to be so divided was Whittingham's translation, Geneva, 1557, and the first English Bible so divided was the Geneva version of 1560.

Ne-zi'ah [bright, pure, illustrious].

Founder of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned with Zerubbabel from the Babylonian captivity (Ezra ii. 54; Neh. vii 56).

Ne'zib [statue, idol, military station].

A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv. 43). Beit Nusib, about 9 miles west-north-west of Hebron, is scarcely the site, for it is in the hill country.

Nib'haz.

An idol, one of two worshiped by the Avvites, a tribe brought with others from the Assyrian empire to colonize Samaria after the captivity of the ten tribes (2 Km xvii. 31). The Jewish rabbins derived the name from the Semitic root nabah, to bark, and considered that Nibhaz had the figure of a dog; but there is no reason to think that they were correct.

Nib'shan [soft, level soil].

A town in the wilderness of Judah (Josh. xv. 62). Site unknown.

Ni-ca'nor [victorious].

1. Son of Patroclus and one of the king's friends whom Lysias, regent in western Syria during the absence of Antiochus Epiphanes, in 166 B. C. selected to lead the army to suppress the Judean revolt (1 Mac. iii. 38; 2 Mac. viii. 9). The Syrians were defeated. Nicanor stood high in the favor of Demetrius I. also, and was appointed governor of Judaea by him (1 Mac. vii. 26; 2 Mac. xiv. 12). He professed friendship for Judas Maccabeus, but the Jew was not deceived. Nicanor engaged in battle with Judas at Capharsalama, and was slain in battle with him near Bethoron, 160 B. C. (1 Mac. vii. 27-49; 2 Mac xv. 1-36).

2. One of the seven men who were chosen in the church at Jerusalem to look after the Greek-speaking widows, and apparently the poor in general (Acts vi. 5).

Nic-o-de'mus [victor over the people]

A Pharisee and a member of the sanhedrin. Convinced by the miracles which Jesus wrought that the teacher of Nazareth had come from God, he sought an interview with him; but by night, to escape observation or because the hour was convenient. Jesus explained to him the nature of the new birth, and the love of God for the world which prompted him to give his only begotten Son that whosoever accepted him in faith might have eternal life (John iii. 1-21). At a meeting of the sanhedrin, when the members began to denounce Jesus as an impostor, Nicodemus pointedly asked whether the law condemned a man unheard (vii. 50-52). After the death of Christ Nicodemus took about a hundred pounds' weight of myrrh and aloes, and aided in preparing the body for burial (xix. 39).

Nic-o-la's-i-tans.

A party or sect in the churches of Ephesus and Pergamos whose practice and doctrine are severely censured. They held the doctrine of Balaam, and taught that Christians were free to eat things offered to idols and commit the excesses of heathenism (Rev. ii 6, 14, 15). Presumably the Nicolaitans were the followers of some heresiarch called Nicolas. There is no proof that he was the man of that name elected as one of the first seven deacons; although one tradition makes the deacon lapse into impurity and then become the head of an immoral sect; and another describes him as using unguarded language, which, though in itself innocent, was capable of being perverted to evil ends, and thus unwittingly originating an immoral party with which he had no sympathy. A sect of Nicolaitans existed among the Gnostics, which may have grown out of these corrupt Christians of the apostolic age.

Nic-o-la'us, in A. V. and E. R. V. Nic'o-las [victor over the people]

A proselyte of Antioch, who was one of the seven elected at the instance of the apostles to look after the interests of the Greek-speaking widows and apparently the Christian poor in general (Acts vi 5).

Ni-cop'o-lis [city of victory]

A place at which Paul, when he wrote the Epistle to Titus, hoped to winter (Titus ii 12). The note appended to the epistle makes it sent from Nicopolis of Macedonia, but it is of no authority. The place referred to in this postscript was situated on both sides of the river Nestus, which was the boundary line between Thrace and Macedonia. It is now called Nikopi. But the probability is that the Nicopolis at which Paul meant to winter was the town in Epirus, 4 miles from Actium, which Augustus founded in 30 B. C. to commemorate his victory. Herod the Great built a number of its public edifices (Antiq xvi 5, 3). Its ruins remain at Prevesa.

Ni'ger [black].

A Latin surname of Simeon, a prophet and teacher in the church of Antioch (Acts xiii. 1).

Night.

The period of darkness (Gen 1 5). It was divided into three watches: sunset to midnight, midnight to cock-crow, cock-crow to sunrise (Lam ii. 19; Judg. vii. 19; Ex. xiv. 24). The Greek and Roman division into four watches was in use in N. T. times (Luke xii. 38; Mark vi. 48). At this period the night, from sunset to sunrise, was divided into twelve hours (cp. Acts xxiii. 23).

Night Hawk.

The rendering of the Hebrew Tamush, violent one; an unclean bird mentioned in Lev. xi 16, Deut xiv 15. It is doubtful what bird is meant. The English versions make it the night hawk, which is another name for the night jar, better known as the goat-sucker (Caprimulgus europæus), or some species akin to it. The Septuagint and Vulgate identify it with the owl.

Night Monster.

The rendering of the Hebrew Liluth (Is. xxxiv 14, R V Margin; in A V screech owl). The word in Hebrew means simply nocturnal, and may denote any female nocturnal bird or beast. In Assyrian, it was applied to a nocturnal demon. See under SATYR.

Nile.

The great river of Egypt (Is. xxiii. 3, in A V Sihor, Jer i 18, margin of R V); in Hebrew Shihor, dark, turbid, and Y'or, stream. Its waters covered so vast an expanse, especially during the inundation, that it is sometimes called a sea (Nah. iii 8). The ultimate sources of the river are the streams which feed the Victoria Nyanza in equatorial Africa. But the Nile in a narrower sense, as it presents those peculiarities which have made it famous, is formed by the confluence of the White and the Blue Nile at the town of Khartum, from which point to its principal mouths at Damietta and Rosetta, a distance of upwards of 1800 miles, it traverses an absolutely barren country and receives one tributary only, the Athara, on the east side, about 180 miles below Khartum. The banks rise several hundred feet and at places to upwards of 1000 feet, resembling two large canal embankments, and wall the valley all the way to Cairo, where they diverge abruptly toward the east and north-west and face the protruded delta. A short distance above Assuan, the ancient Syene, a ridge of granite, extending for 180 miles from east to west, lies athwart the river's course. The stream breaks through this barrier, plunges down the rocks of the last or, on ascending the river, first cataract, and enters the bounds of ancient Egypt. All above that cataract was Ethiopia; all below was Egypt. The granite of this transverse ridge is colored, it is the well-known light-brown stone of which so many of the polished statues of the Pharaohs are made. Below Cairo the river divides and seeks the sea by several great channels. These mouths are now two, the Damietta and the Rosetta; but formerly they numbered seven, of which the most important were the eastern or Pelusiac, the western or Canopic, and the middle or Sebenytic (Herod. ii. 17).

As the river pursues its tortuous course through thirsty land, much of its water is consumed by evaporation and infiltration, and still more by the extensive system of irrigating canals. The loss at the time of the inundation within Egypt proper is about one-third of the total volume.

This annual overflow is the famous feature of the Nile. Its occurrence in a rainless region was mysterious to the ancients (Herod. ii 19-25). It is explained by the fact that all the sources of the Nile lie within the region of abundant periodical rains. These fall copiously on the sources of the White Nile about the time of the equinoxes, and in Abyssinia a little later. The Abyssinian rains, being nearer the mouth, cause a first rise, which reaches Egypt about the middle of June. This is followed in the course of a month by a sudden increase, due to the influx of the rising waters of the White Nile, when the river begins to swell steadily in volume with a resulting inundation which commences in the latter part of August. Toward the end of September the water ceases to rise, remaining at about the same height for a fortnight or more, but during the first half of October it rises again and attains its highest level. During a good inundation it reaches a height of 40 feet at Assuan and of 23 to 27 at Cairo. About the end of November most of the fields are left dry and covered with a fresh layer of rich brown slime; this is the time when the lands are put under culture. Occasionally inundation does not take place. Tradition was current and found record in an inscription on the rocks at Sahel, an island of the first cataract, that in the reign of Toser or Toser-Sa, a Pharaoh of the third dynasty, the inundation failed for seven years and a sore famine resulted. It failed for seven years in the time of Joseph (Gen xli 54); and it failed likewise for seven years in the reign of the caliph el-Mustansir, the resulting famine reaching its height A D 1070.

In the time of the Pharaohs the Egyptian agricultural year was divided into three equal parts; the period of the inundation (from the end of June to the end of October), that of the growing of the crops (from the end of October to the end of February), and that of the harvest (from the end of February to the end of June).

Nim'rah [limpid and wholesome water].

An abbreviation of Beth-nimrah (cp. Num. xxxii. 3 with 36); see BETH-NIMRAH.

Nim'rim [perhaps, a plural of Nimrah, limpid waters, or an abnormal plural for leopards].

A locality in Moab, noted for its waters (Is. xv 6; Jer. xlviii 34). Opinion as to its identification is divided between Beth-nimrah in the Jordan valley and the wady Nemeirah, near the southern end of the Dead Sea, where the ruins of a town Nemeirah, the leopard, exist. Tristram locates the site higher up the valley, where it is said there is an old Moabite city with the name Springs of Nemeirah. It has many well-watered gardens still in cultivation.

Nim'rod.

A Cushite, a mighty hunter and a potent monarch, the beginning of whose original kingdom embraced Babel, Erech, Accad, and Calneh, cities in the land of Shinar (Gen. x. 8-10, Mic. v. 6). The only ancient king of Babylonia known, who fits this description, and was at the same time celebrated in tradition and song, was Izdubar or, as there is reason to pronounce his name, Gilgamesh. He freed Babylonia from the oppressive rule of the Elamites and became king of Erech. He was a slayer of wild beasts, and his encounters with animals, not less than his exploits in war, were embodied in a poem, and formed a favorite subject for engraver and sculptor. His life became embellished with legend, and he was occasionally addressed in prayer by men of after ages; but through all the attributes which accumulated about him the fact remained clearly discerned that he was a mortal man. There is, however, no proof that Nimrod and Gilgamesh are identical, and the attempt to establish a relationship between their names has thus far proved fruitless.

Nim'shi [perhaps, drawn out, or active, lively].

An ancestor of Jehu (1 Kin. xiv. 16; 2 Kin. ix. 2), who was generally designated the son of Nimshi.

Nin'e-veh.

The capital of the Assyrian empire. The Hebrews embraced the entire population which was collected about the capital, and occupied the district at the confluence of the Tigris and the Upper Zab under the designation of Nineveh, the great city (Gen. x. 11, 12; Jon. i. 2; iii. 3; Judith i. 1). Nineveh in the narrower sense stood on the eastern bank of the Tigris, at the mouth of a small tributary which is now known as the Khosr, about 27 miles above the confluence of the Zab with the main stream. It was built by a people of Babylonian origin (Gen. x. 11). Its tutelary deity was the goddess Ishtar, to whom from a very early period a temple had existed in the place. This sanctuary engaged the attention of Shamshirraman about 1800 B. C., and after falling into decay, was rebuilt with splendor by Ashurbanipal about 1400 B. C. Asshur, 60 miles south of Nineveh and on the opposite bank of the river, was the ancient seat of government; but Shalmaneser erected a palace at Nineveh about 1300 B. C., and made it his capital, and from that period it was looked upon as the chief city of Assyria. Ashurnasirpal and his successor Shalmaneser, whose united reigns extended from about 885 to 825, had palaces in both Nineveh and Calah, and resided sometimes in one place, sometimes in the other. Their successors dwelt in Nineveh in the broad sense; but the palace was not always in Nineveh proper, but was often erected in one of the suburbs, as Calah or Dur-sharrukin or Tarbisu. The Assyrians were great warriors, and the spoils of the conquered cities and nations were brought to the capital and used to embellish it. It was also the center of some literary activity. About 650 B. C. Ashurbanipal gathered a great library, consisting of documents inscribed on clay tablets, which related to history, ritual, incantation, astronomy, mathematics. It was composed for the most part of copies of older works, which had been brought from Babylonia. The prophet Nahum calls Nineveh the bloody city (iii. 1), both because of the wars which it had waged for centuries with the surrounding nations, and because of the cruelty which was practiced by the victors. Ashurnasirpal, for example, was accustomed after his victories to cut off the hands and feet, and the noses and ears, and put out the eyes of his captives, and to raise mounds of human heads. In 625 B. C., when the Assyrian empire began to decline in vigor, Nabopolassar, governor of Babylon, declared himself independent, and about 606 B. C. the Umman-manda, fierce nomadic peoples of the far northeastern lands, acting in confederation with Nabopolassar, descended upon the plain and by their own might captured and destroyed Nineveh. They were greatly aided by a sudden rise of the Tigris, which carried away a great part of the city wall and rendered the place indefensible. So complete was the desolation that in classic times the departed Nineveh became like a myth. Yet all the while part of the city lay buried under mounds of apparent rubbish. Rich, English resident at Bagdad, inspected the mound called Kouyunjik, on the eastern bank of the Tigris, in 1820, and became convinced that it concealed the ruins of Nineveh. In 1843 Botta, French consul at Mosul, on the western bank of the Tigris, began to make excavations. He was soon diverted to Khorsabad, 10 miles off, the site of Dur-sharrukin. Between 1845 and 1850 Layard commenced operations at Nimroud, 18 miles south of Kouyunjik, then he made excavations at the latter place itself, which proved to be the site of Nineveh. George Smith conducted further excavations at the place from 1873 to 1876, and after his death the work was taken up and extended to other mounds by Rassam. The walls of Nineveh have been traced, and indicate a city 3 miles in length by less than a mile and a half in breadth, containing an area of about 1800 English acres. But, as already said, the Hebrews and perhaps other foreigners were accustomed to include under the name of Nineveh the complex of cities which included besides Nineveh Calah, 18 miles south, Resen between Calah and Nineveh, and Rehoboth-Ir, broad places or suburb of the city, which is perhaps identical with Rehbit Nina, suburb of Nineveh, which lay to the northeast of the city. These are the four places which are enumerated in Gen. x. 11, 12 as composing the great city. But they were not the only towns which sprang up in the environs of Nineveh. Yarmja, on the river directly south of Nineveh, marks an ancient site, and near the Tigris, 3 miles above Nineveh, was Tarbisu, with a royal palace, beginning the imposing line of habitations and walled towns which extended along the river southward to Calah. Back from the river, northeast of Nineveh and beyond Rehbit Nina, at the foot of the eastern mountains, was Dur-sharrukin or Sargon's burg, a town about as large as Calah, built about 707 B. C., and containing a great palace. Seven miles southeast, and also at the foot of the eastern mountain, was another town scarcely inferior in size to Calah. Its ancient name is unknown, but it is situated hard by Baasheihah. It was one of a series of towns which extended to Calah. Birtelleh, 6 miles south, probably marks the site of an ancient town, and Keremlis, 3 miles farther on, is known to do so. Imgurbel, with its palace and temple which Ashurnasirpal adorned, was 6 miles south of the latter place, and was 9 miles from Calah. Other towns and villages dotted the plain within the bounds which have been thus defined. It may be that Diodorus Siculus, of the first century B. C., is citing an authentic tradition when he states that Nineveh formed a quadrangle measuring 150 stadia by 90, or 480 in circuit, about 60 miles. Strabo, a few years later, says that it was much larger than Babylon.

Ni'san [Assyrian Nisannu, probably opening, beginning].

The name given after the captivity to Abib, the first month of the year (Neh. ii. 1; Esth. iii. 7). It nearly corresponds to March. See YEAR.

Nis'roch.

A god worshiped by Sennacherib. It was in the temple of Nisroch at Nineveh that he was assassinated (2 Kin. xix. 37; Is. xxxvii. 38). Nisroch is the Hebrew pronunciation of the name. Perhaps it represents the Assyrian god Nisku, or is composite and contains the name of the god Ashur.

Ni'ter.

Salt-peter, potassium nitrate; but among the ancients sodium carbonate and potassium carbonate. It is an alkali (Prov. xxv. 20), and in solution was used in washing clothes (Jer. ii. 22).

No and in R V once No-amon (Nah. iii. 8) [Egyptian nu-āa, the large city, or nu-amen, Amon's city].

The Egyptian city of Thebes, often called by this name on the monuments. Herodotus found its distance from On to be a voyage of nine days up the river (ii. 9). After the expulsion of the Hyksos from Egypt, Aahmes I., the founder of the eighteenth dynasty, turned his attention to the reorganization and improvement of the kingdom, and among other works embellished Thebes. The city at once rose to chief importance as the capital of the new empire, and became large, splendid, and populous. Homer speaks of its hundred gates (Iliad ix. 381). Its tutelary divinity was Amon, and the high priest of Amon was second only to the king. It remained the center of Egyptian civilization and power until, first, Esarhaddon, king of Assyria, conquered Egypt, in 672 B. C., and, afterwards, Ashurbanipal, his son and successor, subjugated the country and plundered the city in 664 B. C. (Nah. iii. 8). But even after that disaster, Thebes long remained a place of importance (Jer. xli. 25; Ezek. xxx. 14-16. Herod. ii. 3; ii. 10). It was finally destroyed utterly by the Roman prefect, Cornelius Gallus, for its participation in the revolt of Upper Egypt in 30-29 B. C. against oppressive Roman taxation. Splendid remains of the city, consisting of temples, obelisks, sphinxes, etc., still exist at Luxor and Karnak, on the eastern, and Kurna and Medinet-Habu, on the western side of the river. West of what was the site of the city there is a gorge cut into the lower limestone which contains the tombs of the ancient Theban kings.

No-a-di'ah [Jehovah hath met].

1. Son of Binnui. He was one of those who took charge of the gold and silver vessels brought by Ezra and the returned captives from Babylon (Ezra vii. 33).

2. A prophetess whose evil vaticinations were intended to frighten Nehemiah (Neh. vi. 14).

No'ah I., in A. V. of Matthew and Luke Noë [rest]

Son of Lamech of the posterity of Seth (Gen. v. 28, 29). The reason for bestowing the name Noah is stated in words which bear some resemblance to the name in sound. He called him Noah, saying: "This same shall comfort us (y'nah'menu) for our work and for the toil of our hands, because of the ground which the Lord hath cursed." This method is one of several which are employed by the Hebrew writers. The references to the years of Noah's life are capable of several explanations, in accordance with ancient methods of statement and of constructing genealogical registers. Several methods are mentioned in the article on CHRONOLOGY. The application of the first two of these to the data referring to Noah is simple and needs no explanation. The third method is more intricate, but is also applicable. According to it, in the family of Lamech, 182 years after it succeeded to the position of prominence among the children of Seth and became the family through which the church descended, a son was born whom his father called Noah, saying: "This one shall comfort us." Long afterwards, among the descendants of this child of hope, who are collectively called Noah, just as the descendants of Israel were frequently called Israel, appeared one in whom the hopes were realized, who proved a comforter, whose conduct and worship were rewarded by God's promise not to curse the ground again for wicked man's sake nor to smite any more everything living, who built the ark and who was the family's head and representative. He is referred to by the tribal name. His eldest son was about 100 years old when the flood came. This event occurred in the six hundredth year of Noah, that is, 600 years after the family which was spoken of as Noah had attained to leadership. If the third method is the true one, such is its application to the record concerning Noah.

Noah was a just man and, like Enoch, walked with God (Gen. vi. 9). But it was a time of almost universal apostasy. It was an age of religious indifference, when even the sons of God had become worldly and in contracting marriage chose by the outward appearance rather than by the disposition of the heart (vi. 2), and when men generally were living for the present moment, eating and drinking, marrying and giving in marriage (Mat. xxiv. 38). It was also an age that was defiant of God: there was secret hostility of the heart; men formed their plans without regard to God, every imagination and device of man's heart was evil (Gen. vi. 5); there was open defiance also; the earth was filled with violence, the strong oppressed the weak (11). The age was so corrupt that God purposed to destroy mankind; but a respite apparently of 120 years was given (3). By his exemplary life at least, Noah was a preacher of righteousness (2 Pet. ii. 5). To him God, the creator and Judge of all, revealed his purpose to destroy man, and commanded him to build an ark to save himself and his family and keep alive the various kinds of animals, for a flood of waters was to overwhelm the land. Noah did so. When the ark was finished, Jehovah, God of redemption, bade Noah enter the ark with his family and provide for their use the clean animals which they needed for food and sacrifice; and he who had created the beasts and the birds had them also go by pairs into the vessel for the preservation of their species. The same God of redemption shut Noah in. Then the flood broke in all its violence. See FLOOD. When at length the judgment purposed by the creator and governor of the universe was accomplished he remembered Noah and made the waters to assuage. After catching the first glimpse of the mountain tops, Noah waited the same length of time as the storm had raged, and then sent forth birds to discover whether the waters were abated from the surface of the earth. When he learned that they were, he tarried yet in the ark, waiting until God should bid him disembark. On New Year's day he removed the covering and saw that the ground was dry, but it was eight weeks longer before God bade him go forth. Then he built an altar and offered burnt offerings to the God of his redemption, who accepted the worship and purposed in his heart not to curse the ground again and smite every living thing on account of man's wickedness. God proceeded to reveal this purpose. As he had blessed Adam when he created him and had commanded that he be fruitful and multiply, so now at the beginning of a new world he blessed Noah and bade him be fruitful. He also laid injunctions on the head of the new race; but of the seven precepts of Noah, as they are called, which were regarded by the Jews as antecedent to the law and the observance of which was required of all proselytes, three only are expressly mentioned here: the abstinence from blood, the prohibition of murder, and the recognition of the civil authority (Gen. ix. 4-6). The remaining four, the prohibition of idolatry, blasphemy, incest, and theft, rested on the general sense of mankind. God further, in revealing his purpose not to curse the ground again for man's sake, pledged himself not to cut off all flesh again by the waters of a flood and adopted the rainbow as the sign of the engagement by which he had bound himself (8-17).

Noah naturally devoted himself to agriculture. Among other works he planted a vineyard, and he drank himself drunk on the wine. His son Ham mocked at his disgrace, but the other sons sought to protect their father. When Noah recovered, and learned what had occurred, with insight into character, and with that knowledge which he had derived before the flood of God's ordination that the evil propensities of parents descend to children and that God blessed the righteous in their generations (Ex. xx. 5, 6), he foretold degradation among the posterity of Ham, for some reason singling out one only of Ham's sons, predicted the subjection of this branch of the tribe to the descendants of the high-minded and godly brothers, pronounced the divine blessing on the families of Shem and Japheth, and announced especially their united service of Jehovah, God of Shem (Gen ix 20-27); see CANAAN, JAPHETH, and SHEM.

Noah lived, or the family which he represented continued its leadership, for 350 years after the flood (Gen ix 28). Then the Semites, as distinguished from the other descendants of Noah, became the leading family and the line in which the church descended. The flood seems to be referred to in Ps xxix 10, where muḥḥul, the special word for the flood, is used. Isaiah (liv 9) and Ezekiel (xiv 14) both allude to Noah. Our Lord compares the days of Noah to those which should precede his own second coming (Mat xxiv 37); the patriarch's faith is commended in Heb. xi. 7, and Peter twice alludes to the eight saved from the deluge when it overwhelmed the ungodly (1 Pet iii. 20; 2 Pet ii 5). The Greeks and Romans had a story about a flood from which only two people were saved, Deucalion and his wife Pyrrha; and this Deucalion may be Noah under a different name. However this may be, the Babylonians at any rate preserved a tradition of the same flood of which the Hebrews had knowledge. They called the hero of it Sitnapishtim and Atrahasis. See FLOOD.

No'ah II. [a moving, wandering].

A daughter of Zelophehad (Num. xxvi. 33, xxvii. 1; xxxvi. 11; Josh. xvii. 3).

No-a'mon. See NO.

Nob [elevation].

A town of the priests (1 Sam. xxii. 19), in the territory of Benjamin (Neh. xi. 32), on the north and apparently within sight of Jerusalem (Is. x. 32). After the capture of the ark, the tabernacle was for a time pitched at Nob, with Ahimelech as high priest. He was ignorant of the variance between Saul and David, and when the latter came to Nob, Ahimelech allowed him and his men to eat the showbread and gave him the sword of Goliath. This act was reported to Saul, who summoned the priests and had them slain, and smote Nob, men, women, and children with the sword. Abiathar, however, escaped and told David (1 Sam. xxi., xxii.) The place was inhabited after the exile (Neh. xi. 32), but its site has not been identified.

Robinson contents himself with locating it 'somewhere upon the ridge of the mount of Olives, northeast of the city.'

No'bah [barking].

1. A Manassite, presumably, who captured the town of Kenath, on the western slope of the Jebel Hauran, and gave it his own name (Num. xxxii. 42). The old name was probably ere long restored. See KENATH.

2. A town mentioned in connection with the Gadite town of Jogbehah. A road leading to the country of the nomads passed on the east (Judg. viii. 11). The site of Nobah is accordingly to be sought near the boundary between Gad and the Arabian desert.

No'bal, in A. V and margin of R. V. Ne-bal, which is the traditional pronunciation.

One of the chiefs of the people who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 19).

Nod [in Hebrew, wandering, exile].

A district on the east of Eden to which Cain went and there abode (Gen. iv. 16). Not identified.

No'dab [nobility].

An Arab tribe of the Syrian desert, to judge from their allies (1 Chron. v. 19).

No'e. See NOAH.

No'gah [brilliance].

A son of David (1 Chron. iii. 7, xiv. 6).

No'hah [rest].

The fourth son of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 2), who, however, did not give rise to a tribal family. He is not mentioned among those who accompanied Jacob into Egypt, probably because he was born after the migration into Egypt. Keil offers a different explanation. He supposes that Nohah either is another name for Shephupham (Num. xxvi. 39, R. V.), or else was a celebrated chief who was descended from Shephupham and whose name supplanted Shephupham as the designation of the family.

Non. See NUN.

Noph. See MEMPHIS.

No'phah [possibly, a breeze].

A Moabite town (Num. xxi. 30), not elsewhere mentioned. The text is open to question.

Nose Jew'el.

A jewel inserted, generally by means of a ring, into the side of the nostril for ornament (Is. iii. 21, R. V.).

Nose Ring.

A ring worn as an ornament, especially by women (R. V. of Gen. xxiv. 47; Ezek. xvi. 12). It was inserted through the partition between the nostrils or in the side of the nose.

Num'ber and Nu'mer-al.

There is no evidence that the ancient Hebrews used figures to denote numbers. The numerals which occur in the present text of the Hebrew Scriptures, in the Siloam inscription, and on the Moabite stone, are spelled in full. The Hebrews employed the letters of the alphabet to represent numerals as early as Maccabæan times, using aleph for one, beth for two. This practice is exhibited on the coins of Simon; see MONEY. In the Nabathæan inscriptions of the first century the numerals are generally spelled, but they are occasionally represented by signs, upright strokes for the smaller units, a figure like 5 without the upper horizontal arm for five, and other marks. In the Aramaic inscriptions of the same period at Palmyra signs are also used. On the lion weights, which were used by Aramæan traders in Nineveh in the eighth century B. C., the weight is indicated by upright strokes for the units and a horizontal stroke for ten. In yet earlier centuries the Assyrians and Babylonians used cuneiform signs to indicate number.

Numbers were used symbolically and conventionally. Three had apparently no symbolism; but emphasis was conventionally expressed by it; as "The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord, are these" (Jer. vii. 4), "O earth, earth, earth" (xxii. 29), "I will overturn, overturn, overturn it" (Ezek. xxi. 27), "Holy, holy, holy" (Is. vi. 3), and the triple blessing (Num. vi. 24-26). The threefold character of the baptismal formula and the apostolic benediction resulted from the doctrine of the Trinity (Mat. xxviii. 19, 2 Cor. xiii. 14). Four does not play an important part. Four corners or quarters of the earth were recognized, north, south, east, and west (Is. xi. 12), and hence four winds (Dan. vii. 2), and four chariots (Zech. vi. 1, 5). Seven was early a sacred number among the Semites (Gen. ii. 2; iv. 24; xxi. 28). It did not derive its character from the fact that it was equal to three plus four. Not arithmetical, but religious considerations were involved; see SABBATH. Ten was recognized as a complete number, and was constantly used as such; there were ten commandments (Ex. xxxiv. 28), ten antediluvian and ten postdiluvian patriarchs (see CHRONOLOGY), and a tenfold division of the book of Genesis. Twelve was the basis of the duodecimal system of the Babylonians, and as a result found employment in common life. Something of it was probably inherited by the Hebrews, and was enhanced by the fact that the tribes of Israel were twelve. Forty was a round number much in vogue (Ex. xxiv. 18; 1 Kin. xix. 8; Jonah iii. 4; Mat. iv. 2; and CHRONOLOGY III).

Num'bers.

The fourth book of the Pentateuch. In the Hebrew Scriptures it is named "In the wilderness" (see Num. i. 1). Its modern designation originated with the Greek translators, and was chosen on account of the two enumerations of the people which the book relates; the first at Sinai in the second year of the exodus, the second on the Jordan in the fortieth year.

It may be divided into three main sections: 1. In the wilderness at Sinai (i. 1-x. 11). Census of the people, exclusive of the Levites, with assignment of a place for each tribe in the encampment (i. ii.); census of the Levites, their location in the camp, and specific duties (iii, iv). The unclean removed from the camp (v. 1-4). Law that the restitution for a trespass go to the priest in case the person wronged, to whom it ordinarily went, has died and is without heirs (5-10). Laws about jealousy and Nazirites, and form of the priest's blessing (v. 11-vi. 1). Offering of the princes at the dedication of the tabernacle (vii). The place of the seven lamps (viii. 1-4). Consecration of the Levites (5-22), and the age of entering service (23-26); see LEVITES. Observeance of the passover and law of the supplementary celebration (ix. 1-14). The guiding pillar of cloud (15-23) and silver signal trumpets (x. 1-10). 2. On the way from Sinai to the Jordan (x. 11-xxi. 35). Order of march (x. 11-28). Hobab invited to go with Israel (29-32). A stage of the journey (33, 34). Words used when the ark set forward and when it rested (35, 36). Murmurs against the manna, seventy elders to aid Moses, descent of quails (xi.). Miriam's leprosy (xii.). At Kadesh: the spies and their report, the people faithless and condemned to die in the wilderness (xiii, xiv). Supplementary legal specifications (xv). Rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram; and related events (xvi, xvii); in consequence, duties and privileges of the priests and Levites affirmed (xviii.). Law for purification of those defiled by contact with a dead body (xix.). Return to Kadesh: death of Miriam, son of Moses and Aaron, embassy to Edom (xx. 1-21). Death of Aaron, journey from mount Hor around Edom to plains of Moab, fiery serpents, conquest of the country east of the Jordan (xx. 22-xxi. 35). 3. At Shittim opposite Jericho (xxii. 1-xxxvi. 13). Balaam (xxii.-xxiv.). Sin of Baal-peor (xxv). Census of the new generation (xxvi). Laws regarding inheritance by daughters (xxvii. 1-11). Public announcement of Joshua as Moses' successor (12-23). Further regulation of the daily offerings and of vows (xxviii.-xxx.). War with Midian (xxxi). Assignment of the conquered country east of Jordan to the Reubenites, Gadites, and half-tribe of Manasseh (xxxii.). Itinerary from Egypt to Shittim (xxxiii). Boundaries of the land and a commission on allotment (xxxiv.). Laws of the cities of refuge (xxxv). Supplementary law concerning inheritance by daughters (xxxvi).

The book of Numbers is recognized by all schools of criticism to reflect the same social conditions and laws as Leviticus.

NU-me'ni-us [pertaining to the new moon]. A Jew, son of Antiochus and a member of the senate (Antiq. xiii 5, 8), sent as ambassador to Rome and Sparta in 144 B C by Jonathan Maccabæus, and dispatched a second time to Rome by Simon in 140 B C. (1 Mac. xii. 16; xiv. 24; xv. 15).

Nun, in A V and Hebrew text once Non (1 Chron vii 27) [fish].

1. Father of Joshua, the military leader (Ex xxxiii 11; Josh i 1), descended through Tahan and perhaps Beriah from Ephraim (1 Chron. vii 27)

2. The fourteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet English N has the same origin and represents it in anglicized Hebrew names It heads the fourteenth section of Ps cxix, in which section each verse of the original begins with this letter.

Nurse.

1 A wet nurse, meneketh, employed to suckle an infant (Ex ii 7-9; 2 Km xi 2). Deborah, who had nursed Rebekah, remained an honored servant in the family (Gen xxiv. 39, xxxv 8), as was frequently the case (Odyssey xix. 15, 251).

2 A male or female attendant, 'omen, who acted as nurse, ṛ e, had the care of small children, either when infants (Num xi 12, Ruth iv. 16) or when older but still helpless (2 Sam. iv. 4).

Nuts.

1 The rendering of the Hebrew Botum, pistachio nuts (Gen. xliii 11, R V margin). The true pistachio tree (Pistacia vera) belongs to the order Anacardiaceæ (anacards or terebinths) Its leaves have, as a rule, three or four leaflets. Its fruit, which is a little less than an inch in diameter, consists of a bony shell surrounded by a dry covering and enclosing a sweet, somewhat oily kernel. The nuts are eaten like almonds or used for making confectionery. It is a native of western Asia, from which it has been introduced into southern Europe. It is not now common in Palestine. Jacob sent some of its fruit, with other vegetable produce, as a present to the Egyptian prime minister (Gen. xliii 11).

2 The rendering of the Hebrew word 'qoz, walnut (Song vi 11) The walnut tree (Juglans regia), in America distinguished as the English walnut, is native from the Caucasus to the mountains of northern India. It is cultivated in Galilee and along the slopes of Lebanon and of Hermon.

Nym'phas [sacred to the muses]

A Christian at Laodicea or Colossæ, to whom Paul sent salutation (Col. iv. 15).

O.

Oak.

1 A rendering of the Hebrew word 'Elah, a strong tree. The Hebrew word occurs in fifteen passages of the O T. In three of these it serves as a geographical designation and is treated as a proper name, valley of Elah (1 Sam. xvii. 2, 19; xxi. 9; R. V. margin, terebinth. In two passages, where it is associated with another word, 'allon, which is rendered oak, it is translated terebinth in R V, but teil tree and elms in A. V. (Is. vi. 13; Hos. iv 13). In the remaining ten passages it is rendered oak, with terebinth on the margin of R. V.

2. The rendering of the Hebrew 'Elon, strong one, in the text of nine passages of the R V, terebinth being placed on the margin. The A V, following the Targums and Vulgate, uniformly renders 'elon, by plain, but on the margin of Judg ix 6 it substitutes oak. There were the oak of Moreh (Gen. xii 6; Deut. xi 30), the oak of Mamre (Gen. xiii 18; xiv 13; xviii. 1), the oak in Zaanannim (Judg iv. 11), the oak of the pillar that was in Shechem (ix. 6), the oak of the augurs (ix 37, R V. margin), and the oak of Tabor (1 Sam. x 3).

3. The rendering of the Hebrew word 'El, strong tree, in Is i 29.

4 The uniform and doubtless correct rendering of the Hebrew word 'Allon. It occurs in eight passages, and was a species of oak associated with Bashan (Is ii. 13; Ezek. xxvii 6, Zech. xi 2). Under a tree of this species near Bethel Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, was buried (Gen xxxv. 8) It was probably the prickly oak (Quercus coccifera); see illustration, article ABRAHAM

5 The rendering, probably correct, of the Hebrew word 'Allah (Josh xxiv. 26).

Oak is the meaning of 'allon, for it was a characteristic tree of Bashan. 'Elah differed from it (Is vi 13. Hos iv. 13), and hence is probably the terebinth; and the three related words, 'elah, 'el, and 'elon, may denote three kinds of terebinth. They may, however, designate any large tree, and not specify the terebinth in particular. Several species of oak grow in Palestine Quercus sessiliflora grows high up on Lebanon and in the Hauran. Four varieties of the prickly evergreen oak (Q. coccifera) occur: one is Q. pseudococcifera, and is found on Carmel, in Gilead, and in Bashan, often being of magnificent growth; another is Q. calliprinos, which is found in Lebanon, on Tabor, and in Gilead. Valonia oak (Q. equlops) is deciduous. It is common in Galilee and Gilead.

Oath.

An appeal to God in attestation of the truth of a statement or of the binding character of a promise (Gen. xxi. 23; xxxi. 53; Gal. i. 20; Heb. vi. 16). Its violation was an offense against God (2 Chron. xxxvi. 13; Ezek. xvii. 13, 18). Sometimes the appeal was to the sovereign or other sacred object (Gen. xlii. 15; 2 Sam. xi. 11; Mat. v. 33; xxiii. 16-22). Jehovah condescended to confirm his promise to the patriarch by an oath, swearing by himself (Gen. xxii. 16; Heb. vi. 13-20). An oath was commonly made by lifting the hand unto God (Gen. xiv. 22;

Ezek. xx. 5, 6; Rev. x. 5; Homer, Iliad xix. 254, but it was sometimes made by placing the hand under the thigh of the person to whom the promise was made (Gen. xxiv. 2; xlvii. 29), probably as an invocation of the posterity, which should proceed from the loins, to guard the oath and avenge its violation. The oath was occasionally taken before the altar (1 Kin. viii. 31). Abraham gave Abimelech seven ewe lambs as witness of the oath (Gen. xxi. 27-31). An oath was sometimes intensified by slaying an animal, dividing it into two parts, and passing between the pieces (xv. 8-18). Each party to the oath invoked upon himself the fate of the victim if he broke the covenant. By the Mosaic law, in certain judicial investigations, a man to clear himself was required to swear an oath of the Lord (Ex. xxii. 11; Num. v. 19-22). Any man swearing an oath or making a vow to God was required to carry out his promise, as was a woman, if being a virgin her father did not disallow her oath when she uttered it, or being married her husband did not interfere. If she was a widow, or had been divorced, her oath stood (Num. xxx.). If anyone swore falsely by the name of the true God, he profaned the divine name (Lev. vi. 3; xix. 12; cp. Is. xlviii. 1; Jer. xii. 16; Mal. iii. 5); and no one was under any circumstances to swear by a false god (Josh. xxiii. 7). The man is commended in Ps. xv. 4 who does not change, although he has sworn to his hurt. Our Lord condemned the use of oaths, even when taken with the best intention, declaring that whatever went beyond "yea, yea, or nay, nay," was of the evil one (Mat. v. 33-37). He was delivering the sermon on the mount and correcting various perversions of the law which the scribes had introduced; and among other evils, he condemned swearing in ordinary communications between man and man. But the judicial oath is lawful; for it was enjoined by God (Ex. xxii. 11), and Christ himself did not hesitate to answer when he was put upon his oath by the high priest (Mat. xxvi. 63). The oath was recognized as lawful by the apostles also, for they called on God to witness to the truth of what they said (2 Cor. xi. 31; Gal. i. 20). The mischief which may arise from a rash oath was well illustrated in that of Herod the tetrarch, which made him against his will the murderer of John the Baptist (Mat. xiv. 3-12).

O-ba-di'ah [worshiper of Jehovah].

1. A man of Issachar, family of Tola, house of Uzzi (1 Chron. vii. 3).
2. A Gadite hero who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 9).
3. Father of the chief of the Zebulunites in David's reign (1 Chron. xxvii. 19).
4. A descendant of Jonathan (1 Chron. viii. 38; ix. 44).
5. The governor of Ahab's palace, who during the persecution of Jehovah's prophets by queen Jezebel, hid a hundred prophets, in two companies of fifty, in a cave (1 Kin. xviii. 3, 4). He was sent by his royal master to look for grass for the horses and mules during the great drought, and while so engaged fell in with Elijah, who persuaded him to announce to the king the presence of the prophet (5-16). Elijah's interview with the king led to the contest at Carmel, which was followed by the slaughter of Baal's prophets.

6. One of the princes sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. xvii. 7).

7. A prophet of Judah (Obad. 1). Josephus believed that he was the God-fearing Obadiah of Ahab's palace, but the prophet probably lived at least a century after Ahab.

The book of Obadiah is the fourth of the minor prophets. It consists of a solitary chapter, and foretells the destruction of Edom (1-9) and the reason of it, namely, Edom's unbrotherly attitude toward the children of Jacob (10, 11), warns Edom accordingly not to exult over the children of Judah in their distress (12-16), and predicts the deliverance and enlargement of Israel (17-21). The entire prophecy derives its incentive and strength from the great truth, clearly discerned by other holy men of God as well as by Obadiah, that the day of Jehovah is coming upon all nations (15) to the destruction of every foe, native and foreign, of God's rule on earth; and the kingdom shall be Jehovah's (21); cp. Is. ii. 12, 17, 20, 21; x. 12-19; Joel iii. 12-21; Amos v. 18; ix. 8-15; Micah iv. 11-13).

Much uncertainty exists as to the date of the prophecy. 1. It is very generally ascribed to the Chaldean period, when Jerusalem was alternately subject to the king of Egypt and the king of Babylon, and was finally captured by Nebuchadnezzar in 587 B. C., razed to the ground, and its inhabitants carried into captivity. This view is based on the description of Judah's calamity (10-16), and the fact is appealed to that Edom gave its sympathy to Babylon at this crisis (Ps. cxxxvii. 7) and prophets of the time severely denounced Edom (Jer. xlix. 7-22; Ezek. xxv. 12-14; xxxv. 11). The prophecy may, however, be much earlier, for 1. No allusion is made to the striking features of the fall of Jerusalem, the burning of the temple, the razing of the walls, and annihilation of the city. 2. The relation of verses 1-9 to Jer. xlix. 7-22. It is generally conceded that the unity and movement of Obadiah's thought and the general nature of the resemblance between the two passages indicate Jeremiah's dependence on Obadiah. 3. The hostile attitude of Edom was of long standing (Ezek. xxxv. 5), and the feeling against Edom expressed by Obadiah was voiced by Amos more than a century before the Chaldean invasion (Amos i. 6, 9, especially 11, 12; ix. 12; cp. Joel iii. 19). 4. Particular historical conditions, which are presupposed by the prophet, existed as early as the reign of Ahaz. Jerusalem had been plundered several times; it had been entered and ravaged by Arabians and Philistines in the reign of Jehoram (2 Chron. xxi. 16, 17; cp. Amos i 6); and in the reign of Amaziah, who slaughtered the Edomites, the king of Israel entered Jerusalem, broke down the northern portion of the city wall, plundered temple and palace, and carried off hostages (2 Kin. xiv. 14, 17; 2 Chron. xxv. 11, 12, 23, 24). These events may well have called forth those manifestations of Edom's unbrotherly spirit, which Obadiah rebukes. In that case the prophecy would date from about 791 B. C., and antedate Joel (cp. Obad. 17; Joel ii 32; see JOEL); but if it does, its position after Joel is a marked departure from the prevailing chronological order of the minor prophets. III The book may, however, be approximately in its proper chronological place, and accordingly date from the time of Ahaz. For calamities befell Judah in the reign of Ahaz the king of Damascus wrested Edom from Judah, the king of Israel ravaged to the gates of Jerusalem, the Philistines took the cities of the lowland, and Ahaz stripped the temple of its treasures to buy aid from the king of Assyria, did homage to this foreigner, and made Judah a vassal state, Israelites also were carried into captivity (Obad. 20, Amos i 6, 9; cp. 1 Chron. v 26), then the Edomite did violence to his brother Jacob, refrained from extending aid, and became as one of Judah's enemies (2 Chron. xxviii 17, 2 Kin. xvi. 6, R V margin, Obad. 10, 11). The year 731 B. C. or slightly earlier, in the reign of Ahaz when Judah was so deeply humiliated, was an appropriate time for Obadiah to take up his prophecy against the Edomites, rebuke them for their indifference to Judah's woes and for their open hostility in the past and present, and warn them not to exult over Judah's present distress, for their own time of punishment is coming.

8 A Levite, one of the overseers over the workmen who repaired the temple in the reign of Josiah (2 Chron. xxxiv. 12).

9. Founder of a family, presumably of the lineage of David (1 Chron. iii. 21).

10 A descendant of Joab. He came from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra viii. 9).

11 A priest who, doubtless in behalf of a father's house, sealed the covenant made in the time of Nehemiah (Neh. x. 5).

12. A Levite, apparently founder of a family of porters (Neh. xii. 25). He seems to have been the Levite Obadiah, son of Shemaiah (1 Chron. ix. 16), called Abda in Neh. xi. 17.

O'bal [corpulence].

A people descended from Joktan (Gen. x. 28). 'Abil is the name of one of the oldest tribes of Arabia (Delitzsch) and of a district in Yemen (Halévy). Bochart suggests Pliny's Avalitæ on the African coast, near the straits of Bab el-Mandeb. In 1 Chron. i. 22 the name is written Ebal, jod being used instead of vau. These letters were often confused by copyists.

O'bed [server, worshiper].

1. Son of Ephlal, of the house of Jerahmeel, tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ii 37).

2. Son of Boaz and Ruth, and grandfather of David (Ruth iv. 17, 21, 22).

3. One of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi 47).

4 A Levite, one of the doorkeepers, son of Shemaiah, house of Obed-edom (1 Chron. xxvi. 7).

5 The father of a certain Azariah, in the time of Athaliah (2 Chron. xxiii. 1).

O-bed-e'dom [serving Edom, or Edom is serving].

1. A Gittite, that is a native either of the Philistine Gath, and, if so, probably a member of David's bodyguard, or else of the Levitical city of Gath-rimmon in Dan. He lived between Kirjath-jearim and Jerusalem, near the spot where Uzzah was struck dead for touching the ark. The ark was therefore taken to his house by David's order, where it remained three months, blessings attending him and his family for giving it accommodation (2 Sam. vi 10-12; 1 Chron. xiii 13, 14; xv. 25). If a Levite, he is doubtless identical with Obed-edom the Korahite (see number 3). The Korahites were a division of the Kohathite family to which Gath-rimmon was assigned, and the statement that God blessed him (1 Chron. xxvi. 5) seems to refer to 1 Chron. xiii. 14 and 2 Sam. vi. 11.

2. A Levite of the second degree, who with others acted as doorkeeper for the ark, and was moreover a musician who played the harp at the removal of the ark to Jerusalem, and afterwards as a regular duty in the tent erected for the ark (1 Chron. xv. 18, 21; xvi. 5).

3 A Levite, who as doorkeeper marched in front of the ark at its removal to Jerusalem (1 Chron. xv. 24). He is probably one with Obed-edom, son of Jeduthun, a doorkeeper for the ark in the tent at Jerusalem (xvi. 38), and who is generally, though on uncertain grounds, held to be the person mentioned in the preceding clause of the verse. He appears to be Obed-edom the Korahite (xxvi. 1, 4; cp. also 10 with xvi. 38), whose sons and grandsons, with their brethren, sixty-two in number, were among the ninety-three, of whom the courses were formed in David's reign (xxvi. 8). Their station was at the southern gate (15). The family was still on duty in the reign of Amaziah (2 Chron. xxv. 24).

O'bil [a camel keeper].

An Ishmaelite who had charge of David's camels (1 Chron. xxvii. 30).

Ob-la'tion. See OFFERING.

O'both [water skins].

A station of the Israelites before their arrival in the desert east of Moab (Num. xxi. 10, 11; xxxiii. 43, 44). Situation unknown.

Och'ran, in A. V. Ocran [troubled].

An Asherite, father of Pagiel (Num. i. 13).

O'ded [he hath restored].

1. Father of the prophet Azariah (2 Chron. xv. 1). In ver. 8 the text is evidently corrupt.

2. An Israelite prophet in the reign of Pekah. Meeting the army of the northern kingdom returning from battle with many captives of Judah, the prophet remonstrated with them on their unbrotherly conduct, and in the name of Jehovah called on them to send the captives home. His words produced a great effect. Some of the leading men in Samaria, persuaded by him as to the path of duty, refused to allow the army to bring the prisoners inside the city. They then clothed the naked, fed the hungry, and, mounting the feeble on asses, took them to Jericho, and handed them over to their countrymen (2 Chron. xxviii. 9-15).

Od-o-me'ra, in A. V. Od-o-nar'kes.

Chief of a nomad tribe, or possibly an officer under Bacchides, whom Jonathan Maccabæus smote (1 Mac. ix. 66).

Of'er-ings.

Offerings to God of various kinds can be traced from the dawn of human history. In the O. T. alone there are mentioned among others of early times the vegetable offering (Gen. iv. 3), the sacrifice of the firstling of the flock (iv. 4), the burnt offering (viii. 20; Ex. x. 25), the sacrificial meal (Gen. xxxi. 54), and the drink offering (xxxv. 14). An elaborate ritual of sacrifice existed among the great nations of antiquity, notably in Babylonia and Egypt, long before the days of Moses.

Offerings of many kinds to God constituted a marked feature of the Israelitish worship. Extended information on the subject is found in Lev. i-vii, but not there exclusively. Offerings were of two classes, public and private, according as they were offered at the expense of the nation or of an individual, and they were of three kinds: drink offerings, vegetable or meal offerings, and animal offerings or sacrifices. The shedding of blood was a necessary accompaniment of every offering made in accordance with the religion of Jehovah. Without it there is no remission of sins; and hence a bloodless offering could not be accepted from man, for man by nature and practice is a sinner and has no right to approach God. It is true that in certain cases, such as extreme poverty, a bloodless offering was permitted; but it was made and accepted only in connection with the blood of the great public altar (Lev. ii. 2, 8; v. 11-13).

The drink offering was not independent under the law. It was made only in connection with the meal offering which accompanied all burnt offerings, except perhaps that of Lev. xii. 6, and all peace offerings which were Nazirite, votive or freewill (Num. vi. 17; xv. 1-12). It was excluded from sin and trespass offerings.

The vegetable offering, called meat offering in A. V. and meal offering in R. V., consisted of white meal, or of unleavened bread, cakes, wafers, or of ears of grain roasted, always with salt and, except in the sin offering, with olive oil (Lev. ii. 1, 4, 13, 14; v. 11). It might form an independent offering; and part might be placed on the altar and the rest belong to the priest, as in private voluntary offerings (ii.), and when accepted as a sin offering from the very poor in lieu of an animal (v. 11-13); or else the whole might be consumed on the altar. In this latter case it corresponded to the burnt offering; and was made at the consecration of the high priest and at the cleansing of the leper (vi. 19-23; xiv. 10, 20). Or the vegetable offering might be subordinate, an accompaniment of a sacrifice. It was thus the invariable concomitant of the burnt offering, except perhaps that of Lev. xii.; and of peace offerings, except those obligatory at the feast of weeks. In these cases, according to tradition, it was entirely consumed on the altar. In other cases, part was placed on the altar and the rest went to the priest; namely, the wafers at the consecration of priests (viii. 26-28), in the thank offering (vii. 12-15), and at the release of the Nazirite (Num. vi. 13-20).

Animal offerings or sacrifices called for cattle, sheep and goats of both sexes, rarely for doves. The animal was required to be free from blemish and at least eight days old. Sacrifices were of three kinds, in each of which the blood made atonement (Lev. i. 4; xvii. 11). 1. The burnt offering, for which a male lamb, ram, goat, or bullock was prescribed. The case in 1 Sam. vi. 14 was extraordinary. The blood was sprinkled round about upon the altar, and the entire animal was consumed on the altar. It was expressive of the entire self-dedication of the offerer to Jehovah. 2. The sin offering and the trespass or guilt offering; for the former of which a bullock, a male or female goat, a female lamb, a dove, or a pigeon was used (Lev. iv. 4, 23, 28, 32; v. 7), while for the latter a ram was prescribed or, in the case of the leper and the Nazirite, a male lamb (vi. 6; xiv. 12, 21; Num. vi. 12). The blood was symbolically displayed, but in different ways. In the sin offering a portion of the blood was sprinkled before the Lord and smeared on the horns of the altar of incense, and the rest was poured out at the base of the altar of burnt offering, when the sin had been committed by the high priest or the nation; but in the case of other sinners, a part was put on the altar of burnt offering, and the rest was poured out as before (Lev. iv. 6, 7, 17, 18, 25, 30, 34). In the trespass offering all the blood was scattered over the altar. The fat only was burnt on the altar. The flesh of those sin offerings of which the blood was taken into the sanctuary was burnt without the camp, whereas the flesh of other sin offerings and of trespass offerings belonged to the priests (Lev. vi. 26, 30; vii. 6, 7; cp. Ex. xxix. 14; Lev. iv. 3, 12, 13, 21; xvi. 27; Heb. xiii. 11, 12). No part of these offerings was eaten by the offerer, as in the peace offerings; for the sacrificer came as one unworthy of communion with God, and these offerings were for purposes of expiation. The sin offering was made for sins of which the effect terminates primarily on the sinner; the trespass offering for sins of which the effects terminate primarily on another, and for which, in addition to the sacrifice, restitution was made through the hands of the priest to the person injured or, in case of his death without heirs, to the priest (Lev. v. 16; vi. 5; Num. v. 7, 8). But sins committed deliberately and for which the penalty was death could not be expiated (Num. xv. 30, 31). Atonement could be made for unintentional sins; for non-capital sins, like theft, for which punishment had been endured and restitution made; and for sins which the guilty one voluntarily confessed and for which he made compensation when possible. 3 The peace offering. Three kinds are distinguished: the thank offering in recognition of unmerited and unexpected blessings; the votive offering, in payment of a vow; and the freewill offering, probably not in gratitude for a special favor, but as an expression of irrepressible love for God (Lev. iii.). Peace offerings might also be prompted by the felt need of renewing peaceful communion with God (Judg. xx. 26; xxi. 4; 2 Sam. xxiv. 25). Any animal authorized for sacrifice, of either sex, might be used, but no bird. The blood was sprinkled; the fat was consumed on the altar; and, when the offering was private, the breast and shoulder went to the priests, and the rest of the flesh was eaten by the offerer and his friends before the Lord at the place of the sanctuary (Lev. iii. vii. 11-21; cp. 22-27; Ex. xxix. 20-28; Deut. xii. 7, 18; 1 Sam. ii. 15-17); see WAVE OFFERING. The meal before Jehovah was a eucharistic feast. It signified that Jehovah was present as a guest.

The sacrificial acts were five: 1. Presentation of the sacrifice at the door of the sanctuary by the offerer himself as his personal act. 2. Laying on of hands. The offerer placed his hands on the victim's head, thereby dedicating it to God and making it his own representative and substitute (cp. Lev. xvi. 21); see LAYING ON OF HANDS. 3. Slaying the animal by the offerer himself, who thus symbolically accepted the punishment due for his sin. In later times the priests slew the animal. 4. Symbolic application of the blood.

The priest sprinkled or smeared it on the altar and poured it out at the base. In specified cases a part was put on the offerer, or it was sprinkled before the veil of the sanctuary (Lev. iv. 6), or carried into the holy place (vi. 30), or even into the holy of holies (xvi. 14). 5. Burning the sacrifice, the whole of it or its fat only, on the altar of burnt offering, whereby its essence and flavor ascended to God.

Og.

A king of the Amorites of Bashan (Deut. iii. 1, 8), whose rule extended from the Jabbok to mount Hermon (8, 10 with Num. xxi. 23, 24). He had residences at both Ashtaroth and Edrei (Josh. xii. 4, 5; xiii. 12). He was huge of stature, the last of the Rephaim; and had an iron bedstead or sarcophagus of ironstone, 9 cubits long by 4 broad, of course longer and wider than its occupant. This relic was preserved in Rabbath Ammon (Deut. iii. 11). After the Israelites had conquered Sihon, they left their families and their cattle at the secure camp at Pisgah, and marched against Og. They defeated and slew him at Edrei and took possession of his country (Num. xxi. 20, 32-35; Deut. iii. 14). This territory was given to the half-tribe of Manasseh (Deut. iii. 13).

O'had.

A son of Simeon (Gen. xlii. 10; Ex. vi. 15). He did not found a tribal family.

O'hel [a tent]

A son of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii. 20).

O-ho'lah, in A. V. Aholah [her tent].

Samaria and the kingdom of Israel personified as a woman of bad character (Ezek. xxiii. 1-49). Her name typified her infidelity to Jehovah.

O-ho'li-ab, in A. V. Aholiab [father's tent].

An artificer of the tribe of Dan, who assisted Bezalel in making furniture for the tabernacle (Ex. xxxi. 6; xxxv. 34, 35).

O-hol'i-bah, in A. V. Aholibah [my tent is in her].

Jerusalem and the kingdom of Judah personified as a woman of bad character (Ezek. xxiii. 1-49), although possessing Jehovah's tent.

O-hol-i-ba'mah, in A. V. Aholibamah [my tent is a high place].

A wife of Esau, daughter of Anah the Hivite (Gen. xxxvi. 2). She gave name to an Edomite family, organized under a chief (41). She was also called Judith, the praiseworthy (xxvi. 34; cp. ANAH).

Oil.

The oil used by the ancient Hebrews was chiefly olive oil. The fruit of the olive ripens in the autumn. It was, and is still, obtained by shaking the tree or beating it (Deut. xxiv. 20; and Is. xvii. 6; xxiv. 13, R. V. text and margin). The oil was expressed from the berries by treading them with the foot (Deut. xxxiii. 24; Mic. vi. 15), often in a shallow cavity hewn in the native rock, or by crushing them in a basin or circular trough under a wheel, collecting the outflowing oil, and then, in order to secure every drop that the berries contained, squeezing the pulp in a press constructed for the purpose. The expressed oil was collected in a rock-hewn vat or in a jar, and the impurities were allowed to settle. The fresh oil was specifically known to the Hebrews as yiggar (cp. Joel ii. 24, Hebrew text). Pure beaten olive oil (Ex. xxvii 20; xxix. 40) was the finest in quality. Leaves, twigs, and dirt having been removed, the olives were beaten to pieces and crushed, and put into a basket, and the oil was allowed to flow out of itself. It was, as it were, a sort of first fruit, obtained before the pulp was placed under the press.

Oil was so important a product of Palestine that oil and wine are frequently mentioned, with or even without grain, as the chief harvest gain (Num. xviii. 12; Deut. vii. 13; Neh. x. 39; xiii. 5, etc.) Oil was used for illuminating purposes, being burned in lamps (Ex. xxv. 6; Mat. xxv 3). Pure beaten olive oil was prescribed for the continual light in the sanctuary (Ex. xxvii 20). Oil was used for food (1 Chron. xii 40; Ezek. xvi 13). It was mixed with meal and made into bread (1 Kin. xvii. 12), and cakes of fine flour mingled with oil, or with oil poured upon them, were part of the meal offering (Lev. ii 1, 4-7), the oil being prescribed probably on account of its common use in food. Oil was used in medicine for mollifying wounds (Is. i 6; Mark vi. 13). Sometimes wine was added to the oil, as was done by the good Samaritan in the case of the wounded Israelite (Luke x. 31). Herod was put in a bath of warm oil in the hope of alleviating his disease (War i. 33, 5). Oil was used as a cosmetic for anointing the body, especially after a bath, and for rendering the hair smooth (Ps. xxiii 5; civ. 15; 2 Sam. xiv 2). Olive oil was used for anointing kings (1 Sam. x 1; xvi 1, 13; 1 Kin. i 39; 2 Kin. ix 1, 6); and was called holy because employed in behalf of God (Ps. lxxxix. 20). A holy oil of composite and expensive character was used for the anointing of high priests. The tabernacle, the ark, the table, the candlestick, the altar, the laver and its foot were also anointed with the same precious compound (Ex. xxx. 22-33).

Oil Tree.

The literal rendering of the Hebrew words 'Eṣ shemen, tree of oil, in Is. xli. 19. The words are translated olive wood (1 Kin. vi 23; in A. V. olive tree) and wild olive (Neh. viii. 15; in A. V. pine branch). From its wood the two cherubim in the oracle of Solomon's temple were made, each of which was ten cubits high (1 Kin. vi. 23, 26), and also the doors of the oracle and the door posts for the entrance of the temple (31-33). It is generally believed to be the oleaster (Elæagnus hortensis), sometimes called the wild olive, but which, though it has a certain superficial resemblance to the true olive, is not really akin to it. The oleaster is a shrub or tree. It yields an oil, but much inferior to that of the olive. It is abundant in Palestine, especially near Hebron, Samaria, and mount Tabor. Other investigators identify the oil tree with Balanites ægyptiaca, which is called zakkum by the Arabs, and from which they extract an oil. But it now grows around the Dead Sea, and not on the mount of Olives (Neh. viii. 15).

Oint'ment.

Fragrant ointments were highly prized among the Hebrews (Eccl. vii 1). They were used in dressing the hair and in purifying and perfuming the skin (Esth. ii. 12; Eccl. ix 8), and Jesus was several times anointed with ointment brought by women who regarded him with adoration (Mat. xxvi. 6-13; Luke vii 36-50). Ointments, with other spices, were employed on the dead body and in embalming (Luke xxiii 56). Balm of Gilead and eye salve were used in medicine (Jer. vii 22; Rev. iii 18). In the ritual an ointment or holy oil was used, composed of myrrh, cassia, cinnamon, calamus, and olive oil (Ex. xxx 25). In Palestine the usual ointment consisted of perfumed olive oil. The Hebrew word for oil is sometimes rendered ointment in A. V. (2 Kin. xx 13), and this rendering is allowed to stand in E. R. V. in Prov. xxvii 9; Ecc. vii. 1; ix 8; x. 1; Song i 3, iv 10; Is. lvii. 9; Amos vi. 6. See PERFUMERY.

Old Tes'ta-ment.

The first of the two portions into which the Bible is naturally divided. The title was borrowed from the apostle Paul, who in 2 Cor. iii. 14, says, "For until this day remaineth the same veil untaken away, in the reading of the O. T." [in R. V. covenant]. The O. T. consists of thirty-nine books which, in the order in which they stand in the English Bible, naturally divide into three classes: seventeen historical books (Genesis to Esther), five poetical books (Job to Song of Solomon), and seventeen prophetic books. Poems and fragments of poems occur in the historical books (Gen. iv. 23, 24; ix. 25-27; xlix. 2-27; Ex. xv. 1-18; Judg. v.); prophecy also is found in the historical books (Gen. iii. 15; ix. 11-16, 2 Sam. vii) and history in the prophetic books (Is. vii; Jer. xxvi; xxxvii 11-xxxix 14; xl 7-xliii 8), and poetry abounds in the prophetic books. The Hebrew Bible contains all these books and no more: but there is a difference in the arrangement and in the classification. See CANON. The English Bible has adopted the arrangement of the old versions.

The whole of the O. T. was originally written in Hebrew, excepting only Ezra iv. 8-vi 18; vii. 12-26; Jer. x. 11; Dan ii 4-vii. 28, which are in Aramaic. The letters of the Hebrew and Aramaic alphabets were similar. A primitive form of them was in use in Phœnicia as far back as 1500 B. C. An early form is seen on the Moabite stone, in the Siloam inscription, and on Maccabæan coins. They passed through various changes of form until they ultimately became the familiar square character of the extant Hebrew manuscripts and printed editions of the Hebrew Bible. The books of the O. T. were written in the older script; but in the course of their multiplication by manuscript copies, the older characters were gradually transliterated into the square.

In writing the Hebrews made use of consonants only, leaving the vowels to be supplied by the reader. But between the seventh and the tenth centuries of the Christian era Jewish scholars, resident chiefly at Tiberias in Palestine, supplied vowel points which indicated the proper vocalization and followed the traditional pronunciation. These vowel signs gave greater fixity to the meaning of the texts. These men are called Masoretes or Massoretes, from māsorah or better massorah, tradition, and the text, as supplied with vowels and otherwise improved, is known as the Masoretic text. They also added a system of accents to indicate the proper accentuation of the words and the manner in which they are to be conjoined or disjoined. In the Jewish schools of Babylonia a different method of indicating the vowels, but yielding substantially the same pronunciation, was in vogue. The Babylonian punctuation was written above the lines of the text.

At an early period the words were often separated by a dot or spacing (cp the dot, Moabite Stone, Siloam Inscription; the spacing, Carpentras Stele, probably 4th century B. C.); and hence Hebrew manuscripts not improbably existed which were spaced in a similar manner. The Talmudic rules for copying manuscripts directed that a space equal to the width of a letter be left after each word.

At an early date also the Jews divided the Hebrew text into sections and verses. The sections were intended to mark off the divisions of the discourse. They were of two kinds, major and minor, or main divisions and subdivisions, technically called open and closed, and indicated by the letters pe and samech respectively. For example, in the first chapter of Genesis an open section is assigned to each day. And one open section contains the narrative of the flood (vi. 9-ix. 17), which is subdivided into the four closed sections, vi. 9-12, introduction; vi. 13-viii. 14, the ark and the flood; viii. 15-ix. 7, Noah leaves the ark, sacrifices, and receives God's blessings and commands; ix. 8-17, the covenant of the rainbow. The sections are for the most part appropriate, and show a correct understanding of the text on the part of those by whom they were made. As regards the verses, they were first numbered in the Hebrew Bible in Bomberg's edition of 1547, in which the number was noted on the margin opposite every fifth verse by the appropriate letter of the Hebrew alphabet used numerically. Arias Montanus, in his Hebrew Bible with interlinear Latin translation, published at Antwerp in 1571, was the first actually to break up the Hebrew text into chapters. To number the verses, he added the Arabic numerals in the margin. See BIBLE.

The Hebrew text of the O. T. has come down practically unchanged since at least the second century of the Christian era. From this form all existing manuscripts are derived. The preservation of this standard text, in its integrity and with freedom from errors, during its transmission through two thousand years has been due to the existence of professional scribes to whom its copying, pronunciation, and interpretation were entrusted and to the elaborate rules adopted for their guidance which rendered mistakes in copying unlikely to occur and made the detection of a chance error almost certain. Aaron ben Moses ben Asher, who flourished in the earlier half of the tenth century, prepared an edition conformed to the original according to the minute tradition of the scribes. This work of ben Asher was highly prized for its accuracy, and from it all western manuscripts are descended.

But duplicate passages, such as Gen. x. 4 and 1 Chron. i. 7 or 2 Kin. viii. 26 and 2 Chron. xxii. 2, reveal the existence of occasional errors that got into the standard text before the second Christian century. They occur more in numbers and in proper names than in narratives, and they are chiefly due to transcribers mistaking one Hebrew character for another that closely resembled it (see BETH, DALETH), improperly uniting two words into one or separating one word into two (see MOLE 2), attaching an initial letter to the preceding word, or accidentally repeating or omitting letters or words. Not all differences, however, are errors. Some, as in Ps. xiv. and lvi., are the result of a revision undertaken by the author himself or by others in order to adapt the work to a new purpose; or like Is. ii. 2-4 and Mic. iv. 1-3, are due to freedom of quotation. As in the case of the N. T., three aids exist for biblical critics who attempt to eliminate copyists' errors and restore the text to its primitive purity. They are, first, the collation of Hebrew manuscripts, which has been carried on with perseverance, portions of from 1500 to 2000 manuscripts having been used in the comparison; second, the examination of early versions made from the Hebrew into other languages before the Masoretic text was established; and third, the study of passages quoted or alluded to in the Apocrypha, the N. T., or other writings.

It is believed that the original manuscripts of the O. T. books were written on skins; see BOOK. That many of them were, is certain (Ps. xl. 7; Jer. xxxvi. 14, 23). The existing manuscripts are usually of parchment or, in the East, of leather. They are not old. In the British Museum is a manuscript of the Law, written on vellum, which is believed to have been penned before A. D. 850; and in the Karaite synagogue at Cairo is a codex of the former and latter prophets, without vowels, which was written A. D. 895, if it is correctly dated. The oldest extant manuscript of which the date can be affirmed with certainty is a manuscript of the latter prophets (Major and Minor), punctuated after the Babylonian system. It was brought from the Crimea, is dated A. D. 916, and is now kept in the imperial library at St. Petersburg. The oldest manuscript of the entire O. T. is dated A. D. 1010. It too is at St. Petersburg. The scarcity of ancient Hebrew manuscripts is to a large extent due to the practice of the Jews, which is alluded to in the Talmud, of burying all sacred manuscripts which became defective through wear or otherwise faulty.

After the invention of printing, the book of Psalms was put in type and published in 1477. Eleven years later, in 1488, the whole printed Hebrew Bible was issued in folio from a press at Soncino in the duchy of Milan. A printed manual edition was first issued by Bomberg in 1517. The great rabbinic Bible of Jacob ben Hayyim, published by Daniel Bomberg at Venice in 1524-25 in four volumes, is based upon a careful collation of manuscripts and faithfully reproduces the standard text of the scribes at Tiberias. Van der Hooght's edition of the Hebrew text was first published at Amsterdam in 1705. It has held its ground on account of its accuracy, being reprinted with minor corrections by Aug. Hahn in 1831 and by C. G. G. Theile in 1849. It has about 1000 marginal readings, most of them of considerable antiquity. Yet more important is the edition of the Masoretic text, with critical and Masoretic appendices, prepared by S. Baer and Franz Delitzsch. Genesis appeared in 1869, and other books have followed at intervals. This edition and that of Ginsburg, issued at London in 1894, are revisions of the text of Jacob ben Hayyim, designed to conform it more closely to the teachings of the Massora. Kittel's edition, printed at Leipzig, 1906, reproduces the text of Jacob ben Hayyim, and gives in footnotes the more important variants of the manuscripts and versions.

Ol'ive.

A tree largely cultivated in Palestine in olive yards (Ex. xxiii. 11; Josh. xxiv. 13; Judg. v. 5; 1 Sam. viii. 14). It grew also in Assyria (2 Kin. xviii. 32). Strabo mentions it among the trees of Armenia, and it is supposed to be indigenous in northern India and other temperate regions of Asia. The wood was used for timber (1 Kin. vi. 23, 31, 32, 33). A valuable oil was obtained from the berries, and had extensive use; see OIL.

Plants grown from the drupe or from slips cut from below the grafted branches, and the shoots which spring up around the trunk, are of the wild variety and require grafting. And a good, fruitful olive tree, if its cultivation is neglected, deteriorates and becomes wild. The wild olive is a shrub or low tree; and any berries which it may produce are small and of no value. The process of grafting a cutting from the wild olive tree into one of the cultivated kind is alluded to in Rom. xi. 17, 24 to illustrate the grafting of the gentile converts on what hitherto had been the Jewish church. In gardening the process was different; it was the grafting of a cutting from the cultivated tree into a stock of the wild olive to alter and improve its nature.

From an olive tree the dove plucked the leaf when the flood was subsiding (Gen. viii. 11). An olive branch is now an emblem of peace. The olive was also a symbol of prosperity and divine blessing, of beauty and strength (Ps. lii. 8; Jer. xi. 16; Hos. xiv. 6). The aged olive tree is often surrounded by young and thrifty shoots (Ps. cxxviii. 3). Women sometimes adorned themselves with garlands of olives on festal occasions (Judith xv. 13), and at the Olympic games in Greece the victor's crown was composed of olive leaves.

The olive tree of Palestine is the common Olea europæa. It has lanceolate, entire, leathery, evergreen leaves of a dusty color, and small whitish, monopetalous flowers. The nearest approach to it of familiar garden plants is the privet. The olive is still cultivated through nearly every part of Palestine.

Ol'ives, Mount of, and Ol'i-vet, the latter word being a Latin form, borrowed from the Vulgate, and meaning a place where many olive trees grow.

A hill which is before Jerusalem on the east (Zech. xiv. 4), separated from it by the valley of the Kidron (2 Sam. xv. 14, 23, 30). Its summit with the farther slope was reckoned as a Sabbath-day's journey from the city (Acts i. 12), or, according to Josephus, at 5 or 6 stades (Antiq. xx. 8, 6; War v. 2, 3). David, barefoot and with covered head, went up its ascent when he fled from Absalom. On its summit God was wont to be worshipped (2 Sam. xv. 32). The glory of the Lord appeared there to Ezekiel in a vision (Ezek. xi. 23), and Zechariah prophetically portrayed Jehovah standing on the mountain to interpose in behalf of his people (Zech. xiv. 4). Jesus went often to the mount of Olives (Luke xxi. 37; xxii. 39, John viii. 1). He was descending its slope when the multitude welcomed him to the city with hosannas (Luke xix. 37, 38). He had crossed its summit when Jerusalem burst into full view, and he wept over the fate which he knew awaited the city (41-44). He was sitting on the mount with his disciples gazing across the valley at the splendid temple and the city, when he prophesied the destruction of both (Mat. xxiv. 3; Mark xiii. 3). After his last passover he retired to the mount of Olives (Mat. xxvi 30; Mark xiv. 26). The garden of Gethsemane was to the west of it, either at its base or some small distance up its ascent. Bethany and Bethphage were on the eastern side (Mat. xxi 1; Mark xi. 1; Luke xix. 29). It was near the former of these villages that our Lord's ascension took place (xxiv. 50). The mount of Olives is unquestionably the eminence now called by the Arabs Jebel et-Tôr, east of Jerusalem. Properly speaking, it is a chain of hills rising into three or, as some reckon, four summits, and with two lateral spurs. One spur runs westward, starting at the bend of the Kidron, about a mile north of Jerusalem, and attains an elevation of 2737 feet above the sea. This northern spur is generally identified with Josephus' hill of Scopus, or the watchman (War ii 19, 4). The other spur is separated from the main ridge by the Kidron. It also runs westward, and faces the city on the south. It has been designated the hill of Evil Counsel, from the late and worthless tradition that Caiaphas had a country place on its summit and in his house the chief priests met and consulted about putting Jesus to death (John xi 47-53). Its altitude is 2549 feet.

Of the four peaks into which the range of Olivet rises, the most northerly one, called Karem es-Seiyad, is the highest, being 2723 feet above sea level. It was formerly called Galilee, either because Galilæans encamped there when they came to Jerusalem to the festivals, or because in the fourteenth century it was believed to be the place of the ascension where the angels addressed the disciples as men of Galilee. The second peak is called the Ascension. As early as A. D. 315 it was regarded as the spot whence Jesus ascended to heaven, and Constantine crowned it with a rotunda and a basilica. The latter has been replaced by a succession of churches of the Ascension. This is the mount of Olives proper. It stands directly opposite to the eastern gate of Jerusalem, and rises to 2643 feet above the level of the ocean, 371 above the bed of the Kidron, and 208 over the temple plateau. The third hill is called the Prophets', from what are called the prophets' tombs on its side. The fourth hill is named the mount of Offense, from the belief that Solomon there built the idolatrous shrines for his heathen wives. The Ascension hill and the hill of the Prophets are so slightly dissevered that some reduce the four summits to three.

At the foot of the mount of Olives proper, at the traditional site of Gethsemane, the road forks, including the garden in its crotch. One branch runs south, rises by a gradual ascent, winds round the southern shoulder of the mountain, and continues on to Bethany and Jericho. It was built in the seventh century A. D. by the calif Abd-el-Melek. The northern fork runs east, and at the distance of about fifty yards divides into three. The middle one, steep and rugged, leads up the face of the mountain, crosses it near the summit, and goes on past the so-called stone of Bethphage to Bethany. As early as the fourth century the Christians of Jerusalem, when celebrating the triumphal entry of Jesus into the city, used to come in procession over this road. The two branches on either side of this steep middle road also reach the top of the mountain, but they follow a more gradual ascent. Farther up the Kidron valley a Roman road to the Jordan climbed the western slope of the ridge near 'Ain es-Suwan, crossed the crest about half a mile north of the top of Olivet, in the depression north of Karem es-Seiyad, descended into the wady and crossed it near the ruin Buk'adan and, keeping the wady Rûâbeh hard by on the north, continued on to the Jordan.

Ol'i-vet. See OLIVES, MOUNT OF.

O-lym'pas.

A Roman Christian to whom Paul sent his salutation (Rom. xvi. 15).

O'mar.

A descendant of Esau through Eliphaz (Gen. xxxvi. 11), and chieftain of a tribe of the name (15).

O-me'ga.

The last letter of the Greek alphabet, hence used figuratively for the last or for the end (Rev. i 8, 11; xxi. 6; xxii. 13).

O'mer.

A measure for dry articles. It contained a tenth part of an ephah (Ex xvi. 36), and was one hundredth of a homer (Ezek. xlv 11). The omer contained nearly 6 pints. See MEASURE.

Om'ri [untaught or impetuous or like a sheaf].

1. A man of Benjamin, family of Becher (1 Chron. vii 8).

2. A man of Judah, family of Perez (1 Chron. ix. 4).

3. Son of Michael and prince of the tribe of Issachar in David's reign (1 Chron. xxvii. 18).

4. A king of Israel. Before gaining the throne he was commander of the Israelite army in the reign of Elah and not unlikely in that of Baasha also; and he may have subjugated Moab at this time (Moabite Stone 7, 8). He was conducting the siege of Gibeon, which belonged to the Philistines, when news arrived that Zimri had murdered Elah, and usurped the throne. The army at once proclaimed Omri king of Israel. He accepted the honor, and led his troops against the town of Tirzah, the national capital, where Zimri was. The latter, despairing of his ability to hold the throne, committed suicide (1 Kin. xvi 15-20). But the nation was divided. One half adhered to Omri and the other half supported the claims of Tibni; and it was not until the death of Tibui five years later that Omri became the undisputed sovereign of all Israel (21-23). The statement of ver. 23, "in the thirty-first year of Asa began Omri to reign over Israel" (in Hebrew simply "Omri reigned"), refers, not to the time of his proclamation by the soldiery and his assumption of the royal title (although the twelve years of his reign are counted from this event), but to his attainment of the sole authority in the kingdom (cp. ver. 15, 29). He transferred the seat of government from Tirzah to Samaria, which he built for the purpose (24). He followed the idolatries of Jeroboam and acted in other respects more wickedly than any of his predecessors on the throne of the ten tribes (26; Mic. vi. 16). He died about 874 B. C., and was buried in Samaria. His son Ahab succeeded him on the throne (1 Kin. xvi. 28). Omri made an impression on history outside of Israel. Not only did the Moabites remember his name; but after his death and the annihilation of his family the Assyrians for a time still attached his name, which they wrote Ḥumri, to the reigning monarch and land of Israel.

On, I. [strength].

A Reubenite chief who took part in the rebellion of Korah (Num. xvi. 1); see KORAH.

On, II. [Egyptian An, light].

An old and renowned city of Lower Egypt, on the east of the Nile, in the delta, several miles from the river and 19 miles north of Memphis. It was the principal seat of the worship of the sun; hence called Heliopolis by the Greeks (cp. Ex. i 11, Septuagint) and Beth-shemesh by Jeremiah (xlii. 13). Apparently Isaiah had this city in mind; and by a slight change in the first letter of the name turned city of the sun into city of destruction, to denote the overthrow of idolatry (Is. xix. 18; cp. margin).

Obelisk at Heliopolis.

Erected by Useratesen, second king of the twelfth dynasty.

With the temple of the sun were connected a training school for priests and a medical school, and these institutions were visited by all the Greek philosophers who went to Egypt to study. In Herodotus' day the priests of On were esteemed the most learned in history of all the Egyptians (ii. 3). It was the daughter of a priest of On whom Pharaoh gave to Joseph to wife (Gen. xli. 45, 50; xli. 20).

O'nam [strong, wealthy].

1. A Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 23; 1 Chron. i. 40).
2. A man of Judah, house of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 26, 28).

O'nán [strong].

A son of Judah by a Canaanite woman. He sinned, and was cut off by a divine judgment, leaving no posterity (Gen. xxxviii. 4-10; xli. 12; Num. xxvi. 19).

O-nés'-i-mus [useful, profitable].

A slave of Philemon, whom Paul was the means of converting at Rome, and whom he sent back to his Christian master requesting that he might be received, not as a servant, but as a brother beloved (Philem. 10-19). He was a man of Colosse, and with Tychicus carried from Rome to that city the epistles to the Colossians and to Philemon (Col. iv. 7-9).

On-e-siph'o-rus [bringing advantage].

A Christian whose home was probably at Ephesus (2 Tim. i. 18). When he was at Rome he sought out the apostle Paul, then a prisoner, and showed him great kindness (16). The members of his household were with Timothy, and Paul sent them his salutations (iv. 19).

O-ni'as, in A V once O-ni'a-res (1 Mac. xii. 19) [Greek for perhaps Comah]. The form Oniars is an old corruption, in which the two names Onias Arius are blended (cp. Antiq. xii. 4, 10).

A high priest of the Jews, who held office from about 323 to 300 B. C. He was a contemporary of Arius, king of Sparta, who reigned from 309 to 265 B. C. (1 Mac. xii. 7, in A V Darius, a corruption of Arius; 19, 20). Onias succeeded Jaddua, and was the father and predecessor of Simon the Just (Antiq. xi. 8, 7; xii. 2, 5). He is probably referred to in Eccles. i. 1. Josephus errs in regarding Onias III, a later pontiff, as the recipient of the letter from Arius.

For others of the name, see HIGH PRIEST.

On'ion.

A plant, the bulbous root of which was much used in Egypt as an article of food (Num. xi. 5; Herod. ii. 125). It is Allium cepa, called in Hebrew besel, in Arabic basal. It has been cultivated from an early period in Egypt and other parts of the east.

O'no [strong].

A town of Benjamin (Neh. xi. 35), in a plain of considerable size (vi. 2), built or rather rebuilt by a Benjamite called Shamed (1 Chron. viii 12). Some of its inhabitants returned from the Babylonian captivity (Ezra ii 33; Neh. vii 37). It is considered to have been at Kefer 'Ana, about 7 miles inland east by south from Joppa.

O'n'y-cha.

The rendering of the Hebrew Sh'heleth (Ex. xxx 34). It was one of the ingredients in a perfume made for the service of the tabernacle. It is believed to have been the operculum (lid) of a shell mollusc called stromb or wing-shell, which being burnt gave out a certain perfume.

O'nyx [a finger nail, an onyx].

The rendering of the Hebrew Shoham. The Hebrew word denotes a precious stone (Job xxviii. 16, R. V. margin beryl; Ezek xxviii 13). It was found in the land of Havilah (Gen ii 12). Two of these stones, each graven with the names of six Israelite tribes, were put on the shoulder pieces of the high priest's ephod (Ex. xxviii 9, 12), and another was the second stone in the fourth row on his breastplate (xxviii 20). David gathered such stones for the service of the future temple (1 Chron. xxix. 2). The onyx is a cryptocrystalline variety or subvariety of quartz. It is in layers of different colors, which alternate with each other and bear some resemblance to the white and flesh-colored bands of the finger nail.

O'phel [a swelling, a hill].

The southern and lower portion, or perhaps originally only an eminence on this southern portion, of the eastern or temple hill at Jerusalem, enclosed by the city walls. This general locality is indicated by the proximity of the pool of Shelah, i. e. doubtless Siloam, the court of the guard, the water gate, and the horse gate (Neh. ii 15-27; see JERUSALEM, paragraph on the walls); the pool of Siloam, the eastern court of the temple, and the Kidron valley (War v. 4, 1 and 2; 6, 1). Jotham built much on its walls, and Manasseh increased their height (2 Chron. xxvii. 3; xxxiii 14). After the exile, if not before, the Nethinim had their residence in this quarter, because of its convenience to the temple (Neh. ii 26; xi. 21). Sir Charles Warren, in the course of his excavations on this portion of the ridge, came upon a wall more than 70 feet high, which he felt disposed to identify with that of Manasseh.

O'phir.

A tribe descended from Joktan (Gen. x. 29; 1 Chron. i 23), and the country which they inhabited. This region was celebrated for its gold (xxiv. 4; Job xxii 24; xxviii 16; Ps. xlv. 9; Is. xiii 12), to obtain which, Hiram, in conjunction with Solomon, sent a navy from Ezion-geber (1 Kin. ix. 28). The ships brought back algum or almug trees as well as gold (x. 11), and probably also silver, ivory, apes, and peacocks (22; cp. xxii. 48). Jehoshaphat attempted to imitate the enterprise, but his ships were wrecked at Ezion-geber (xxii. 48). As this port was on the gulf of Akaba, the route to Ophir was by the Red Sea and not by the Mediterranean. The voyage out and back in the ships of that day, with the peculiar winds of the Red Sea, and including the lying in port, lasted, it may be judged, three years (x. 22; cp. xxii 48); see RED SEA. Three opinions exist as to its situation: 1. Ophir was at Sofala, on the eastern coast of Africa, opposite the island of Madagascar. In favor of this view is the fact that it was formerly an emporium for gold. But when it is noted that the algum or almug tree is apparently the sandalwood, which is a native of India, and is not believed to occur either in Arabia or Africa, and that other products of Ophir brought by the seamen had also Indian names, it is probable that Ophir was in India, or else was a mart of exchange for Indian goods. 2. Josephus says that it was the Golden Land in India (Antiq. viii 6, 4), perhaps on the river Cophen (i 6, 4); and hence it has been conjecturally located at Abhira, at the mouth of the Indus. 3. Ophir was in southern or southeastern Arabia. This opinion is probably correct; for the majority of the Joktanites, perhaps all of them, settled in Arabia. Moreover, Ophir is mentioned between Sheba and Havilah.

Oph'ni [perhaps, the musty or the Ophnite]. The Hebrew uses the definite article.

A village of Benjamin (Josh. xvii. 24). Robinson suggests its identity with Gophna, on the highway from Samaria to Jerusalem, a day's march north of Gibeah (War v. 2, 1); the modern Jufna, 3 miles northwest by north of Bethel. This identification assumes that the boundary of Benjamin turned northward near Bethel, for Bethel was on the northern boundary.

Oph'rah [hind].

1. A son of Menothai, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 14).

2. A town of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 23), evidently north of Michmash (1 Sam. xii. 17). According to the Onomastikon, of the fourth century A. D., it was a village then called Ephraim, five miles to the east of Bethel. Robinson doubtfully identified it with et-Taiyibeh, on a conical hill 4 miles northeast by east of Bethel, with a splendid view from its summit, which he felt could not have been left unoccupied in ancient times. His opinion has been widely accepted, although the place seems far north for a town of Benjamin.

3. A village west of the Jordan, occupied by the Abiezrites, a family of Manasseh (Judg. vi 11, 15; cp. Josh. xvii. 1, 2). It was the home of Gideon, where he was called to his mission and built an altar, where he made an ephod to the ensnaring of Israel, and where he was buried (Judg. vi-viii.). Conder, pointing out that according to the Samaritan Chronicle, Ophrah was the ancient name of Fer'ata, 6 miles west by south of Shechem, suggests this village as its site. Fer'ata is, however, commonly regarded as Pirathon (q. v.).

Or'a-tor.

1 The rendering of the Hebrew Lahash, an incantation, preceded by n'bon, skillful in enchantment (Is. iii. 3). The R. V. accurately translates the phrase by skillful enchanter.

2. The rendering of the Greek Rhêtôr, public speaker, pleader, in Acts xxiv. 1, applied to Tertullus. He was a professional advocate engaged by Paul's Jewish enemies to prosecute the apostle before the Roman procurator.

Or'chard. See GARDEN.

Or'eb [a raven]

1. One of two Midianite princes defeated, captured, and put to death by Gideon. He was slain at a rock, which came to be called in consequence the rock of Oreb (Judg. vii. 25; viii. 3; Ps. lxxxiii. 11; Is. x. 26).

2. A rock on which the Midianite prince Oreb was killed by Gideon (Judg. vii. 25, Is. x. 26). Exact situation unknown; but doubtless it was west of the Jordan near the river (Judg. vii. 25; viii. 4).

Or'en [a species of pine tree].

A man of Judah, house of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 25).

Or'gan. See PIPE.

O-ri'on.

A constellation (Job ix. 9; xxxviii. 31; Amos v. 8), in Hebrew K'asil, a man without understanding, an irreligious person, a fool. The ancient versions unite in this identification. The Targums and the Syriac version render the word by giant, and the Septuagint and Vulgate employ the name Orion. In the classic mythology Orion is represented as a man of great strength, celebrated as a worker in iron and as a hunter. Being killed by the goddess Diana, he was transferred to the heavens and bound to the sky (cp. Job xxxviii. 31), and became the constellation Orion.

The constellation is visible in all latitudes. It disputes with the Great Bear the distinction of being the finest constellation of the sky. Two of its stars—Betelgeuse at the upper part of his right arm as he faces the spectator, and Rigel at his uplifted left foot—are of the first magnitude. About 100 stars in the constellation are visible to the naked eye, and 2000 or more may be seen under the telescope.

Or'na-ments.

Orientalers adorn themselves with ornaments to an extent deemed excessive by occidental taste. It has ever been so. Hebrews, Egyptians, Midianites, Syrians, both men and women, were fond of wearing ornaments (Gen. xxiv. 22; Ex. iii. 22; xi. 2; xxxii.

2; Num. xxxi. 50). Women wore beads and pearls, and articles of gold, silver and brass (Song i. 10, 11; 1 Tim. ii. 9); earrings, nose rings, pendants, necklaces, chains, brazen mirrors, armlets, bracelets, finger rings, anklets (Gen. xxiv. 22, 47; xxxv. 4; Ex. xxxv. 22; Num. xxxi. 50; Is. iii. 18-23). Men of all classes except the poorest wore seal rings (Gen. xxxviii. 18), which were useful in business as well as ornamental. Nor did they regard rings for the arms as effeminate. Saul, like the kings of Assyria, wore a ring about the arm or wrist (2 Sam. i. 10). It was a national custom with the Ishmaelites for the men to wear earrings (Judg. vii. 25, 26), and men among the Hebrews sometimes did so (Ex. xxxii. 2). Men of high rank wore a gold chain as badge of office (Gen. xl. 42, 1 Jan. v. 29).

Ornaments were laid aside in time of mourning (Ex. xxxiii. 4-6).

Or'nán [perhaps, piny]. See ARAUNAH.

Or'pah [neck, mane].

The wife of Chilion, and the sister-in-law of Ruth. She consented to remain in her native country, Moab, when Ruth, drawn by affection to her mother-in-law, Naomi, insisted on accompanying her to Palestine (Ruth i. 4, 14, 15; cp. iv. 10).

Or-tho-si'a, in A. V. Orthosias.

A city on the coast of Phœnicia, between Tripoli and the river Eleutherus (1 Mac. xv. 37; Pliny, Hist. Nat. v. 17).

Os-nap'per. See ASNAPPER.

Os'pray, obsolete form of Osprey.

The rendering of the Hebrew 'Ozanyyah (Lev. xi. 13; Deut. xiv. 12), an unclean bird. It is either a species of eagle or more vaguely the eagle genus. The Septuagint translates it 'alaeetos, that is, Pandion haliaetus. It is a dark brown eagle widely distributed throughout the world, frequenting seacoasts, and living on fish. In Palestine it occurs along the Mediterranean, especially in the lagoons at the mouth of the Kishon.

Os'si-frage [bone breaker].

The rendering in A. V. of the Hebrew Peres, breaker. It was an unclean bird (Lev. xi. 13; and Deut. xiv. 12). The R. V. translates it gier eagle. It is believed to be the lammergeyer, or bearded eagle (Gypaetus barbatus). The English name ossifrage and the Hebrew peres both refer to the fact that the bird delights in bones, snakes, and tortoises, which it breaks. This it sometimes does by taking them up to a great height in the air and dropping them on a stone. The ossifrage is $3\frac{1}{2}$ feet high; the expansion of its wings is about 9 feet. Its claws are not adapted for carrying off living prey, and its disposition is cowardly. In Palestine the ossifrage is rare and tending to extinction, its chief haunts being the ravines of the Arnon, east of the Dead Sea.

Os'trich.

1 The rendering of the Hebrew Ya'en, feminine Ya'nah, probably the voracious bird. It was ceremonially unclean (Lev. xi 16; Deut. xiv 15), makes a mournful sound (Mic. i 8), inhabits the wilderness (Is. xiii 21; xxxiv 13), and was believed to forsake its eggs (Lam. iv. 3). The A. V. translates the masculine form by ostrich, the feminine form by owl.

2 The rendering of the Hebrew Rauan, utterer of tremulous sounds (Job xxxix. 13, in A. V. peacock). The female deposits her eggs on the ground to be warmed in the dust; and it was commonly supposed that she abandoned them to their fate, forgetting that the foot might crush them or that the wild beast might trample them (14, 15). The speed of the ostrich is such that it distances a man on horseback (18).

3. The A. V. inaccurately renders Nosah by ostrich in Job xxxix 13. It means a feather, as in Ezek. xvii 3, 7.

The ostrich (Struthio camelus) belongs to the aberrant subclass or division called Ratitæ, or struthious birds. They are among the largest in size of the class, but are not able to fly, the deprivation being compensated by great power of running. The common ostrich is 6 or 8 feet high. The ostrich feathers which are used for ladies' hats are the quill feathers of the wings and tail. The bird prepares a nest by rolling in the sand and scooping out a hole about 6 feet in diameter. An egg is laid every other day, until the eggs number ten, twelve, or more. Each egg is about three pounds in weight. They appear to be hatched partly by the heat of the sun, but mainly by incubation, the male bird sitting on them for about twenty hours to the hen's four. The male takes charge of the young brood. At night the bird utters a hoarse, complaining cry, alluded to in Mic. i 8. The ostrich is diffused over the greater part of Africa. It still occurs in Arabia, but its area there seems to have been diminished since O. T. times.

Oth'ni [probably, lion of (God)].

A porter, the son of Shemaiah (1 Chron. xxvi 7).

Oth'ni-el [lion of God, powerful one of God].

A son of Kenaz and brother or half brother of Caleb, son of Jephunneh the Kenizzite (Josh. xv. 17; 1 Chron. iv 13); see CALEB. Caleb promised to give his daughter Achsah in marriage to any hero who took the town of Debir or Kirjath-sepher. Othniel effected its capture and received Achsah (Josh. xv. 15-17; Judg. i 11-13). He subsequently delivered the Israelites from the tyranny of Cushan-rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, and became judge, and the land had rest forty years (iii 8-11).

Ov'en. See BREAD.

Owl.

1 The rendering of the Hebrew Bath hayya'nah (Lev. xi 16, A. V.). See OSTRICH 1.

2. The rendering of the Hebrew Kos, a cup, an owl. It was ceremonially unclean (Lev. xi. 17; Deut. xiv 16, little owl), and frequented waste places (Ps. cii. 6). Probably the southern little owl (Athene glauca) is intended, which is universally distributed through Palestine, occurring in olive yards, rocks, thickets, and among ruins and tombs.

3. The rendering of the Hebrew Yanshuph. It was ceremonially unclean (Lev. xi. 17; Deut. xiv 16, great owl) and frequented waste places (Is. xxxiv 11; R. V. margin, bitter). It is rendered ibis in the Septuagint and Vulgate, and owl in the Targums and the Syriac version. Tristram believes that the species was the Egyptian eagle owl (Bubo ascalaphus). It lives in caves and among ruins, and is common about Petra and Beer-sheba.

4. The rendering of the Hebrew Tinshemeth (Lev. xi 18; in A. V. swan). The Septuagint renders it heron, and the Vulgate swan.

5 The rendering of the Hebrew Lilith, nocturnal specter (Is. xxxiv. 14; in A. V. screech owl, in R. V. night monster). The screech or barn owl (Strix flammea) is found in Palestine frequenting ruins.

6. The rendering of the Hebrew Kippoz (Is. xxxiv. 15; in R. V. arrow snake). The corresponding word in Arabic, kifáza, denotes the arrow snake.

Little Owl of Palestine.

Ox.

The male of the species Bos taurus, though ox frequently signifies any animal of the kind, without respect to sex (Ex. xx. 17), and the plural oxen is often synonymous with cattle (Gen. xii. 16). The ox was early domesticated. Abraham had sheep and oxen (Gen. xii. 16; xxi. 27); so had his contemporary Abimelech (xx. 14), and the Egyptians at the time of the ten plagues (Ex. ix. 3). The ox was used for plowing (1 Kin. xix. 19), for dragging carts or wagons (Num. vii. 3;

Egyptian Oxen treading out Grain.

2 Sam. vi. 6, etc.), and for treading out grain (Deut. xxv. 4). They were eaten (1 Kin. i. 25; cp. Mat. xxii. 4), and were largely sacrificed, especially in connection with the burnt offerings (Num. vii. 87, 88; 2 Sam. xxiv. 22; 2 Chron. v. 6; vii. 5, etc.). A yoke of oxen was two oxen designed to be yoked together for the plow, for a cart, or for anything similar. Tristram says that the common cattle of southern and central Palestine are small in size, those of northern Palestine are larger. The largest herds are now beyond the Jordan.

The word t'o, rendered wild ox (Deut. xiv. 5, A. V.) and wild bull (Is. li. 20, A. V.), is translated in R. V. by antelope (q. v.). See UNICORN.

Ox'goad. See GOAD.

O'zem.

1. A son of Jesse (1 Chron. ii. 15).

2. A son of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 25).

O-zí'as. See UZZIAH.

Oz'ni [eared, attentive].

A son of Gad, and founder of a tribal family (Num. xxvi. 16). He was either called also Ezbon (Gen. xli. 16), or else on Ezbon's death he took his place and founded a tribal family, as did Hezron and Hamul in Judah (Num. xxvi. 19-21).

P.

Pa'a-rai.

One of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxii. 35, most probably a diverse reading of 1 Chron. xi. 37).

Pad'dan and Pad-dan-a'ram, in A. V. Pa'dan and Pa-dan-a'ram [plain, plain of Aram, i. e., Syria]; see ARAM 2 (1).

Pa'don [freedom, redemption].

Founder of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from captivity (Ezra ii. 44; Neh. vii. 47).

Pa'gi-el [a meeting with God].

Head of the tribe of Asher in the wilderness (Num. i. 13; ii. 27; vii. 72, 77; x. 26).

Pa-hath-mo'ab [governor of Moab].

Founder of a family, members of which returned from the Babylonian captivity (Ezra ii. 6; viii. 4; Neh. vii. 11). Some of them married heathen wives, from whom Ezra persuaded them to separate (Ezra x. 30). The representative of the family signed the covenant (Neh. x. 14), and Hashub, a member of the family, rebuilt or replaced part of the wall of Jerusalem (iii. 11).

Pa'i. See PAU.

Paint.

In ancient Egypt and Assyria the custom of painting a black rim around the eyes prevailed among the women. The Hebrews seem to have regarded the practice as a meretricious art, unworthy of a woman of high character (2 Kin. ix. 30; Jer. iv. 30; Ezek. xxi. 40; War. iv. 9, 10). The eyeball under the lids and the edge of the lids, and sometimes the eyebrows, were blackened. Doubtless various dye stuffs were used for the purpose Antimony, burnt to blackness and pulverized, was employed (Septuagint). Probably lead also was used, as it is in Persia. The ordinary kohl, which is used by women in Egypt at the present day, is a powder obtained from almond shells or by burning a fragrant resin. The powder was kept in small, covered jars; and was applied, both dry and moistened with oil, by means of a probe made of wood, silver, or ivory, and blunt at the end.

For cosmetics applied to other parts of the body, see HENNA, and for pigments used to color walls and other objects, see COLORS.

Pal'ace.

David occupied a royal residence at Jerusalem (2 Sam v 9; vii. 1, 2), but Solomon's commodious and magnificent abode was the first in Jerusalem to be constructed on a grand scale (1 Kin. vii 1-12). It was thirteen years in course of erection, whereas the temple was completed in seven years (vi. 38; vii 1). It contained the house of the forest of Lebanon (2-5), which took its name from its numerous cedar pillars. This house was 100 cubits or 150 feet long, 50 cubits wide, and 30 cubits high. Its walls were of solid masonry. Within were four rows of cedar pillars. Probably one row ran parallel with each wall, and the four rows formed the four sides of a rectangular court, about 30 by 80 cubits in dimension: or else the pillars were disposed in two double rows parallel to the long sides of the building and left a court in the center. Beams extended from the pillars to the walls and supported three tiers of chambers. These chambers looked down into the court. This building was at once armory and treasure house (x 17, 21; Is. xxii 8), and may have served other purposes as well. A hall of pillars was the reception and waiting room of the palace (1 Kin vii. 6). It was 50 cubits in length and 30 cubits in breadth, and had a portico in front of its portal. This portico was not unlikely the main entrance to the palace. Next came the hall of judgment (ver 7), open in front, but probably closed on the other three sides by solid walls pierced by doors only. It was the throne room. The great ivory throne overlaid with gold stood there (x 18-20). These three buildings probably opened on a rectangular court, the sides of which were the portal in the central part of the inner long wall of the house of the forest of Lebanon, the inner doors and wall of the hall of pillars, and the open front of the throne room. Behind the throne room was the inner court where the king dwelt. The principal entrance to it was probably through the throne room, so that the king pronounced judgment and granted audiences in the gate of his palace. This court was, of course, adorned with flowers and fountains, and surrounded by cloisters. The palace of Pharaoh's daughter (vii. 8) was next to the throne room, according to Josephus (Antiq. viii. 5, 2). Solomon's palace was constructed on the general model which prevailed in western Asia, and which is now familiar from the remains of the royal abodes unearthed in Assyria, Babylonia, and Persia. Some conception of its elegance and beauty may be formed from casual references in the Book of Esther to the palace of the Persian king at Shushan (Esth. i. 5, 6, 9; ii. 3, 14; v. 1, 2; vii. 7). See HOUSE; ASMONÆANS, PALACE OF THE; HEROD'S PALACE; and PRÆTORIUM.

Pa'l'al [a judge, or he hath judged].

A son of Uzal. He helped to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 25).

Pal-an-quin'.

A covered conveyance, arranged both for sitting and reclining, and carried by means of poles on the shoulders of two, four, or six men or borne as a litter between two camels, horses, or mules. The royal palanquin, provided by Solomon for his bride, consisted of a frame made of cedar, with small ornamental pillars of silver, a bottom of gold, costly coverings of purple for the seat, and perhaps embroideries lovingly made by the daughters of Jerusalem (Song iii 9, in A. V. chariot; by Ewald and Delitzsch rendered bed of state).

Pal'es-time (Joel iii 4) and Pal-es-ti'na (Ex. xv 14; Is. xiv. 29, 31), in R. V. always Philistia.

In the O. T. the name denotes the country of the Philistines (cp. Herod. vii. 89). The name now designates a country in the southwest corner of Asia, constituting the southern portion of Syria, and which for a long time was in the possession of the Hebrews. That portion of this territory which lies west of the Jordan the ancient Hebrews called Canaan as distinguished from the land of Gilead on the east of the river. After the conquest the entire country became known as the land of Israel (1 Sam xiii 19; 1 Chron. xxii. 2; Mat. ii 20), but after the division of the kingdom this name was often given to the northern realm. In the epistle to the Hebrews (xi 9) it is called the land of promise. Soon after the beginning of the Christian era Greek and Latin writers denominate it Palestina. In the Middle Ages it became known as the Holy Land (cp. Zech ii 12; 2 Mac. i 7).

1. Boundaries and Extent of Palestine. The Hebrews occupied the region from Kadesh-barnea and the wady el-'Arish on the south to mount Hermon on the north, and from the Mediterranean Sea on the west to the desert on the east, except the plain of the Philistines and the country of Moab. In prosperous reigns powerful kings extended their sway beyond these limits and held dominion over Hamath and Damascus and beyond, as far as the river Euphrates, and over Ammon, Moab, and Edom. The Hebrews themselves were accustomed to say that their country extended from Dan to Beer-sheba, a distance of 150 miles. The southern boundary was then the wady el-Fikreh and the river Arnon. These limits included the thickly populated portion of the land. Taking the smaller limits, which exclude most of the territory occupied by the tribe of Simeon and part of that occupied by Naphtali, the boundaries form a parallelogram, the altitude of which, measured by the latitudes of Dan and the southern extremity of the Dead Sea, is 145 miles, and the base 70 miles. The area is 10,150 square miles. This includes the Philistine country, which, at its utmost extent from Carmel to Beer-sheba, had an area of 1765 square miles, leaving 8385 square miles as the territory occupied by the Hebrews. The survey assigns to eastern Palestine, from Hermon to the Arnon, about 3800 square miles; and to western Palestine, as far south as Beer-sheba and including Philistia, 6040 square miles.

2. Population of Palestine. The Hebrews at the time of the conquest numbered 600,000 males above twenty years of age, which represents a total population of 2,160,000. They were distributed over something more than 8300 square miles. Massachusetts, with an area of 8315 square miles, had a population of 2,238,943 in 1890, and New Jersey, with an area of 7815 square miles, had a population of 1,444,933. David took the census of a much larger region. The present population is estimated at 600,000. That it was formerly much larger is evident from the statements of the Bible and Josephus, and from the numerous ruins of former towns. Scarcely a hilltop of the multitude always in sight but is crowned with a city or village, inhabited or in ruins.

3. The Geology of Palestine. A band of Nubian or Petra sandstone extends along the eastern coast of the Dead Sea and along part of the wall of rock flanking the Jordan valley on the east, and appears on the western slopes of Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon. It is generally of a dark red or blackish color. Above this lies the most important geological formation in Palestine, the cretaceous limestone which constitutes the main part of the table-land of the country both east and west of the Jordan. At Jerusalem there are two beds of the limestone, an upper or harder layer, called by the inhabitants musseh, and an inferior soft one, denominated melekeh. The reservoirs, sepulchers, and cellars under and around the city have been excavated in the soft melekeh, while the foundations of the buildings are on the hard musseh. The large quarries near the Damascus gate are in the melekeh. From them came the stone of which the temple walls were constructed. These beds of cretaceous limestone underlie a newer series which, commencing at mount Carmel, runs nearly south to Beer-sheba, from which it then curves in a westerly direction parallel to the Mediterranean. Outliers of it exist also northeast, east, and southwest of Jerusalem and around Shechem. From the abundance in them of the little foraminifera called nummulites, the beds are named the nummulitic limestone. They belong to the Eocene Tertiary, and probably to the Middle Eocene. This rock is so connected with the cretaceous limestone that the two are generally held to constitute but a single formation, called the cretaceous-nummulitic series. Flanking the nummulitic limestone on the west a long continuous band of calcareous sandstone extends through the Philistine country and appears in scattered patches farther north, to near mount Carmel. As a rule, it is porous and soft, and as it easily weathers away, it exposes the harder limestone of the table-land which dips beneath it, and makes the descent from the uplands to the lowlands of Judæa and Samaria more abrupt than it otherwise would be. Between this sandstone and the Mediterranean lie raised beaches belonging to the upper Pliocene, or to recent times. All these are sedimentary beds. A few igneous rocks, however, exist in the land. A minute patch of very old igneous rocks, an outlier of the great mass of granite, porphyry, diorite, and felsite, which occurs farther south in the Arabah and especially at Sinai, is combined with the carboniferous rocks. On the eastern side of the Jordan, nearly all the way from the roots of mount Hermon to south of the sea of Galilee, and east and southeast to the Hauran, beyond the limits of Palestine, the country is over-spread by an immense mass of volcanic material, basalt, dolerite, felsite, none of it older, and some of it apparently more recent, than the Pliocene Tertiary. There are detached portions of the same volcanic rocks in western Palestine, west and northwest of the sea of Galilee, with fragments in other quarters. Along the Mediterranean coast of Palestine, wherever the ground is low and level, there is a row of sand dunes, some rising 200 feet in height. Those on the southwest of the country may have been at least partly formed by the blowing of sand from the Egyptian and Sinaitic deserts. Those farther north obtained the sand from the weathering of the calcareous sandstone of Philistia. They tend to encroach upon the cultivated parts adjacent, the wind continually blowing particles from them inland. Palestine lies in one of the lines in which earthquake action is potent; and both in ancient times and more recently portions of the country have been seriously convulsed. To recapitulate, the geological structure of Palestine consists of a layer of red sandstone over the primitive rocks; then comes the chalky limestone which forms the mass of the country, overlaid with nummulitic limestone and alluvial soil; and lastly in the northeast appear colossal erupted masses of volcanic rock.

4. The Physical Geography of Palestine.

The physical divisions of Palestine are five: the maritime plain, the low country or Shephelah, the central mountain range, the Jordan valley, and the eastern table-land. These form parallel zones, and with certain modifications extend through the entire length of the country from north to south. They are broken only by the plain of Esdraelon, which lies athwart the mountain range and connects the seacoast with the Jordan valley. 1. The maritime plain lies along the coast of the Mediterranean Sea for the entire length of the country, being broken only by mount Carmel. North of Carmel it is quite narrow, but south of that mountain it is 6 miles wide and increases in width southward. It is an undulating plain 100 to 200 feet above sea level, and very fertile. Between Carmel and the 'Aujah, which empties into the sea north of Joppa, it was called Sharon, south of Joppa it was occupied by the Philistines. 2. The low country or Shephelah is a region of low hills situated between the maritime plain south of Carmel and the high central range. It forms a terrace with an elevation of about 500 feet above the sea level. The name is applied almost exclusively to that part of the low hilly country which extends from the latitude of Joppa southward to Beer-sheba, and which is sharply separated from the central range by a series of valleys running north and south. 3. The central mountain range is a continuation of the Lebanon mountains. South of the river Leontes the lofty ridge drops to a high plateau which reaches southward as far as the northern end of the sea of Galilee and Acre. This is Upper Galilee. It contains a number of hills between 2000 and 3000 feet in elevation; while several rise considerably above that height, like Jebel Jermuk which is 3934 feet. Lower Galilee is triangular, having the sea of the sea of Galilee. Southwest of the sea is mount Tabor, 1843 feet high; and farther south mount Gilboa, with one peak 1698 feet and another 1648 feet. The southern part of Lower Galilee descends into the plain of Esdraelon, most of the places in which do not exceed 200 or 300 feet in height. South of the plain of Esdraelon the range is broken by many wadies, mountains are scattered into groups, and its inner recesses are accessible from the maritime plain, Esdraelon, and the Jordan valley. Carmel is thrust out as a spur toward the northwest. The average watershed is 2000 feet high. But mount Ebal rises 3077 feet and its companion Gerizim 2849. This was Samaria. From Bethel to Hebron and almost to Beer-sheba, a distance of about 45 miles, the range forms one compact mass with precipitous sides on the east and west and with an average height of 2200 feet. Bethel, however, has an elevation of 2930 feet above sea level, the highest part of Jerusalem 2598, Bethlehem 2550, and Hebron 3040. About 15 miles south of Hebron it slopes down to the desert of the wandering. The summit of the range is the narrow table-land which was occupied by the tribes of Benjamin and Judah. 4. The Jordan valley is a remarkable chasm which begins

Cross Sections of Palestine on the Parallels of Hebron, Jerusalem, and Shiloh of Galilee and the Jordan as far as Beth-shean on its eastern side and the plain of Esdraelon on the southwestern side. It consists of a series of low ridges running east and west. Its elevation is considerably less than that of Upper Galilee, many of its hills being only 400, 500, or 600 feet high, though there are a few loftier peaks immediately west at the foot of mount Hermon, 1700 feet above sea level, but with lofty mountains on each side, and grows rapidly deeper as it goes southward until at the surface of the Dead Sea it is 1290 feet lower than sea level; see DEAD SEA and JORDAN. Though not an impassable barrier, it prevented free intercourse between the peoples who dwelt east of it south of the Jabbok as far as Edom, and the tribes of Judah and Benjamin on the west. 5. The eastern table-land is a great fertile plain, much of it more than 3000 feet in elevation, stretching from the bluffs which overlook the Jordan valley to the Syrian desert. It is cut in twain by the gorge of the Jabbok and the northern portion is further cleft by the Yarmuk, immediately south of the sea of Galilee.

5. The Principal Roads of Palestine. The physical structure determined the course of travel. The great commercial and military highway between Egypt and the empires of the east passed through Palestine. It crossed the wady el-'Arish near its mouth, followed the seacoast to Gaza, where it was met by a road from Elath and Arabia, and continued through the plain of the Philistines to Ashdod. Beyond Ashdod it forked. One branch followed the coast by Joppa and Dor, and avoided mount Carmel by keeping to the seashore at the base of the headland; but the way is only 600 feet wide under the headland, and is broken by rocks. The other branch, and the main line of travel, continued from Ashdod through Ekron and Lod and crossed the mountains to the plain of Esdraelon by one of three passes. The western road emerged by Tell Keimun and led to Acre, Tyre, Sidon, and the north. The central road crossed to el-Lejjun (Megiddo), traversed the plain of Esdraelon and Lower Galilee to the plain of Gennesaret, followed the Jordan northward, and by one branch entered the valley of the river Litany between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, and led to Hamath and the north. The other branch crossed the Jordan between the waters of Merom and the sea of Galilee, and went northeastward to Damascus. The third and most frequented route from the maritime plain passed through the plain of Dothan to En-gannim, where it divided, one branch joining the aforementioned road across Lower Galilee, and the other leading to Beth-shean, and, dividing again, continuing to Gilead or to Damascus. By any of the northern routes Carchemish on the Euphrates might be reached. There was another road from the plain of Esdraelon to Egypt. It traversed the hill country, passing by Samaria, Shechem, Bethel, Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Hebron, and Beer-sheba. At this point the road branched, and there was a choice of routes; the highway along the seacoast might be gained by diverging to the west, or the journey might be continued by way of Rehoboth and 'Ain Muweileh, and thence across the desert to Egypt. A route from Beth-shean to Edom, which was also used by travelers to Jerusalem, passed down the Jordan valley to Jericho, where persons going to Jerusalem took the steep road up the mountains to the capital. From Jericho the road continued along the western shore of the Dead Sea to En-gedi, where it was joined by a road from Jerusalem and Bethlehem, and thence continued to Edom and Elath at the head of the Red Sea, where it joined the caravan routes from Egypt and Gaza to southern Arabia. East of the Jordan a caravan route led from Damascus along the edge of the desert southward to Arabia; see DECAPOLIS. It was joined by roads running from Beth-shean across Gilead; by a road from Shechem down the wady Far'ah to the ford of the Jordan below the mouth of the Jabbok, and thence across Gilead to Rabbath Ammon; and by another from the ford at Jericho by way of Heshbon. West of the Jordan Galilee was crossed by a road running almost due east from Acre, which joined the road to Damascus near the point where it crossed the Jordan, midway between the waters of Merom and the sea of Galilee. The high table-land occupied by the tribes of Benjamin and Judah was not easy of access from the maritime plain. A way, however, led from the plain of Sharon and the Nahr el-'Aujah at Ras el-'Ain (Antipatris) southeastwardly into the hill country, and joined the road from Samaria to Jerusalem at a point two miles southwest of Bethel. From the seaport of Joppa a road led to Jerusalem by the valley of Ajalon and Beth-horon. From Ashdod the capital was most readily reached by wady es-Surar and Beth-shemesh; but a route to Jerusalem and also to Bethlehem was afforded by the wady es-Sunt past Socoh. Access to the hill country in the vicinity of Hebron was had through the wady el-'Afranj by Beit Jibrin, and by the wady el-Hesy by Lachish.

6. The Meteorology of Palestine. The great contrasts in physical features have given Palestine a remarkable range of climate, from the perpetual snow on mount Hermon to the tropical heat of the Jordan valley at Jericho and En-gedi. The average temperature at Jerusalem in January, which is the coldest month, is about 49° F., and the greatest cold 28°. In August the average is 79° 3', and the greatest heat is 92° in the shade. See also YEAR.

7. The Botany of Palestine. In consequence of the great diversity of surface and climate, the flora is extensive and plants of many latitudes flourish. Tristram showed that of 3002 flowering plants and ferns known to exist in Palestine, a large number for so small a country, 2563 are Palearctic, and most of them belong to its Mediterranean section; 161 are Ethiopian, 27 Indian, and 251 peculiar. In the region which lies between the Taurus mountains and the southern point of the peninsula of Sinai, and between the Mediterranean Sea and the Syrian desert, Dr. Post has found 850 genera and about 3500 species.

8. The Zoology of Palestine. The distribution of the several species of animals essentially agrees with that of the Palestinian plants. Of 113 mammalia known to occur in Palestine, Tristram found 55 to belong to the Palaearctic region, the same to which our European species belong; 34 were Ethiopian, 16 Indian, and 13 peculiar to the land. The same species sometimes belongs to two regions. Of 348 species of birds, 271 were Palaearctic, 40 Ethiopian, 7 Indian, and 30 peculiar. Of the 91 reptiles and amphibians, 49 were Palaearctic, 27 Ethiopian, 4 Indian, and 11 peculiar. Of 43 fresh-water fishes, 8 were Palaearctic, 2 Ethiopian, 7 Indian, and 26 peculiar. In the case of both plants and animals, the African and Indian types come chiefly from the low-lying region around the Dead Sea, and to a less extent from the low valley of the Jordan.

9 The Ethnology of Palestine. The aboriginal inhabitants of Palestine were a tall, stalwart race, consisting of Anakim (Josh. xi. 21, 22), Rephaim (Gen. xiv. 5), Emim, Zamzumim, and Horites (Deut. ii. 10-23). Traces of the primitive population continued to exist as late as the time of the monarchy (2 Sam. xxi. 16-22). When Abraham arrived, the country was occupied chiefly by the Amorites and other smaller tribes of Canaanites, but Philistines and Phœnicians were settled on the seacoast and Hittites dwelt on the northern border and at Hebron. The Hittites are regarded as a Turanian people from the Taurus mountains. The Philistines came from the west. The Canaanites, including the Phœnicians, either belonged to the Hamitic race by blood or became incorporated with it (Gen. x. 6, 15-20). They early spoke a Semitic language. These various peoples were conquered, but not utterly exterminated, by the Hebrews under the leadership of Moses and Joshua. The occasional introduction of Edomites, Ammonites, and Moabites by conquest and immigration did not bring a new strain into the blood, for these peoples were Semitic and like the Hebrews descended from Abraham. The conquest of Aramæan tribes, so far as it resulted in adding foreigners to the commonwealth of Israel, added Semites. After the fall of Samaria, the Assyrians deported the northern and eastern tribes of the Israelites and introduced colonists from Hamath, Babylonia, and Elam (2 Kin. xvii. 24; Ezra iv. 9). They were largely Semites and Aryans. A large immigration of Greeks followed in the wake of the conquest of Alexander the Great, colonized Ptolemais, built the Greek towns of the Decapolis, and introduced the Greek language, customs, and culture. Later, Roman officials and a Roman army of occupation were in the country, and ultimately Roman colonists came. In the second quarter of the seventh century of the Christian era the country was subjugated by the Mohammedans, and in many of the towns and villages Arabian military colonies were planted. The Turks made their appearance as conquerors in western Asia A. D. 1086, and except for short periods Palestine has ever since been under their rule; but people of Turkish descent are very few in the country.

10 The History of Palestine. The early history of Palestine, before the arrival of Abraham, is involved in obscurity. The succession of races who inhabited the country may be gathered from the Hebrew records, as already pointed out. The kings of Babylonia early began their invasions of the west, and the campaign of Chedorlaomer in eastern Palestine in the time of Abraham is described in Gen. xiv. The Babylonians impressed their culture, including their complicated script and their language as a medium of international communication, upon the inhabitants. After the expulsion of the shepherd kings from the country of the Nile, the great Pharaohs of the eighteenth dynasty extended their sway far into Asia. Thothmes III. conquered Canaan and exacted tribute from the nations dwelling as far as the Euphrates. During the reigns of Amenophis III. and IV., who succeeded him after an interval, Canaan was garrisoned by Egyptian troops and governed by Egyptian officials. But in the latter reign the grasp of Egypt was evidently weakening. The Hittites were threatening the northern frontier, lawlessness prevailed in various parts of the land, travel was insecure, individual states were in a foment of discontent or in rebellion, and various tribes were extending their territory at the expense of Egypt. Under the succeeding dynasty Seti I. passed through Palestine and waged war with the Hittites on the Orontes; Ramses II. invaded Palestine and penetrated beyond; and Menephtah's armies ravaged southern Palestine and the coast of Philistia, and wasted the crops of the Israelites, who were perhaps in the wilderness of the wandering near Kadesh-barnea; see EGYPT and PHARAOH. Ramses III., of the twentieth dynasty, overran Palestine while the Israelites were still in the desert. When the power of the country had been reduced by these wars, the Hebrews appeared on the scene. Under the leadership of Moses, they conquered the region east of the Jordan; and in the following year, under Joshua, they crossed the river, and after repeated campaigns took possession of Canaan. From this time onward, until the fall of Jerusalem in the first century of the Christian era, the history of Palestine is largely the history of the Hebrew people. See HISTORY.

11. The Topography of Palestine. As nearly as can be estimated, 622 towns west of the Jordan are mentioned in the Bible and the Apocrypha. Other early documents refer to many of these towns by name. In 1874 Mariette Bey published geographical lists taken from tablets round the necks of the figures of captives represented on the great gateway of the temple at Karnak. They belong to the reign of Thothmes III. There are 118 names, of which no fewer than one-third throw light on the topography of Palestine and the Book of Joshua. References to towns of Palestine in the time of Amenophis III. and IV. occur in the letters which were discovered at Tell el-Amarna. Later references are found in contemporary records of Assyria, especially in documents which relate to campaigns conducted in Palestine. Eusebius, bishop of Cæsarea in the first half of the fourth century of the Christian era, wrote a tract concerning the names of places in the sacred Scriptures. It was translated and enlarged by Jerome, resident at Bethlehem a century later. The work is commonly known as the Onomasticon of Eusebius and Jerome. The notices regarding the situation of ancient places in Palestine, according to the information possessed by the learned authors, are often valuable, sometimes absurd. The information gathered by Reland and published by him in 1714, and the travels of Seetzen and Burckhardt, especially east of the Jordan, in the beginning of the present century, prepared the way for the systematic, scientific investigation conducted by Dr. Robinson. He visited Palestine in 1838, accompanied by a former pupil of his, Rev. Dr. Eli Smith, American missionary at Beirut, who greatly aided the inquiry by his knowledge of Arabic. They found by asking the natives what certain ruins or yet inhabited villages were called, that they often bore the old Hebrew names still, a little modified as pronounced by Arab lips. Their discoveries in the topography of Palestine were very important, and were given to the world by Prof. Robinson in 1841 in three octavo volumes. Returning from America, Dr. Robinson resumed his researches in Palestine in 1852, accompanied again by Rev. Dr. Eli Smith and others. He made fresh discoveries, embodied in his Later Biblical Researches, 1856. Dr. Robinson brought to bear on his inquiry not merely keen observation and a sound judgment, but great learning; and his conclusions, many of them disputed at the time, are now much more largely accepted. On June 22, 1865, a society named The Palestine Exploration Fund, was formed in England to prosecute in a scientific spirit all branches of inquiry regarding the Holy Land. Since then it has conducted an ordnance survey of a great part of Palestine, and constructed a superb map of the country in twenty-six sheets. This result is a permanent and splendid achievement. The society has also carried on excavations, especially at Jerusalem and Lachish. As a result of all past investigations, about one-half of the biblical sites have been identified with certainty or great probability.

Pal'lu, in A. V. once Phallu (Gen. xlv. 9) [distinguished].

A son of Reuben, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. xlv. 9; Ex. vi. 14; Num. xxvi. 5).

Palm.

A tree, called in Hebrew tamar, tammorah, and tomer, and in Greek phoenix. It is a tall tree (Song vii. 7, 8), straight and upright (Jer. x. 5). It is a fruit tree (Joel i. 12), and sufficiently ornamental to have been carved in various parts of Solomon's temple and other sanctuaries (1 Kin. vi. 29, 32, 35; Herod. ii. 169). Its great leaves were used as tokens of victory and peace (1 Mac. xii. 51, 2 Mac. x. 7; John xii. 13; Rev. vii. 9; imitated in 2 Esdr. ii. 43-47). These leaves are often popularly called branches; and this designation is employed in the English versions (Lev. xxiii. 40; Neh. viii. 15; John xii. 13), but is not botanically correct. Scarcely any palms have branches at all; and the date palm, the species grown in parts of Palestine, is not one of the few exceptions to the rule. The leaves are large and feathery, from 4 to 6 feet in length; they are quite accessible, as there are generally a number of young plants around the foot of the parent stem. Palm trees flourished on the banks of the Nile. They grew at Elhm, in the wilderness near the Red Sea (Ex. xv. 27), and in Edom (Virgil, Georg. iii. 12). They grew in various parts of Judæa also (Pliny Hist. Nat. v. 14); as in the valley of the Jordan, at Jericho, and En-gedi, and on the coast of the sea of Galilee (Gen. xiv. 7, in the proper name; Deut. xxxiv. 3; Eccles. xxiv. 14; Antiq. ix. 1.2; War i. 6, 6; iii. 10, 8); in the south of Judah (Josh. xv. 31, 49, in the names Sansannah and Kirjath-sannah), in mount Ephraim near Bethel (Judg. iv. 5; xx. 33), near Jerusalem (Neh. viii. 15; John xii. 13). They grew also in the desert east of Damascus, at the town named from them, Tadmor, Tamar, and Palmyra. They flourished also in the lower valleys of the Tigris and Euphrates (Herod i. 193). The tree was regarded by the Greeks and Romans as peculiarly characteristic of Palestine and the neighboring regions. Phœnicia took its name in Greek from the date palm; and the coin struck at Rome to commemorate the capture of Jerusalem represented a woman, emblem of the country, sitting disconsolate under a date palm; see JERUSALEM and MONEY. The tree which was once so common has almost disappeared from Palestine, except in the maritime plain of Philistia and in the neighborhood of Beirût, but it is being cultivated anew near Jericho. The palm tree in Scripture almost always means the date palm (Phoenix dactylifera), which grows about 60 or 80 feet high, having a single upright stem of uniform thickness through its entire length and marked by the scars of fallen leaves. The stem terminates above in a circle of great feathery leaves, perennially green. It is believed to attain a great age, from a hundred to two hundred years. The domestic uses of the palm are numerous. The leaves are employed for covering the roofs and sides of houses, for fences, mats, and baskets. When the tender part of the spathe is pierced, a sweet juice exudes, from which sugar is obtained by evaporation, and a strong drink called arrack by fermentation or distillation (War iv. 8, 3; Herod i. 193). The fruit, which it produces annually in numerous clusters and great abundance, constitutes its chief value, being largely used as an article of food. Even the stony seeds are ground, and yield nourishment to the camel of the desert. Another palm tree may have been known to many Israelites: the Palmyra, which grows at Tadmor in the wilderness. It is Borassus flabelliformis, the specific name implying that it has fan-shaped leaves.

Date Palm

Palmer-worm.

The rendering of the Hebrew Gazam, devourer, an insect which devoured vines, fig trees, olive trees, and the produce of the gardens and fields generally (Joel i. 4; ii. 25; Amos iv. 9). Probably a kind of locust, or a locust in a certain stage of its growth (R. V. margin). When the A. V. was made, palmer-worm denoted a sort of hairy caterpillar which has no fixed abode, but wanders like a palmer or pilgrim from place to place.

Pal'sy.

A partial or total loss of sensibility, voluntary motion, or both, in one or more parts of the body (Mark ii. 3, 9-12; Acts ix. 33-35). It is produced by disease of the brain, the spinal cord, or particular nerves. Under this term the ancients included a variety of diseases affecting the muscles.

Pal'ti, in A. V. once Phalti (1 Sam. xxv. 44) [abbreviation of Phaltiel, deliverance by God].

1. The representative spy from the tribe of Benjamin (Num. xiii. 9).

2. The man to whom Saul married Michal, David's wife, and from whom she was later wrested away and restored to David (1 Sam. xxv. 44; 2 Sam. iii. 15, where the unabreviated form is used).

Pal'ti-el, in A. V. once Phaltiel (2 Sam. iii. 15) [deliverance by God].

1. Prince of the tribe of Issachar and a contemporary of Moses (Num. xxxiv. 26).

2. The same as Palti 2 (2 Sam. iii. 15).

Pal'tite.

A member of the family, or an inhabitant of the town, of Pelet or Palti. To judge from 2 Sam. xxiii. 26 compared with 1 Chron. xxvii. 10, the Paltites were reckoned to Ephraim.

Pam-phy'l-a [popularly interpreted by the Greeks as meaning an assemblage of mingled tribes].

A stretch of coast land in Asia Minor. It was bounded on the north by Pisidia; on the south by a gulf of the Mediterranean, called the sea of Pamphylia, across which Paul sailed (Acts xxvii. 5), on the east by Cilicia; and on the west by Lycia and part of Phrygia. Pamphylia contained Jewish communities (ii. 10). Its towns, Perga and Attalia, were visited by Paul on his first missionary journey (xiii. 13; xiv. 24, 25, xv. 38).

Pan'nag.

A product of Palestine which the Tyrians purchased (Ezek. xxvii. 17). The R. V., following the Jewish Targum, suggests that perhaps it was a kind of confection.

Pa'per. See PAPHYRUS.

Pa'per Reed.

Papyrus, the rendering in the A. V. of the Hebrew 'Arav, nakedness (Is. xix. 7); see PAPHYRUS. The corresponding word in Arabic means an open place, and R. V. renders the Hebrew word by meadow.

Pa'phos.

A town at the southwestern extremity of Cyprus, near cape Zephyrion. It was called Old Paphos to distinguish it from the newer mercantile town some miles to the northwest. It was the capital of the Roman province of Cyprus, and the residence of the proconsul. In its vicinity was a celebrated temple of the Cyprian Venus (Homer, Odyssey viii. 362). The town was visited by Paul (Acts xiii. 6-13). It is now called Kuklia.

Pa-py'rus.

The rendering of the Hebrew word Gome'; a plant which grows in mire (Job viii. 11, R. V. margin; in Is. xxxv. 7 rendered rush), and of which the tiny ark of Moses (Ex. ii. 3, R. V. margin; in text, bulrushes), and also larger boats (Is. xviii. 2, R. V.) were made. The plant referred to is the paper reed (Papyrus antiquorum). But the papyrus is not a grass, as the word reed might suggest; nor is it a rush. It is a giant sedge, with a triangular stock 8 or 10 feet high, terminating in a tuft of flowers. It grows in the plain of Sharon, near the sea of Galilee, and in the waters of the Huleh, commonly thought of as Merom; and it formerly flourished on the Papyrus.

Nile, though now extinct upon that river. Its use was widespread (2 Esdr. xv 2; 3 Mac. iv. 20). The Egyptians made shoes, baskets, boats, and other articles of it; and used sheets, formed of strips of the pith, as writing paper. On such material, called in Greek chartēs, the apostle John wrote his Second Epistle (2 John 12)

Par'a-ble.

A method of speech in which moral or religious truth is illustrated from the analogy of common experience. The comparison may be expressed, as by the word like, or be implied. The limits between the parable and simile and metaphor are not well defined. Often there is scarcely any difference, except that the simile and metaphor are short and the parable comparatively long. "Ye are the light of the world" is a metaphor; "like a lamb dumb before his shear-er" is a simile; but "the kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven, which a woman took, and hid in three measures of meal, till it was all leavened," is a parable (Mat. xiii. 33). The parable has certain advantages. One is, that this means of conveying truth makes it adhere to the memory much more than a plain didactic statement would do. For instance, no didactic statement as to the willingness of our Lord to receive penitent sinners would have had an effect at all equal to that produced by the parable of the prodigal son (Luke xv. 11-32). A second advantage in a parable is that when it is needful for a prophet or a preacher to censure a powerful personage, who will not allow himself to be directly found fault with, it is possible by a skillfully framed parable to make him not merely listen patiently, but condemn himself before he discovers that it is himself he is condemning. This was done with much skill by the prophet Nathan when he went to reprove David for his great sin in the matter of Uriah the Hittite.

The following are the chief parables in the O. T.: the trees anointing a king (Judg. ix. 8-20), the ewe lamb (2 Sam. xii. 1-14), the widow, one of whose two sons slew the other (2 Sam. xiv. 4-20), the soldier who let his captive escape (1 Kin. xx. 35-42), the thistle which asked for the cedar's daughter as a wife for his son (2 Kin. xiv. 9-11), the vineyard (Is. v. 1-7), the two eagles and a vine (Ezek. xvi. 1-10), the lion's whelps (xix. 1-9), Oholah and Oholbah (xxii. 1-49), the boiling pot (xxiv. 1-14).

An important part of our Lord's teaching was by means of parables, and when Scripture parables are spoken of, generally those of Jesus are meant. Christ used the parabolic form of teaching at every period of his public ministry (Mark iii. 23, Luke vi. 39; vii. 40-50), but there came a time when a distinct change took place and he gave a larger place to parables in his public instruction (Mat. xiii. 3; Mark iv. 2). Two reasons are assigned why he adopted to such an extent this method of teaching. One given by Matthew is that it was prophesied (Mat. xiii. 34, 35; cp. Ps. xlix. 4; lxxvii. 2, 3). The other, emanating from our Lord, explains the former. He used parables because it was not given unto his auditors to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven, since seeing they saw not and hearing they did not understand (Mat. xiii. 10-16). This statement of Jesus has been interpreted to mean that he clothed the truths of the kingdom in images in order to make them more intelligible to his hearers and to impress them indelibly on their memory. But this was true of a certain class of hearers only and in many cases, even in respect to them, only after the parable had been explained. Jesus rather meant that his auditors generally were unprepared to hear and heartily believe the spiritual truths of the kingdom; and while the time had come to teach these doctrines to his followers who were to carry on his work after his departure (Mark iv. 33, 34), the truth was henceforth hidden from those who had heard without repentance, was cautiously uttered in the hearing of obdurate enemies who were watching to seize upon his words and employ them against him, and was veiled from the fickle multitude who would refuse to listen to his words if they perceived the full import of them (Mark iv. 11, 12).

With perhaps only one exception (Mat xviii. 23-35), the recorded parables, which were spoken after this form of instruction became prominent in Jesus' public teaching, fall into three groups: I. Eight illustrating the nature of the kingdom of heaven (Mat xiii 1-50; Mark iv 26-29), followed by one by way of application (Mat. xiii. 51, 52). These were spoken during one day on the shore of the sea of Galilee (xiii 1, 53). They contain five fundamental truths: 1. Sower and seed: the varied reception of the gospel by different classes of hearers 2. Tares and wheat: evil springs up among the good. 3. Seed growing secretly, mustard seed, and heaven: growth of the church imperceptibly, externally, internally. 4. Hid treasure, and pearl of great price: value of the kingdom, necessity of sacrifice to obtain it. 5. Net gathering all kinds of fish: mixed condition of the visible church until the end of the world. II Nineteen, or thereabout, illustrating the kingdom of heaven in the individual life (Luke x 25-xix, except xiii. 18-21) Most of them if not all, were delivered after Christ's departure from Galilee, in the interval of six months between the feast of tabernacles and his last passover. They include the parables of the good Samaritan, the friend at midnight, the rich man and his barns, the waiting servants, the shut door, the chief seat, the supper and excuses for not attending it, the lost sheep, the lost money, the prodigal son, the unjust steward, the rich man and Lazarus, the servant's duty, the importunate widow, the Pharisee and the publican, and the pounds. III. Five or, with Mat xxiv 32-35, six, which were delivered during the last week at Jerusalem, and point to judgment and the consummation of the kingdom. The attitude of those called is illustrated by the parables of the two sons and the wicked husbandmen (Mat. xxi 28-46), and the need of the wedding garment, of watchfulness, and of fidelity is shown by the parables of the marriage of the king's son, the ten virgins, and the five talents (Mat xxii 1-14; xxv 1-30).

In interpreting the parables, rigid inquiry should be made into the circumstances in which each was delivered at first, and the doctrine or argument which it was intended primarily to convey. This done, it is at once seen that the teaching of the parable is of universal application, suited for all analogous circumstances and for all succeeding time.

Par'a-clete [Greek paraklētos, a legal assistant, advocate, or intercessor]

The word occurs in R. V. on the margins of John xiv. 16, 26; xv. 26; xvi. 7, where helper or advocate is given as the English equivalent. In the text of these passages the translation is comforter, but in 1 John ii. 1 it is advocate. It is applied to:

1 The Lord Jesus Christ. He was the advocate, by implication in John xiv. 16, who guided, counseled, and strengthened the disciples while he was present with them, and he is now the Christian's advocate with the Father, and pleads the believer's cause with God (1 John ii. 1) as he did while on earth (Luke xxii 31, 32; John xvii).

2 The Holy Spirit, who is Christ's advocate with the believer, glorifying Christ and declaring him (John xv. 26; xvi. 14), vindicating him from man's unworthy thoughts, showing him to be chief among ten thousand and altogether lovely, and exhibiting him as man's great need; and he is the Spirit of truth, who teaches the believer and guides him into the truth (xv. 26; xvi. 13, 14), convicting of sin, righteousness, and judgment (ver 8), who teaches to pray and makes intercession with groanings that cannot be uttered (Rom. viii. 26, 27).

Par'a-dise.

A pleasure ground, orchard, or park, in Hebrew pardes (Ecc. ii. 5, Song iv. 13, R. V. margin; in Neh. ii. 8 rendered forest). Solomon's gardens at Etham and the hanging gardens at Babylon are called paradises in the Greek text of Josephus (Antiq. viii 7, 3; con Apion i. 20), and the garden of Eden is called the paradise (paradeisos) of Eden in the Septuagint (Gen. ii 8).

Paradise was the region of bliss which man had lost, and it naturally came to be a designation for the place of the righteous dead. The later Jews distinguished between a supernal and an infernal paradise, the former being a part of heaven, the latter a division of hades assigned to the souls of the just.

In the N. T. paradise means heaven in two instances (2 Cor. xii 4; ep. 2; Rev. ii. 7, cp. xxii. 2); see HEAVEN. Accordingly it naturally denotes heaven in the remaining instance (Luke xxiii 43).

Pa'rah [heifer, young cow].

A village of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 23), commonly identified with the ruins Fārah in the wady Fārah, 5½ miles northeast of Jerusalem.

Pa'ran [perhaps, a region abounding in caverns]

A wilderness between mount Sinai, or more exactly between Hazeroth, several days' march from Sinai, and Canaan (Num. x. 12; xii. 16). It was on the south of Judah (1 Sam. xxv. 1-5). In it Kadesh was situated (Num. xiii. 26), and apparently also Elath on the Red Sea (Gen. xiv 6; see EL-PARAN). It lay east of the wildernesses of Beer-sheba and Shur (Gen. xxi. 14, 21; cp. xxv 9, 12-18; xxviii. 9). It included the wilderness of Zin, or insensibly merged itself in it without a sharply defined boundary (Num. xiii. 26 with xx. 1). These data indicate the plateau or mountain land (Deut. xxxii. 2; Hab. iii. 3), lying south of Canaan, and bounded on the other sides by the wilderness of Shur, the curved range of mountains known as Jebel et-Tih or mountain of the wandering, and the Arabah. It is the wilderness where the Israelites wandered thirty and eight years. Most of it is from 2000 to 2500 feet above sea level. There is a wady, or valley, in the Sinaitic Peninsula, called wady Feiran, which looks very much like Paran altered. Niebuhr thought that they might be identified; but it is so difficult to harmonize the Scripture location of the place with this view, that Robinson, Stanley, and most inquirers, decline to accept the identification. The wady Feiran is between mount Sinai and the Red Sea. Paran is not reached till after the departure from Sinai in the opposite direction.

Par'bar [probably, colonnade]

A precinct on the western side of the outer court of the temple (1 Chron. xxvi. 18). It contained chambers for officials and stalls for cattle (2 Kin. xxiii 11, where the plural is rendered suburbs and precincts).

Parch'ed Corn.

Roasted grain used as food (Lev. xxiii 14; Ruth ii. 14; 1 Sam xvii. 17). Thomson describes the method of preparing it at present in vogue. A number of the best ears of grain, not too ripe, are plucked, with the stalks attached. After being tied in small parcels, a blazing fire of dry grass and thorn bushes is kindled under them, which burns off the chaff and roasts the grain.

Parch'ment.

The skin of sheep or goats prepared for use as a writing material or for other purposes. The skin is first soaked in lime to remove the hair, and is then shaved, washed, dried, stretched, and smoothed. Herodotus relates that the ancient Ionians used the skins of goats and sheep, because of the scarcity of papyrus (Herod. v. 58). In Herodotus' own time papyrus was the common writing material. Parchment was first obtained at Pergamos; and when Ptolemy forbade the export of papyrus, Eumenes II., king of Pergamos, adopted parchment for the books of his great library, and such skins became known as chartæ pergamænæ, whence the word parchment is derived. In the time of Josephus and earlier, parchment was used by the Jews for the manuscripts of their sacred writings (Antiq. xii 2, 11); and it was a provision of the Talmud that the law should be written on the skins of clean animals, tame or wild, and even of clean birds. Papyrus was a common writing material (2 John 12, in E. V. paper), but Paul refers to parchments of his, about which he is especially solicitous (2 Tim iv. 13).

Par'ents.

The fifth commandment inculcates upon children the duty of reverencing their parents and attaches a promise to its fulfillment (Ex. xx. 12; Deut. v. 16; Ephes. vi. 1, 2). Upon the parents rests the obligation of bringing up the children in the fear of the Lord, and not provoking them to wrath (Gen. xviii. 19; Deut. vi. 7; Ephes. vi. 4). According to the Mosaic law, a son that smote father or mother, or cursed them, was punished with death (Ex. xxi. 15, 17; Lev. xx 9; Deut. xxvii 16); and as an extreme measure, parents were enjoined to bring a stubborn and rebellious son before the elders for trial and execution (Deut. xxi 18-21). The Mosaic law thus regulated the power of parents. According to Roman law, as set forth in the twelve tables, the life and liberty of children were in the father's hands. In Hebrew law the right of life and death did not rest with the parents, but was vested in the judicial body. Custom permitted an impoverished parent to sell a daughter to be a maidservant, but the Mosaic law carefully guarded her rights (Ex. xxi 7-11). Israelitish custom further permitted a creditor to seize a bankrupt debtor and enslave his wife and children (2 Kin. iv 1, Neh. v 5, Is. l 1; Mat. xviii. 25), and in cases of grave sin the entire family was involved in the extermination of the offender (Josh. vii 24).

Par'lor.

Eglon's summer parlor was an upper chamber exposed to the cool breezes (Judg. iii. 20, cp. R. V. margin). See HOTSE.

Par-mash'ta [probably, a Persian name, very great, superior]

A son of Haman (Esth. ix. 9).

Par'me-nas [probably, faithful]

One of the seven men elected to look after the Greek-speaking widows and, apparently, the poor and financial affairs generally in the apostolic church (Acts vi. 5).

Par'nach.

A Zebulunite (Num. xxxiv. 25).

Pa'rosh, in A. V. once Pharosh (Ezra viii 3) [a flea].

Founder of a family, members of which returned from the Babylonian captivity (Ezra ii 3; viii. 3). One of the clan was called Pedaiah (Neh. iii. 25). Other members of it married foreign wives, whom Ezra induced them to put away (Ezra x. 25).

Par-shan'da-tha [a Persian name, given to Persia].

A son of Haman (Esth. ix. 7).

Par'thi-ans.

A people who, when first heard of, occupied a region nearly corresponding to the modern Persian province of Khorasan, a considerable distance southeast of the Caspian Sea. The length of Parthia proper was about 300 miles, its breadth from 100 to 120 its area about 33,000 square miles, or slightly more than that of Scotland and nearly that of Indiana. The first mention of the Parthians is in the inscriptions of Darius Hystaspis. The, revolted against the Persians, 521 B. C., but were soon subdued again. From the Persians, they passed to Alexander the Great, and then to his eastern successors, the Seleucidae. About 256 B. C. Bactria successfully revolted against Seleucid domination, and Parthia, under Arsaces I, immediately followed the example. His successors are generally known as the Arsacidae. Mithridates I, who reigned thirty-eight years, from 174 to 136 B. C., raised the kingdom founded by Arsaces into an empire, extending 1500 miles from east to west, with a varying breadth from north to south of 100, 300, or 400 miles. The western boundary was the Euphrates. The chief city was Ctesiphon on the Tigris, opposite Seleucia. After riding themselves of the Macedonian-Greek domination, the Parthians came into frequent collision with the Romans, one standing bone of contention between them being the possession of Armenia. From 64 B. C. to A. D. 225 they set limits to the Roman empire in the East. In 40-37 B. C. their armies overran Asia Minor and Syria, took and plundered Jerusalem, and placed Antigonus, the last of the Asmonaeans, on the throne (Antiq. xiv 13, 3, War i 13, 1). Jews from Parthia were present at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii 9), and may have carried the gospel to Parthia when they returned home. After wielding power for nearly 500 years, the Parthians became enervated by luxury, and the Persians about A. D. 224, rose in revolt, and under the leadership of Arda-hir, family of Sassan, terminated the Parthian dominion, substituting the second Persian or Sassanian empire in its room.

Par'tridge.

A wild bird, called in Hebrew kore', the crier or caller, in Greek perdx, which was hunted on the mountains of Palestine (1 Sam xxvi. 20). The caged partridge was used as a decoy bird (Ecclus. xi. 30). Jeremiah compares the amasser of ill-gotten wealth to the partridge which, according to the belief of the Israelites of his time, gathers young which it has not brought forth (Jer. xvii 11, R. V.), or sitteth on eggs which it has not laid (R. V. margin). Two species are found in Palestine, the desert or Hey's sand partridge (Ammoperdix heyi), which is the only species at En-gedi, in the wilderness of which David was when he compared himself to a hunted partridge; and the chukar partridge (Caccabis chukar), which is abundant in all the hilly parts of Palestine. It has richly barred feathers on the flanks, deep red legs and bill, and deep black gorget. It is a large and fine bird, a variety of the Greek partridge (Caccabis saxatilis), but larger, and it exceeds the chukar partridge of India in size.

Greek Partridge

Pa-ru'ah [flourishing].

The father of Solomon's purveyor in Issachar (1 Kin iv. 17).

Par'va-im.

A designation of gold used for the ornamentation of Solomon's temple (2 Chron iii. 6). Gesenius derived it from Sanscrit pūrta, in front, eastward, and gave it the sense of eastern or oriental gold; but most investigators believe that it denotes a locality in Ophir.

Pa'sach [perhaps, a divider].

An Asherite, of the family of Beriah (1 Chron. vii 33).

Pas-dam'mim. See EPHES-DAMMIM.

Pa-se'ah, in A. V. once Phaseah (Neh. vii. 51) [lame].

1 A man of Judah, descended from Che-lub (1 Chron iv. 12).

2. The father of a certain Jehoiada, who repaired the old gate of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 6). He was the founder of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from captivity (Ezra ii 49; Neh. vii. 51).

Pash'hur, in A. V. Pashur.

1. Son of Malchiah, and one of several officials who had influence with king Zedekiah and bitterly opposed the prophet Jeremiah (Jer. xxi. 1; xxxviii. 1, 4; cp. xxi. 9 with xxxviii. 2). It is natural to suppose that his father is the Malchiah mentioned in xxxviii. 6, a royal prince into whose dungeon the prophet was cast. His identity with the priest Pashhur, the son of Malchijah (1 Chron. ix. 12), is doubtful: especially as to his companion, but not to him, is given the priestly title (Jer. xxi. 1).

2. A son of Immer, a priest. He put Jeremiah in the stocks on account of his discouraging predictions (Jer. xx. 1-6).

3. The father of an opponent of Jeremiah named Gedaliah (Jer. xxxviii. 1).

4. The founder of a priestly family, members of which returned from the Babylonian captivity (Ezra ii. 38; Neh. vii. 41, and perhaps 1 Chron. ix. 12). Some of his descendants married foreign wives, whom Ezra induced them to put away (Ezra x. 22).

5. A priest, doubtless head of a father's house, who, with others, sealed the covenant, made in the days of Nehemiah, by which it was agreed to forbid the intermarriage of their children with foreigners and to keep the law of God (Neh. x. 3).

Pass'o-ver [passing over (Ex. xii. 23; Antiq. ii. 14, 6)].

1. The first of the three annual festivals at which all the men were required to appear at the sanctuary (Ex. xii. 43; Deut. xvi. 1), known also as the feast of unleavened bread (Ex. xxiii. 15; Deut. xvi. 16). It was instituted in Egypt to commemorate the culminating event in the redemption of the Israelites (Ex. xii. 1, 14, 42; xxiii. 15; Deut. xvi. 1, 3). That night was to be much observed unto the Lord, when he smote all the firstborn in the land of Egypt, but passed over the houses of the Israelites where the blood had been sprinkled and the inmates were standing, staff in hand, awaiting the deliverance promised by the Lord. The festival began on the fourteenth of Abib at evening, that is in the beginning of the fifteenth day, with the sacrificial meal (Lev. xxiii. 5). A lamb or kid was slain between the evenings, that is towards sunset (Ex. xii. 6; Deut. xvi. 6), between the ninth and eleventh hours (War vi. 9, 3). It was roasted whole, and was eaten with unleavened bread and bitter herbs (Ex. xii. 8). The shed blood denoted expiation, the bitter herbs symbolized the bitterness of Egyptian bondage, the unleavened bread was an emblem of purity (cp. Lev. ii. 11; 1 Cor. v. 7, 8). The Israelites pleading the blood, mindful of the afflictions from which they awaited deliverance, and putting away wickedness, were the people of the Lord in holy, glad communion before him. The supper was partaken of by the members of every household. If the family was small, neighbors joined until the company was large enough to consume the entire lamb (Ex. xii. 4). The head of the household recited the history of the redemption. At the first institution the participants stood, in later times they reclined. Other minor features were introduced: four successive cups of wine mixed with water, to which there is no reference in the law; singing of Psalms exlii.-cxviii. (cp. Is. xxx. 29; Ps. xlii. 4); a dish of fruits reduced with vinegar to the consistency of lime as a reminder of the mortar used during the Egyptian bondage. The paschal supper was the introductory ceremony and chief feature of the festival, which lasted until the twenty-first day of the month (Ex. xii. 18; Lev. xxiii. 5, 6; Deut. xvi. 6, 7). That the event was to be commemorated by a festival of seven days' duration (Ex. xii. 14-20) was not communicated to the people until the day of the flight (xii. 3-10). They were directed regarding one evening only (xii. 21-23), and informed that the service was to be kept perpetually (24, 25). The attendance of the pilgrims was required at the supper only. They were at liberty to depart on the morrow (Deut. xvi. 7). The first day, that is the fifteenth, was kept as Sabbath and likewise the seventh; no work was done and there was a holy convocation (Ex. xii. 16; Lev. xxiii. 7; Num. xxviii. 28, 25; of which only the last is emphasized in Ex. xii. 6; Deut. xvi. 8). On the morrow after the Sabbath, that is on the second day of the festival, a sheaf of the first ripe barley was waved by the priest before the Lord to consecrate the opening harvest (Lev. xxiii. 10-14; cp. Josh. v. 10-12, R. V. margin; Septuagint of Lev. xxiii. 7, 11; Antiq. iii. 10, 5); see WEEKS, FEAST OF. This was an incidental feature: the act consecrated the opening harvest, but it held a subordinate place; the second day, when it was performed, was not observed as a Sabbath; and altogether the relation of the passover to the agricultural year was less marked than in the festivals of weeks and tabernacles. During the pass-over day by day continually, in addition to the regular sacrifices of the sanctuary, two bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs were offered as a burnt offering, and a he goat as a sin offering (Lev. xxiii. 8; Num. xxviii. 19-23). During the seven days also unleavened bread was eaten. They had no leaven in their houses on the night of the passover, and consequently the dough which they seized in their hurried flight was unleavened (Ex. xii. 8, 34, 39). It was baked thus. Henceforth unleavened bread was associated in their minds, not only with the thought of sincerity and truth, which was the essential idea, but also with that of the hurried flight from Egypt (Deut. xvi. 3). Celebrations of the passover are recorded at Sinai (Num. ix. 1-14), on entering Canaan (Josh. v. 11), under Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxx. 1-27; with reference to Solomon, 5, 26), under Josiah (2 Kin. xxiii. 21-23; 2 Chron. xxxv. 1-19), in the days of Ezra (Ezra vi. 19-22). See also Mat. xxvi. 17 seq.; Mark xiv. 12 seq.; Luke xxii. 7 seq.; John xviii. 28; Antiq. xvii. 9, 3; xx. 5, 3; War vi. 9, 3).

2. The lamb or kid killed at the festival of the passover (Ex. xii. 21; Deut. xvi. 2; 2 Chron. xxx. 17). Christ is our passover (1 Cor. v. 7). Like the paschal lamb, he was without blemish (Ex. xii. 5 with 1 Pet. i. 18, 19), not a bone was broken (Ex. xii. 46 with John xix. 36), his blood was a token before God (Ex. xii. 13), and the feast was eaten with unleavened bread (18 and 1 Cor. v. 8).

Pat'a-ra.

A maritime city on the southwest of Lycia. Paul took ship there for Phœnicia on his last voyage to Palestine (Acts xxi. 1). It possessed a famous oracle of Apollo. It still exists as a ruin under its old name, though gradually becoming overwhelmed by moving sand dunes.

Path'ros [land of the south (Gesenius, Brugsch), house of the goddess Hathor in the south (Ebers)].

The country of southern or Upper Egypt. It is mentioned between Egypt and Cush (Is. xi. 11); and is known in Egyptian texts as Pa-to-ris, with Thebes as its capital. It was the original seat of the Egyptians themselves (Ezek. xxix. 14); and the first historical king of Egypt, Menes, is reported to have resided in Upper Egypt, in whose time all the lower country north of lake Moeris was a swamp (Herod. ii 4, 15, 99). Isaiah foretold the dispersion of Israel to the remotest regions and their eventual return, among other places from Pathros (Is. xi. 11; cp. vii 18). After the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar, Jews, probably refugees, were dwellers in Pathros (Jer xlv 1, 2, 15).

Path-ru'sim.

(One of seven peoples proceeding from Mizraim. They are the inhabitants of Pathros (Gen. x. 14, 1 Chron. i. 12))

Pat'mos.

An island to which the apostle John was banished for the word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ, and where he saw the visions recorded in the book of Revelation (Rev. i. 9). It is a small, rocky island, one of the Sporades, in the Grecian Archi-

Hebrew race and nation. It is applied to Abraham (Heb. vii. 4), to the twelve sons of Jacob (Acts vii. 8, 9), and to king David (ii. 29). The title is commonly given to the godly men and heads of families, whose lives are recorded in the O. T. previous to the time of Moses, as the antediluvian patriarchs whose lineage is given in Gen. v. In the patriarchal system the government of a clan is regarded as the paternal right. It resides in the first instance in the progenitor of the tribe, and descends from him to the firstborn son or eldest lineal male descendant. The head of each several family, into which the increasing tribe expands, exercises a similar government within his own limited sphere.

The patriarchal dispensation was the period before the establishment of the theocracy at Sinai, when each patriarchal head of a family was the priest of his own household, and God communed with him as such.

Pat'ro-bas.

A Christian at Rome, to whom Paul sent salutations (Rom. xvi. 14).

Pa'u [bleating (of sheep)].

A town of Edom, the city of king Hadar (Gen. xxxvi. 39). Site unknown. Called in 1 Chron. i. 50 Pai, vau and jod being interchanged; see VAU.

Patmos and the Harbor of La Scala.

pelago, and is now called Patino. It lies off the southwestern coast of Asia Minor, about 30 miles south of Samos; and is about 15 miles in circumference, and generally barren.

Pa'tri-arch.

The father or chief of a race; a name given in the N. T. to the founders of the Paul (Greek Paulos, from Latin Paulus, little).

The great apostle to the gentiles. His Jewish name was Saul (Hebrew Sha'ul, Greek Saulos). He is so called in The Acts until after the account of the conversion of Sergius Paulus, proconsul of Cyprus, from which point in the narrative (Acts xiii. 9) the name Paul alone is given him. In his epistles the apostle always calls himself Paul. It is not strange that some have supposed that he took the name Paul from the proconsul. But this is in reality quite improbable in itself, and fails to observe the delicacy with which Luke introduces the apostle's gentile name when his work among the gentiles, by whom he was known as Paul, began. It is more probable that, like many Jews (Acts i. 23; xii. 12; Col. iv. 11), and especially in the dispersion, the apostle had from the beginning both names. He was born in Tarsus, the chief city of Cilicia (Acts ix. 11; xxi. 39; xxii. 3), and was of the tribe of Benjamin (Phil. iii. 5). It is not known how the family came to reside in Tarsus, though one ancient tradition represents it as having removed there from Gischala in Galilee after the latter place had been captured by the Romans. It is possible, however, that the family had at an earlier time formed part of a colony settled in Tarsus by one of the Syrian kings (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveler, p. 31), or they may have voluntarily migrated, as so many Jews did, for commercial purposes. Paul seems, however, to have had a large and even influential family connection. In Rom. xvi. 7, 11 he salutes three persons as his kinsmen, two of whom, Andronicus and Junias (R. V.), are said to have been "of note among the apostles," and to have become Christians before Paul did. From Acts xxiii. 16 we learn that his "sister's son," who seems to have resided, perhaps with his mother, in Jerusalem, gave information to the chief captain of the plot to kill Paul, from which it may be inferred that the young man was connected with some of the leading families. This is also confirmed by the prominence of Paul, though himself a young man, at the time of Stephen's death. He was apparently already a member of the council (Acts xxvi. 10), and soon afterwards the high priest intrusted to him the work of persecuting the Christians (ix. 1, 2; xxii. 5). His language in Phil. iii. 4-7 further implies that he occupied originally a position of large influence, and that opportunities of honor and gain had been open to him. His family connections, therefore, cannot have been obscure. Though he was brought up in the strict observance of the Hebrew faith and traditions, his father having been a Pharisee (Acts xxiii. 6), he was born a free Roman citizen. We do not know by what means his ancestor obtained citizenship. It may have been for service to the state or possibly by purchase. Its possession may have had some connection with the apostle's Roman name Paulus. But, however acquired, his Roman citizenship became of great importance in the prosecution of his Christian work and more than once saved his life. Tarsus was one of the intellectual centers of the East, and the seat of a famous school of learning in which Stoicism was the dominant philosophy. It is scarcely probable, however, that Paul came under these influences when a boy, for his parents were strict Jews, and he was early sent to Jerusalem to be educated. Like other Jewish boys he was taught a trade, which in his case was the manufacture of tents, such as were used by travelers (xviii. 3). But, as he himself says (xxii. 3), he was brought up in Jerusalem. He must, therefore, have been sent there when quite young. And his education in Jerusalem tended to deepen the hold upon him of his inherited Pharisaic traditions. He was instructed "according to the perfect manner of the law of the fathers" (ibid.). He had for his teacher one of the most learned and distinguished rabbis of the day. This was Gamaliel, the grandson of the yet more famous Hillel. It was this Gamaliel whose speech, recorded in Acts v. 34-39, prevented the sanhedrin from attempting to slay the apostles. Gamaliel, indeed, had some leaning, strangely for a Pharisee, toward Greek culture, and his speech in The Acts shows the reverse of a bitter, persecuting spirit. But he was famous for rabbinical learning, and at his feet the young man from Tarsus became versed not only in the teaching of the O. T., but in the subtleties of rabbinical interpretation, while it is plain also that his zeal for the traditions of the fathers and his narrow Pharisaism burned with the fiery intensity of youth. Thus the future apostle grew up an ardent Pharisee, trained in the religious and intellectual ideas of his people and from his personal qualities, his course of education, and probably his family connections prepared to take a high position among his countrymen.

He first appears in Christian history as the man at whose feet the witnesses who stoned Stephen laid their clothes (Acts vii. 58). He is described as being then a young man. The position he is here said to have occupied was not an official one. It seems to imply, however, especially when taken with the statement (viii. 1) that he "was consenting unto his death," that Paul was active in the persecution of the first Christian martyr. He was doubtless one of the Hellenists, or Greek-speaking Jews, mentioned in Acts vi. 9 as the original instigators of the charge against Stephen. We cannot be wrong in supposing that Paul's hatred of the new sect had already been aroused; that he not only despised their crucified Messiah, but regarded them as being both politically and religiously dangerous; and that he was already prepared, with bitter but conscientious fanaticism, to oppose them to the death. So we find him, immediately after Stephen's death, taking a leading part in the persecution of the Christians which followed (Acts viii. 3; xxii. 4; xxvi. 10, 11; 1 Cor. xv. 9; Gal. i. 13; Phil. iii. 6; 1 Tim. i. 13). He did this with the fierceness of a misguided conscience. He was the type of the religious inquisitor. Not content with waging the persecution in Jerusalem, he asked of the high priest letters to the synagogues in Damascus that he might bring from thence any Christian Jews whom he might find (Acts ix. 1, 2). Large powers of internal administration were granted to the Jews even by the Romans, and in Damascus, which was under the control of Aretas, king of the Nabatheans, the governor was particularly favorable to them (ix. 23, 24; 2 Cor xi 32), so that Paul's persecution of the Christians is not in the least incredible. The important thing to observe, however, is that according to the express testimony of Luke and of Paul himself, he was filled with fury against them up to the very moment of his conversion, and believed that in persecuting them he was rendering the highest service to God. He did not have a doubt as to the righteousness of his course, nor did his heart fail him in its execution.

It was on the way to Damascus that his sudden conversion occurred. Paul and his companions, probably on horseback, had been following the usual road across the desert from Galilee to the ancient city. Damascus had been nearly reached. It was the hour of noon and the sun was blazing in the zenith (Acts xxvi. 13). Suddenly a light from heaven, brighter than the sun, streamed round about them, and, overcome by its blinding brilliance, Paul fell upon the ground. His companions, too, fell to the ground (14), though they appear to have afterwards arisen, while he remained prostrate (ix 7). Out of the light he heard a voice, saying in the Hebrew language: "Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me? it is hard for thee to kick against the goad" (xxvi. 14 R V.). He replied, "Who art thou, Lord?" He heard in answer "I am Jesus whom thou persecutest" (15). "Arise, and go into the city, and it shall be told thee what thou must do" (ix. 6; xxii 10). His companions heard the sound of the voice (ix. 7), but did not understand what was said (xxii. 9). Paul, however, was found to be blinded by the light, so they led him by the hand into Damascus, where he lodged in the house of a certain Judas (ix. 11). For three days he remained blind and fasting, praying (9, 11) and meditating on the revelation which had been made to him. On the third day the Lord commanded a certain Jewish Christian, named Ananias, to go to Paul and lay his hands on him that he might receive his sight. The Lord assured Ananias, who was afraid of the persecutor, that the latter had already seen him in a vision coming to him. Thereupon Ananias obeyed. Paul confessed his faith in Jesus, received his sight, accepted baptism, and forthwith, with his characteristic energy and to the astonishment of the Jews, began to preach in the synagogues that Jesus was the Christ, the Son of God (ix. 10-22).

Such is the narrative of the conversion of Saul of Tarsus. Three recitals of it are given in The Acts; one by Luke (ix. 3-22); one by Paul himself before the Jews (xxii. 1-16); again by Paul before Festus and Agrippa (xxvi. 1-20). The three accounts entirely agree, though in each of them particulars are dwelt on which are not found in the others. The story in each case is told with special regard to the purpose of the narrator. Paul in his epistles also frequently alludes to his conversion, attributing it to the grace and power of God, though he does not describe it in detail (1 Cor ix. 1, 16; xv 8-10; Gal. i. 12-16; Eph iii. 1-8; Phil. iii 5-7; 1 Tim i 12-16; 2 Tim i 9-11). The fact, therefore, is supported by the strongest possible testimony. It is certain also that Jesus not only spoke to Paul, but visibly appeared to him (Acts ix 17, 27; xxii 14, xxvi 16; 1 Cor ix 1). While the form in which he appeared is not described, we may be sure that it was a glorious one; so that Paul realized at once that the crucified Jesus was the exalted Son of God. He himself describes it as "the heavenly vision" (Acts xxvi. 19), or spectacle, a word elsewhere used only in Luke i 22 and xxiv. 23 to describe the manifestation of angelic beings. There is no ground therefore for the allegation that it was an illusion of any kind. At the same time the mere appearance of Christ did not convert Paul. This was the work of the Spirit in his heart, enabling him to apprehend and accept the truth which had been revealed to him (see especially Gal i. 15). Ananias also was evidently made use of in order to connect Paul's new life with the already existing church. The various rationalistic attempts which have been made to explain Paul's conversion without acknowledgment of the objective and supernatural interposition of the Lord are wrecked upon the testimony of Paul himself that he had thought up to the time of his conversion that it was his religious duty to persecute Christianity, and that his change was due to the sovereign exercise of God's power and grace. The expression, "It is hard for thee to kick against the goad," does not imply that he had been an unwilling persecutor or that he already believed that Christianity might be true, but describes the folly of any resistance to the purpose of God with him. At the same time his previous history had been an unconscious preparation for his future work. His Roman citizenship, his rabbinical training, as well as his natural qualities of mind fitted him for his life task. There is reason to believe also that with all his zeal he had not found spiritual peace in Judaism (Rom vii 7-25). If so, the manner of his conversion must have made him vividly realize that salvation is alone through the grace of God in Christ. His religious experience therefore was also part of his preparation to become the great ex-pounder of the gospel as providing justification for the sinner on the ground of Christ's merits received through faith alone. As soon as he was converted Paul began evangelistic work. This was partly due to his natural energy, but also to the fact that it had been revealed to him that God's purpose in calling him was to make him a missionary and apostle (Acts ix. 15; xxvi 16-20; Gal i. 15, 16). He began work in the synagogues of Damascus and pursued it with success. This raised against him persecution from the Damascene Jews, who were aided by the governor of the city (2 Cor. xi. 32); so that he was compelled to flee secretly, being let down by his disciples in a basket from a window in the city's wall (Acts ix. 23-25; 2 Cor xi 33). Instead of returning to Jerusalem, however, he went to Arabia and afterwards returned to Damascus (Gal. i 17). We do not know where he went in Arabia, nor how long he stayed, nor what he did there. It is not improbable that the time was mainly spent in meditation upon the great change which had come over his life and the truth as it had now been revealed to him. But three years after his conversion he determined to leave Damascus and visit Jerusalem again. He tells us (Gal. i. 18, 19) that his main purpose was to visit Peter; that he remained in Jerusalem only fifteen days; and that of the apostles he saw Peter only, though he mentions that he also saw James, the Lord's brother. Luke, however (Acts ix 26-29), gives further particulars. It appears that the Christians in Jerusalem were afraid of him because of his former reputation and did not believe he was really a disciple; but that Barnabas, with that generosity of mind which was ever characteristic of him, took Paul to the apostles and related the story of his conversion and subsequent changed life. We are also told that Paul preached as fearlessly in Jerusalem as he had done at Damascus and directed his efforts especially toward his old friends, the Greek-speaking Jews (ix. 28, 29). These, too, plotted at once against his life. The threatening danger caused the brethren to send him away, so they took him to Cæsarea and sent him from there to Tarsus (29, 30; Gal i. 21). He departed the more willingly because in the temple the Lord had appeared to him in a vision bidding him go and telling him distinctly that his mission was to the gentiles (Acts xxii. 17-21). The two accounts in The Acts and Galatians of this visit to Jerusalem have sometimes been thought inconsistent, but they may be naturally harmonized. It is highly probable that Paul would want to visit Peter in order that his work might proceed in unison with that of the original apostles, of whom Peter was the most prominent. It is equally natural that the Jerusalem Christians should be at first afraid of him; and the conduct of Barnabas, who was, like Paul, a Hellenistic Jew, is in keeping with his action throughout the whole history. Fifteen days, moreover, are not too short a time for the events described in The Acts. It is, in fact, confirmed by the Lord's command to Paul to depart quickly (xxii. 18). Nor is Luke's statement that Barnabas brought Paul "to the apostles" inconsistent with Paul's statement that he saw Peter only, together with James. The reception of the new convert even by Peter alone, not to speak of James, who occupied almost an apostolic position (see Gal ii 9), was equivalent to apostolic recognition of him, and this is all that Luke's expression was meant to describe. It is further worthy of remark that it was now realized fully, both by Paul and the leaders in Jerusalem, that the new convert was a chosen apostle of Christ, and that his mission was to the gentiles. At the same time the question does not appear to have been raised of what would be the relation of gentile converts to the Mosaic law. Neither did any foresee how important Paul's mission was to become. His commission, however, was admitted, and he was sent forth to Tarsus to engage in such work as might open before him.

Paul's stay in Tarsus is nearly a blank to us. It probably lasted six or seven years; see below on the chronology of Paul's life. No doubt he engaged in missionary work, and probably founded the churches of Cilicia, which are mentioned incidentally in Acts xv. 41. If at any time he felt the intellectual influences of Tarsus, this must have been the period. As already remarked, Tarsus was one of the centers of the Stoic philosophy, and Paul's appreciation of Stoicism plainly appears in his speech at Athens. But we must be content with the little information that has been given us. While doubtless not inactive, Paul was waiting for the Lord by his providence to make plain the way in which his chosen ambassador was to go.

At length, however, the purpose of God began to appear. Some of the Greek-speaking Jewish Christians who had been driven from Jerusalem by the persecution which followed Stephen's death came to the great city of Antioch in Syria. It was situated on the Orontes, north of the Lebanon range, had been the capital of the Syrian kingdom, and was then the residence of the Roman governor of the province. It was rated as one of the chief cities of the empire. Its mixed population and its extensive commerce made it a center of wide influence. Lying just outside of Palestine and at the entrance to Asia Minor, connected also by traffic and politics with the whole empire, it formed a natural base of operations from which the new faith, if it was to be separated from Judaism, could go forth to the conquest of the world. In Antioch the Christian refugees began, we are told (Acts xi. 20), to preach to the gentiles (A. V. Grecians; R. V. Greeks). There is a difficult question of the text in the original; but the context leaves no room for doubt that the work was among gentiles. Many were converted, so that a distinctively gentile church sprang up in the metropolis of Syria. When the fact was reported at Jerusalem, Barnabas was sent to investigate. With noble breadth of view, he saw the Lord's hand in the new development in spite of the fact that the converts were uncircumcised. He also seems to have realized that this was the divine opening for Paul; for he went to Tarsus to seek him and brought him to Antioch. Together they labored for a year in Antioch. Many more gentiles were converted, and the non-Jewish character of the church was signalized by the fact that to the disciples in Antioch was the name Christians first given, evidently by their heathen neighbors. Thus began Paul's connection with Antioch. Thus also arose on the page of church history the first gentile Christian organization. It was to be the starting point for Paul's mission to the pagan world.

While Paul was at Antioch, a prophet from Jerusalem, named Agabus, predicted in the Christian assembly that a famine was soon to occur. This was seized upon by the brethren at Antioch as an occasion for evincing their love to and fraternity with the Christians of Judæa. The fact is a remarkable proof of the sense of obligation which these gentiles had to those from whom they had received their new faith, as well as of the extent to which the gospel broke down at once the barriers which had existed between races and classes. Contributions for the relief of the Judean Christians were made at Antioch, and the same were sent to the elders at Jerusalem by the hands of Barnabas and Saul (Acts xi 29, 30). This visit of Paul to Jerusalem probably occurred in A. D. 44, or shortly after. It is not mentioned by Paul in Galatians, no doubt because he did not see any of the apostles. Some writers indeed have tried to identify it with the visit recorded in Gal. ii 1-10; but that plainly occurred after the dispute concerning the circumcision of gentiles had sprung up, and Luke distinctly assigns the rise of that controversy to a later date (Acts xv. 1). The purpose of Paul in Galatians was to recount the opportunities he had had of obtaining his gospel from the older apostles; and if on this occasion, as Luke intimates (xi. 30), he met only the elders of the church, and if the brief visit was purely on a matter of charity, his argument in Galatians did not require him to mention the journey. Barnabas and Paul soon returned to Antioch, taking with them John Mark (xii. 25).

The time had at length arrived when Paul's historic missionary work to the gentiles was to begin. It was indicated by the Spirit to the prophets belonging to the church in Antioch (Acts xiii. 1-3). They were directed to set apart two of their number, Barnabas and Paul, for the work to which

God had called them. Thus by divine direction and under the auspices of the church at Antioch, the apostle's first missionary journey began. Its exact date is uncertain. We can only assign it to the years between A. D. 43-50; perhaps, 46-48. Neither is there any clear indication how long a time it occupied. Barnabas, who was the older, is mentioned as the leader; but Paul speedily took the chief place through his ability in speaking. John Mark also went as their helper. The party went from Antioch to Seleucia, at the mouth of the Orontes, and thence sailed to Cyprus, the original home of Barnabas. Landing at Salamis, on the east coast of Cyprus, they began work, as was natural, in the Jewish synagogues. Then they moved through the island from place to place until they reached Paphos on the southwest coast. Here they attracted the notice of Sergius Paulus, the Roman proconsul, and were violently opposed by a Jewish sorcerer, Bar-jesus, who called himself Elymas, learned one, and who had previously won the patronage of the proconsul (Acts xiii. 6, 7). Paul, with much indignation, rebuked the sorcerer and smote him with blindness, and the effect of the miracle and of the missionaries' teaching was the conversion of Sergius (8-12). Then leaving Cyprus, the party, of whom Paul was now the recognized head (13), sailed north toward Asia Minor and came to Perga in Pamphylia. There John Mark, for some unexplained reason, left them and returned to Jerusalem. Nor do Paul and Barnabas appear to have remained in Perga, but journeyed northward into Phrygia until they reached Antioch, called Pisidian because it lay toward Pisidia. This was the chief city of the Roman province of Galatia. There they entered the Jewish synagogue and, on invitation of the rulers of the synagogue, Paul made the great address recorded in Acts xiii. 16-41, the first recorded specimen of his preaching. After rehearsing the divine leading of Israel with a view to the coming Messiah, he related the testimony of the Baptist and the rejection of Jesus by the Jewish rulers, but declared that God had raised him from the dead, that in him the ancient promises to Israel were being fulfilled, and that only through faith in him could men be justified. He also warned the Jews not to repeat the crime of their rulers in Jerusalem. The speech aroused the enmity of the leading Jews; but it made an impression on some others, and yet more on those gentiles who were already under the influence of the synagogue and who ever formed the connecting link for Paul between the synagogue and the pagan world. The next Sabbath the break took place between the missionaries and the synagogue, and the former began to address their work directly to the gentiles. The chief people of the city, however, were excited by the Jews against the Christians, and Paul and

Barnabas were expelled (Acts xiii. 50). From Antioch they went to Iconium, another city of Phrygia, where many converts, both Jewish and gentile, were made (51). But the Jews again succeeded in raising persecution, and the missionaries passed on to Lystra and Derbe, important cities of Lycaonia (xiv. 1-6). At Lystra the miraculous cure of a lame man by Paul led to an attempt on the part of the heathen populace to offer worship to the missionaries, calling them Jupiter and Mercury; and this occasioned the second recorded speech of Paul (15-18), in which he reasoned against the folly of idolatry. At Lystra Timothy was probably converted (see Acts xvi. 1; 2 Tim. i. 2; iii. 11). The brief popularity of the apostle was, however, soon followed by renewed persecution under Jewish instigation (Acts xiv. 19), so that he was stoned, dragged out of the city, and left for dead. When he revived he departed with Barnabas to Derbe, which was probably at the southeastern limit of the province of Galatia (20). It would have been possible for the missionaries to cross the mountains into Cilicia, and so go directly by way of Tarsus, back to Syrian Antioch. Their route had followed a rough circle. But they would not return until they had placed the new churches on a firm basis. Hence they returned from Derbe to Lystra, from Lystra to Iconium, from Iconium to Pisidian Antioch, and from Antioch to Perga, in each place organizing the church and encouraging the disciples. At Perga they preached, as they had seemingly not done at the former visit; then, going to its seaport, Attalia, they returned to Antioch in Syria (Acts xiv. 21-26). Thus the first missionary tour of the apostle was completed. It covered the regions next toward the west of those already occupied by the gospel. His method was to offer the gospel first to the Jews and then to the gentiles. He found a large number of the latter already influenced by Judaism, and therefore somewhat prepared to receive Christianity. His method was to found churches in the principal cities, and his journeys were facilitated by the fine roads which the Roman government had made between her military posts. The Greek language also was everywhere understood. Providence had thus prepared the way for the prepared herald of the gospel to the world. [On the missionary journeys of Paul, the student should consult Conybeare and Howson's Life and Epistles of St. Paul; and, especially for the first journey, the first part of Ramsay's Church in the Roman Empire.]

The success of Paul's work among the gentiles led, however, to controversy within the church. Certain strict Jewish Christians from Jerusalem went to Antioch and declared that unless the converted gentiles were circumcised, they could not be saved (Acts xv. 1). Some years before this time God had revealed to the church through Peter that gentiles were to be received without observance of the Mosaic law (x. 1-xi. 18). But the strict Jewish party, made up mostly of converted Pharisees (xv. 5), would not abide by this teaching; and the announcement of their doctrines in Antioch so disturbed the church there that the brethren determined to send Paul and Barnabas, with others, to Jerusalem to consult with the apostles and elders about this question. This is the visit described in Acts xv. and Gal. ii. 1-10. Both accounts are entirely harmonious, though written from different points of view. Paul tells us that a revelation from God directed him to go (Gal. i. 2). It was a great crisis. The whole future of the new religion was depending on the issue. But the result was a triumph of Christian loyalty and charity. Paul and Barnabas proclaimed to the mother church what God had done through them. When the strict Jewish Christians opposed them, a council was held of the apostles and elders (Acts xv. 6-29). Peter reminded the church of God's will as shown in the case of Cornelius, Paul and Barnabas related the mighty attestations which God had given to their mission; James, the Lord's brother, pointed out that prophecy had foretold the calling of the gentiles. It was resolved to heartily recognize the uncircumcised converts as brethren, but to direct them to avoid certain practices which were specially offensive to the Jews. Paul tells us in Galatians that the church in Jerusalem stood by him against the "false brethren;" and also that James, Peter, and John gave him the right hand of fellowship, he to go to the gentiles, they to the Jews. Thus Paul retained fellowship with the other apostles while at liberty to go on his own divinely appointed mission. How bitter the controversy was on the part of the Judaizers is shown by their subsequent hatred and hostility to Paul. But he had gained his point. The unity of the church was preserved. The liberty of the gentiles was preserved. A practical adjustment was made by which reasonable Jewish prejudice was conciliated, while the way was open for the carrying of the gospel to all peoples, unencumbered by Jewish ceremonialism. A brief reminder of the controversy occurred indeed soon after in Antioch which ought to be mentioned (Gal. ii. 11-21). Peter had gone there and, being in entire agreement with Paul, had lived in free association with the gentiles. But when Jews from Jerusalem came to Antioch, Peter and even Barnabas withdrew from this association. This led Paul publicly to rebuke Peter, and in his rebuke he outlined the doctrinal ground on which he rested the rights of the gentiles in the church. Salvation is by faith alone, he said, because the believer has died with Christ to the law; i. e. Christ by dying has met all the obligations of the law for his people, and therefore nothing more than faith in Christ can be made the condition of any one's becoming a Christian. We thus see that the rights of the gentiles in the church involved for Paul much more than a question of church unity. He saw that it involved the essential principle of the gospel. By his defense of this principle, as well as by his missionary work, Paul was the chief agent in the establishment of universal Christianity.

The council at Jerusalem was probably held in A. D. 50; see the chronology below. Not long after it Paul proposed to Barnabas a second missionary journey (Acts xv, 36). He was unwilling, however, that John Mark should again go with them, and this led to the final separation of the two great missionaries. Paul thereupon took with him Silas, see SILAS. They first visited the churches of Syria and Cilicia, and then passed northward, through the Taurus mountains, to the churches which had been founded on Paul's first journey. They thus came first to Derbe, then to Lystra. At the latter place Paul determined to take Timothy with him, and circumcised him to prevent giving offense to the Jews, for Timothy's mother was a Jewess. Paul thus showed willingness to conciliate Jewish prejudice, though he would not yield an inch when the principles of the gospel were at stake. From Lystra they appear to have gone to Iconium and Pisidian Antioch. Their movements here, however, are much disputed by scholars. Ramsay and others, who believe that the churches of the first journey were the "churches of Galatia" to which the epistle with that name was afterwards written (see GALATIA, GALATIANS, EPISTLE TO THE), hold that Paul went directly north from Pisidian Antioch through the Roman province of Asia, but without preaching, since he was "forbidden of the Holy Ghost to preach the word in Asia" (Acts xvi 6); that when they came "over against Mysia" (7, R. V.) they attempted to go into Bithynia, but were again forbidden; then passing by (or, as the original may mean, neglecting) Mysia they turned westward through or alongside of Mysia to Troas. The commoner view is that from Pisidian Antioch the travelers moved northeastward into Galatia proper; that on the way Paul was for a while disabled by sickness, and that this led him to improve the opportunity, sick though he was, of preaching in Galatia and so of founding the "churches of Galatia" (Gal. iv. 13-15); that this movement to the northeast from Pisidian Antioch was due to the command not to preach in Asia; that when his work in Galatia proper was done, he attempted to enter Bithynia, but was again forbidden; and so, as on the former theory, he turned west through or alongside of Mysia to Troas. This whole period is very briefly described by Luke. The Spirit was directing the missionaries to Europe, and Luke's narrative likewise hastens forward.

At Troas there appeared the vision of the man of Macedonia (Acts xvi 9); in response to whose call the missionaries, now joined by Luke himself, took ship for Europe, and landing at Neapolis, went forward to the important city of Philippi. Here a church was founded (xvi. 11-40), which ever remained specially dear to the apostle's heart (see Phil. i 4-7; iv 1, 15). Here, too, Paul first came into conflict with Roman magistrates and found that his citizenship was a protection for his work (Acts xvi. 20-24; 37-39). From Philippi, where Luke remained, Paul, Silas, and Timothy went on to Thessalonica. The brief account in Acts xvii. 1-9 of the work done there is supplemented by the allusions made to it in his two epistles to that church. He had much success among the gentiles; he laid with great care the foundations of the church; and he gave the example of industry and sobriety by supporting himself by his trade while preaching the gospel (1 Thes. ii, etc.). But persecution arose, instigated by the Jews, so the brethren sent Paul to Berea, and from there, after marked success even in the synagogue, to Athens. His sojourn at Athens was rather disappointing, and is memorable chiefly for the address before the philosophers on Mars' hill (Acts xvii 22-31), in which Paul showed his appreciation of the truths which the gospel had in common with Stoicism, while he yet faithfully proclaimed to a critical audience their duty to God and what God required them to believe. At Corinth, on the contrary, to which he next went he remained eighteen months, and his work was most successful. Here he made the acquaintance of Aquila and Priscilla and abode with them (xviii 1-3). At first he preached in the synagogue, but afterwards, because of the opposition of the Jews, in the house of a gentile, Titus Justus, who lived next to the synagogue (5-7, R. V.). In both The Acts (xviii 9, 10) and 1 Cor. (ii. 1-5) there are allusions to the great anxiety of mind with which the apostle prosecuted his mission in Corinth, and to his earnest determination to proclaim in Greece as elsewhere the simple gospel of the Crucified; while 1 Cor. amply testifies both to his success and to the many temptations to which the Christians of Corinth were exposed, and which from the beginning occasioned the apostle special solicitude. The needs of other churches also pressed upon him, so that from Corinth he wrote the two epistles to the Thessalonians for the purpose of warning against certain doctrinal and practical perils by which that church was threatened. The hostility of the Jews also did not cease, and, on the coming to Corinth of the new proconsul, Gallio, they accused Paul of violation of the law. But the proconsul properly decided that the matter pertained to the synagogue itself and that the apostle had broken no law of which the government could take cognizance. The empire thus at this period protected the Christians from Jewish violence by identifying them with the Jews, and Paul was permitted to continue his work unmolested. His mission to Corinth was one of the most fruitful in the history of the early Christian church. At length, however, Paul turned his face again to the east. From Corinth he sailed to Ephesus. He did not remain there, however, but, promising to return, sailed to Cæsarea, made apparently a hasty journey to Jerusalem, and, having saluted the church there, returned to Antioch, whence he had originally started (Acts xviii 22). Thus was completed his second missionary journey. Its result had been the establishment of Christianity in Europe. Macedonia and Achaia had been evangelized. The gospel had thereby taken a long step forward toward the conquest of the empire. After remaining some time at Antioch, Paul, probably in A. D. 54, began his third journey. He first traversed "the region of Galatia and Phrygia in order, establishing all the disciples" (23), and then settled in Ephesus. It thus appears that the previous divine prohibition to preach in the province of Asia had been removed. Ephesus was the capital of Asia and one of the most influential cities of the East. Hence the apostle for 3 years made it his center of operations (xix 8, 9; xx 31). For 3 months he taught in the synagogue (xviii. 8), and then for 2 years in the school or lecture hall of a certain Tyrannus (9). His work in Ephesus was marked by great thoroughness of instruction (xx. 18-31); by the exercise of astonishing miraculous power (xix. 11, 12); by great success, so that "all they which dwelt in Asia heard the word of the Lord" (10), and even some of the chief officers of Asia became Paul's friends (31); yet also by constant and fierce opposition (23-41; 1 Cor iv 9-13; xv. 32); and finally, by the care of all the churches (2 Cor xi 28). This period of the apostle's life is especially rich in incidents. Much occurred of which The Acts tells nothing. Here Paul heard of attacks made on him and his doctrine by Judaizing teachers in Galatia; and in reply he wrote the famous Epistle to the Galatians, in which he defends his apostolic authority, and gives the first formal statement and proof of the doctrines of grace. The condition of the Corinthians also occasioned him much anxiety. In reply to inquiries from Corinth he wrote a letter, now lost, concerning the relations of believers to the pagan society about them (1 Cor. v. 9). But later reports showed that more serious troubles had arisen. Hence our 1 Cor. was written, an epistle which finely exhibits the apostle's practical wisdom in the instruction and discipline of the infant churches. Even so, however, the seditious elements in the Corinthian church would not yield. Many think that Paul, after writing 1 Cor., himself made a hurried visit to Corinth for disciplinary purposes (cp 2 Cor. xii. 14, xiii. 1). At any rate, before leaving Ephesus he sent Titus to Corinth, probably with a letter, to secure the discipline of a refractory member of the church. Titus was to rejoin him in Troas. When he failed to do so, Paul passed on in much anxiety to Macedonia, whither Timothy and Erastus had preceded him (Acts xix. 22). At length, however, Titus rejoined him (2 Cor. ii. 12-14; vii. 5-16), with the good news that the Corinthian church had obeyed the apostle and were loyal in their love for him. Whereupon Paul wrote our 2 Cor., the most biographical of all his epistles, in which he rejoices in their obedience, gives directions concerning the collection he was making for the Judæan saints, and once more defends his authority as an apostle of Christ. From Macedonia he himself went to Corinth and passed the winter of A. D. 57-58 there. No doubt he completed the discipline and organization of the Corinthian church; but the visit is most memorable because he then wrote the Epistle to the Romans. In it he states most completely the doctrine of the way of salvation. He evidently regarded Rome as the place where his labors should culminate. He could not, however, go there at once, because he felt it necessary to return to Jerusalem with the gifts of the gentiles to the mother church. Christian work had already been begun at Rome, and was being carried on mainly by Paul's own friends and disciples (cp. Rom. xvi). Hence, he sent the epistle from Corinth that the Christians of the capital might possess complete instruction in the gospel which Paul was proclaiming to the world.

Paul now set out on his last journey to Jerusalem. He was accompanied by friends who represented various gentile churches (Acts xx. 4). The apostle's work among the gentiles had been much opposed by Judaizers, and even the ordinary Jewish Christians often regarded him and it with distrust. Hence arose his scheme of proving the loyalty of the gentile churches by inducing them to send a liberal offering to the poor Christians of Judæa. It was to carry this offering that he and his friends left Corinth for Jerusalem. His plan had first been to sail direct to Syria, but a plot of the Jews led him to change his route and to return by way of Macedonia (xx. 3). He lingered at Philippi while his companions went on to Troas, but he was rejoined at that place by Luke (5). After the passover he and Luke went on to Troas, where the others were waiting for them and where all remained seven days (6). A church had grown up at Troas, and an interesting account is given by Luke of the events of the apostle's interview with it on the day and night before he left it (7-12). From Troas Paul went by foot about twenty miles to Assos, whither his companions had already gone by boat (13). Thence they sailed to Mitylene, on the eastern shore of the island of Lesbos, and then, coasting southward, they passed between the mainland and the island of Chios, touched the next day at the island of Samos, and the day following reached Miletus (14, 15). The A. V. states (Acts xx. 15) that they "tarried at Trogyllium" after leaving Samos; see TROGYLLIUM. The R. V. with the best manuscripts omits this clause. Miletus was about 36 miles from Ephesus, and as Paul was in haste, he determined not to go to Ephesus, but to send for the elders of the church. At Miletus he took leave of them in the affectionate address recorded in Acts xx 18-35. No words could more strongly exhibit the apostle's devotion to his work, and his love for his converts, and his realization of the spiritual perils to which they would be exposed. Leaving Miletus, the ship went with a straight course to Cos (Acts xxi. 1, in A. V., Coos), an island about 40 miles to the south; then, the next day, Rhodes, an island and city about 50 miles southeast of Cos, was reached; and from Rhodes the course lay eastward to Patara, on the coast of Lycia (Acts xxi. 1). At Patara a ship for Phœnicia (Syria) was found and the party went on board (2), and, passing west of Cyprus, reached Tyre (3). There they remained a week, and the disciples of Tyre urged Paul not to go to Jerusalem (4); but after an affectionate farewell he sailed (5, 6) to Ptolemais, the modern Acre, and came the next day to Cæsarea (7, 8). At Cæsarea the company abode with Philip the evangelist. There too the prophet Agabus, who at an earlier time had foretold the famine (xi 28), bound his own hands and feet with Paul's girdle, and predicted that so would the Jews bind Paul and deliver him to the gentiles. But in spite of this warning and the lamentation of the brethren, Paul insisted on going forward (xxi 11-14). So, in company with a number of the disciples, he went on to Jerusalem, thus completing what is known as his third missionary journey.

The prediction of Agabus was soon fulfilled. Paul was at first indeed well received by the brethren in Jerusalem, and on the day following his arrival went in to James, the Lord's brother, and the elders of the church. When he had related his work among the gentiles, they glorified God. At the same time they reminded him that many of the Jewish Christians had heard evil reports about him and doubted his fidelity to Moses. It was proposed, therefore, that he should give an ocular proof that he still held the Jewish customs in honor. He was to join with four men, who at that time were performing a Nazirite vow in the temple. To this Paul assented, for he was ever anxious not to give needless offense to the Jews, and the observance proposed was probably little more than what he had done of his own will at Corinth (xviii. 18). While Paul insisted that no gentile should observe the Mosaic law, and while he maintained that no Christian Jew was bound to observe it, he found no fault with Jews who chose to observe it, and held himself at liberty to observe its regulations or not as circumstances might seem to make expedient. His assent to this proposal, therefore, was not inconsistent with his action on other occasions. But the expedient proved unavailing for the purpose for which it was intended. Certain Jews from Asia saw him in the temple and raised a tumult. They falsely charged him with having brought gentiles into the temple, and declared to the populace that he had everywhere taught men to dishonor both the temple and the law (xxi. 27-29). A riot speedily ensued in which Paul would probably have been slain, had not the commander of the Roman garrison, Claudius Lysias, hastened with soldiers to quell the uproar. He was leading Paul, bound with two chains, into the castle for examination and the Jews were following with many outcries, when the apostle desired liberty to speak. The commander was surprised that the prisoner could use Greek, for he had taken him to be an Egyptian insurrectionist who had recently given trouble to the government (38). When Paul explained that he was a Tarsian Jew, Lysias allowed him to address the multitude. He did so in the Hebrew tongue (xxi. 2). He related his early life and the story of his conversion. They heard him till he uttered the word "gentiles," when the uproar was renewed, and Lysias withdrew him into the castle for safety and further examination. The examination would have been by scourging, had not Paul remarked to the centurion that he was a Roman citizen (25). When this was reported to Lysias, he unbound Paul and, feeling that the matter was a serious one, directed the priests to convoke the sanhedrin on the following day that the prisoner might be tried.

The appearance of Paul before the council led, however, to another tumult (Acts xxiii. 1-10). The apostle was now fighting for his life. He had no hope of justice, and should the council condemn him, Lysias might give him over to execution. With much shrewdness he succeeded in dividing his enemies. He claimed to be a Pharisee, and to be on trial for teaching the doctrine of the resurrection of the dead. This was true, as far as it went, and it served Paul's purpose. The hatred of the Pharisees and Sadducees for each other was greater than their hostility to Paul, and the two sects quickly arrayed themselves on opposite sides. The commander feared that Paul would be pulled to pieces between his defenders and his opponents, so by his orders the soldiers removed the prisoner again to the castle.

That night the Lord appeared to Paul in a vision and bade him be of good cheer, since he was certainly to bear his testimony at Rome (Acts xxiii. 11). This consummation was to be effected, however, in an unexpected way. Some of the Jews formed a plot to kill Paul and, to accomplish this, it was determined to request the commander to bring the prisoner once more before the council. But Paul's nephew heard of the plot and managed to inform his uncle and the commander (12-22). Thereupon Lysias sent Paul under a strong guard to Cæsarea with a letter to Felix, the procurator, referring the case to him. When Felix learned that the accused was from Cilicia, he declared that he would wait until the accusers came, and meanwhile placed Paul for safe keeping in Herod's palace, which was used as the prætorium or residence of the procurator. Then followed two years of imprisonment in Cæsarea. When the Jews appeared before Felix, they made a general accusation against Paul of sedition and especially of profanation of the temple, complaining of the violence with which Lysias had taken their prisoner out of their hands (Acts xxiv 1-9). To this Paul replied by an explicit denial and a demand that witnesses should be produced against him (10-21). Felix appears to have been sufficiently acquainted with the matters in dispute to perceive that Paul had not committed any crime worthy of punishment. He dismissed the accusers on the plea that he must learn further particulars from Lysias, and directed that Paul should be kept in confinement, but that his friends should be allowed to visit him freely. Felix and his wife Drusilla were also much impressed by what Paul had said and "heard him concerning the faith in Christ" (24). In fact, the apostle seems to have exercised a strange fascination over the procurator, who trembled before his solemn preaching and promised to send for him again. He hoped also that Paul would pay for his liberty (25, 26). But the apostle would not bribe the procurator, and the latter deferred decision of the case, so that when, after two years, Porcius Festus succeeded Felix, Paul was still a prisoner (27).

The Jews hoped that the new governor would prove more favorable to their desires than Felix had been. But Festus refused to send Paul to Jerusalem for trial, and required his accusers to confront him again in Cæsarea (Acts xxv. 1-6). Again, however, they were unable to prove any crime against him, while he persistently maintained his innocence (7, 8). Festus, however, willing to please the Jews, asked Paul if he would go to Jerusalem to be tried. Paul knew that such a course would probably prove fatal to him. He availed himself, therefore, of his right as a Roman citizen and appealed unto Cæsar (9-11). This took the case out of the procurator's hands and necessitated the prisoner's transmission to Rome. Before he could be sent, however, Agrippa II. and his sister Bernice came to visit Festus, doubtless to congratulate him on his accession to office, and the procurator, who was not well versed in Jewish disputes and yet was bound to send to the emperor a full account of the case, related the matter to Agrippa, who expressed his desire to hear what the prisoner had to say. Forthwith it was arranged that Paul should state his cause before the assembled company. Agrippa's familiarity with Jewish affairs would be of service to the procurator in preparing his report to the emperor (12-27).

Paul's defense before Agrippa forms one of his most notable speeches. In it he displayed the courtesy of a gentleman, the eloquence of an orator, and the fearlessness of a Christian. He reviewed his life in order to show that he had been governed only by the wish to obey the God of Israel, and maintained that his course as a Christian had not only been determined by God's direction, but had been the fulfillment of the Hebrew prophecies themselves (Acts xxvi. 1-23). When Festus interrupted him with the exclamation that he was mad, Paul appealed earnestly to Agrippa. But the king was not disposed to be more than an observer and critic of what he deemed a new fanaticism. He replied with some contempt: "With but little persuasion thou wouldest fain make me a Christian" (28, R. V.). Nevertheless he admitted that Paul had done no crime, and might have been set at liberty if he had not appealed unto Cæsar (31, 32). In the autumn of the same year, A. D. 60 (see chronology below), Paul was sent to Rome. He was committed, with other prisoners, to the care of a centurion, Julius, of the Augustan band or cohort. He was accompanied by Luke and Aristarchus, a Thessalonian (xxvii. 1, 2). The account of the voyage is related by Luke with singular detail and accuracy (see James Smith, The Voyage and Shipwreck of St. Paul). The apostle was treated also with notable courtesy by the centurion. Leaving Cæsarea in a coasting ship of Adramyttium, they touched at Sidon and then sailed to Myra in Lycia. There they were transferred to an Alexandrian merchant ship bound for Italy. The wind, however, was not favorable. They were compelled at first to keep coasting northward until over against Cnidus on the coast of Caria. Then putting southward, they rounded with difficulty cape Salmone, on the eastern extremity of Crete, and managed to reach Fair Havens, a port on the southern shore of the same island (Acts xxvii. 3-8). It was now after the Fast, i. e. the 10th of Tishri or day of atonement (9), when the season of navigation was drawing to a close. The weather also continued threatening. Paul counseled against sailing further, but the centurion followed the advice of the master and the owner of the ship, who wished to go on to Phœnix, further west on the coast of Crete, where there was a better harbor (9-12). But when they had left Fair Havens, a fierce northeast wind came down upon them and drove them to the south. Passing south of Cauda (or Claudia A V, the modern Gozzo), and having lightened the ship, they were driven for fourteen days before the gale in a westerly direction. Paul alone maintained his courage and that of the rest, for an angel of the Lord assured him that no life would be lost (13-26). On the fourteenth night the sounding lead told of their approach to land; and, casting four anchors, they waited for the day. When daylight came, they perceived in the unknown land a small bay with a beach; so cutting off their anchors, they hoisted the foresail to the wind and made for the beach (27-40, R V). The ship, however, grounded, and soon began to break up under the violence of the waves. Thereupon the whole company cast themselves overboard and, as Paul had predicted, all reached land in safety (41-44). In this thrilling adventure, which Luke relates with so much detail, the conduct of Paul beautifully illustrates the courage of the Christian and the influence over others which a man of faith can exercise in times of peril.

The land on which they had been cast was the island of Melita, the modern Malta, which lies 58 miles south of Sicily. The inhabitants kindly received the shipwrecked company, and Paul by his works gained special honor among them (Acts xxviii 1-10). After three months, however, they were put on board another Alexandrian ship, which had wintered in the island, and, after touching at Syracuse and Rhegium, arrived at Puteoli, a harbor of southwestern Italy. There Paul found Christian brethren with whom he tarried seven days (11-14). Meanwhile word of his arrival had reached the Christians in Rome, so that some of them went to meet him at the Market of Appius and the Three Taverns, two places distant from Rome about 43 and 33 miles respectively (15, R V). According to the A V (16) the centurion delivered his prisoners to the captain of the guard, and this has been usually understood to mean the prefect of the praetorian guard, who at this time, A D 61, was the celebrated Burrus. The R V., however, with the best manuscripts, omits this statement. Mommsen, followed by Ramsay, thinks that the prisoners were delivered to the captain of another corps, to which Julius the centurion himself belonged, and whose duty it was to superintend the transportation of grain to the capital and to perform police duty. We really cannot tell to whose custody Paul was delivered. We only know that he was held in military confinement, chained to a soldier (xxviii 16; Phil i. 7, 13), but allowed to lodge by himself. Appeals to Caesar were slow processes. Paul soon hired a dwelling and continued in it for two years (Acts xxviii 30).

So began Paul's first imprisonment in Rome. The Acts closes with an account of how after three days he summoned the chief of the Jews, related the reason of his presence in the capital, and on an appointed day expounded to them the gospel; but that when they, like their countrymen elsewhere, disbelieved, Paul again declared that he would turn to the gentiles. His imprisonment, therefore, did not prevent his missionary activity. The last verses of The Acts relate that for two whole years he received all who came to him and preached the kingdom of God and the things concerning the Lord Jesus Christ without hindrance from the authorities (xxviii 17-31). But still more light is thrown on this period of Paul's life by the epistles which he wrote during it. They are those to the Colossians, to Philemon, to the Ephesians, and to the Philippians. The first three were probably written in the earlier part of the period and that to the Philippians toward its close. These epistles show that the apostle in Rome had many faithful friends working with him. Among these were Timothy (Col i. 1; Ph¹ i. 1; ii. 19; Philem 1), Tychicus (Eph vi. 21; Col. iv. 7), Aristarchus (Col iv. 10; Philem 24), John Mark (Col. iv. 10; Philem 24), and Luke (Col. iv. 14; Philem 24). His friends had unhindered access to him; they acted as his messengers to the churches and also as his co-workers in Rome; and they made the imprisoned apostle the center and head of the gentile Christian work throughout the empire. The epistles further show the personal activity of the apostle's life. With great zeal and success, in spite of his bonds, did he preach the gospel. He was an ambassador in bonds (Eph vi. 20). He desired his friends to pray that God would open for him a door of utterance (Col iv. 3). In Onesimus, the runaway slave, we see an example of the fruit of his labors (Philem. 10). As time went on the success of his work increased. He wrote to the Philippians (i. 12, 13, R. V.) that the things which had happened unto him had fallen out unto the progress of the gospel, so that his bonds were manifest in Christ throughout the whole praetorian guard and to all the rest. He sent greetings also (iv. 22) from them of Caesar's household. At the same time he was opposed even by some of the Christians, probably of the Jewish Christian type (i. 15-18). But he regarded their opposition with equanimity, and was confident that he would be finally released (Phil. i. 25; ii. 17, 24; Philem 22). His imprisonment was only God's way of enabling his ambassador to fulfill to the uttermost his chosen mission. Finally, the epistles testify to the apostle's continued superintendence of the churches throughout the empire. New heresies had arisen in Asia. In the epistles of the imprisonment Paul gave his ripest instructions concerning the person of Christ and the eternal purpose of God revealed in the gospel, while the practical directions which they contain disclose the breadth of his grasp on Christian duty and the fervor of his own Christian life.

Although the book of The Acts leaves Paul a prisoner at Rome, there is abundant reason to believe that he was released after two years' confinement and resumed his missionary journeys. The evidence for this may be summarized as follows: (1) The closing verse of The Acts accords better with this view than with the supposition that the imprisonment which has been described ended in the apostle's condemnation and death. Luke emphasizes the fact that no one hindered his work, thus certainly giving the impression that the end of his activity was not near. Moreover (2) Paul fully expected to be released (Phil. i. 25; ii. 17, 24; Philem. 22), and this expectation was fully justified by the treatment which he had always received at the hands of Roman officials. It should be remembered that Nero's persecution of the Christians had not yet begun; that it was a sudden outbreak, preceded by no official ill-treatment of them; and that in the view of Roman law, the Christians were as yet only a sect of the Jews, whose liberty to maintain their religion was fully recognized. It is, therefore, altogether probable that, when Paul's case came before the imperial tribunal, he was acquitted of any crime of which Roman law could take cognizance. No doubt also the report of Festus was a favorable one (see Acts xxvi 31), nor do the Jews appear to have sent any accusers to Rome to appear against him (xxviii 21). (3) The tradition that he was released and resumed his journeys, and was again arrested dates from an early period. Clement of Rome, A. D. 96, seems clearly to imply that Paul went to Spain, for he says that in his journeys "he reached the limit of the west." His journey to Spain is also mentioned in the so-called Muratori Fragment, A. D. 170. With this agrees the history of Eusebius, A. D. 324, which reports, as the common tradition, that "after he [Paul] had made his defense, the apostle was sent again on the ministry of preaching, and a second time having come to the same city [Rome], he suffered martyrdom." It must be admitted that this traditional evidence is not sufficiently strong to be absolutely demonstrative; but it is early and strong enough to confirm the rest of the evidence, and no sufficient counter-evidence can be adduced. (4) The epistles to Timothy and Titus may be proved to be Pauline by abundant external and internal evidence. No place for them, however, can be found in the history of Paul related in The Acts. They must, therefore, have been written later, and that fact compels us to accept the tradition given by Eusebius.

We must, therefore, believe that Paul's appeal from Festus to Cæsar resulted in his release. His subsequent movements can only be inferred from the allusions contained in the epistles to Timothy and Titus and from tradition. We may suppose that after his release he went, as he had intended (Phil. ii 24; Philem. 22), to Asia and Macedonia. From 1 Tim. i 3 we learn that he had left Timothy in charge of the churches about Ephesus when he himself went to Macedonia. Where he was when he wrote 1 Tim. is not clear, but he hoped soon to be able to return to Ephesus (1 Tim. iii. 14). From Titus we learn that he had left Titus in charge of the churches of Crete, and expected to winter in Nicopolis (Titus iii. 12). There were, however, three cities by that name to which this reference may apply, one in Thrace, near Macedonia, another in Cilicia, and a third in Epirus; so that the name does not help us much to fix the apostle's locality. It is probable, however, that Nicopolis in Epirus was the one referred to. If we accept the early tradition that Paul went to Spain (see above), we may suppose that he did so after having been in Asia and Macedonia; that after that on his return from Spain, he stopped at Crete and left Titus on that island; then that he returned to Asia, from which place he doubtless wrote the Epistle to Titus. We learn from 2 Tim. iv. 20 that he had passed through Corinth and Miletum, the one in Greece, the other in Asia. There is nothing to show whether he carried out his intention of wintering in Nicopolis. Many suppose, however, that he did go to Nicopolis in Epirus and was there rearrested and sent to Rome. But while the apostle's movements during this closing period of his life are somewhat uncertain, the epistles then written show that he occupied himself, in addition to evangelizing new regions, with the perfecting of the organization of the already existing churches. He evidently felt that his career must soon close, and that the churches would be exposed to new dangers, from both without and within. Hence the pastoral epistles, as they are called, round out the apostle's instruction of the churches by solidifying their organization and practically equipping them for their future work.

The release of Paul from his first Roman imprisonment probably occurred in A. D. 63 and his subsequent activity lasted about four years. According to Eusebius, his death took place in A. D. 67; according to Jerome in A. D. 68. How he came to be rearrested we do not know. There are a few slight hints furnished, however, by the Second Epistle to Timothy, which was written from Rome shortly before his death. We should remember, moreover, that in A. D. 64 Nero's persecution of the Christians in Rome broke out; and it was doubtless followed by sporadic outbreaks against them in the province (1 Pet. iv. 13-19). It may be, as some have supposed, that Paul was informed against a leader of the now proscribed sect by the Alexander mentioned in 2 Tim. iv. 14. At any rate, and wherever he was arrested, he was sent to Rome for trial, either because, as before, he appealed to Cæsar, or because he was charged with a crime committed in Italy, perhaps with complicity in the burning of Rome, or because the provincials wished to gratify Nero by sending so notable a prisoner to the capital. Only Luke, of his former friends, was with him when 2 Tim. was written (2 Tim. iv. 11). Some had even deserted him (i. 15; iv. 10, 16), while others had gone away on various errands (10, 12). Yet when arraigned before the tribunal he was at first not condemned (17), though he continued to be held on some other charge. Possibly he was able to disprove a charge of criminal conduct, but was retained in custody because he was a Christian. He speaks of himself as a prisoner (i. 8) in bonds (16), as if an evildoer (ii. 9), and regards his fate as sealed (iv. 6-8). No doubt he was finally condemned to death simply because he was a Christian, in accordance with the policy begun by Nero in A. D. 64. Tradition relates that the apostle was beleagued, as became a Roman citizen, on the Ostian Way.

In giving this outline of the life of the apostle Paul, we have necessarily followed the express testimony of The Acts and epistles. But it should not be forgotten that many other events occurred in his active and checkered career. To some of these allusions are made in his epistles (Rom. xv. 18, 19; 2 Cor. xi. 24-33). Yet the well-known events of his life, taken with his epistles, make plain the character of the man and the supreme value of his work. It is difficult to gather into one picture the many features of his versatile character. He was by nature intensely religious and his religion controlled his whole being. This was true of him even as a Jew, much more after his conversion. Keenly intellectual, he grasped truth at its full value and logically wrought out its implications. Yet truth possessed his heart equally with his intellect, and his emotions were as fervid as his logical processes were vigorous. At the same time the practical aspects of truth were seen by him no less than its theoretical side. If on the one hand he fully wrought out dialectically the content of his doctrinal ideas, on the other hand he applied Christianity to life with the wisdom and completeness of a practical man of affairs. He was intense in his affections, at times ecstatic in his religious experiences, ever progressive in his statements of truth, capable of soaring to the loftiest heights of religious thought, and of embodying in action the truth for which he stood. This versatility, intensity, purity, breadth of mental and spiritual life, when used by the all-controlling Spirit of God, fitted Paul for the work for which the providence of God intended him.

And that work consisted in authoritatively interpreting to the gentile world, in action and in written statement, the mission and message of Christ. How Paul did this in action is narrated in the book of The Acts. Through his agency the universalism of Christianity, its independence of the Jewish ritual, its adaptation to all mankind, was historically established. Other men also contributed to the result. But it was Paul's divinely given task to bear the burden of this achievement, and to him, as to no other man, Christianity owes its possession of a worldwide destiny. All this was done, of course, in accordance with the purpose of Christ and under his direction. But the student of Christian history must recognize in Paul the principal agent used to accomplish the result. On the other hand, the epistles of Paul disclose in written statement the doctrinal and ethical interpretation of Christ's word and work, which accompanied Paul's missionary activity and made it profound and permanent. It is, therefore, to Paul as a theologian that we rightly look with the greatest admiration. His theology took shape from the peculiar experience of his own conversion. By that sudden transition he was made to realize the impossibility of man's saving himself, the dependence of the sinner on the sovereign grace of God, and the completeness of the redeeming work which Jesus, the Son of God, had done through death and resurrection. It flowed that only by union with Christ through faith can any man be saved. Salvation consists in justification of the sinner by God on the ground of Christ's obedience, and when thus justified the sinner, being united to Christ, is made to partake of all the spiritual benefits, external and internal, in heaven and on earth, which Christ has purchased for him. The Spirit inspired Paul to set forth on this foundation the truth of Christ's whole work and person. In the epistles to the Galatians and Romans the way of salvation itself is most fully elaborated, while in the epistles of the imprisonment the exalted dignity of Christ, and the whole breadth and end of God's eternal purpose of grace in Christ and his church find their full expression. Besides these principal themes, almost every phase of Christian truth and duty is touched upon in his epistles. His is emphatically the theology of grace. He sounded the depths of this truth. He interpreted the Hebrew Messiah to the gentile world. He was raised up to explain to the world the Saviour in whom it was invited to believe and the work which the Saviour had done. Paul was preeminently the theologian of the apostles as well as the most aggressive missionary. It is not possible to understand Christianity, unless we unite with the teaching and work of Jesus Christ the interpretation thereof furnished by his apostle Paul.

Chronology of Paul's life. While the order of events in Paul's life and the relative dates of his epistles are in the main quite clear, there is some dispute concerning the precise years to which both events and epistles are to be assigned. In the book of The Acts two dates may be regarded as certain, viz., the ascension of Christ in A. D. 30 (though some scholars assign this to A. D. 29) and the death of Herod Agrippa (Acts xii. 23), which all admit to have taken place in A. D. 44. Neither of these dates, however, is of much assistance in determining the absolute chronology of Paul's life. That depends mainly on the date assigned to the accession of Festus as procurator of Judæa. According to the common and most probable opinion Festus became governor (xxiv. 27) in A. D. 60. Josephus assigns nearly all the events during the governorship of Felix to the reign of Nero, which began in October, A. D. 54, and Paul (10) speaks of Felix as having been "of many years a judge unto this nation." It is hardly possible, therefore, to assign Paul's arrest when he appeared before Felix to a date earlier than A. D. 58. Then Paul was kept two years in confinement in Cæsarea, which would make the accession of Festus, who then succeeded Felix, to have taken place in A. D. 60. It can hardly have been later, since Festus was succeeded by Albinus in A. D. 62, and the events recorded of him imply that he was governor for more than a year. But if Festus became governor in A. D. 60, Paul was sent to Rome in the autumn of that year, and arrived at Rome in the spring of A. D. 61, having spent the winter on the way. Then the close of The Acts, and probably the apostle's release from his first Roman imprisonment, are to be dated in A. D. 63 (xxviii. 30).

For the earlier events of Paul's life, we date back from the accession of Festus. Assuming the latter to have been in A. D. 60, then Paul's arrest, which occurred two years before (Acts xxiv. 27), was in A. D. 58. This was at the close of his third journey. The winter preceding his arrest he had spent in Corinth (xx. 3), the preceding autumn in Macedonia (2), and before that, for three years, he had been in Ephesus (31), to which he had gone from Antioch after a rapid tour through Galatia and Phrygia (xviii. 23). Hence four years must be allowed for the third journey. If he was arrested in Jerusalem in the spring of A. D. 58, he must have begun this journey in the spring of A. D. 54. The third journey followed the second by a moderate interval (23), and for the latter at least two years and a half must be allowed, since eighteen months were spent at Corinth (11), and the preceding events of the tour may fairly be supposed to have occupied a year more (xv. 36-xvii. 34). If, therefore, the second journey closed in the autumn of A. D. 53, it probably began in the spring of A. D. 51. The second journey in turn began some days (xv. 36) after the council of Jerusalem. This latter epoch-making event may, therefore, be assigned to the year A. D. 50. The first missionary journey can only be roughly located between A. D. 44, the date of Herod's death (xii.), and A. D. 50, the date of the council (xv.). We may probably assign it to the years A. D. 46-48, though it is not possible to say how long a time it consumed.

For the date of Paul's conversion, we must combine the results given above with his statements in the Epistle to the Galatians. In Gal. ii. 1 he says: "Then fourteen years after I went up again to Jerusalem with Barnabas." This visit is undoubtedly the one to the council which we have located in A. D. 50. But from what event are these fourteen years to be counted? According to some commentators, they are to be reckoned from his conversion mentioned in Gal. i. 15. If so, his conversion was in A. D. 36 or 37, according as we count the fourteen years exclusively or inclusively of the first one of them. But in Gal. i. 18 Paul notes that he first visited Jerusalem three years after his conversion. Hence it is more natural to date the fourteen years of Gal. ii. 1 from the close of the previously mentioned three years. In that case, according as we reckon exclusively or inclusively, his conversion was in A. D. 33 or 35. It is most in accordance with Hebrew custom to reckon inclusively. Hence we may assign his conversion to A. D. 35, his first subsequent visit to Jerusalem (Gal. i. 18) to A. D. 37, and the fourteen years after (ii. 1) to A. D. 50. As already remarked, all of these dates are disputed. Some assign the accession of Festus to A. D. 55, and therefore push back all the other dates five years earlier than those given above. Other critics vary on special points. Some assign Paul's death to A. D. 64, supposing that he died in the first year of Nero's persecution. But the dates given above appear to be by far the most probable. They yield, with some other details, the following table:

G. T. P.

Pave'ment. See GABBATHA.

Pe.

The seventeenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet. It comes from the same source as English P, but was pronounced like p or ph, according to its position. It is accordingly represented in anglicized Hebrew names, though too often arbitrarily, by either p or ph. It heads the seventeenth section of Ps. cxix, in which section each verse of the original begins with this letter.

Copyists sometimes experienced difficulty in distinguishing pe from beth (q. v.).

Peace Offer-ing. See OFFERINGS.

Pea'cock.

The rendering of the Hebrew word Tukki. The rendering is doubtless correct, for, along with ivory and apes, tukkuyim were imported by Solomon in ships of Tarshish (1 Kin x 22; 2 Chron. ix 21). Now the words for ivory and ape are of Indian origin, and tukki also finds a satisfactory origin in Malabar tokei, Old Tamil tokei, tokei, a peacock. The peacock (Pavo cristatus) is a native of India, where it may be found in the jungles, generally running pretty rapidly away when disturbed. As the natives do not allow it to be molested, it often makes its way into the villages.

2. See O-TRICH 2

Pearl.

A precious article of commerce (Mat. xiii. 45, 46; Rev. xxi 2; also Job xxviii. 18, in R V crystal), used as an ornament by women (1 Tim ii. 9; Rev. xvii 4). Pearls are found inside the shells of several species of Mollusca. They consist of carbonate of lime intrastriated with animal membrane, and are formed by the deposit of the nacreous substance around some foreign body within the mantle lobes, such as a grain of sand, which acts as an irritant and serves as a nucleus. This substance is the same as the mother of pearl, which forms the lustrous inner lining of the shell. Pearls of large size and fine quality are yielded by the pearl oyster (Melagyna margaritifera), which abounds in the Indian seas, especially in the Persian Gulf and near Ceylon. It sometimes attains a length of 10 or 12 inches.

Ped'a-hel [God hath saved].

A prince of the tribe of Naphtali in the wilderness (Num xxxiv. 28).

Pe-dah'zur [a rock, i. e., God, hath saved]

Father of the prince of Manasseh in the wilderness (Num i. 10; ii. 20).

Pe-da'lah [Jehovah hath saved].

1 The father of Joel, prince of Manasseh (1 Chron xxvii 20).

2 A citizen of Rumah and maternal grandfather of king Jehoiakim (2 Kin. xxiii. 36).

3 A brother of Shealtiel or possibly, though not probably, his son (1 Chron. iii. 18, 19) See ZERUBBABEL.

4. A descendant of Parosh. He rebuilt and repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh iii. 25).

5. One of those, probably priests, who stood on Ezra's left hand when he addressed the people (Neh. viii. 4).

6 A Benjamite of the family of Jeshaiiah (Neh. xi 7).

7 A Levite; one of those appointed by Nehemiah over the treasures (Neh. xiii. 13).

Pe'kah [an opening (of the eyes), deliverance].

Son of Remaliah. He was a captain under Pekahiah, but he conspired against his king, slew him, and reigned in his stead. He adhered to the calf worship of Jeroboam I (2 Kin xv. 25-28). When Jotham's reign was drawing to a close, Pekah entered into an alliance with Rezin, king of Syria, against Judah. They purposed to dethrone the king, and place the crown on a creature of their own. The allied kings began their great invasion of Judah just as the reins of government passed from Jotham into the hands of Ahaz. The Syrians advanced through the country east of the Jordan to Elath, intending to rendezvous at Jerusalem. Pekah led his army directly toward the capital of Judah, burning and pillaging as he went. The inhabitants of Jerusalem were greatly alarmed. Isaiah, however, was directed to encourage the king and the people with the assurance that the plan of the enemy would fail, and to exhort them to put their trust in Jehovah. Ahaz spurned the advice, preferring to trust to the king of Assyria, and purchased the aid of Tiglath-pileser. The advance of the Assyrian army through Galilee (2 Kin xv. 29) to Philistia, in 734 B. C., compelled the allied kings to withdraw their troops from Judah in order to protect their own dominions. Pekah carried off a multitude of captives as he departed, but on the remonstrance of the prophet Oded, he clothed and fed them and sent them home (2 Kin. xvi. 5-9; 2 Chron. xxviii 5-15; Is vii 1-13). During the next two years Tiglath-pileser was at Damascus, doubtless leading his army across the territory of Israel as he marched from Philistia. From Damascus detachments of the Assyrian army were sent forth, which overran the country east of the Jordan and carried off many Israelites captive (1 Chron. v. 26). In 730 B. C. Hoshea murdered Pekah and ascended the throne in his stead (2 Kin. xv 30). This deed was accomplished with the connivance of Tiglath-pileser, as the Assyrian records relate. The present Hebrew text assigns twenty years to the reign of Pekah (2 Kin xv 27). It is impossible that he occupied the throne of Samaria during all these years, for Menahem, a predecessor of his, was on the throne about 738 B. C., in the reign of Tiglath-pileser (2 Kin xv 19). Critics of all schools accordingly admit that twenty years are much too long. There is a bare possibility, however, that the Hebrew writer, when he summarizes the reign of Pekah, and states that "in the fifty-second year of Uzziah Pekah reigned over Israel in Samaria—twenty years," does not mean that Pekah reigned all of these twenty years in Samaria. Pekah was associated with Gileadites (2 Kin. xv. 25). It is just possible that he set up his authority in northern Gilead and Galilee in 749 B. C., during the confusion which accompanied the death of Jeroboam II., and maintained his power during the greater part of Menahem's reign, being the cause of Menahem's feeling of insecurity until Tiglath-pileser invaded the north and established Menahem's sway over the whole country (2 Kin. xv. 19). Then Pekah, like Abner before him, abandoned opposition, professed loyalty, and was given a high military position in the service of the king to whom he had hitherto refused obedience. After Menahem's death and in the absence of Tiglath-pileser, and perhaps backed by Rezin, he seized the throne in the fifty-second year of Uzziah and again reigned. See CHRONOLOGY.

Pek-a-hi'ah [Jehovah hath given sight or delivered].

Son and successor of Menahem in the kingdom of Israel. He came to the throne about 737 B. C., and reigned two years, adhering to the calf worship of Jeroboam I. He was assassinated in his palace at Samaria by Pekah, a captain of his, who then usurped the throne (2 Kin. xv. 23-26).

Pe'kod.

A locality in Babylonia and its inhabitants (Jer 1 21; Ezek. xxiii. 23); doubtless the Pukudu, a Babylonian people.

Pe-la'iah [Jehovah hath made illustrious].

1. One of the Levites who with Ezra caused the people to understand the law (Neh. viii. 7) and sealed the covenant (x. 10).

2. A man of Judah, descended from Shecaniah (1 Chron. iii. 24).

Pel-a-li'ah [Jehovah hath judged].

A priest descended from Malchijah (Neh. xi. 12).

Pel-a-ti'ah [Jehovah hath set free].

1. One of the Simeonite captains in the successful war between that tribe and the Amalekites (1 Chron. iv. 42).

2. A prince of Israel, and son of Benaiah. He misled the people. In vision Ezekiel saw him, and he prophesied against him, and Pelatiah suddenly died (Ezek. xi. 1-13; cp. viii. 1, 3; xi. 24).

3. A son of Hananiah, and a grandson of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii. 21). Perhaps he was the person of this name who was a chief of the people and with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 22).

Pe'leg, in A. V. of N. T. Phalec [division].

A son or descendant of Eber (Gen. x. 25; xi. 16). He takes his name from the fact that in his days the earth was divided. The division alluded to may be the separation of the descendants of Arpachshad from the Joktanide Arabs (x. 24-29); or it may refer to the scattering of the descendants of Noah in consequence of the confusion of tongue at Babel.

Pe'let [liberation].

1. A son of Jahdai, of the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 47).

2. A Benjamite who joined David while he was at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 3).

Pe'leth [swiftness].

1. A Reubenite, father of that On who joined in Korah's rebellion (Num. xvi. 1).

2. A man of Judah, family of Hezron house of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 33).

Pel'e-thites.

Certain members of David's bodyguard. Apparently they were from the Philistine country, as were the Cherethites and the men of Gath, who were their comrades in arms. They were faithful to David during the calamities of his later years, and took a prominent part in the war in which Absalom lost his cause and his life (2 Sam. xv. 18-22). They also helped in the fight with Shebna (xx. 7). The name which they bear is doubtless a gentile adjective, like those with which it is connected, but it is not a contraction of Pelishtu, Philistine, as some scholars have supposed.

Pel'i-can.

The rendering of the Hebrew word Ka'ath probably meaning the vomiter. The word is twice translated cormorant in the text of A. V. (Is. xxxiv. 11; Zeph. ii. 14), but elsewhere pelican, as everywhere in R. V. The bird was ceremonially unclean (Lev. xi. 18).

Pelican.

Deut. xiv. 17), lived in the wilderness (Ps. cii. 6), and frequented ruins (Isa. xxxiv. 11; Zeph. ii. 14). It is probably the common roseate pelican (Pelecanus onocrotalus), though rivers and lakes, rather than ruined cities, unless the ruins are interspersed with marshes are its appropriate place of abode. Its four toes, being all connected by large webs, adapt it for aquatic life. It sometimes, however, perches on trees. Its bill is large and furrowed, and has under it a large pouch in which the bird carries the fish on which its young feed. Its height is from 5 to 6 feet; the expansion of its wings 12 or 13. A few individuals are found on the sea of Galilee; a much larger number on the shallow lakes of Egypt and on the Nile.

Pel'o-nite.

A word corresponding in 1 Chron. xi. 27; xxvii 10 to Paltite in 2 Sam. xxiii, 26, and in 1 Chron. xi 36 apparently to Gilonite in 2 Sam. xv. 12, xxiii 34. In 1 Chron. xxvii. 10 the person who is designated by this epithet is further said to be of the children of Ephraim. No person or place is known from which this adjective could be derived; certainly not from Pallu, who was a Reubenite and whose descendants were called Pallutes (Num. xxvi. 5). In view of these circumstances, Pelonite is not unreasonably believed to be either a corruption of the text or else to mean "such and such a one," as it does in other connection (e. g. 1 Sam. xxi. 2), and to have been inserted in the passages mentioned by a scribe who could not read the original word in the text which he was copying.

Pen.

1. A stylus or graving tool made of iron and used by writers for cutting letters on stone (Job xix 24; Ps. xlv 1; Jer viii. 8, xvii 1). In Hebrew it is called 'et and once helet (Is viii 1).

2. A reed pen used for writing with ink on papyrus (3 John 13, cp. 2 John 12). The mention of a penknife or knife of a writer in Jeremiah xxxvi. 23, and of a roll in which the prophet's words were written, imply that reed pens had been introduced among the Israelites by the time of Jehoiakim.

The Hebrew words rendered pen of the writer in Judg. v 14, A. V. mean literally staff of a marshal or scribe (R. V.).

Pe-ni'el. See PENEU 2

Pe-nin'nah [ruby or coral].

One of Elkanah's two wives, the other being Hannah (1 Sam. i. 2-6).

Pen'ny.

The rendering of the Greek Denarion. It was the denarius, a silver coin of the Romans (Mat. xxii 19-21), worth about 17 cents in the time of Christ (xviii 28, R. V. margin). See MONEY. It was the ordinary pay of an agricultural laborer for a day (Mat. xx. 2, 9, 13). Two were given to the innkeeper by the good Samaritan for looking after the wounded Jew, though he promised to supplement this sum if the expense should exceed it (Luke x 35). The apostles calculated that 200 would be needed to buy sufficient bread to feed 5000 people (Mark vi. 37). This would be one denarius for each twenty-five, or two thirds of a cent to each person. The prices in Rev. vi. 6 were those asked during a dearth.

Pen'ta-teuch [Greek pentateuchos, consisting of five books].

The first five books of the O. T., viz., Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. The word nowhere occurs in Scripture, the Israelites calling these books collectively the law (Josh. i. 7; Mat. v. 17), the law of Moses (1 Kin. ii. 3; Ezra vii. 6; Luke ii. 22), the law of the Lord (2 Chron. xxxi. 3; Luke ii. 23), the book of the law (Josh. i. 8), the book of Moses (2 Chron. xxv. 3, 4), the book of the law of Moses (Josh. viii. 31), the book of the law of God (Josh. xxiv. 26), the book of the law of the Lord (2 Chron. xvii 9). This fact suggests that the five books were considered as one; and they still are so in Hebrew manuscripts, though severally cited by their opening words. The division into five distinct books is mentioned by Josephus (con. Apion. i. 8). It may have originated with the Greek translators or been ancient. But whether or not the Septuagint translators adopted or originated this five-fold division, from them at least emanated the modern names Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy.

* The division of the law of Moses into five books furnished the model, it is thought, for the similar division of the Psalter. If it did, it is ancient, for the Psalter was early divided into five books. Proof that it did is sought in the alleged discovery that the contents of each book are so arranged that the opening psalm shall correspond to the respective book of the Pentateuch. Ps. i, with its comparison of the righteous to a tree planted by the rivers of water, is a reminder of the garden of Eden in the first book of the Pentateuch. Ps. xiii, with which the second book of the Psalter opens, is the cry of a man in distress, oppressed by the enemy, and thinking himself forgotten by God, but anticipating deliverance out of all his trouble. It recalls the affliction of Israel in Egypt and their deliverance as related in Exodus. In Ps. lxxiii, with which the third book begins, the doubts of the psalmist regarding the justice of God's dealing with men vanish when he considers the end of the wicked. The psalm is supposed to reflect gratitude for God's goodness in giving the law of Leviticus, which was an abiding mercy. Ps. xc, a prayer of Moses, in which God is besought to teach us to number our days, corresponds to Numbers. Ps. cvii, which begins the fifth book, speaks of the goodness of the Lord in the days of trouble, and is thus like Deuteronomy, which recapitulates the instances of God's loving kindness to Israel. It must be confessed that the correspondence is rather fanciful, and if an editor set about securing correspondence, it is strange that he did not adopt a more appropriate arrangement. Ps. viii, with its reference to the heavens, the work of God's fingers, to the moon and stars which he ordained, and to man whom he made and to whom he gave dominion over all creatures, would have better corresponded with Gen. i. Ps. lxxvi of the second book, which tells of the works of God, how he turned the sea into dry land for the people to pass through, and how he tried the Israelites, laid sore burdens on them

The events recorded in the first book of the Pentateuch were transmitted to the time of Moses, as is now known, by tradition oral and written; the subsequent occurrences fell under his own observation, and he was himself an actor in the most stirring events. Writing was practiced long before the time of Moses. It was common in Egypt, where he was educated; in Arabia, through a portion of which he passed; and in Canaan, where his ancestors had sojourned and whither he was leading the people. And the various forms of literature represented in the Pentateuch were familiar literary conceptions of Moses' time (see MOSES). Though the five books themselves are not attributed as a whole to Moses in any verse which they contain, yet the Pentateuch testifies expressly to the Mosaic authorship of its contents. Two passages of the narrative portion are attributed to his pen; the account of the victory over Amalek (Ex xvii. 14), and the itinerary of the march of the Israelites from Egypt to the plains of Moab opposite Jericho (Num xxiii. 2). A didactic song, reciting the dealing of the Most High with Israel, is declared to have been written and uttered by Moses (Deut xxxi. 19, 22, 30; xxxii. 44; and a hymn of praise, evoked by the deliverance from Pharaoh at the Red Sea, is recorded as sung by Moses (Ex xv. 1-18; cp. 21). The legal portion consists of three distinct bodies of law. The first is entitled the book of the covenant, and comprises the ten commandments which formed the fundamental law of the nation, and specific regulations based on them (Ex xx.-xxiii.). This book Moses is expressly said to have written (Ex xxiv. 4). The second body of laws pertains to the sanctuary and service (Ex xxv.-xxvi., xxxv.-xl., Leviticus, and major legal part of Numbers). This legislation is constantly declared to have been revealed by the Lord to Moses (Ex xxv. 1, etc.). The third body of legislation expressly and repeatedly claims to be the address of Moses to the new generation of people on the eve of their entrance into Canaan. It contains a brief rehearsal of the way which God has led them and then repeats sundry portions of the law with the special object of exhibiting its spirituality, emphasizing the features which are of vital religious importance in the new circumstances in which the people will soon be placed, and modifying details to adapt the laws to the new requirements of the settled life in Canaan. Moses wrote this address and delivered it into the custody of the Levites (Deut xxxi. 9, 24-26). These are the explicit claims, scattered throughout the and caused men to ride over their heads, and then brought them out into a wealthy place, should have opened the book. It has an obvious reference to the events recorded in Exodus, whereas Ps xlii has not. Ps lxxvi or lxxviii should form the opening of the third book in order to correspond appropriately to Leviticus.

Pentateuch itself, to its Mosaic authorship. The remainder of the O. T. refers to the law as the work of Moses and written in a book (Josh. i. 7, 8; Ezra vi. 18; Neh. viii. 1, 18); and abounds in explicit references to the law of Moses (Josh. i. 7, 8, viii. 31-35; Judg. iii. 4; 1 Kin. ii. 3; 2 Kin. xviii. 6, 12; cp. Deut. xxiv. 16; 2 Kin. xxi. 7, 8. Dan. ix. 11, 13, Ezra iii. 2; vi. 18; vii. 6. Neh. viii. 1, 18; Mal. iv. 4). One feature of this law, namely, the law of the one altar, was in abeyance during the captivity and seclusion of the ark after the Lord had forsaken Shiloh (1 Sam. iv. 11, 21, 22; vi. 1, vii. 2; Ps. lxxviii. 60; Jer. vii. 12-15; xxvi. 6). During this period the people under the leadership of Samuel sacrificed where they could (1 Kin. iii. 2-4), as their fathers had done in the olden time before the covenant had been entered into between Jehovah and the Israelites, of which the law and the ark were the sign and pledge. Once again this specific law was in abeyance. The pious Israelites of the northern kingdom were prevented from going up to Jerusalem to worship. They had to choose between refraining from sacrifice altogether or worshipping God as did Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. They properly chose the latter alternative. All other cases of sacrifice offered elsewhere than at the central sanctuary were strictly in accord with the law which expressly provided that wherever Jehovah manifested his name, there sacrifice was fitting (Ex xx. 24, see Judg. ii. 1, 5; vi. 19-24, xiii. 15, 22, and ALTAR). The law of Moses was known and its authority acknowledged even in the northern kingdom. The prophets Hosea and Amos, who labored among the ten tribes, although they do not mention the name of Moses, constantly refer to the laws recorded in the Pentateuch and use its very language. At a still later time the temple copy of the book of the law was unused and cast aside during the half century of Manasseh's reign when the religion of Jehovah was neglected; but when the temple was being repaired, preparatory to the restoration of Jehovah's worship, this book was found, or so much of it at least as contained Deuteronomy (2 Kin. xxii. 8; xxiii. 25); or, less likely, the book which the high priest found was a copy of the law of God which had been embedded in the wall of the temple as a record at the time of building the sanctuary. Daniel, Ezra, and Nehemiah allude to the written law of Moses. That Moses was the author of the Pentateuch was the opinion of the Jews of Christ's time (Mark xii. 19; John viii. 5; Antiq. preface 4; con. Apion. i. 8). Christ and the evangelists call the Pentateuch Moses and the book of Moses (Mark xii. 26; Luke xvi. 29; xxiv. 27, 44), and speak of its having been given by Moses and committed to writing by Moses (Mark x. 5; xii. 19; John i. 17, v. 46, 47; vii. 19).

The Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch is impugned. The principal objections formerly urged against it were several verses in which reference has been found to times subsequent to the death of Moses. 1 In Gen xii 6 we read: "And the Canaanite was then in the land" (cp xiii 7). The meaning assigned to these words is that the Canaanites had ceased to be there when the writer lived. The words, however, actually state only that the Canaanites were in the country when Abraham was there, and were occupying the land promised to him. 2. In Gen. xiv 14 we read that Abraham pursued the defeated confederates to Dan. In the patriarch's time, however, the place was called Laish, the name Dan not having been given it till the time of the judges (Judg xviii 29). The question is, however, whether Dan in Genesis is the place mentioned in the Book of Judges. If it is, the more familiar name may have been substituted in the place of Laish in the course of repeated transcription. The Hebrew text has not been preserved in absolute purity. 3. In Gen xxxvi 31 the words occur: "Before there reigned any king over the children of Israel," as if the Hebrew monarchy under Saul had already been established when the author wrote. But the kings of Edom who are mentioned in ver 32-43 reigned before Moses; and Moses notes that the descendants of Esau already had kings, although the Israelites, to whom the promise had been given that kings should arise among them (Gen xvii 6, 16; xxxv. 11), as yet had none. 4. Moses is said to be beyond Jordan, meaning east of the river, as though the writer himself were in Canaan (Deut. i. 1). The expression, however, does not imply this. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob spoke of that region as "beyond Jordan" and the designation became a fixed geographical term. Moreover that country was not Canaan, not the promised land Moses was still beyond Jordan. No matter on which side of the river the people were, they designated the mountains east of the Dead Sea Abarim, those beyond, and in later times they called the country between the Jabbock and the Arnon Peræa, region beyond. 5. It is universally admitted that Deut xxxiv. 5-12, in which the death of Moses is recorded and comparison made between him and prophets subsequently raised up (5, 10, etc.), cannot have been from his pen. But an addition of this sort does not militate against the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch as a whole.

The orthodox theologian and commentator Vitringa expressed the opinion in 1707, in the interest of the credibility of Genesis, that Moses edited and supplemented records left by the fathers and preserved among the Israelites. In 1753, Jean Astruc, a French physician of ability, but profligate, attempted to discriminate two leading authors in Genesis, whose writings Moses used and who are distinguished by their employment respectively of the words Elohim, that is God, and Jehovah. Besides the writings of these two, he thought he could detect ten minor documents relating chiefly to foreign nations and in which no name of God is found. This hypothesis was adopted by Eichhorn, and elaborated with learning and ingenuity. He steadfastly insisted that Moses compiled Genesis, and was the author of the rest of the Pentateuch. It was soon discovered, however, that the principles which govern the partition of Genesis were capable of being applied with similar results to the entire Pentateuch; and if so, the original documents covered the history of Moses' own time, and were scarcely put together by Moses to form the present Pentateuch. The grounds on which the partition is made are chiefly four: 1. The alternate use of the divine names God and Jehovah in successive paragraphs or sections. 2. The continuity of each so-called document when taken separately. 3. The diversity of style, diction, and ideas in the different documents. 4. Repetitions or parallel passages, often contradictory, indicative of distinct documents. Starting in simple form, the hypothesis underwent constant modification under careful criticism in order to remove the difficulties which beset it. The form which it now assumes is that four principal original documents were used by an editor or redactor in compiling the Pentateuch: an Elohist, in which the divine title is Elohim, and which supplies about one-half the matter; a Jehovist and another Elohist, which have many mutual likenesses and are closely united, and finally the document of the Deuteronomist. The second and third documents, referred to as J E, are regarded as the oldest and dated about 1000-800 B. C. The greater part of Deuteronomy or D is assigned to the year 621 B. C. or half a century earlier (2 Km xxi 8). And the first mentioned, usually denominated P to indicate that its author was a priest, is commonly dated at the close of the exile. To each of these main divisions there is a code of law; to J E, Ex xx-xxiii; to D, Deut xii.-xxvi; and to P the priestly and other legislation of Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers. It will be observed that there are two distinct matters involved in the modern theory: first, the existence of documents out of which the Pentateuch was constructed, and, second, the date of these documents. Wellhausen dates them as above, holding that the legislation of Leviticus is later than that of Deuteronomy. But 1. This theory involves the denial of the truth of the historical narrative in the O. T., not the assertion of occasional or minute inaccuracies, but the rejection of the credibility of the O. T. narrative almost as a whole. Wellhausen makes no concealment of the fact. 2. Furthermore, to date the so-called documents so late is forbidden by the fact of the development of doctrine. In the Pentateuch, the conceptions entertained and the doctrine taught concerning the future state, divine retribution, the spiritual character of true worship, angels, and the Messiah are rudimentary. They appear in developed form in late books, in Job, the Psalms, and the prophets; a strong argument that the writer of the Pentateuch lived at an earlier age and in a different intellectual environment. Dillmann, while accepting the existence of documents, opposed Wellhausen's arrangement, insisting that history required the existence of the Levitical legislation before that of Deuteronomy, and so far he is more in accord with the teaching of Scripture. 3. The early existence of the laws and institutions of the Pentateuch is attested by the traces of them in the writings of the early prophets. A short time since, it was customary to admit the genuineness of the passages where these traces are found, but to deny that they were derived from Deuteronomic or priestly documents. Now it is universally conceded that these laws and institutions were in full force when the passages were written, but the logical result of this concession, namely that the Pentateuchal law and organization were in existence in the eighth century B. C., is avoided by declaring that these references are late interpolations in the genuine writings of the prophets. As a rule no proof for this declaration is offered. The decision is magisterial. It is pronounced without appeal from the master's mere assertion. Believers in the Mosaic authorship of the Levitical and Deuteronomic law point with confidence to the evident indissolubleness of these references from the context and their inseparable connection with the original argument, which show that they are not interpolations, but an essential part of the discourse of the prophets of the eighth century. 4. The theory of the late origin of Israel's institutions asserts, as a fundamental postulate, that the law and the elaborate ritual of Israel were the result of a gradual development. As in nature, so in art, law, and ritual, the simple ever precedes the complex, and the rude the refined. The thesis, as a general principle, is demonstrable and is universally accepted; and it is true also in the case of the civil law and the worship of Israel. But there is another truth, to speak of but one, namely, that Israel was the heir of the ages. Development in law and in the ritual of divine worship had been going on for centuries. The Israelites did not begin with nothing, any more than do the founders of a modern state or the framers of a modern constitution. They did not create ex nihilo. Under Moses they appropriated the mature fruits of man's labor and man's experience. Among the nations with whom they were in close touch in the Mosaic era, among the Babylonians from the midst of whom their forefathers had emigrated and the Egyptians with whom they had sojourned, the development of the forms of worship had reached maturity in an elaborate refinement; and the legal sense of the Semites had developed so far as to discern a unity underlying manifold laws and to adopt the principle of codification. The statutes organized as a body of law and incorporated in the book of the covenant, the sanctuary as described in Exodus, and the ritual that is outlined in Leviticus were not strange novelties to the people assembled at Sinai, but were familiar conceptions and already full of significance, appealing to the sense of justice and appreciation for the rights of the lowly and helpless which the Semites possessed long before the days of Moses, representing types of sacred architecture and ritual approved by the most refined contemporary peoples, embodying lofty ideals possessed in common with the ethnic religions of the day, employing a symbolism that was, as it were, the universal religious speech among the men of that age, and giving expression to the common innate sense of propriety in the worship of God. The whole was molded and dominated by the truth of one God only, holy, gracious, and spiritual. The civil law of Israel and the sanctuary, priesthood, and ritual, rich, refined, elaborate, are not things new under the sun; but Moses, a statesman and religious leader, in long and intimate communion with God and under direct divine teaching and control, selected suitable materials from the legal and ritualistic wealth of the age and organized them into a vehicle that was a perfect expression of God's will for quickening, fostering, disciplining, and guiding the moral and religious consciousness of Israel and giving a proper and intelligible display of those great truths concerning God which Israel held and for which Israel was to bear witness among men. The law and worship of Israel as exhibited in the legislation at Sinai, however long the period of development may have been that preceded them, were timely, in entire harmony with the conceptions of the Mosaic age. See MOSES, ALTAR, AMRAPHEL, PRIEST, TABERNACLE, THEOCRACY.

Turning to the literary aspect of the question, what are the objections to the theory of documents? 1. The impossibility of separating the documents from each other in strict adherence to the principle that certain words are characteristic of the several writers. To take an example from the use of different divine names, which is the starting point of the hypothesis and the phenomenon most evident to English readers, the name Jehovah, which in A. V. is generally translated LORD, betokens J, and should not occur, according to the theory, in the book of Genesis in the documents E and P. But in fact it does not occur there in these documents, in v. 29; vii. 16; xiv. 22; xv. 1, 2; xvii. 1; xx. 18; xxi. 1 b, 33; xxii. 11, 14, 15, 16; xxviii. 21. Nor should the name of God appear in the document J; yet it does in iii. 1-5; iv. 25; vi. 2, 4; vii. 9; ix 26, 27; xxxiii 5, 11; xliii. 14, etc. Here are more than a score of instances in Genesis alone and in respect to but two characteristic words, where the critical principle fails. When obstinate facts like these oppose the critical theory, they are excised. The compiler is said to have introduced the awkward words arbitrarily or from another document. In some cases J is said to have used the name God discriminatingly, which is a virtual abandonment of the theory. If the writer used the divine name discriminatingly in some cases, he may have done so in all, as the defenders of the Mosaic authorship maintain. On the theory of the Mosaic authorship, these words are in place; and it is ordinarily apparent that they are discriminatingly employed. God denotes the divine being in his relation to the universe at large as creator, preserver, and governor of all his creatures and all their actions. Jehovah denotes God as he reveals himself to man, especially in grace.

2 The asserted continuity of the documents when taken separately is fictitious. J's narrative ending in iv 25, 26 is continued in v. 28 b, 29, vi (1-4) 5-8. These passages do not relate unbroken history, they are disconnected fragments, there is no continuity. J's narrative in vi 5-8 is continued in vii. 1-5. The account is fragmentary again, not continuous. Whence came the ark into which Noah was commanded to enter? J's narrative embraces x. 21, 25-30; xi. (1-9), 28-30; xii 1-4 a. Who was Terah, and who were Haran and Abram? Where is the smoothness of continuous narrative? P narrated i. 1-ii 4 a, concluding with the emphatic declaration that God saw everything that he had made; and behold, it was very good. Then after listing the genealogy of Adam (v 1-28a, 30-32), he suddenly said: "And the earth was corrupt before God" (vi 9-22). How did that become corrupt which God had pronounced very good? Again, P's uncouth narrative of the early history of Abraham is cut out of J's account, thus: xi 27, 31, 32; xii. 4 b; 5 xii. 6 a, 11 b, 12 a. It is continued in xvi 1 a, 3, 15, 16; xvi. Over against this uncouthness in the hypothetical documents, believers in the Mosaic authorship are able to show unity of theme, unbroken continuity of thought, balanced treatment of the parts, and progressive narrative. See GENESIS 3.

The theory that there are parallel accounts marked by difference of style fails as a trustworthy principle in the only case where it can be tested by external evidence. It is asserted that in the narrative of the flood the storm which produced the deluge is described twice in three successive verses: "The same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened" (vii. 11, P), and "It came to pass after the seven days that the waters of the flood were upon the earth, and the rain was upon the earth forty days and forty nights" (10, 12, J). It is urged also that there are two literary styles apparent here: the former exuberant, vivid, poetic, the latter a bald statement of the facts in simple prose. But the account of the flood was also handed down by the Babylonians and Assyrians; and when the Assyro-Babylonian narrative is compared with the Hebrew record, it is found to show the same repetitions which occurring in Genesis are called parallel narratives, and to exhibit like differences of style in the corresponding places. The narrator depicts the breaking and raging of the storm with equal picturesqueness and even greater exuberance than the Hebrew writer; but when he comes to state how long the storm lasted, he naturally expresses himself simply. He says: "Six days and nights wind, storm and rain prevailed; on the seventh day the rain abated, the storm which had struggled like a woman in travail, rested; the sea withdrew to its bed, the violent wind and the flood-storm ceased," see the Assyrian account in article FLOOD. On the theory of Mosaic authorship, there is no difficulty in accounting for difference of style. Different themes require different statement. Dates, genealogies, and the like do not call the imagination into exercise. Vivid and picturesque description belongs to the narration of lively and vivid incidents.

4 The critical theory that there are parallel accounts of the same event which are marked by contradictions likewise fails to stand the test of external evidence. It is contended that according to P God forewarns Noah of an impending destructive flood of waters, but does not reveal to him whether it will be caused by melting snows or continuous rains or tidal wave, and thus P contradicts J, who states that the Lord bade Noah enter into the ark, because in yet seven days he would cause it to rain upon the earth. But again the Assyrian account shows that the Hebrew narrative does not embody two divergent accounts, but is the record of successive progressive events. For according to it, as in Genesis, man was first warned of coming destruction and bidden build a boat. The ruin was, accordingly, to be wrought by a flood of water, but whether the deluge would be due to rain, or a freshet, or the inflowing sea was not disclosed. When the appointed time approached, however, the prophecy became definite and foretold rain. The Hebrew account, with its present material and the present arrangement of that material, is essentially the ancient account handed down from the fathers. And the criticism which distributes the narrative among different writers on the ground of differences of style or alleged contradictions is demonstrably invalid. PEN'te-cost. See WEEKS, FEAST OF.

Pe-nu'el and once Peniel (Gen. xxxii. 31) [face of God].

1. Originally an encampment east of the Jordan, first named by Jacob because he had there seen God face to face, yet his life had been preserved (Gen. xxxii. 30, 31). In the time of the judges there was a tower there, which Gideon broke down, and a city, the inhabitants of which he slew (Judg. viii. 8, 9, 17). It was fortified by Jeroboam I (1 Kin. xii. 25).

2. A man of Judah, and the ancestor of the inhabitants of Gedor (1 Chron. iv. 4).

3. A Benjamite, family of Shashak (1 Chron. vii. 25).

Pe'or [an opening, a cleft]

1. A mountain in Moab looking toward the desert, or Jeshimon (Num. xxii. 28). From it the camp of Israel at Shittim was in full view (xxiv. 2). A mountain still bore the name in the time of Eusebius and Jerome. It stood opposite Jericho, on the road to Heshbon, above or to the east of Luvias, now Tell er-Rameh. Accordingly Peor was a peak of the Abarim range near wady Hesban.

2. A Moabite divinity worshiped in mount Peor, and often called Baal-peor. See BAAL-PEOR.

Pe-ræ'a or Perea [the land beyond].

The region between the Jabbok and the Arnon, beyond Jordan (War iii. 3, 3); cp. signification and location of Abarim. The name was, however, used in a wider sense; for Josephus calls Gadara, on the banks of the Yarmuk, the capital of Perea (War iv. 7, 3).

Per'a-zim. See BAAL-PERAZIM.

Pe-re'a. See PEREA.

Pe'res. See MENE

Pe'resh [distinction, separation, dung].

A man of Manasseh (1 Chron. vii. 16).

Pe'rez, in A. V. of O. T. Pharez except thrice (1 Chron. xxvii. 3; Neh. xi. 4, 6); in A. V. of N. T. Phares [a breach].

A son of Judah, one of twins whom Tamar bore (Gen. xxxviii. 24-30). He became the founder of a tribal family which took its name from him, and of two other tribal families which sprang from his sons and were named from them (Num. xxvi. 20, 21; 1 Chron. ii. 4, 5). He was an ancestor of David and consequently of Christ (Ruth. iv. 12-18; Mat. i. 3).

Pe-rez-uz'za and Perez-uzzah [breach of Uzza].

The name given by David to the place where Uzza was struck dead for touching the ark (2 Sam. vi. 8; 1 Chron. xiii. 11). Exact situation unknown.

Per-fum'er-y.

Spices of various kinds, such as aloes, cassia, cinnamon, myrrh, frankincense, spike-nard, which were raised in the Jordan valley or imported from Arabia and elsewhere, formed the basis of perfumery (Ecclus. xxiv. 15). The spice was compelled to yield its fragrance by at least four different methods. It was tied in a bundle or enclosed in a bag (Song i. 13); it was reduced to powder and burned as incense (iii. 6); its aromatic matter was separated by boiling, and the extract was carried as scent in smelling-bottles suspended from the girdle, or was mixed with oil and used as an ointment (i. 3; Is. iii. 20, John xii. 3). Frequently several spices were compounded (Ex. xxx. 23, 24; John xix. 39). Perfumery was applied to the person and garments and furniture (Ps. xlv. 8; Prov. vii. 17; Song iv. 11). It was used in the temple service both as incense and as ointment (Ex. xxx. 22-38).

Per'ga [doubtless citadel, burg].

A town in Pamphylia, and under the Romans the capital of the province, on the right bank of the river Kestros, 60 stades from the mouth. Paul and Barnabas visited the town on the first missionary journey, both going and returning (Acts xiii. 13, 14; xiv. 25). In the vicinity was a celebrated temple of the goddess Artemis of the Asiatic type (cp. Diana of Ephesus), who was known as the queen of Peiga.

Per'ga-mum, in A. V. Pergamos [citadel, burg]. Both forms of the name were used by the ancients.

The most important city of Mysia, situated on the north bank of the river Caicus, about 20 miles from the sea. It was once the capital of a wealthy kingdom ruled over by a dynasty of kings, several of them called Attalus. The first of these kings, Attalus I, came to the throne in the year 241 B. C. He defeated the Gauls and settled them in the district henceforth known as Galatia. His son Eumenes, who succeeded him, 197 B. C., adorned the city and founded a celebrated library, which ultimately was second only to that of Alexandria. Attalus III, who died in the year 133 B. C., bequeathed to the Romans his movable property. They misinterpreted the bequest to mean the kingdom, appropriated it, erected it into the province of Asia, and made Pergamum the capital. In 6 B. C., however, the residence of the proconsul, who in imperial times acted as governor of the province, was transferred to Ephesus. Marc Antony promised the library (which did not belong to him) to Cleopatra and had it removed to Egypt, where it was added to the renowned Alexandrian library. The acropolis of Pergamum crowned a steep hill that rose 1000 feet above the plain. Near the summit stood an immense altar to Zeus, erected by Eumenes II. to commemorate the victory won by his father over the Gauls; and at a short distance from this altar there was an elegant temple of Athene. In the Roman period a temple to the divine Augustus was also built on the acropolis. Outside of the city there was a famous shrine of Æsculapius, god of medicine, to which people from all quarters flocked for healing. Parchment, called in Latin pergamena, and in Greek peigamēnē, was so named because it was first obtained at Pergamum. The third of the seven churches of Asia addressed in the book of Revelation was that at Pergamum. It is said that Satan's seat was there, and that a faithful martyr, Antipas, had been put to death in the place. It must, therefore, have been a stronghold of antichristian idolatry (Rev. i 11; ii 12-17). It is now called Bergama or Bergma, and still exists as a town of mean-looking wooden houses interspersed with the more splendid relics of antiquity.

Pe-ri'da. See PERUDA.

Per'iz-zites [dwellers in unwalled villages].

An important section of the Canaanites, often enumerated as one of the tribes of Palestine (Gen. xv. 20; Ex. iii 8; Josh. ix. 1), and perhaps, like the Rephaim, an aboriginal people who were of different race from the Canaanites and in the land before them (cp. Gen. xiii 7; Josh. xvii 15; and the omission of them in Gen. x. 15 seq.). They were in the country as early as the days of Abraham and Lot (Gen. xiii. 7). In Joshua's time they inhabited the mountain region (Josh. xi 3), dwelling in the territory afterwards given over to the tribes of Ephraim, Manasseh (xvii 15), and Judah (Judg. i 4, 5). They were not extirpated, but, contrary to the law of Moses (Deut. vii 3), allowed to enter into marriage alliances with their conquerors, seducing them into idolatry (Judg. iii. 5, 6). Solomon imposed upon these Perizzites a yoke of bondservice (1 Kin. ix 20, 21; 2 Chron. viii 7).

Per'se-us.

Son and successor of Philip III, and last king of Macedon. In 171 B. C. he resumed the war with the Romans which his father had waged; but, after three years of desultory fighting and occasional success, he was completely defeated (1 Mac. viii. 5) by L. Æmilius Paulus in the battle of Pydna, which ended the Macedonian monarchy. He fled, but was captured and taken to Rome, where he graced the triumph of his conqueror.

Per'si-a.

Persia proper, the seat of the Persians when they first became known to the Western nations as a settled people, lay southeast of Elam and nearly corresponded to the province of modern Persia called Fars, or Faristan, a modification of the original native name Pârça. Persia, in this limited sense, was bounded on the north by Great Media (Media Magna), on the southwest by the Persian Gulf, on the east by Carmania (now called Kerman), and on the northwest by Susiana. Its length was at most about 250 miles; its average breadth about 200; its area considerably less than 50,000 square miles. In looser usage, the term Persia denoted the plateau of Iran, the region bounded by the Persian Gulf, the valleys of the Tigris and the Cyrus, the Caspian Sea, the rivers Oxus, Jaxartes, and Indus (1 Mac. vi. 1; 2 Mac. i. 19). But when the Persian empire was at the height of its power, it stretched from the empire of India on the east to the Grecian Archipelago on the west; and from the Danube, the Black Sea, mount Caucasus, and the Caspian Sea on the north, to the Arabian and Nubian deserts on the south (Esth. i. 1; x. 1); and it was nearly 3000 miles long, with a varying breadth of 500 to 1500 miles. It had an area of 2,000,000 square miles, half that of Europe. The race inhabiting Persia proper was Aryan, and closely related to the Median race.

The Persians are not mentioned in the table of nations (Gen. x). They did not attain to prominence until many centuries after Moses. About 700 B. C. the country of Par-u, i. e. Persia, was one of the allies of Elam. But soon Teispes, a chief of the tribe and a member of the family of the Achæmenidæ, conquered Elam and established himself as king in the district of Ansan or Anzan, as the name is also written. His descendants branched into two lines, one reigning in Ansan and the other remaining in Persia. His great-grandson, Cyrus II, king of Ansan, united the divided power, conquered Media about 550 B. C., Lydia in Asia Minor a little later, and Babylonia in 539. He allowed the Hebrew exiles to return to their own land, see YRUS. Dying in 529 B. C., he was succeeded by his son Cambyses, but reserved a small portion of his vast dominions for his younger son, Smerdis. The arrangement worked badly. Cambyses became jealous of Smerdis, and had him privately put to death. In 525 the king conquered Egypt. As he was returning to Persia, the news reached him that Smerdis, whom he believed to be dead, was really alive (which was not true), and had assumed the sovereignty, the Persian army supporting his claim. Troubled by the tidings, the monarch drew a short sword from its sheath and gave himself a wound which in a few days proved fatal. He died 522 B. C. The so-called Smerdis, who was really one of the Magi, now ascended the throne. When it was discovered that he was not the true Smerdis, a conspiracy was formed against him, and he was slain. Darius, son of Hystaspes, one of the leaders of the plot and apparently the next heir to the throne when the family of Cyrus became extinct, began to reign, 521 B. C., being then about twenty-eight years of age. The accession of the new king was the signal for a general revolt of the provinces, but the insurrection was suppressed, and Darius organized a new empire which extended from India to the Grecian Archipelago and the Danube. It was under him that the temple at Jerusalem was rebuilt. He died 486 B. C.; see DARIUS 2. His son and successor was Xerxes, the Ahasuerus of the Book of Esther and probably of Ezra iv 6. He reconquered the Egyptians; and he attempted an invasion of Greece, but was repulsed with great loss to the Persians; see AHASUERUS 2. After a reign of twenty years, he was assassinated in 465 B. C. His son and successor, a much more respectable character, but still fickle and feeble, was Artaxerxes Longimanus. He was not unfriendly to the Jews. He allowed Ezra to lead a large number of them back to Jerusalem, and he permitted Nehemiah to rebuild the walls of the city; see ARTAXERXES. He reigned forty years, dying in 425 B. C. His successors were Xerxes II., 425; Sogdianus, 425; Darius Nothus, the Illegitimate, 424; Artaxerxes Mnemon, of good memory, 404; Artaxerxes Ochus, 359; Arses 338. and Darius Codomannus, 336. The last king was conquered by Alexander the Great in 331 B. C., and with him the first Persian empire passed away. See DARIUS 3.

The royal residences were Persepolis (2 Mac ix. 2), Shushan (Neh. i. 1; Esth. i. 2), Ecbatana, that is Achmetha (Ezra vi 2; Antiq. x. 11, 7), and to an extent Babylon (Ezra vi. 1).

When Cyrus the Great allowed the Jews to return to their own land 538 B. C., he did not grant them their independence. They were placed under governors appointed by the Persian emperor (Neh. iii. 7), and formed part of the satrapy beyond the river (Ezra viii. 36) which consisted of Syria, Palestine, Phœnicia, and Cyprus (Herod. i. 91). They were subjects of Persia for 207 years, from 539, the year in which Cyrus entered Babylon, to 332, that in which Alexander the Great completed the conquest of Palestine.

The faith of their imperial lords was Zoroastrianism, but no effort was made to enforce it on the subject peoples. It was a spiritual religion, recognizing the distinction between God and nature, between spirit and matter, and consequently being averse to images of God. Its fundamental ethical principle was the essential contradiction between good and evil, light and darkness. It conceived of two realms of spirits: one with a hierarchy of angels and archangels, where Ahuramazda or Ormazd, as the name is written in modern Persian, the all-wise lord, God in the fullest sense, presides over the seven holy spirits, who are his ministers and the expression of his attributes, and over thousands of worthy ones; and another realm of evil spirits ruled over by Ahriman, the spiritual enemy. It was deeply tainted with dualism, and Ahriman was probably regarded as self-existent. It taught the duty of man to eradicate evil and cultivate good, and to strive after holiness in thought, word, and deed, which will be rewarded by immortality and heaven. It paid homage to fire, air, earth, and water as the creation of Ahuramazda. See MAGI. Later Judaism shows traces of the Persian supremacy.

What once had been Persia passed first to the Macedonian Greeks and their successors of the same race. Then it became part of the Parthian empire. In A. D. 211 or 212 Ardashir laid the foundations of a new Persian sovereignty, ruled by a dynasty called after his family Sassanian. In 224 he defeated and slew the last Parthian king. The Sassanian dynasty became powerful, met the Roman armies on equal terms, and set limits to the extension of their sway in the east. In A. D. 636 and 641, Yazdejard, or Yezdejd III., the last of the dynasty, was defeated by the Saracens, and Persia came under Mohammedan rule, which has continued till now. Some of the bolder spirits refused to submit to Mohammedan domination, and fled to the deserts and the mountains. Finally, a number of Persian refugees landed in Guzerat about A. D. 717, seeking and obtaining an asylum in India. Their successors constitute a limited but important section of the Indian community. They are called Parsees. They have become prosperous, and are loyal to the English throne.

Per'sis [Persian]

A Christian at Rome who labored diligently in the Lord, and to whom Paul sent his salutation (Rom. xvi. 12).

Pe-ru'da and Perida [scattered, a kernel]

A subdivision of the children of Solomon's servants who returned from captivity (Ezra ii. 55, Neh. vii. 57).

Pes'ti-lence.

An infectious or contagious disease, a plague. While the sending of pestilence is frequently mentioned as from God (Ex. ix. 15; Lev. xxvi. 25; Deut. xxviii. 21), he very often, if not in all cases, uses secondary causes for its production. The punishment which is threatened is often described as the sword, the famine, and the pestilence, and these words tend to stand in this order (Ezek. vi. 11). There is reason for this order. War breaks out. The people of the invaded country cannot cultivate their fields, or, if they do, they find their crops reaped or destroyed by the enemy. Besiegers invest the cities and intentionally cut off the supplies with the object of forcing a surrender. Famine ensues in country and town. The starvation, the carnage, and the unsanitary condition of the cities crowded during the siege bring a pestilence.

Pe'ter.

The Greek form of the Aramaic surname Cephas (John i. 42; 1 Cor. i. 12; iii. 22; ix. 5; xv. 5; Gal. i. 18; ii. 9, 11, 14), meaning a rock, which Christ bestowed upon Simon or, more properly, Symeon (Acts xv. 14; 2 Pet. i. 1, R. V. margin) on his first appearance before him (John i. 42), and afterwards explained more fully in its prophetic import (Mat. xvi. 18 seq.; Mark iii. 16). Simon was the son of a certain John (John i. 42, R. V.; xxi. 15, 16, 17, R. V.) or Jona (Mat. xvi. 17, probably a syncope of John), who, with his sons, Andrew and Peter, prosecuted the trade of a fisherman on the sea of Galilee in partnership with Zebedee and his sons (Mat. iv. 18, Mark i. 16; Luke v. 3 seq.). He was a native of Bethsaida (John i. 44), and subsequently dwelt with his family at Capernaum (Mat. viii. 14; Luke iv. 38).

Peter was probably a disciple of John the Baptist, and was in the first instance brought to Jesus by his brother Andrew (John i. 41, 42), who was one of the favored two disciples of John whom he pointed to Jesus immediately after his return from the temptation in the wilderness (John i. 35 seq.) With prophetic insight into his character, Jesus at once conferred upon him the surname of Cephas, or Peter, that is, "Rock" (John i. 42). In common with the earliest followers of Jesus, Peter received three separate calls from his Master: first, to become his disciple (John i. 40 seq., cp. ii. 2); secondly, to become his constant companion (Mat. iv. 19; Mark i. 17, Luke v. 10); and, thirdly, to be his apostle (Mat. x. 2, Mark iii. 14, 16; Luke vi. 13, 14). Peter's ardor, earnestness, courage, vigor, and impetuosity of disposition marked him from the first as the leader of the disciples of Jesus. He is always named first in the lists of the apostles (Mat. x. 2; Mark iii. 16, Luke vi. 14; Acts i. 13). In the more intimate circle of the most favored three disciples, he is likewise always named first (Mat. xvii. 1; Mark v. 37; ix. 2; xiii. 3; xiv. 33; Luke viii. 51; ix. 28). He was the natural spokesman of the apostolical band. He was the first to confess Jesus as the Christ of God (Mat. xvi. 16; Mark viii. 29), but was equally forward to dissuade him from his chosen path of suffering (Mat. xvi. 22, Mark viii. 33), receiving from Christ the appropriate praise and blame.

Peter's life exhibits three well-marked stages. First, there is the period of training, as exhibited in the gospel narrative. During these years of personal association with Christ, he learned to know both Christ and himself. And though he brought them to an end in a threefold denial of the Master whom he had boasted that he at least would never forsake (Mat. xxvi. 69 seq.; Mark xiv. 66 seq.; Luke xxii. 54 seq.; John xviii. 15 seq.), Jesus closed them with a loving probing of his heart and restoration of his peace and confidence (John xxi. 15 seq.). Secondly, the period of leadership in the church, as exhibited in the earlier chapters of The Acts. During these years Peter justified his surname, and fulfilled the prophecy that on him should the edifice of the church be raised. It was by his bold and strong hand that the church was led in every step. It was he who moved the disciples to fill up the broken ranks of the apostolate (Acts i. 15); it was he who proclaimed to the assembled multitudes the meaning of the pentecostal effusion (ii. 14), he was the leader in the public healing of the lame man and in the subsequent sermon and defense (iii. 4, 12, iv. 8), it was by his voice that Ananias and Sapphira were rebuked (v. 3, 8). Above all, it was by his hand that the door of salvation was opened alike to the Jews in the great sermon at Pentecost (ii. 10, 38), and to the gentiles in the case of Cornelius (x). Thirdly, the period of humble work in the kingdom of Christ, exhibited in the epistles of the N. T. When the foundations of the church had been laid, Peter takes a subordinate place, and in humble labors to spread the boundaries of the kingdom, disappears from the page of history. In the church at Jerusalem James takes henceforth the leading place (xii. 17; xv. 13, xxi. 18, Gal. ii. 9, 12). The door had been opened to the gentiles, and Paul now becomes the apostle to the gentiles (Gal. ii. 7). As the apostle to the circumcision (8), Peter prosecuted henceforth his less brilliant work, wherever Jews could be found, and contentedly left Jerusalem to James and the civilized world to Paul. The book of The Acts closes its account of him at the meeting at Jerusalem (Acts xv.), when his policy of breaking down the barriers for the gentiles met with universal acceptance. We hear of him afterwards at Antioch (Gal. ii. 11), possibly at Corinth (1 Cor. i. 12), certainly in the far east at Babylon (1 Pet. v. 13), and certainly as prosecuting his work through missionary journeys, taking his wife with him (1 Cor. ix. 5). Finally, we know that he glorified God by a martyr's death (John xxi. 19). Beyond this, Scripture tells us nothing of his fortunes, labors, sufferings, or successes, except what can be learned from his two Epistles. In them he stands before us in a singularly beautiful humility, not pressing the recognition of personal claims to leadership upon the Christian community, but following up the teaching of Paul or of Jude with his own, and exhorting his readers to hold fast to the common faith.

No character in Scripture history, we may even say in all literature, is drawn for us more clearly or strongly than Peter's. In the gospels, in The Acts, and in the epistles it is the same man that stands out before us in dramatic distinctness. Always eager, ardent, impulsive, he is pre-eminently the man of action in the apostolic circle, and exhibits the defects of his qualities as well as their excellences throughout life (Mat. xvi. 22; xxvi. 69-75; Gal. ii. 11). His virtues and faults had their common root in his enthusiastic disposition; it is to his praise that along with the weed of rash haste, there grew more strongly into his life the fair plant of burning love and ready reception of truth. He was treated with distinguished honor by his Lord: he was made the recipient of no less than three miracles in those early days of the gospels; he was granted a special appearance after the resurrection (1 Cor. xv. 5); Jesus could find time in his own passion and while saving the world to cast on him a reminding glance and to bind up his broken heart. Accordingly the life of Peter is peculiarly rich in instruction, warning, and comfort for the Christian, and his writings touch the very depths of Christian experience and soar to the utmost heights of Christian hope.

Authentic history adds but little to our knowledge of Peter's life beyond what we glean from the N. T. Conformably to the notice of his martyrdom in John xxi. 19, we are credibly told that he died by crucifixion about the same time with Paul's death by the sword, that is about A. D. 68. The place of his death is not incredibly witnessed to be Rome. Legend was early busy with his life; the Roman legend of a twenty-five years' episcopate in Rome has its roots in early apocryphal stories originating among the heretical Ebionites, and is discredited not less by its origin and manifest internal inconsistencies than by all authentic history.

The First Epistle General of Peter. The author of this epistle announces himself as the apostle Peter (i. 1); and the whole internal character of the letter as well as exceptionally copious historical attestation bears out the assertion. It is addressed "to the elect who are sojourners of the Dispersion in Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia" (i. 1), which is evidently a somewhat metaphorical description of the whole body of Christians inhabiting the region comprised in modern Asia Minor. That the readers in the mind of the author were largely of gentile origin is clear from such passages as i. 14; ii. 9, 10; iii. 6; iv. 3. These were churches founded and nurtured in large part by the apostle Paul, and to them Paul had written his letters to the Galatians, Ephesians, and Colossians; Peter writes to them as those who owed their conversion to others than himself (i. 12, 25), and in order to testify that the gospel they had received was "the true grace of God" and to exhort them to "stand fast therein" (v. 12). Thus he publishes his hearty agreement with the apostle Paul and at the same time pens what is preeminently the epistle of hope. The order in which the countries to which it was sent are enumerated (i. 1), names them from east to west, and suggests that the letter was written in the east. This is borne out by the salutation sent from the Babylonian church (v. 13). Its date is set by its pretty copious use of the Epistle to the Ephesians on the one side, and the death of Peter on the other, as between A. D. 63 and A. D. 67: it is most probable that it was written about 64 or 65. Allusion is made to the epistle as being Peter's in 2 Pet. iii. 1 (cp. i. 1); it is unmistakably quoted by Polycarp, a disciple of the apostle John; it is definitely quoted also as the writing of the apostle Peter by Irenæus and Tertullian in the closing decades of the second century; and from the very beginning it has always held a secure place in the Christian Bible in every part of the world, and has always been in the fullest use by Christians of every land.

The style in which the letter is written is at once simple, striking, and forcible, abounding in sudden and abrupt transitions and admirably reflecting the character of the writer. The whole mode of presentation of its matter is special and characteristic, though the doctrine presented is distinctly the same as that of the epistles of Paul, set forth here with prevailing reference to the grace of God and the future hope. The epistle is filled to a remarkable degree with reminiscences of earlier Christian writings, particularly of the epistles to the Romans and Ephesians and James (cp. 1 Pet. ii. 6, 8 with Rom. ix. 32, 33; 1 Pet. ii. 5; iii. 8, 9, iv. 7-11 with Rom. xii. 1, and 16, 17, and 3, 6, 1 Pet. i. 18 and iii. 1-7 with Eph. vi. 5 and v. 22, 23; 1 Pet. i. 1, 6, 7, 23 and v. 6 with Jas. i. 2, 3, 18 and 1 Pet. iv. 10), thus revealing a characteristic of Peter's. It is remarkable for the combined depth and beauty of its Christian teaching. After the greeting (i. 1, 2) there follows an introductory section (i. 3-12) in which God is praised for the blessings of salvation. The body of the letter (i. 13-v. 11) consists of (1) a series of exhortations to a diligent Christian walk, correspondent to the teaching its readers had received (i. 13-ii. 10); (2) a number of particular directions for the special relationships of life (ii. 11-iv. 6); and (3) some closing instructions for the present needs of the readers (iv. 7-v. 11). It ends with salutations and announcements (v. 12-14).

The Second Epistle General of Peter. The author of this epistle describes himself as "Symeon Peter, a bond servant and apostle of Jesus Christ" (i. 1, R. V. margin), and represents himself as having been present at Christ's transfiguration (i. 16), and as having received from him a prediction as to his death (i. 14; cp. John xxi. 19), and also as standing on an equality with the apostle Paul (iii. 15). A lack of simplicity in the style and of ease in expression contrast with the simplicity of style exhibited by Peter in the First Epistle; and this difference was made as early as Jerome's time an argument for diversity of authorship. Jerome himself thought that such difference as appears was due to Peter's use of different interpreters. Perhaps so (cp. MARK). At any rate, the distinct claim of the author to be the apostle

Peter is borne out by the character of the letter itself; for it does not lack traits characteristic of Peter's manner or points of likeness to his speeches recorded in The Acts, and it shows peculiarities to Peter's discourse in its employment of a number of unusual words which are common to it and the First Epistle, and in the habit, observable in the first letter also, of giving both the negative and positive aspect of a thought (for example, 1 Pet i 12, 14, 15, 18, 19 and 2 Pet i 16, 21; ii 4, 5, iii 9, 17). Traces of the use of this epistle in the very earliest days of the church are not numerous or very clear, but Origen at the opening of the third century speaks of it in a manner which shows that it was used in the church of his day; and although doubts were cherished in some quarters concerning its authorship, these are overborne by the weighty historical evidence.

The form of its address is quite general: "to them that have obtained a like precious faith with us" (i. 1); but in i shows that the same readers, or some one territorial group among them, are in view to whom 1 Peter had been sent. The place from which it was written cannot be confidently ascertained; if the allusion in i 14 implies that Peter was on the verge of his martyrdom, we may think of Rome. In that case the letter should be dated in A. D. 68; and the nature of the errors rebuked in it, and its use of the Epistle of Jude (or vice versa) as well as its allusion to 1 Peter will accord with this date.

Its object, as is declared in i 1, 17, 18, was to stir up the minds of its readers to remember what had been taught them, to the end that they might be saved from the errors now becoming prevalent and might grow in grace and the knowledge of the Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. It was written, in other words, to rebuke the nascent gnosticism creeping into the churches, and to build up Christians in true knowledge and purity. The contents of the letter are in full accord with its object. After the usual apostolical greeting (i 1, 2), it passes insensibly into an earnest exhortation to growth in grace and knowledge (3-11), and thence into a reminder of the grounds on which this knowledge, itself the basis of piety, rests (12-21), and a denunciation of the false teachers (ii. 1-22). The readers are then reminded of the nature and surety of the teaching given them as to the second advent and the end of the world (iii 1-13); and the letter closes with an exhortation to them to make their calling and election sure, including a commendation of Paul's letters, and concludes with a doxology (14-18).

B. B. W. (supplemented)

Peth-a-hi'ah [Jehovah hath set free]

1. A descendant of Aaron whose family became the nineteenth course of priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 16).

2. A Levite who was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 23). He was probably the Levite of the name who assisted Ezra in his religious work (Neh. ix. 5).

3. A man of Judah, family of Zerah, and an official of the Persian king for all matters concerning the people (Neh. xi. 24).

Pe'thor [cleft, opening].

A town near the Euphrates (Num. xxii. 5), by the mountains of Aram or Mesopotamia (Num. xxiii. 7; Deut. xxiii. 4). While the Israelites were in Egypt, the town was captured by the Hittites, and they retained it until the ninth century B. C., when it was wrested from them by Shalmaneser II., king of Assyria, and converted into a colony of the conquerors. It was situated far north of Palestine, on the western bank of the Euphrates, near the river Sagura, now Sajur, a few miles south of the Hittite capital Carchemish.

Pha'raoh [Egyptian per-aa, great house]

A title used as the general designation of the sovereign of Egypt, both with and without the personal name attached.

Of the Pharaohs mentioned in the Bible, several, among whom are the Pharaohs of Abraham and Joseph, cannot be identified with any degree of certainty. Of those that are better known there are:

1. THE PHARAOH OF THE OPPRESSION. It is quite generally, though not universally, believed that this was Ramses II., third king of the nineteenth dynasty and son of Seti I. See EGYPT III. 8. Both belonged to the New Empire. Ramses while yet a mere child was made coregent by Seti, and reigned sixty-seven years, from 1348 to 1281 B. C. according to Dr. Mahler's calculation. He was a great warrior and penetrated farther into Asia than even Thothmes III. had done, advancing as far as Asia Minor and to the vicinity of the Tigris. The Libyans, the inhabitants of Asia Minor, and Islanders of the Mediterranean made war against Egypt, but Ramses defeated them. His great expedition were directed against the Hittites and their allies, and occupied many campaigns. His most notable exploit was during an expedition to Kadesh, on the Orontes, the southern Hittite capital, in which he was led by treacherous Bedouin Arab guides into an ambushade, from which he extricated himself by great personal prowess; but he failed to take the city or inflict on the Hittites such a defeat as would terminate the war. He entered into a treaty of peace and amity, sealed by his marrying the daughter of the Hittite king. The peace which ensued allowed Ramses to devote his attention to building operations, to founding and enriching libraries, and to establishing schools. Especially in the delta did he erect buildings, among which were Pa-Ramses and in part at least Pithom. His mummy is now in the museum at Bulak.

2 THE PHARAOH OF THE EXODUS. He is believed to have been Meneptah II, the thirteenth son of Ramses II. On his accession to the throne he maintained the treaty of peace which his father had entered into with the Hittites. In the fifth year of his reign Lower Egypt was invaded by the Libyans and their allies. The mercenaries of the Egyptian king, rather than himself, ultimately gained a complete victory over their invaders. A hymn was composed to celebrate this success and other victories. The translation is doubtful in minor points, but is essentially as follows:

The chiefs bow down, making their salutations of peace,
Not one of the peoples of the bow [i. e. hostile foreigners] lifts up its head

The land of the Libyans is vanquished,
The land of the Hittites is tranquilized,
Ravaged is the place Pa-Kanana [in Southern Palestine] with all violence,

Carried away is the place Ashkelon,
Overpowered is the place Gezer,
The place Innuam [near Tyre] is brought to naught.

The people Isiraalu are spoiled, they have no seed.

The place Khar [i. e. southern Palestine] has become like the widows of Egypt

All the world is at peace

Every one that was rebellious is subdued by the king Meneptah.

Isiraalu is mentioned in close connection with places in Philistia, Phœnicia, and Palestine. It cannot be rendered Jezreel, for the orthography of the word and the use of the determinative which signifies people are both against it. It alone is without the determinative for land or city. It accordingly is a nomadic tribe or else a people dwelling in a country not their own. Leaving no seed to a spoiled and harried people was a common mode which the Egyptians had of recording the destruction of the crops or supply of grain. The natural meaning of the inscription accordingly is that troops, who were acting under Meneptah and waging war against the peoples of Palestine and vicinity, ravaged the Israelites and destroyed their fields or storehouses of grain. All available evidence indicates that the Israelites had not conquered Canaan and settled in Palestine as Meneptah.

yet. The attempt to identify the Habiri, who were warring in Palestine in the reign of Amenophis IV, six or seven generations before Meneptah, with the Hebrews has not been successful; see EGYPT III. 8. The biblical record and the inscription of Menepthah agree, if the inscription means, as has been inferred by Dr. W. W. Moore, that within two or three years after the exodus Egyptian or Canaanitish subjects of Menepthah attacked the Israelites near Kadesh-barnea. The Hebrews had feared to advance from Kadesh and had begun their dreary life of forty years in the wilderness. Here they pastured their flocks and herds, and doubtless, like Isaac when in the same quarter (Gen. xxvi 12), sowed seed and raised what crops a scantily watered soil permitted. Their grain was destroyed by the enemy; and the event may possibly be referred to in Num. xiv 45; Deut. i. 44-46, for their sojourn at Kadesh had been long enough to permit the young crop to be growing, but not the grain to be ripe. On this interpretation the Pharaoh of the exodus was not drowned in the Red Sea. The biblical record does not necessarily mean that he was. It is not necessary to believe that he did in person everything which is charged to him. What is done in Pharaoh's name and by Pharaoh's servants can be described as done by him: and what his emissaries suffer he can be said to suffer.

3 SHISHAK. Called by the monuments Sheshen and by Manetho Sesonchis, the first ruler of the twenty-second dynasty. According to an inscription found in Abydos, Shishak was the son of an Assyrian conqueror named Nemret. The names of his successors are also more Assyrian than Egyptian in origin. An account of his expedition into Palestine (1 Kin. xiv 25, 26, 2 Chron. xii 2-9), with the usual embellishments and exaggerations, is found on the south wall of the temple at Karnak. In the list given there of cities conquered in that expedition occurs the name Judha-malek, which may possibly mean royal city of Judah. He was probably an able statesman, as he was able to avoid a rupture with Solomon while keeping Solomon's enemy as a guest (1 Kin. xi 40). He shrewdly took advantage of the unsettled state of affairs in Palestine after the division of the kingdom, to make his invasion at that time when resistance to an enemy was necessarily weakened by dissensions at home. He also created a balance of power for himself in Egypt by reelevating to a position of power the priests of Apis at Memphis, rivals of the priests of Thebes. Jeroboam took refuge at his court some time after the twenty-fifth year of Solomon (1 Kin. vi 38; vii 1; ix. 10, 24; xi 27), and the invasion of Judah took place in the fifth year of Rehoboam; accordingly, the longest time required by the biblical data for the reign of Shishak is 21 years, though a shorter time would suffice. This demand is met by the Egyptian monuments, for they mention the thirty-ninth year of his reign.

4. ZERAH the Cushite, who undertook an expedition against Judah in the reign of Asa, leading an army composed of Ethiopians and Libyans, doubtless in addition to the Egyptian troops. His forces were routed at Marashah (2 Chron. xiv. 9-15; xvi. 8). The monuments do not mention this military expedition, as it is their custom to pass over in silence their own defeats. Zerah is commonly identified with Osorkon I or II., successors of Shishak in the twenty-second or Bubastite dynasty. He may have been called Cushite by the biblical writer either because he was crown prince when he led the expedition against Judah, in which case he bore the title Prince of Cush; or because he was by birth an Ethiopian, Osorkon II being the son-in-law, not the son, of the preceding monarch.

5. So, contemporary of Hoshea, king of Israel (2 Kin. xvii 4): see So.

6 TIRHAKAH, third and last king of the twenty-fifth dynasty, which is known also as the Ethiopian dynasty. Both he and his name are Ethiopian (Steindorff). When Sennacherib, king of Assyria, was advancing through Philistia in the direction of Egypt in 701 B. C., he heard that Tirhakah, king of Ethiopia, was coming against him (2 Kin. xix. 9). Sennacherib, in his own account of the affair, without mentioning the personal names of the monarchs, says that the kings of Egypt and the archers, chariots and horses of the king of Ethiopia met him in battle at Eltekeh (Cylinder ii 73-81). Ethiopia and Egypt, which were probably under the general sway of Shabataka, or already under the rule of the young and vigorous Tirhakah as husband of Shabataka's widow and guardian of his young son, were governed by subordinate kings. Esarhaddon conducted several campaigns against Egypt; and in 671 B. C. penetrated into the midst of the country, defeated Tirhakah, whom he calls king of Ethiopia, took Memphis, made Tirhakah's son a captive, and assumed the title of king of Egypt, Pathros, and Ethiopia. Tirhakah found refuge in Ethiopia, and on Esarhaddon's death, in 669 or 668 B. C., returned to Egypt. Ashurbanipal sent an army against him, styling him king of Egypt and Ethiopia, and defeated his troops at Karbanit, near the mouth of the Canopic branch of the Nile. Tirhakah retired to Thebes. He still had the support of several minor kings of Egypt, among whom was Necho. Ashurbanipal afterwards pursued him thither and took Thebes. The Assyrian king presently records the death of Tirhakah. This event occurred about 664 B. C. The Egyptian records attest the fact that he reigned at least 26 years, so that his possession of the royal title can be traced back as far as 690 B. C. at least.

7. NECHO, son of Psammetick I. He was the second ruler of the twenty-sixth dynasty and reigned 16 years, from 610 to 594 B. C. He attempted to complete a canal connecting the Red Sea with the Nile, and sent a successful expedition to circumnavigate Africa (Herod. ii. 158; iv. 42). He slew king Josiah at Megiddo as the latter unwisely opposed his march toward Assyria. Herodotus says that Necho defeated the Syrians at Magdolos (Megiddo), and afterwards took Cadytus, one of the large cities of Syria (ii. 159). This has been identified with Gaza, but better with Kadesh, the Hittite city on the Orontes. On Josiah's death, the people set up his son Jehoahaz, but Pharaoh dethroned and carried him off to Egypt, setting up in his stead his elder brother, Jehoiakim (2 Kin. xxiii. 30-34). Necho seems to have left his army at Carchemish while he returned to Egypt. In 605 B. C. he returned to his army, the object being an attack on the decaying Assyrian empire. Unfortunately he came too late and found himself opposed by Nebuchadnezzar, the Babylonian conqueror of Assyria, was utterly routed by him, and lost all of Egypt's Asiatic possessions (2 Kin. xxiv. 7).

8. PHARAOH-HOPHRA, the Uah-ab-ra of the Egyptian monuments, the Ouaphris of Manetho, and the Apries of Herodotus. He was the second successor of Necho, separated from him by the short reign of Psammetick II. He reigned 19 years, from 589 to 570 B. C. He was on the throne while Jeremiah and his fellow-fugitives from Palestine still lived. The prophet intimated that Pharaoh-hophra should be given into the hands of his enemies, as Zedekiah, the last king of Judah, had been (Jer. xlv. 30). He was a warrior, and appears to have conquered the combined fleets of Cyprus and Sidon in a sea fight. He failed at last in an attack on the Greek colony of Cyrene. His army, in consequence, revolted; he was captured, confined, and ultimately put to death.

Phar'i-sees [probably, separated].

One of the three chief Jewish sects, the others being the Sadducees and the Essenes. It was the strictest sect (Acts xxvi. 5). In all probability the Pharisees originated in the period before the Maccabean war, in a reaction against the hellenizing spirit which appeared among the Jews and manifested itself in the readiness of a part of the people to adopt Grecian customs. Those who regarded these practices with abhorrence and their spread with alarm were incited to strict and open conformity to the Mosaic law. They were drawn yet more closely together as a party by the fierce persecution which Antiochus Epiphanes, 175-164 B. C., set on foot against the faithful Israelites who would not abandon Judaism and accept the Greek faith, when he attempted to destroy the holy Scriptures, and commanded that whosoever was found with any book of the covenant or consented to the law, should be put to death (1 Mac. i. 56, 57). The Hasidæans, who were mighty men of Israel, even all such as were voluntarily devoted unto the law (ii. 42; cp. i. 62, 63), participated in the Maccabean revolt as a distinct party. They were probably the Pharisees, they certainly corresponded to that sect. When the war ceased to be a struggle for religious liberty, and became a contest for political supremacy, they ceased to take an active interest in it. They are not mentioned during the time that Jonathan and Simon were the Jewish leaders, 160-135 B. C. The Pharisees appear under their own name in the time of John Hyrcanus, 135-105 B. C. He was a disciple of theirs, but left them and joined the Sadducees (Antiq. xiii. 10, 5 and 6); and his son and successor, Alexander Jannæus, endeavored to exterminate them by the sword. But his wife, Alexandra, who succeeded him in 78 B. C., recognizing that physical force is powerless against religious conviction, favored the Pharisees (15, 5; 16, 1). Thenceforth their influence was paramount in the religious life of the Jewish people.

The Pharisees held the doctrine of free-will of man. They believed in the immortality of the soul, in the resurrection of the body, and in the existence of spirits, that men are rewarded or punished in the future life, according as they have lived virtuously or viciously in this life; that the souls of the wicked shall be detained forever in prison under the earth, while those of the virtuous rise and live again, removing into other bodies (Acts xxiii. 8; Antiq. xviii. 1, 3; War ii. 8, 14). These doctrines distinguished them from the Sadducees, but did not constitute the essence of Pharisaism. Pharisaism is the final and necessary result of that conception of religion which makes religion consist in conformity to the law, and promises God's grace only to the doers of the law. Religion becomes external. The disposition of the heart is less vital than the outward act. The interpretation of the law and its application to the details of ordinary life accordingly became a matter of grave consequence, lawyers acquired increased importance, and expositions of the law by recognized authorities grew to a body of precepts of binding force. Josephus, who was himself a Pharisee, describes them as not merely accepting the law of Moses, and interpreting it more skillfully than others, but adds that they had delivered to the people a great many observances by succession from the fathers which are not written in the law of Moses (Antiq. xiii. 10, 6), these being the traditional interpretations of the elders, which our Lord pronounced to be of no binding authority (Mat. xv. 2, 3, 6).

At first, when one incurred great danger in joining the party, the Pharisees were men of strong religious character. They were the best people in the nation. Subsequently Pharisaism became an inherited belief and the profession of it was popular, and men of character very inferior to that of the original members of the sect joined its ranks. With the lapse of time also the essentially vicious element in the system developed and laid the Pharisees, as commonly represented by the members of the sect, open to scathing rebuke. John the Baptist called them and the Sadducees a generation of vipers; and it is well known how severely our Lord denounced them for their self-righteousness, their hypocrisy, their inattention to the weightier matters of the law, while being very particular as to minute points, with other faults (Mat. v 20; xvi. 6, 11, 12; xxiii 1-39). They became an intriguing body of men (Antiq xvii. 2, 4). They took a prominent part in plotting the death of Christ (Mark iii. 6; John xi. 47-57). Yet they always numbered in their ranks men of perfect sincerity and the highest character. Paul in his early life was a Pharisee, and was accustomed to bring forward the fact when he was reasoning with his countrymen (Acts xxiii 6; xxvi. 5-7, Phil. iii 5). His teacher, Gamaliel, was of the same sect (Acts v 34).

Pha'rosh. See PAROSH.

Phar'par [swift].

Presumably the less important of the two rivers of Damascus, for Naaman mentions it only second (2 Kin. v. 12). According to the local tradition, which can be traced back to the middle of the sixteenth century, the Pharpar is the Taura, one of seven canals which are drawn off from the Barada as it nears Damascus. It is more common, however, outside of Damascus, to identify the Pharpar with the A'waj, the only independent stream except the Barada within the territory of Damascus, but distant a ride of three hours from the city. It is formed by the confluence of several streams which take their rise in mount Hermon. It pursues a tortuous course through the plain to the south of the city and finally enters the most southerly of three inland lakes. In dry weather its waters are sometimes absorbed before they even enter the lake.

Pha-se'lis.

A city of Lycia, on the gulf of Pamphylia, with three excellent harbors. It enjoyed considerable commerce in early times (Herod. ii. 178). It was independent (1 Mac xv 23) until the war of 78-75 B. C., when the Romans destroyed it because it had become a center of organized piracy. It was rebuilt, but did not rise to importance again. Its ruins exist near Tekrova.

The captain of the army of Abimelech, king of Gerar; present when treaty was made between Abimelech and Abraham, and between Abimelech or his successor with like title and Isaac (Gen. xxi. 22; xxvi. 26). There is no need to assume that he was older than Isaac.

Phil-a-del'phia [brotherly love].

1. A city of Lydia, in Asia Minor, about 27 miles southeast of Sardis, in the plain of the Hermus. It was built by Attalus Philadelphus, on a part of mount Tmolus. In A. D. 17 it was destroyed by an earthquake, but was soon rebuilt. It was the seat of one of the seven churches of Asia addressed in the book of Revelation (i. 11; iii 7-13). Unlike most of the seven, it receives commendation and encouragement, unmixed with censure. It is now called Allah Shehr, and continues to be inhabited. The walls of the ancient city, which are still standing, enclose several hills, with the remains of a temple and other buildings.

Modern Philadelphia

2. A later name of Rabbah of the Ammonites. See RABBAH.

Phi-le'mon [Greek, loving or affectionate (cp. philēma, a kiss)].

A convert of the apostle Paul's (Philem. 19), who resided in the same city with Archippus and from which Onesimus had come, viz. Colossæ (cp. Philem. 2 with Col. iv. 17; and Philem. 10 with Col. iv. 9). There was a church in his house (Philem. 2). Paul calls him a fellow-laborer (1) and speaks of his kindness to the saints (5-7). As Paul had never been in Colossæ (cp. Col. ii. 1), we may suppose that Philemon was converted in Ephesus during the apostle's ministry there (cp. Acts xix. 10). It is not improbable that Archippus was Philemon's son and Apphia his wife (Philem. 2).

The Epistle of Paul to Philemon is the brief letter sent by Paul, in conjunction with Timothy, to Philemon. The latter's slave, Onesimus, had run away, perhaps taking with him some of Philemon's money (18, 19); and, having made his way to Rome, had there been converted through the instrumentality of the apostle (10). Paul would gladly have retained him as a free attendant, but did not feel at liberty to do so without Philemon's consent (13, 14). He doubtless felt too that Onesimus, as a Christian, ought to seek the forgiveness of his master; and he was equally anxious that Philemon should both forgive and receive the converted wrongdoer. So he sent Onesimus back to Philemon, urging the latter to receive him as a brother beloved (16), telling of the love he himself bore toward the convert (10, 12), and offering to repay Philemon for whatever loss Onesimus had caused him (18, 19). The letter is an exquisite production. It reveals the delicacy of Paul's feeling and the graciousness of his relations with his friends. It also illustrates the effect of Christianity on social relationships generally, the spirit of love and justice which were destined to reorganize society. When Onesimus carried this letter to Philemon, he accompanied Tychicus, who also bore the Epistle to the Colossians (Col. iv. 7-9) and that to the Ephesians (Eph. vi. 21, 22). All three epistles were written at the same time, probably A. D. 61 or 62, and from Rome. The genuineness of the Epistle to Philemon, though it is so brief a letter, is well attested, being contained in the Syriac and Old Latin versions, named in the Muratorian fragment, accepted by Marcion, quoted by Origen and expressly as Paul's, and included by Eusebius among the undisputed books. It thus strongly supports the genuineness of the other epistles with which it is associated.

G. T. P. (supplemented).

Phi-le'tus [worthy of love].

One who joined with Hymenæus in propagating the error that the resurrection is already past (2 Tim. ii. 17, 18).

Phil'ip [fond of horses].

1. Father of Alexander the Great (1 Mac. i. 1). He was a son of Amyntas II. of Macedon. He took charge of the government about 360 B. C., as guardian of the royal infant, and by skillful negotiations and successful war delivered the country from the danger which beset it by reason of the hostility of the Pæonians, Illyrians, and Athenians. He then ascended the throne, perhaps by usurpation. He captured Amphipolis and annexed it to his dominions in 358, and crossing the river Strymon, he took possession of Thracian territory and founded Philippi in 356. These achievements marked only the beginning of his unchecked career of conquest in Greece, by which he raised Macedonia from an obscure state to be the dominant power in Grecian affairs. He was assassinated in 336 B. C., and was succeeded by Alexander.

2. Another king of Macedon, and third of the name. He entered into an alliance with Hannibal against the Romans in 215 B. C., but they held him in check with the cooperation of the Ætolians. After seven years he was glad to make a separate peace. In 200 B. C. the Romans invaded his kingdom. He successfully resisted them for two years, but in 197 he was completely defeated (1 Mac. viii. 5) by the Roman general Flaminius at Cynocephalæ in Thessaly, and forced to conclude a humiliating peace. He died in 179 B. C.

3. Foster brother of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Mac. ix. 29), and one of his privileged friends (1 Mac. vi. 14). When Antiochus was in Persia, nigh unto death, he appointed Philip regent during the minority of the young Antiochus (15). Lysias, however, who was in Syria, usurped the position (17). Philip returned in haste, and obtained temporary possession of Antioch, the capital (55, 63). But Lysias succeeded in capturing the city. According to Josephus, Philip was executed (Antiq. xii. 9, 7), but perhaps he escaped and fled to Egypt before the city fell (2 Mac. ix. 29).

It has been conjectured, on insufficient grounds, that he is identical with Philip, the Phrygian who was made governor of Judæa by Antiochus (2 Mac. v. 22), and that he was the master of the elephants at the battle of Magnesia (Livy xxxvii. 41).

4. A son of Herod the Great, and the first husband of Herodias and brother or half-brother of Herod Antipas (Mat. xiv. 3; Luke iii. 19). He is not called the tetrarch, and there is reason to believe that he was a different person from Philip the tetrarch, half-brother of Herod Antipas. In giving the genealogy of a portion of Herod the Great's family, Josephus states that Herodias married Herod, son of Herod the Great by Mariamne, daughter of the high priest Simon; that she left him to live with Antipas his half-brother; and that her daughter Salome married Philip the tetrarch, son of Herod the Great by Cleopatra of Jerusalem, and after Philip's death took another husband (Antiq. xviii. 5, 4). Thus, according to Josephus, the first husband of Herodias was a different person from Philip the tetrarch. The writers of the N. T. agree with Josephus in that they make Herodias' first husband a brother of Herod Antipas the tetrarch, and do not identify him with Philip the tetrarch, whom they also know (Luke iii. 1). They differ as to his name. It is commonly believed that both authorities are right, and accordingly the first husband of Herodias is often designated Herod Philip. For among the children of Herod the Great two sons, born of different mothers, were named after Herod's father Antipas or Antipater. Three of his sons, born of three different mothers, were called Herod; one of whom, however, had a second name Antipas, and was spoken of indifferently either as Herod or Antipas (Antiq. xvii. 1, 3; xviii. 5, 1; 6, 2). One of the sons whom his wife Cleopatra of Jerusalem bore was called Philip; and it is probable that Mariamne's son, who is called Herod by Josephus, had the name of Philip also. Herod Philip, after the execution of his half-brothers Alexander and Aristobulus, was next in order of birth to Antipater, Herod the Great's firstborn, and for a time he was recognized as next in succession to the throne (Antiq. xvii. 3, 2); but he was passed over in Herod's later wills.

5. Philip the Tetrarch. One of the two sons of Herod the Great and Cleopatra of Jerusalem. He was brought up at Rome with his half-brothers Archelaus and Antipas (Antiq. xvii. 1, 3; War i. 28, 4). In A. D. 4 he advocated the claims of Archelaus to succeed their common father, and was himself appointed by the emperor Augustus to be over Batanea, Trachonitis, Auranitis, and certain parts of Zeno's house about Jamnia (War ii. 6, 1-3, cp. Antiq. xvii. 11, 4). He was still tetrarch of the region of Ituræa and Trachonitis in the fifteenth year of Tiberius Cæsar when John the Baptist began his public life (Luke iii. 1). He married Salome, the daughter of Herod, Mariamne's son, and Herodias (Antiq. xviii. 5, 4). He enlarged the town of Paneas, at the source of the Jordan, and named it Cæsarea. It was afterwards often spoken of as Cæsarea Philippi (Mat. xvi. 13), to distinguish it from Cæsarea on the sea. He also raised the village of Bethsaida to the dignity of a city and called it Julius, in honor of Julia, daughter of Augustus and wife of Tiberius (Antiq. xviii. 2, 1, War ii. 9, 1). He reigned thirty-seven years, from 4 B. C. to A. D. 33, dying in the twentieth year of Tiberius Cæsar. His character was excellent, and his rule was mild and just (Antiq. xviii. 4, 6). His dominions were annexed to the province of Syria, but in A. D. 37 were assigned to Herod Agrippa I. Coins of his have been found inscribed with his title, Tetrarchos.

6. Philip the Apostle. One of the twelve apostles (Mat. x. 3). His home was in Bethsaida, on the sea of Galilee, and he was a fellow-townsmen of Andrew and Peter. Jesus met him at Bethany beyond the Jordan, where John was baptizing, won his faith, and called him to be a disciple. He found Nathanael and brought him to Jesus, in the conviction that an interview with the Master would convince Nathanael that Jesus was the Messiah. His confidence was justified (John i. 43-48). A year later Jesus chose him to be an apostle. When our Lord was about to perform the miracle of feeding the five thousand, he first proved Philip, and awoke a conception of the magnitude of the miracle by asking Philip: "Whence are we to buy bread, that these may eat?" (John vi. 5, 6). On the day of the triumphal entry into Jerusalem, certain Greeks desired to see Jesus, and applied to Philip, who put them in communication with Jesus (xii. 20-23). In making the acquaintance of Christ, the disciples had been making acquaintance with the Father; but when Christ spoke to them about their having known and seen the Father, Philip appeared not to understand and said: "Show us the Father, and it sufficeth us" (xiv. 8-12). He is named after the resurrection as one of the apostles who met in the upper chamber (Acts i. 13). This is the last authentic notice we have of him ecclesiastical traditions regarding his future life being confused and contradictory.

7. Philip the Evangelist. He was one of the seven men of good report, full of the Spirit and of wisdom, chosen to be deacons to look after the interests of the Greek-speaking widows and probably the poor generally in the church at Jerusalem, and is mentioned next in order to the martyr Stephen (Acts vi. 5). Persecution followed the death of Stephen, and the Christians were scattered abroad. Philip became an evangelist. He visited Samaria, preached the gospel, wrought miracles, and made many converts (viii. 4-8; xxi. 8). Among them was Simon the sorcerer, popularly known as Simon Magus (viii. 9-25). Afterwards, by direction of an angel, Philip went along the road from Jerusalem to Gaza, on which, after a time, he met, preached to, and baptized the Ethiopian eunuch (26-39). He afterwards visited Azotus (Ashdod), and then went on preaching till he reached Cæsarea (40). He was still in that city years afterwards when Paul passed through it on his last journey to Jerusalem; and the fact is noted that Philip had four virgin daughters who had the gift of prophecy (xxi. 8, 9).

Phi-lip'pi [pertaining to Philip].

A Macedonian city, called originally Krenides or place of small fountains. It was within the limits of ancient Thrace, but in 356 B. C. Philip II. of Macedon annexed the country as far as the river Nestus and thus took in the town, which he enlarged and strengthened and called after his own name. In its vicinity were rich gold and silver mines, the produce of which greatly aided Philip in carrying out his ambitious projects. In 168 B. C. the Roman consul Paulus Æmilius inflicted a decisive and very sanguinary defeat on Perseus, the last of the Macedonian kings; and Philippi, with the rest of the territory, fell into the hands of the victors. In 42 B. C. two decisive battles took place in the neighborhood between Brutus and Cassius, two of Cæsar's leading assassins, and Octavian and Antony, his chief avengers. After Octavian had become Augustus Cæsar he took an interest in the place where he had gained the victory, and sent a Roman colony to Philippi. Not merely does Luke mention that it was a colony (Acts xvi. 12), but coins exist with the inscription, Colonia Augusta, Jul. Philippensis. It was the first city of the district; not the capital, which was Amphipolis, but either the place of first importance or the first city reached by a traveler from the sea, Neapolis belonging to Thrace and not being attached to the Roman province of Macedonia until the time of Vespasian. About A. D. 52 Paul visited the city, making various converts, of whom the chief were Lydia of Thyatira, the damsel possessed with the spirit of divination, and the Philippian jailer (Acts xvi 12-40). The second of these successes had brought on persecution and imprisonment of the evangelists or they would not have had access to the jailer to do him spiritual good (1 Thess. ii. 2). Paul had to leave the place abruptly on this occasion, but he visited it again at a future period, sailing thence to Syria (Acts xx 6). Philippi lies inland about 10 miles northwest of its seaport Neapolis, the two being separated by a mountain range, the pass over which is about 1600 feet above the sea level. At first Philippi was confined to a small hill rising from the midst of a plain; in the Roman period it extended to the plain. The riverside was the bank of the Gangites, now called Angista, along the shore of which the walls of the Roman city ran. The ruins, consisting of a theater, columns, etc., are extensive, the most interesting being a gateway, supposed to be that by which the apostle went out to the riverside. No one now lives on the spot, but there is a Turkish village, named Bereketi, in the immediate vicinity.

Phi-lip'pi-ans.

The natives or inhabitants of Philippi (Phil iv. 15).

The Epistle of Paul to the Philippians is the sixth of the epistles as they are arranged in our N. T. It was written by Paul, associating also Timothy with him, to all the saints in Christ Jesus which are at Philippi, with the bishops and deacons (i. 1); a Christian community of which Paul himself had gathered the nucleus, and the first one of the churches which he had founded in Europe. When Paul wrote the epistle, he was a prisoner (i. 7, 13, 14, 16). But where, in Caesarea or in Rome? He was apparently in the custody of the praetorian guard (i. 13, R. V.), and he sends salutations from the saints that are of Caesar's household (iv. 22). Many about him were actively engaged in propagating Christianity (i. 14-18). These references, as well as the whole tone of the letter, make it clear that the epistle was written from Rome during the apostle's first Roman imprisonment; see PAUL. It is also most probably to be dated toward the close of that period, in A. D. 62 or 63. This follows from several facts. 1. He had been for some time in Rome (i. 12). 2. He was expecting his release (i. 25; ii. 23, 24). 3. The Philippians had sent him a gift (iv. 10) by the hands of Epaphroditus (ii 25); Epaphroditus, however, had been taken sick in Rome, the Philippians had heard of it, and Epaphroditus had learned of their sorrow over his illness (ii. 26). A considerable time, therefore, had elapsed since Paul had reached the capital.

The epistle was written primarily to acknowledge the gift which the Philippians had sent to Paul. Contrary to his custom, he had more than once received such gifts from them (iv. 15). But the apostle also seized the opportunity to tell them about himself and to warn them against error. It is the letter of a pastor to his flock. It was not called forth, like many of his epistles, by any crisis in the church. It abounds in spiritual advice for the Christian life. At the same time it is valuable for the light it throws on Paul's situation in Rome. It was sent by the hand of Epaphroditus (ii. 25, 30) who, having recovered from his illness, was about to return to Philippi. It may be divided into the following sections: 1. Introduction (i. 1, 2). 2. Gratitude for their fidelity; expression of his love for them; prayer for their sanctification (i. 3-11). 3. Account of how God had used him, though a prisoner, to extend the gospel; of the opposition to him on the part of some, but of his own contentment; of his wish at times to die, but of his devotion to them and confidence that he would be spared to them; and of his earnest desire that they might stand firm (i. 12-30). 4. Appeal to them for spiritual unity, through self-forgetfulness and love, after the example of Christ, that they may perfect the work of service which he had ever set before them (ii. 1-18). 5. Promise to send to them Timothy and, if possible, to go himself shortly; meanwhile he will send Epaphroditus (ii. 19-30). 6. Exhortation to joyfully pursue the Christian life, based on his own joy in self-surrender to Christ and in the eager pursuit of the reward which Christ offers; to which he adds a warning against those who misuse the freedom of the gospel that they may indulge their fleshly appetites (iii). 7. Concluding exhortations to individuals and to all, the keynotes of which are joy, contentment, holiness (iv. 1-9). 8. Final acknowledgment of the gift they had sent him and of his joy in their love, with a few parting salutations (10-23). G. T. P. (edited).

The unity of the epistle has been questioned. Polycarp, who was a disciple of the apostle John, in a letter to the Philippians, written between A. D. 110 and 115, casually alludes to Paul as having written letters to them (Polycarp iii. 2, "who also wrote you letters"); and accordingly the attempt has been made to establish the existence of two letters joined together in the epistle as it now exists, united for example at iii 1, the second and earlier letter consisting of iii. 2-17 23. The genuineness of each of the two hypothetical letters is, of course, a part of the theory. The words of Polycarp are, however, misunderstood; for he apparently knew the epistle in its present form only, and the plural letters was a common usage instead of the less vivid singular. Moreover, the efforts that have been made to partition the epistle, either at iii. 1 or elsewhere, have not been regarded as successful by the jury of scholars. The epistle as it stands yields a satisfactory analysis. Abrupt transitions from personal to general matters, or the introduction of a new thought when the writer seemed about to close, as at the beginning of chapter iii, are common in letters of personal correspondence, such as this epistle is (cp. EPISTLE).

Phi-lis'-ti-a [land of foreigners or immigrants].

A word occurring in Scripture in poetical passages of the O T (Ps lx. 8; lxxxvii 4; and R V of Is xiv 29), and meaning the land of the Philistines. It was in the southwestern portion of Canaan, and was bounded on the north by the plain of Sharon, on the south by the desert of Shur, on the east by the lowland of Judah, and on the west by the Mediterranean. Excluding narrow strips of territory beyond its proper limits, its length may be estimated at 50 miles, and its breadth at 15. The greater portion of it consists of a low plain, unhealthy in autumn, but very fertile, bearing heavy crops of grain, as well as oranges, figs, olives, and other fruits. The coast line has a row of sand dunes, continually encroaching on the cultivated districts. Of its five cities, all important in ancient times, Gaza alone is still a large place. Ekron and Ashdod are villages; Ashkelon lies in ruins by the sea; Gath is so much forgotten that its name has disappeared, and its site is not quite certain.

Phi-lis'-tines.

A tribe or nation which is first mentioned in Gen x. 14, and tabulated as descended from Mizraim, in other words, as belonging to Egypt. They went forth from the Casluhim, and were a remnant of the isle or sea-coast of Caphtor (Jer. xlvii 4; Amos ix. 7); see CAPHTOR. The country near Gaza was inhabited first by the Avvim, but settlers from Caphtor destroyed these aborigines and dwelt in their room (Deut. ii. 23). Philistines were in the region about Gerar and Beer-sheba as early as the time of Abraham (Gen xx. 1, 2; xxi. 32, 34; xxvi 1). When the Israelites left Egypt, their shortest way to Canaan would have been through the Philistine country, but the emancipated slaves were not sufficiently heroic to fight their way through the land of so warlike a tribe, and they were directed to go by another route (Ex. xiii. 17, 18). No steps were taken by Joshua to conquer the Philistines, who already were in possession of the five fortified cities with which their names are associated, Gaza, Ashdod, Ashkelon, Gath, and Ekron, each under a lord (Josh. xiii. 2, 3; Judg. iii. 3). The judge Shamgar slew 600 of them with an oxgoad (31). Not long after this Israel, on account of its idolatries, was sold into the hands of the Philistines (x 6, 7). They were delivered (11), but sinning again, came under the same domination for forty years. From this they were delivered by Samson, but the Philistines ultimately proved his ruin (xiv.-xvi.). Early in Samuel's public life they defeated the Israelites, slaying, among others, Hophni and Phinehas, Eli's sons. They also captured the ark of God and kept it seven months; but as it brought calamities with it, they sent it back to the Israelite country (1 Sam. iv.-vi.). Twenty years later Samuel defeated the Philistines in battle at the same place, which he called Ebenezer, the stone of help, because Jehovah had helped him there (vii 3-12). It was an overwhelming defeat. The Philistines were permanently humbled, and came no more within the border of Israel. Their army often crossed that border, and intrenched itself in strong positions, and a Philistine invasion was a constant menace. But the Israelites had recovered their border from Ekron to Gath, regaining possession of the Shephelah or lowland, and the Philistines did not again dispossess them (vii. 13, 14). The power of the Philistines was never more formidable than during the reign of Saul (x 5; xii. 9). He and his son Jonathan smote them at Geba, at Michmash, and elsewhere (xiii 1-23, xiv 47, 52; xxiii. 27, 28, xxiv 1). But they soon appeared again, and Goliath, whom David slew, was a Philistine champion who stood out from their army, then in battle array within the territory of Judah (xvii 1-58, xviii. 6; xix. 5; xxi 9, xxii. 10). Soon after this, David more than once encountered the Philistines (xviii. 17-21, 25, 27, 30, xix. 8; xxiii. 1-5); but, at last, fearful of falling a victim to Saul's malice, he twice over took refuge in the Philistine country (xxi 10-15; xxvii.-xxix.; Ps lvi title). On the second occasion he obtained as a feudatory possession the town of Ziklag, which had hitherto been under Philistine authority (1 Sam. xxvii 6). A glance at the map will show that the Philistines had penetrated to the very heart of Canaan when they defeated the Israelites, slaying Saul and his sons, at the battle of Gilboa (xxviii. 4; xxix 11; xxxi. 1-13; 1 Chron. x 1-14). David was more successful than his predecessor in repelling the invasions of the Philistines, with whom he had several battles (2 Sam. iii. 18; v. 17-25; viii. 1, 12; xix. 9; xxi. 15-22; xxii. 9-17; 1 Chron. xi. 12-19; xiv. 8-17; xvii. 1, 11; xx.

4, 5). After his death the Philistines are less frequently mentioned, as if their power was waning. Under Nadab, the son of Jeroboam I, and some other short-lived kings, the Israelites besieged Gibbethon, a Philistine city (1 Kin. xv. 27; xvi. 15). The Philistines sent presents to Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii. 11); but they invaded Judah in the reign of his successor, Jehoram (xxi. 16), and also in that of Ahaz (xxviii. 18). Uzziah and Hezekiah successfully invaded Philistia (2 Kin. xviii. 8; 2 Chron. xxvi. 6, 7). Judgment against them is frequently threatened by the prophets (Is. xi. 14; Jer. xxv. 20; xlvii. 1-7; Ezek xxv 15-17; Amos i. 6-8; Obad. 19; Zeph ii 4, 5; Zech. ix. 5-7). Many Philistines accompanied Gorgias, the Syrian general of Antiochus Epiphanes, in his invasion of Judah (1 Mac. ii. 41). Judas Maccabæus afterwards captured Azotus (Ashdod) and other Philistine cities (v. 68). Jonathan Maccabæus burnt Azotus, with the temple of Dagon, and the city of Ashkelon (x 83-89). He also burnt the suburbs of Gaza, but took no further hostile measures, as the city itself was surrendered on his demand (xi. 60, 61). The Philistines are not mentioned by name in the N T, and seem ultimately to have merged in the Jewish nation.

The Mediterranean is once called the sea of the Philistines (Ex. xxiii. 31).

Phi-Iol'o-gus [fond of words]

A Christian at Rome, apparently the head of a Christian household (Rom. xvi. 15).

Phi-los'o-phy [love of wisdom]

The spirit of pure philosophy, which seeks to penetrate to the essence of things in themselves, is foreign to the Eastern mind. The great distinction between Eastern and Western philosophy has been historically that oriental reasoning remained in the sphere of religion and was never divorced from religious axioms, while occidental investigation came to be conducted, even by profoundly religious minds, in a far wider sphere than religion and by the reason unassisted by the postulates of religion. Moral philosophy has characterized the East, metaphysics the West. For the biblical student the contrast between Greek and Hebrew thought, their separate development, their eventual contact, and their mutual influence are important. The Hebrew mind reflected on the view of the world which is presented by revelation. It drew wisdom from the experience of former generations, which was handed down by the ancients, from observation of human life and the results of conduct, and from the study of the adaptations of nature to an end. It thus gained true principles for the government of conduct, it sought to discover to what extent religious truth was approved by the test of human experience, and it wrestled with the paradoxes of the moral government of God, especially with the question of the sufferings of the righteous and the prosperity of the wicked. From these varied sources and manifold investigations the Hebrew wise man was confirmed in the conviction that the fear of God is the beginning of wisdom. Hebrew philosophy, or wisdom as the Bible calls it, received a great impulse through the interest of Solomon, who both gathered the maxims of other men, and out of his own shrewd observation and varied experience gave utterance to new proverbs. The proverbs of Solomon largely concern conduct in relation to the individual and to God, such as chastity, temperance in meat and drink, self-control, honesty, suretyship, behavior in the presence of the mighty. From these things Hebrew thought proceeded to view morality in larger relations. From the consideration of apparent exceptions to its conclusions, it advanced to moral questions, and looked upon events not in their immediate personal results, but in the light of their effect upon posterity and of divine retribution in time to come. The Hebrew philosopher further studied nature, and saw that a divine purpose exists everywhere (Ps. civ. 24). Everywhere is the impress of thought. Intelligence is involved in the creation and preservation of the universe (Prov. iii. 19). He found wisdom to be an attribute of God, which is everywhere revealed in nature. It existed before God proceeded to create. He personified wisdom (Prov. i. 20-33; viii. 12), and represented it existing from everlasting, as brought forth before the creation of the world, present with God when he established heaven and earth, ordained to rule in the created universe (viii. 22-31; Job xxviii. 12-27). Wisdom was not itself a person, but it was looked upon as objective to God, as "the reflection of God's plan of the world," as the principle which God ordained for the world. By later writers the thought was developed and wisdom was still further distinguished from God (Wisd. vii. 22-viii. 5; ix. 4, 9); see WISDOM.

Greek philosophy is usually said to begin with Thales about 640 B. C. Three main periods are distinguished. 1. The pre-Socratic schools which arose among the Greek colonies of Asia Minor. The great subject of inquiry was the constitution of the universe. Is there one underlying element; such as moisture, or the subtle and all-pervading air, or one eternal, infinite, immovable, unchangeable Being, or the instantaneous balance of power? 2. The Socratic schools represented by Socrates, Plato, and Aristotle, 469-322 B. C. Athens was the center of philosophic thought, and inquiry was directed to ideas, form (or essence) of things. But it was not a barren metaphysics that was cultivated; a lofty morality was inculcated. Socrates used inductive reasoning by which he sought to discover the permanent element underlying the changing forms of appearances and opinions; and the truth which he thus discovered he attempted to fix by a general definition or statement. Aristotle allowed absolute authority to the reason alone, and accepted nothing which he could not prove by logic. 3. The post-Socratic schools. Philosophy had culminated in Aristotle, and discussion reverted to ethics founded on metaphysics. Epicurus, 342-270 B. C., declared that the character of actions is determined by their result, and that permanent pleasure is the highest good. Zeno the Stoic, about 308 B. C., taught that moral character resides in the act itself, independent of the result; and inculcated the obligation of absolute obedience to the commands of duty. The Skeptics taught that certainty is not attainable in human knowledge; and early members of the school held that when we are convinced that we can know nothing, we cease to care, and in this way attain happiness.

Alexander the Great died in 323 B. C., and Aristotle in 322. Thus when Greek philosophy had reached its climax, Greek culture began to be introduced into Palestine and among the Jews of the dispersion. Epicureanism and Stoicism were developed in Greece during the period of the first close contact of Greek and Hebrew, but they exercised little influence on Hebrew thought compared with the power exerted by Plato and Aristotle. The influence of the Socratic schools was seen in the Sadducees perhaps, who seem like Aristotle to have rejected everything which unaided reason did not teach, although they professed to be governed by a different principle. The influence of the Socratic schools was seen in the Alexandrian school of Jewish thinkers, whose prominent representative was Philo, a contemporary of Christ. They held to the teaching of Moses; but at the same time they took what they approved of in Greek philosophy, learning especially from divine Plato, and endeavored to show that it was already taught in the O. T. They combined the doctrines of the Greek sage and of Moses into a new system, and removed inconsistencies by arbitrarily allegorizing Scripture, even down to its geography. The influence of the Greek philosophy was seen in the improved methods and enlarged scope of debate. Paul advances a formal philosophic argument in his address in the midst of the Areopagus and in the beginning of his Epistle to the Romans (Acts xvii. 30; Rom. i. 19, 20). The influence of Greek philosophy was seen further in borrowed ideas, such as the preexistence of the soul (Wisdom viii. 19, 20); in new words and new content of words, as in the use of the word form in the Aristotelian sense of essence or sum total of attributes (Phil. ii. 6); and in nice discrimination of thought and precision of definition. Gnostic speculations later came from the East; and the attempt to combine Gnosticism with Christianity led Paul to combat it by presenting the true relation of Christ to God and the world in the Epistle to the Colossians Phin'e-has, in A. V. of 1 Mac. Phinees [perhaps Egyptian, pa-nehst, the negro (Petrie)]. A Hebrew etymology is not apparent.

1. Son of Eleazar, and grandson of Aaron (Ex. vi. 25). He ran a spear through an Israelite and a Midianite woman who had come into the camp at Shittim together, this summary punishment terminating a plague which was then raging as a judgment against the idolatries and impurities into which the Midianitish women were leading the Hebrews. An everlasting priesthood was therefore promised to him and his descendants (Num. xxv. 1-18; Ps. cvi. 30; 1 Mac. ii. 54). With a short interruption when the house of Eli, of the lineage of Ithamar, officiated as high priests, Phinehas and his sons held the office until sacrifice ceased with the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple by the Romans in A. D. 70. Phinehas went as priest with the army on the punitive expedition against the Midianites (Num. xxxi. 6), and was sent with ten princes to remonstrate with the tribes east of the Jordan on their erection of an altar, erroneously supposed to be for schismatic worship (Josh. xxii. 13). He received as his share of the promised land a hill in mount Ephraim (xxiv. 33). Through him the Israelites inquired of the Lord whether they should attack the Benjamites for condoning the sin of the inhabitants of Gibeah (Judg. xx. 28).

2. The younger of Eli's two degenerate sons. He was killed in the battle with the Philistines in which the ark of God was taken, and when the news of the catastrophe arrived, they so affected the feelings of his wife that the pains of premature childbirth came upon her, and she died (1 Sam. i. 3; ii. 34; iv. 11, 19-22).

3. Father of a certain Eleazar (Ezra viii. 33), evidently a priest.

Phle'gon [burning, scorching].

A Christian at Rome to whom Paul sent his salutation (Rom. xvi. 14).

Phoe'be, in A. V. Phebe [pure, bright, radiant].

A servant or deaconess of the church at Cenchreae, the eastern port of Corinth. On her removing to Rome, Paul cordially commended her to the Christians there; for she had been a helper or patron of many, a term which may imply that she made it a duty to stand by foreigners in their civic helplessness (Rom. xvi. 1, 2). See DEACONESS.

Phoe-ni'ci-a, in A. V. once Phenicia (Acts xxi. 2), and twice Phenice (xi. 19; xv. 3) [Greek, land of the date palm, or of purple dyeing, or of dark skinned people].

A narrow strip of territory between the Mediterranean Sea on the west and on the east the crest of the Lebanon range and the detached hills running south from it. The northern limit may be regarded as Arvad. Southward, after the settlement of the Hebrews on the coast, Phœnicia practically terminated at the Ladder of Tyre, about 14 miles south of Tyre, although Phœnicians still dwelt in Achzib and Accho (Judg. i. 31). In the time of Christ Phœnicia extended southward as far as Dor, about 16 miles south of Carmel. The distance from Arvad to the Ladder of Tyre is about 125 miles. The chief cities were Tyre and Sidon, of which Sidon was the first to rise to celebrity. Phœnicia was called Canaan by the ancient Hebrews (Is. xxiii. 11), and its inhabitants were reckoned as Canaanites and classed with the Hamitic peoples (Gen. x. 15). This classification makes probable, but does not necessarily imply, that they were of Hamitic blood. According to their own tradition, they had migrated from the Erythrean Sea, by way of Syria, to the coast of Canaan (Herod i. 1; vii. 89). According to Arabian authors, the migration was across the northern Arabian desert. The Phœnicians thus traced their origin to the neighborhood of the Persian Gulf, an early abode of the Hamitic race. In course of time they adopted the Semitic language. The territory which the Phœnicians inhabited had good natural harbors; mount Lebanon afforded them an almost inexhaustible supply of timber, with which ships were constructed, and they became the most skillful navigators known to antiquity. They not merely traded with distant countries accessible by Mediterranean routes, but they colonized spots favorable for commerce some of which afterwards rose into importance. Their most celebrated colony was Carthage, on the African coast, near modern Tunis, which was long a rival of Rome, by which it was at last destroyed. Of the Carthaginian leaders who figured in the Punic wars, some, if not all, had names purely Phœnician, and almost Hebrew. Thus, Hannibal means the grace of Baal, and Hasdrubal a help is Baal. When our Lord visited the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, he was within the Phœnician territory (Mat. xv. 21; Mark vii. 24, 31). Various Christians who were scattered abroad, owing to the persecution which followed the martyrdom of Stephen, found their way to Phœnicia (Acts xi. 19). Paul and Barnabas went through it on their way from Antioch to Jerusalem (xv. 3). Paul, on his last voyage to Jerusalem, sailed in a Phœnician vessel, which brought him to Tyre (xxi. 2, 3). See TYRE, BAAL, JEZEBEL, and HIRAM.

Phœ'nix, in A. V. Phœ-ni'ce [date palm].

A haven in Crete (Acts xxvii. 12), safe throughout the year because the entrance to its harbor opens toward the northeast and southeast (R. V., cp. text and margin). It is now called Lutro, and is the only harbor on the south of Crete which is safe at every season of the year.

Phry'gi-a.

A large and important province of Asia

Minor, which, after its original boundaries were curtailed by the dismemberment from it of Galatia, was bounded on the north by Bithynia; on the south by Lycia, Pisidia, and Isauria; on the east by Lycaonia and Galatia; and on the west by Caria, Lydia, and Mysia. The region is a high table-land between the chain of Taurus on the south, Olympus on the north, and Temnus on the west. Of its towns, four are mentioned in the N. T., Laodicea, Colossæ, Hierapolis, and Antioch of Pisidia, which is reckoned by Strabo to Phrygia. At this period Phrygia had ceased to be a province and was merely a local name. Antiochus the Great settled 2000 Jewish families from Babylonia and Mesopotamia in Lydia and Phrygia (Antiq. xii. 3, 4), and Jews from Phrygia were present at Jerusalem on that day of Pentecost signalized by the descent of the Holy Spirit (Acts ii. 10). Phrygia was traversed by Paul on his second and third missionary journeys (Acts xvi. 6; xviii. 23).

Phut. See PUT.

Phu'vah. See PUVAH.

Phyg'e-lus, in A. V. Phy-gel'us.

A Christian in the province of Asia who, with others, deserted the apostle Paul in the latter part of his life (2 Tim. i. 15).

Phy-lac'te-ry [a safeguard, an amulet].

A prayer band consisting of short extracts from the law of Moses, and worn on the forehead or on the arm (Mat. xxiii. 5). The phylactery eventually assumed the form of a small case, made of parchment or black seal-skin. The one for the forehead contained four compartments, in each of which was placed a strip of parchment inscribed with a passage of Scripture. The four passages were Ex. xiii. 2-10, 11-17; Deut. vi. 4-9; xi. 13-21. It was fastened with straps on the forehead, just above and between the eyes. The other case, which was bound on the left arm, contained but one compartment, in which a strip of parchment was placed bearing the same four quotations from the law. The first three of these were interpreted as enjoining the custom, but are rather to be understood figuratively (see FRONTLET). Phylacteries are worn by every male Jew during the time of morning prayer, except on the Sabbath and festivals, which days are themselves signs and render phylacteries unnecessary (cp. Ex. xiii. 9).

Phy-si'cian. See MEDICINE.

Pi-be'seth [Egyptian, Pa-bast, abode of the goddess Bast].

An Egyptian city (Ezek. xxx. 17), in Greek form written Bubastos or Bubastis (Herod. ii. 59, 137). It is now called Tell Basta, and is on the delta near Zagazig, on the western side of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile. It is about 45 miles northeast by north of modern Cairo, and 30 southwest by south of ancient Zoan. Among the ruins are the remains of a once splendid temple of red granite, dedicated to the goddess of the place.

Piece.

In O. T., when piece refers to money and is not italicized, it denotes a certain amount of precious metal, whether coined or uncoined (Gen. xxxiii 19; 1 Sam. ii. 36). The word piece was chosen by the translators because it is vague, and they did not know the value of the money indicated by the several Hebrew words. Pi'e is also employed by the translators, where the unit of weight or the coin is not expressly mentioned by the Hebrew writer, but where he ordinarily means a shekel (Judg. xvii. 2; 2 Sam. xviii 11, in A V shekel; cp Deut. xxii 19; 1 Kin x. 29, where both versions have shekel). In N. T. also a piece of silver commonly denotes the shekel or its equivalent (Mat. xxvi. 15 with xxvii 9 and Zech. xi 12); but in Luke xv 8 it is a drachma, worth about 16 cents.

Pi'e-ty.

Filial piety, dutifulness in the family (1 Tim. v. 4).

Pi'geon. See DOVE.

Pi-ha-hi'roth [probably, house or place of sedge]

The last station of the Israelites on leaving Egypt, near Baal-zephon and Migdol, and on the sea (Ex. xiv 2, 9; Num. xxxiii 7, 8). The site is disputed. Brugsch regards the name as Hebrew, which then might mean mouth of the caverns; and he identifies it with the Serbonian bog, which the Greeks called Barathra, and at the bottom of which they represented the monster Typhon as lying. But the name is doubtless Egyptian. Keil asserts that it has incontestably been preserved in 'Ajrud, on the Pilgrim road, about 16 miles northwest of Suez. But the two names have only one letter in common. Naville identifies it with Pikerehet, or Pikeheret, near Pithom (q. v.). Not merely is there a similarity of sound, but Pharaoh had a farm there; and the Septuagint, instead of "before Pi-hahroth," inserts "before the farm." The city was an important one, which disputed with Pithom the honor of being the capital of the eighth nome, or district, of Lower Egypt. Its special deity was Osiris. Naville believes that it was the same place as Serapiu, or Serapeum, the only known sanctuary of Osiris in that region. Two roads ran from it: the one to Clusma, 9 miles off the other to Pelusium.

Pi'late [armed with a javelin, or wearing the pilus or felt cap which was worn by a unarméd slave as the emblem of liberty].

Pontius Pilate, fifth Roman procurator in Judæa after the deposition of Archelaus in A. D. 6. See PROCURATOR. Through the influence of Sejanus he was appointed by the emperor Tiberius procurator of Judæa about A. D. 26, in succession to Valerius Gratus.

He arrived in Judæa the same year. He was accompanied by his wife (Mat. xxvii. 19). For a long time it was illegal for a Roman governor who was appointed to a dangerous province to take his wife with him, but since the time of Augustus it was permitted (Tacitus, Ann. iii. 33).

Pilate sent a detachment of troops into Jerusalem by night, carrying with them their ensigns, which had hitherto always been left outside the city. On these ensigns were silver eagles and small images of the emperor, and they gave great offense to the Jews. Deputations went to Cæsarea, the official residence of the procurators, to urge the removal of the ensigns, and Pilate, after in vain attempting to intimidate the petitioners, was obliged at last to comply with their request (Antiq. xviii 3, 1; War. ii. 9, 2 and 3). Some time afterwards, taking the sacred money called Corban, he began to expend it in making an aqueduct to bring water into Jerusalem from the uplands south of the capital. The Jews considered that this was applying to secular uses money which had been dedicated to God; and on Pilate's visiting Jerusalem they beset his tribunal with much clamor and tumult. Having been told beforehand that such an occurrence was likely to happen, he had taken the precaution of mingling his soldiers in disguise among the multitude, armed with sticks, if not with concealed daggers. When the tumult was at its height he gave them a signal to attack the rioters with the sticks, which they did so vigorously that some were killed, and the rest, fleeing in panic, trampled many of their number to death. The riot seems not to have been renewed, and the aqueduct was made; but the affair increased the disfavor with which the people regarded Pilate (Antiq. xviii 3, 2; War. ii. 9, 4). Pilate attempted to dedicate some gilt shields in honor of the emperor Tiberius and place them within Herod's palace at Jerusalem. They were inscribed with the imperial name, but were without the imperial portrait. Still they gave offense. The people appealed to him in vain to forbear. Then the influential men of the city forwarded a petition to the emperor, who ordered Pilate to take the shields back again to Cæsarea (Philo, Legat. ad. Caum. xxxviii.). In narrating this event, Philo, or rather Agrippa I., in a letter which Philo cites, describes Pilate as a man of inflexible disposition, and merciless, as well as obstinate. He also says that he feared they might complain to the emperor about Pilate in respect to his corruption and his acts of violence, and his habit of insulting people, and his cruelty, and his continual execution of people untried and uncondemned, his never-ending and gratuitous and most grievous inhumanity. Pilate was in office when John the Baptist and our Lord began their respective ministries (Luke iii. 1). It was the custom of the procurators to go up to Jerusalem when the immense gatherings took place at the leading Jewish festivals. On these occasions they took up their residence in the palace of Herod. It was probably at one of these that Pilate fell upon the Galileans, and mingled their blood with their sacrifices (Luke xiii. 1, 2). The Galileans were a turbulent class of men, prone to misbehave when they came up to the festivals (Antiq. xvii. 10, 2 and 9). There is no reason to believe that Pilate would have treated them as he did unless they had first broken out into riot. It is probable that Herod Antipas took offense at the summary way in which his subjects were slain by Pilate on this occasion; but whatever may have been the origin of the variance between the two, Herod's ill-will was appeased by Pilate's acknowledgment of the tetrarch's jurisdiction in Galilean affairs (Luke xxiii. 6-12) on the day when our Lord was put to death.

The character of Pilate, which these various incidents of his official career reveal, is seen in his treatment of Jesus also. Pilate was a worldling willing enough to act justly if this could be done consistently with his interests, and to avoid criminal acts provided that this could be done at small cost; but if heavy payment were needed, Pilate was not the man to give it. His secret question to himself was not, What is my duty? but, What is my interest? He acquitted our Lord of evil, was desirous of releasing him, and was aware that justice required that this should be done; but he knew also that it would further increase his unpopularity; so to please the Jewish people, he gave orders to scourge him in whom he had just before declared that he had found no crime. He allowed the Roman soldiers, whom a single word from him would have restrained, to inflict new tortures on the already lacerated body of Jesus, and after many more insults and injuries to the uncomplaining sufferer, finally answered the Jewish clamors for the crucifixion of the Son of God by giving sentence that it should be as they required (Mat xxvii; Luke xxiii.).

Pilate's government ended abruptly. A Samaritan impostor promised his countrymen that, if they would go to the top of mount Gerizim, he would show them where Moses had hidden certain golden vessels of the tabernacle. Moses never was at mount Gerizim; he had not crossed the Jordan; yet a deluded multitude gathered at a village at the foot of the mountain in order to go up. Unfortunately they carried arms. Pilate, therefore, seized all the ways to Gerizim with horsemen and foot soldiers, attacked the mass of the professed treasure-seekers, slew many, and made prisoners of others and sent them to execution. The Samaritans forwarded a complaint against Pilate to his immediate superior, Vitellius, president of Syria. Vitellius appointed a new procurator, and ordered Pilate to proceed to Rome to answer to the emperor for his conduct. Before Pilate arrived Tiberius had died, March 16th, A. D. 37 (Antiq. xviii. 4, 1 and 2). It is reported that Pilate was banished to Vienne, on the Rhone, in the south of France, and ultimately committed suicide.

Various Acta Pilati, Acts of Pilate, are extant, but no two of them agree, and all are considered to be spurious.

Pil'dash.

A son of Nahor and Milcah (Gen. xxii. 22).

Pil'ha, in A. V. Pil'e-ha [a slice, plowing].

One of those who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 24).

PIL.

To take the skin or rind off, to peel (Gen. xxx. 38, R. V. peel).

Pil'lar.

1 A stone erected as a sign of the holiness of a place (Gen. xxviii. 18), as a memorial of some person or event (xxx. 45; Josh. iv. 5-9, 1 Sam. vii. 12; 2 Sam. xviii. 18; and see GARRISON), or as a representative of parties present (Ex. xxiv. 4). Isaiah prophesied that the time is coming when the converts to the true faith in Egypt shall erect an altar and a pillar to the Lord (Is. xix. 19), as Abraham and Jacob did of old in Canaan. The pillar was used by the heathen. The Canaanites erected pillars in connection with the worship of Baal. The Israelites were strictly enjoined, in the oldest legislation, to break them and overthrow the altars (Ex. xxiii. 24, R. V.), and they were forbidden to erect similar pillars beside the altar of the Lord (Deut. xvi. 22). Pillars, however, found favor among the degenerate Israelites of the northern kingdom (Hos. ii. 4; x. 1, 2), and even in Judah (Mic. v. 13, R. V.).

2. A support, much used in ancient architecture for upholding roofs and curtains (Ex. xxvi. 32, Judg. xvi. 26). The earth and the heavens were often spoken of poetically as supported by pillars (1 Sam. ii. 8; Job. ix. 6; xxvi. 11). Strong men and fundamental principles are figuratively called pillars (Gal. ii. 9; 1 Tim. iii. 15).

Pil'low. See BOLSTER.

Pil'tai [characterized by deliverance].

A priest, head of the father's house of Moadiah in the days of the high priest Joia-kim (Neh. xii. 17).

Pine and Pine Tree.

1. The rendering of the Hebrew Tidhar, the name of a tree in Lebanon (Is. xli. 19, lx. 13; R. V. margin, plane). It has not been properly identified.

2. The rendering of 'Es shemen, oil tree (Neh. viii. 15, in R. V. wild olive). See OIL TREE.

Pin'na-cle.

A part of the temple, the edge of which was at a great height above the ground (Mat. iv. 5). Exact identification is impossible. The Greek word pterugion, like pinnacle which is used to translate it, literally means a little wing; and it denotes the fin of a fish, the border of a garment, or the end of the breastplate (Lev. xi. 9; Num. xv. 38; Ex. xxviii. 26, in Septuagint). It may be simply the edge of the roof or court. Lightfoot, influenced by the meaning of the Greek word, suggested the porch which projected on each side of the temple like wings (War v. 5, 4). Others have thought of the royal porch which adjoined the temple and towered 400 cubits above the valley of the Kidron (Antiq. xv. 11, 5; xx. 9, 7). The golden spikes which were erected on the roof of the temple to prevent birds from alighting, have been thought of also as most nearly resembling slender towers or pinnacles in the modern sense; but they were many, and the evangelists speak of the pinnacle as though there were but one (R. V.).

Pi'non.

A chieftain of Edom (Gen xxxvi. 41: 1 Chron. i. 52), probably catalogued by the name of his town (Gen. xxxvi. 40); see PUNON.

Pipe.

1 A wind instrument, called in Hebrew halil, pierced instrument, and in Greek aulos. It existed in a variety of forms. The single pipe or reed was held vertically and blown by a mouthpiece at the end. A different kind was held and blown like a flute. The double pipe consisted of right and left tubes, which were blown at the same time, and played each with the corresponding hand. The holes of a pipe numbered two, three, or four. It was used in orchestra or was played alone (1 Sam. x. 5; 1 Kin. i. 40), and it accompanied merry song, religious praise, and the funeral dirge (Is. v. 12, xxx. 29; Mat. ix. 23; xi. 17). See MUSIC.

2 A wind instrument of ancient origin, called 'uqab (Gen. iv. 21), which was used in merrymaking (Job xxi. 12; xxx. 31), and was deemed worthy of employment in the praise of God (Ps. cl. 4). According to the Targums it was a pipe. The Vulgate and in Ps. cl. the Septuagint explain it as a wind instrument, the organon. The A. V. always translates it organ, doubtless in the sense of mouth organ or set of pipes. The R. V. uniformly renders it pipe.

It is uncertain whether nekeb (Ezek. xxviii. 13) denotes a pierced instrument (E. V. pipe) or a perforated gem.

Pi'ram [like a wild ass, swift].

A Canaanite king of Jarmuth, one of those defeated by Joshua before Gibeon (Josh. x. 3).

Pir'a-thon, in R. V. of 1 Mac. ix. 50 Pharathon [nakedness, prominence]. In A. V. of 1 Mac. the adjective Pharathoni is used.

A town in the mount of the Amalekites, in the Ephraimite territory. Abdon, the judge, and Benaiah, the military official, were Pirathonites (Judg. xii. 13-15; 2 Sam. xxiii. 30; 1 Chron. xxvii. 14). It was fortified by Bacehides (1 Mac. ix. 50; cp. Antiq. xiii. 1, 3). Robinson identified it plausibly with Fer'ata, on a hill about 6 miles west by south of Shechem. Conder suggests Fer'on, 14 miles west by north of Shechem; see OPHRAH.

Pis'gah [a part, piece, division].

That part of the Abarim range of mountains near the northeastern end of the Dead Sea (Deut. xxxiv. 1 with in. 27 and xxxii. 49). The Dead Sea was under its slopes (Deut. iii. 17). Its top looked down upon the desert (Num. xxi. 20). The field of Zophim on its top was visited by Balaam and Balak (xxiii. 14). From its summit, called Nebo, a large part of Canaan west of the Jordan was visible, and from it Moses viewed the promised land (Deut. iii. 27; xxxiv. 1-4); see NEBO. It was on the southern border of the realm of Sihon, king of the Amorites (Josh. xii. 2, 3). As late as the time of Eusebius, the mountainous country adjacent to mount Peor was called Phasgo. But the name is no longer attached to the eastern mountains, but seems to linger in the rocky headland, Ras el-Feshkah, on the opposite side of the sea.

Pi'shon. See EDEN.

Pi-sid'i-a.

A district of Asia Minor, bounded on the north by Phrygia; on the south by Lycia and Pamphylia; on the east by Lycaonia; and on the west by Caria. It formed a part of the Roman province of Galatia. The mountain chain of Taurus runs through it, and its turbulent inhabitants were so brave that they were never entirely subdued either by the Persians or by the Romans. Its chief town was Antioch, visited by Paul (Acts xiii. 14).

Pi'son. See EDEN.

Pis'pah.

An Asherite, son of Jether (1 Chron. vii. 38).

Pit.

A large deep hole in the ground. It may be either natural or artificial (Gen. xiv. 10; xxxvii. 20, 24).

Figuratively it is used for the grave or death (Job xxxiii. 18, 24), and it is employed thrice to render she'ol (Num. xvi. 30, 33; Job xvii. 16); see SHEOL and ABYSS.

Pitch.

1. The rendering of the Hebrew Kopher, covering. The ark of Noah was daubed over with it, to render the junction of wooden planks impervious to water (Gen. vi. 14). It was probably asphalt from Hit, in Babylonia. See BITUMEN.

2. The rendering of the Hebrew Zepeth, liquid. The ark of Moses was covered over with it (Exod. i. 3). The streams in the land of Edom were to become pitch of this character (Is. xxxiv. 9). The last passage suggests that it also was asphalt from some locality. See BITUMEN.

Pitch'er.

A water jar of earthenware (cp Judg. vii. 19), in the East generally having one or two handles. See JAR, and the illustrations, JACOB and Fountain of the Virgin, article JERUSALEM.

Pi'thom [Egyptian pa-tum, abode of Tum (Tum being the setting sun, worshiped by the Egyptians as a god)].

One of the two store cities which the Israelites when in bondage in Egypt built for Pharaoh (Exod. i 11). Excavations, made under the auspices of the Egyptian Exploration Fund, by Edouard Naville at Tell el-Maskhuta, showed this to be the ancient Pithom. It is on the south side of the sweet-water canal which runs from Cairo to Suez through the wady Tumilat. There seems to have been at the spot an ancient shrine dedicated to Tum; but inscriptions dug up indicate that the city and fortifications did not come into existence till the time of Ramses II., the Pharaoh, it is believed, of the oppression. No more ancient monuments than his have been found in the place. To the northeast of the temple of Tum are extensive subterranean buildings. The walls are 9 feet thick, built of crude bricks joined by thin layers of mortar. A most interesting observation was made that some bricks had been manufactured with and some without straw (cp. Exod v. 10-12). The walls inclosed a number of rectangular chambers not communicating with each other, the only access to them being from above. Naville believes that they were storehouses or granaries, into which the Pharaohs gathered the provisions necessary for armies or even for caravans about to cross the desert into Syria. At the time of the Greek dynasty Pithom received the new name of Heroopolis, city of heroes, which the Romans abridged into Ero, as is proved by Latin inscriptions from the locality. Sayce compares Ero with Egyptian ara, a storehouse. It was in the land of Goshen: for the Septuagint substitutes Heroopolis for Goshen in Gen. xli. 28, and the Coptic version, translated from the Septuagint, reads near Pithom, in the land of Ramesses. All around the sacred buildings of Pithom was the civil city of Thuku, believed to be the Succoth of Exod. xii. 37.

Pi'thon.

A descendant of Jonathan (1 Chron. viii. 35; ix. 41).

Plague.

An infliction sent by God as a punishment for sin. In most of the cases mentioned in the Bible the infliction is an epidemic or other disease, but it may be also a judgment of a different character. A disease to be a plague need not be miraculous. The particular disease which God has attached as a penalty for the violation of this or that physical or mental law may be properly called a plague, if the act has moral quality. And even a disease which arises from ignorance of sanitary laws and from a violation of nature in no wise criminal, and which in itself is without moral significance, may become in God's hands an instrument for the punishment of evil doers, God predetermining and arranging for the time and place of its outbreak with this end in view. What is called in English by way of emphasis the plague is a highly malignant form of typhus fever, due to neglect of sanitary precautions, which has frequently originated at Cairo, in Egypt, and spread to Syria, Asia Minor, and the adjacent regions. It is probable that it has been used in times past as a chastening rod.

The first plague mentioned in Scripture was that sent on Pharaoh, Abraham's contemporary, for the protection of Sarah, the patriarch's wife (Gen. xii. 17). The next plagues in point of time were the ten inflicted on Egypt. They were not phenomena with which the Egyptians were previously unacquainted; but in most cases, if not in all, they were distresses common to the country. Yet they were not mere natural phenomena in aggravated form; they exhibited unmistakably miraculous features; see EGYPT III 6. The first consisted in the change of the river water into blood or something like it (Ex vii 14-25); the second, in the vast multiplication of frogs (viii 1-15); the third, in lice, sand flies, or fleas, produced from the dust (16-19); the fourth, in swarms of flies (20-32); the fifth, in murrain on the cattle (ix. 1-7); the sixth, in boils and blains on man and beast (8-12); the seventh, in a destructive hailstorm (13-35); the eighth, in locusts brought by the east wind (x 1-20); the ninth, in dense darkness (21-29); and the tenth, in the death of all the firstborn (xi 1-xii 30). A plague was sent upon the Israelites for making and worshiping the golden calf (Ex. xxxii. 35); and another for murmuring against the sustenance provided for them by God (Num. xi 33, 34), another slew the spies who had brought up an evil report of the land (xiv. 37), another raged among the people for murmuring at the righteous punishment of the rebels Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. In this visitation 14,700 perished (xvi. 46-50). In another plague sent upon the people on account of the idolatres and impurities at Baal-peor 24,000 died (xxv. 9; Josh. xxii. 17; Ps cvi 29, 30). The infliction of the emerods, or piles, upon the Philistines is called a plague (1 Sam. vi. 4). A plague or pestilence, in which 70,000 perished, followed on David's numbering the people (2 Sam. xxiv. 13-25, 1 Chron. xxi.

12-30). A plague was threatened against Jehoram, king of Judah, and his people (2 Chron. xxi 14, 15).

Sometimes the word plague is used of diseases which are not epidemic: it is applied, for instance, to an issue of blood (Mark v. 29, 34, literally scourge), to leprosy in individuals (Lev. xiii. 3, 5, 6), and even to the spreading of some inferior forms of vegetation on the walls of presumably damp houses (xiv. 35)

Plain.

In the A. V. seven different words are rendered plain. Three of these deserve special notice, sh'phelah, kikkar, and "rabah" The term sh'phelah, or lowland, as R. V. renders it, was the technical designation for the districts of southern and in part of central Palestine, between the higher hills on the east and the low-lying plain along the Mediterranean on the west. In Josh. xv 33-47 forty-two towns of Judah, with their villages, are enumerated as being within its bounds. Some of these were, however, generally in Philistine hands, and hence Obad. 19 mentions the lowland of the Philistines. See LOWLAND

Kikkar, which means circle, circuit, was applied especially to the plain of the Jordan from at least Succoth on the north to Sodom and Gomorrah on the south (Gen xiii 10, 11, 12; xix 17, 28; Deut. xxxiv. 3; 2 Sam xviii. 23; 2 Chron iv 17). The valley as far north as the sea of Galilee was probably included in the designation (War iv 8, 2)

The word "rabah," which is rendered plain in A. V. of Deut ii 8; iii 17, etc., is generally left untranslated in R. V. See ARABAH.

lobed leaves, resembling those of the sycamore maple, which is the reason why the latter tree is sometimes called a plane, and has the specific name pseudo-platanus. The oriental plane is indigenous in southern Europe and western Asia. In Palestine it is wild by the side of mountain streams, besides being cultivated in many places.

Ple'ia-des [daughters of sailing, stars which indicate by their rising the time of safe navigation; or perhaps, the full or compact group].

The Hebrew word Kimah is the name of a brilliant star or constellation (Job ix. 9; xxxviii. 31; and Amos v 8, in A. V. the seven stars), and in the opinion of the majority of ancient writers it denotes the Pleiades. An Arabic designation for the Pleiades is Thuriyya, which likewise signifies a compact group.

The Pleiades are a cluster of stars in the constellation Taurus (the Bull), in the shoulder of the animal. For some unknown reason they were anciently said to be seven; and since only six were usually seen, the notion arose of a lost Pleiad. Six stars are visible to the naked eye on ordinary nights, but more may be seen by persons of very good sight. With the aid of a telescope a hundred stars may be counted. Josephus uses the setting of the Pleiades as a note of time (Antiq. xiii. 8, 2).

Plow.

In Palestine the plow is of primitive character. It consists of a pole or the branch of a tree to one end of which the

The rendering of the Hebrew 'Armon, naked one (Gen xxx. 37; Ezek. xxxi. 8). So R. V. and the ancient versions, except that the Septuagint renders it pine in Ezekiel. The A. V., following the rabbinical interpretation, calls it chestnut. The oriental plane tree (Platanus orientalis) grows from 70 to 90 feet high. It has palmately yoke is attached, while from the other end a small branch projects or else through the end a beam is thrust which is sheathed in a thin plate of iron and forms the share (Is. ii. 4). It was dragged by oxen or cows, and was guided by the hand (Judg. xiv. 18; Job i 14; Eccles. xxxviii. 25, 26; Luke ix. 62). Such an implement can do little more than scratch the surface of the ground. Hence the same land has to be plowed over and over again. When Elisha was plowing with twelve yoke of oxen there were probably twelve plows, each with its pair of bullocks and its man, Elisha being the last of the twelve (1 Kin. xix. 19, 20).

Plow, Plowshares, and Yokes,

Poch'e-reth-haz-ze-ba'im [perhaps, capturing gazelles].

Name of a division of Solomon's servants' members of which returned from Babylon (Ezra ii. 57; Neh. vii. 59). The A. V. divides the name, makes the latter part a place, and calls the man Pochereth of Zebaim.

Po'et-ry.

Poetry is one of the earliest forms in which the literary taste of a people begins to express itself. It is rhythmical and regular in form, like the motions of the dancer which it so frequently accompanied in ancient times (Ex. xv. 20, 21). It is naturally born of the emotions, and is called forth by individual or national joy or sorrow or deep concern. The imagination also and the habit of expressing thought in vivid language borrowed from nature, which are vital elements in poetry, come to manifestation during the childhood of a people. The Hebrews formed no exception to the rule. The words of Sarah at the birth of her son have the poetic ring (Gen. xxi. 6, 7). The blessing which Jacob bestowed on his sons as the time of his death approached was couched in the sententious and picturesque form of Semitic poetry (xlix.). The song which sprang spontaneously from Moses' lips, when he beheld the overthrow of Pharaoh's host in the sea and discerned at once the moral effect which it would have on the nations of Canaan, was also an utterance born of strong feeling and cast into the simple form of Hebrew poetry.

Ancient Semitic poetry does not rhyme. Poems have been discovered which show a certain caesural arrangement, but this feature is not essential. Assonance, alliteration, and rhyme, so common in occidental poetry, oc-asionally occur in Hebrew poetry, but they also are not essential and they are extremely rare. Nor is there a regular recurrence of long and short syllables or feet; but the rhythmical tendency was strongly felt and unconsciously led to producing lines of nearly the same number of words or word-groups, or, to state the matter somewhat differently, the same number of main accents, including at times a secondary accent. The line, moreover, was made to end at a break in the sense except in extremely rare cases, such as Ps. xcvi. 12.

The essential formal characteristic of Hebrew poetry is parallelism. By this is meant that the sentiment of one line is echoed in the next.

The name was given to this feature by Bishop Lowth in 1753, who investigated the phenomenon and drew attention to synonymous, antithetic, and synthetic parallelism (de Sacr Poesi Hebr xix). Parallelism is of various kinds

1. Synonymous, when the thought of the first line is repeated in other words in the second line, as in Gen. iv. 23:

Adah and Zillah, hear my voice;
Ye wives of Lamech, hearken unto my speech.

The couplet:

For I have slain a man to my wounding [or,
for wounding me],
And a young man to my hurt [or, for bruising me],

likewise exhibits synonymous parallelism; and at the same time it shows the exegetical importance of an acquaintance with this principle, for Lamech must not be understood to speak of two murders. He mentions killing but one man. This principle also enables the expositor of Scripture to interpret ambiguous words; for example, in Ps xxii. 20

Deliver my soul from the sword;
My darling from the power of the dog, the parallelism determines that the darling referred to is not a dear friend, but means the psalmist's soul or his life.

2. Progressive, in which the second line expresses a new idea more or less closely related to the first; as in Job iii. 17.

There the wicked cease from troubling,
And there the weary be at rest

3. Synthetic or constructive, in which there is parallelism of structure only, while the thought of one line serves as the foundation upon which to build a new thought; as Ps. xxv. 12:

What man is he that feareth the Lord?
Him shall he instruct in the way that he shall choose;

or Prov. xxvi. 4:

Answer not a fool according to his folly,
Lest thou also be like unto him,

or Ps. xxiv. 9:

Lift up your heads, O ye gates,
Yea, lift them up, ye everlasting doors:
And the King of glory shall come in.

4. Climactic, in which the characteristic words are repeated and form the ladder on which the thought climbs to completion or to emphatic reiteration; as in Ps. xxix. 5:

The voice of the Lord breaketh the cedars;
Yea, the Lord breaketh in pieces the cedars of Lebanon,

and in Ps. cxxi. 3, 4:

He will not suffer thy foot to be moved:
He that keepeth thee will not slumber,
Behold, he that keepeth Israel
Shall neither slumber nor sleep

5. Antithetic, in which the thought is made more clear by contrast; as in Mat. viii. 20:

The foxes have holes,
And the birds of the air have nests,
But the Son of man hath not where to lay his head

6. Comparative, in which the thought is explained by comparison with something else that is familiar; as in Ps. xlii. 1:

As the hart panteth after the water brooks,
So panteth my soul after thee, O God

The parallelism usually yields a distich, but tristichs are not uncommon, as may be seen from the examples already cited. Tetra-stichs and pentastichs also occur (Ps. i. 3; xxvii. 4, 9; xxxvii. 7, 14, 20, 25, 28, 34, 40). The stanza is not essential to Hebrew poetry. It is used, however, in Ps. xlii and xliii, which form one poem, divided into three equal parts by a recurring verse. Ps. xlv. consists of three groups of three verses each, the conclusion of each group being marked by Selah, and the last two groups closing with a refrain. There are also alphabetical psalms, in which the principle is more or less fully observed of beginning the successive verses with the letters of the alphabet in consecutive order (Ps. xxv.; xxxiv.; xxxvii.). Ps. cxix. consists of twenty-two groups of eight verses each. The number of groups equals the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet, and the initial letter of each verse in a group is in the original that letter of the alphabet which numerically corresponds to the group. The book of Lamentations is constructed on a similar alphabetical plan; see LAMENTATIONS.

Poetry is usually classified as epic, dramatic, lyric, and didactic. Neither the epic nor the drama is found in the Bible; but the Book of Job has a semi-dramatic form, for there is action, which forms the basis of drama, in the prologue and epilogue, and there is a regular alternation of speakers throughout. See also SONG OF SONGS. The lyrics are the most numerous poems. No period of Israelitish history after the exodus is without them. They consist of triumphal odes which celebrate the deliverance wrought by Jehovah, like the song of Moses at the Red Sea, and the song of Deborah; psalms of the penitent suing for mercy or expressing the joy of forgiveness (Ps. xxxii.; li.), and of the poor and needy crying out in distress, calm in faith, or praising God for succor (xxxviii.; and iii.; xxi.; Hab. iii.; and 1 Sam. ii. 1-10; Is. xxxviii. 10-20; Luke i. 46-55); psalms of the coming Redeemer and his kingdom (Ps. ii.; xlv.; lxxii.); and plaintive elegies, as the lament of David over Saul and Jonathan, the songs of mourning for Judah, and the Lamentations (2 Sam. i. 17-27, Ps. xlv.; lx.; lxxiv.).

Poison.

Any substance, vegetable, animal, or mineral, which produces a morbid or deadly effect when introduced into the animal organism (2 Kin. iv. 39, 40; Rom. in. 13). The venom of serpents is denoted in Hebrew either by hemah, heat (Deut. xxxii. 24, 33; Ps. lvm. 4), a general word which is also used for hot passion and the heat produced by wine, or by ro'sh (Deut. xxxii. 33; Job xx. 16), which also signifies a bitter herb; see GALL. The custom of anointing arrows with the poison of snakes is probably alluded to in Job vi. 4. It was a practice of great antiquity and considerable extent (Homer, Odyssey i. 261, 262; Phny, Hist. Nat. xi. 115; xviii. 1). Vegetable poison was also employed for this purpose, as that obtained from the yew tree (Hist. Nat. xvi. 20). The Gauls used a poisonous herb called lumeum, perhaps leopard's bane (xxvii. 76). The suicide of Ptolemy Macron by poison, the alleged murder of Pheroras by poisoned food, and the fame of Arabian women for skill in preparing poisonous potions (2 Mac. x. 13; Antiq. xvii. 4, 1), serve to show that the crimes prevalent at that time in Rome were not left uncommitted in Judah and the East (cp. Mark xvi. 18); but the absence of direct mention of them in the Bible indicates that they were not common among the Jews.

Pome'gran-ate [apple, having many grains or seeds].

The pomegranate (Punica granatum), in Hebrew called rimmon, in Arabic rummân, is a tree from 12 to 15 feet high, having oblong-oblanccolate entire leaves, without dots. Here and there on the branches occasional thorns are found. The flowers have generally scarlet petals proceeding from a large leathery calyx. The fruit is about the size of an orange, and has a hard, red rind, filled with numerous seeds enveloped in bright red pulp; hence the English name, which means an apple with many seeds. The pulp is most refreshing to the taste. The pomegranate is wild in northern Africa and western Asia, and possibly so in Gilead.

It was largely cultivated in Palestine in Scripture times (Num. xiii. 23; xx. 5; Deut. viii. 8; 1 Sam. xiv. 2; Song iv. 3, 13; vi. 7, 11; viii. 2; Joel i. 12; Hag. ii. 19). The expressed juice of the fruit made a pleasant drink (Song viii. 2, R. V.) Pomegranates of blue, purple, and scarlet stuff alternating with bells made of gold were put along the skirts of the robe connected with the high priest's ephod (Exod. xxviii. 33, 34; xxxix. 26). The chapters of the two pillars at the porch of Solomon's temple had each around them a double row with a hundred pomegranates each (1 Kin. vii. 20, 2 Kin. xxv. 17, 2 Chron. iii. 16). The fruit is still much cultivated in Palestine

Pon'ti-us. See PILATE

Pon'tus [the sea].

The eastern half of the coast of Asia Minor on the Pontus Euxinus, or Black Sea, from the first word of which the name of the province was derived. It may be described as reaching from the valley of the Phasis in Colchis to the river Halys, and extending inland southward across the mountains to Cappadocia. About 400 B. C. an independent kingdom of this name was established. Six of its successive kings were called Mithridates. The last of them maintained, till his death in 63 B. C., a fierce struggle with the Romans, who reduced the kingdom to the position of a protected state, united it with Bithynia, and formed the province of Bithynia and Pontus. Jews resided in Pontus

(1 Pet. i. 1). Jews from Pontus were at Jerusalem during the pentecostal effusion of the Holy Spirit (Acts ii. 9). Aquila the Jew was born in the province (xviii. 2)

Pool.

A reservoir for water, supplied by rain or else by springs, like the pool of Siloam. From the pool the water was sometimes conducted in channels to town and garden (2 Kin. xx. 20, Ecc. ii. 6, Ecclesi. xxiv. 30). The pools of Bethesda, Siloam, and Gihon were at Jerusalem, and water was also conducted to the city from the reservoirs at Etam; and there were pools at Hebron, Gibeon, Samaria, and Heshbon (2 Sam. ii. 13; iv. 12; 1 Kin. xxii. 38; Song vii. 4).

Poor.

The unequal distribution of the blessings of life is not ideal in the sight of God. Now God gave Canaan to his people (Ex. vi. 4, 8). Accordingly the Mosaic law provided for a general participation of the people in the ownership of the land; and while it permitted freedom of sale, it secured a readjustment of property and a return to each family of its inheritance in Canaan every fifty years (Lev. xxv. 13, 23). But notwithstanding all that law and instruction can do, the poor are always present, sometimes through sins of their own or their ancestors, sometimes through the inscrutable but wise providence of God. The poverty which springs from indolence or personal crime was theoretically excluded from Israel, the kingdom of God; and its poor were regarded from the standpoint of the theocracy as the unfortunate and chastened but beloved children of God. All the poor, especially widows, orphans, and strangers, enjoyed the care of God and the godly, and all were specially favored by the law. Every hungry person had the right to pluck and eat for present need in the vineyard or grainfield of another (Deut. xxiii. 24, 25). Every poor person was authorized at harvest to glean after the reapers, to cut the grain that was left standing at the edge of the field, and to take any forgotten sheaf which remained in the field when the harvest was over. At the vintage and in fruit-picking time what was left hanging on the branches belonged to the poor (Lev. xix. 9, 10; xxiii. 22; Deut. xxiv. 19-21). In the seventh year and fiftieth year the land was not tilled, and what grew of itself was not harvested, but was free to all to eat (Lev. xxv. 4-7, 11, 12). The poor man in his extremity might sell his services to a master for a term of years, but regained his freedom in the year of release (38-42). If a loan were required by a poor man, it was to be bestowed, even though the near approach of the release of the seventh year would soon give him the legal right of not repaying the debt (Deut. xv. 7-10). The poll tax, which each man had to pay for the ransom of his soul or life on the taking of a census, was the same in amount for both rich and poor, being half a shekel; but in offerings presented at the tabernacle or temple, a cheaper form of gift was sometimes prescribed for the poorer worshiper (Lev. xii 8; xiv 21; xxvii 8). The prosperous were encouraged to invite the poor to the sacrificial feasts and to remember them on other joyous occasions (Deut. xvi. 11, 14). There are many beautiful examples of kindness shown to the needy (Job xxxi. 16-22). There were also warnings in the law against the oppression of the poor (Ex. xxii. 21-27). At the same time, justice must not be violated. A judge must not give a verdict in favor of a man because he was poor; the claims of justice were to be paramount over every other consideration (Ex. xxiii. 3; Lev. xix. 15). The kindly provisions of the law, however, were frequently ignored in times of religious declension, and the prophets have occasion to rebuke hard-heartedness and injustice toward the poor (Is. i 23; x. 2; Ezek. xxii. 7, 29; Mal. iii 5). There were also abuses of the good law itself. There were those who obeyed the letter, but not the spirit, who bestowed alms to be seen of men (Mat. vi. 1). Many gracious promises are made to the pious poor, and the divine procedure to them is shown to be that of loving care (1 Sam. ii 6; Job v. 15, xxxiv. 28, xxxvi. 15; Ps. ix. 18; x. 14, xii 5; xxxiv 6; xxxv. 10). Blessings are also promised to the man who pities the poor (Ps. xli. 1; Prov. xiv 21, 31; xxix 7, etc.). Our Lord in the course of his ministry showed his great love for the poor (Mat. xix 21; Luke xviii 22, John xiii. 29, etc.), and it was a special characteristic of his ministry that to the poor the gospel was preached (Mat. xi. 5; Luke xiv. 21-23). The early church considered it one of its most sacred duties to look after its poor, and as far as its limited resources would allow, the poor also outside its communion (Acts ii 45, iv 32; vi. 1-6; xi. 27-30, xxiv. 17, 1 Cor. xvi 1-3; Gal. ii 10; 1 Thes. iii. 6).

The poor in spirit are the humble, whether rich or poor in this world's goods (Mat. v 3).

Pop'lar.

The rendering of the Hebrew Libneh, white, applied to a tree (Gen. xxx 37). It ranked with trees of which the shadow is good (Hos. iv 13). If it is the poplar, the species is Populus alba, a tall tree with white wood, and the leaves white and cottony on the lower side. In the first passage the R V, following the Septuagint, has stora, on the margin, referring to Styrax officinale, sometimes called libnah in Arabic, a resinous shrub from 10 to 20 feet high, a native of the Levant; see STACTE. The Septuagint understands the white poplar to be meant in Hos. iv. 13.

Por'a-tha [probably, having many chariots].

One of Haman's sons (Esth. ix 8).

Porch.

A walk protected by a roof supported by pillars; a colonnade; a portico. There were often porches of this character in royal or other mansions (1 Kin. vii 6, 7), and there was a notable one on the eastern front of Solomon's temple (vi 13, Ezek. viii 16; Joel ii. 17). Sometimes there was a colonnade on an upper floor (Judg. iii 23). The porches of the pool of Bethesda, and Solomon's porch connected with the second temple, were also colonnades (John v. 2; x 23), called in Greek stoa. The porch where Peter's second denial took place was doubtless the passage from the street to the court of the house; and in the parallel passage it is styled the fore-court (Mat. xxvi 71, Mark xiv. 68, R. V. margin).

Por'ci-us. See FESTUS.

Por'cu-pine [a spinous pig].

The rendering of the R V. in Is. xiv. 23; xxxiv. 11; Zeph. ii. 14 of the Hebrew Kippod, the one rolling itself together. The corresponding word in other Semitic dialects denotes both the hedgehog and the porcupine. The European porcupine (Hystrix cristata) is common in Palestine, especially in the gorges leading down to the valley of the Jordan. A brush-tailed porcupine (Atherura hirsutirostris) has also been found in Judæa. The A. V. translates kippod by bittern.

Por'poise.

The rendering of Tahash in the R V. on the margin of Ex. xxv. 5 and elsewhere where the text has seal and A. V. has badger. This marginal rendering follows Niebuhr's remark that the name tahas is given to a species of porpoise by the Arabs near cape Mussendum.

Pos'ses-sion. See DEMONIAC.

Por'ter

A gate keeper (1 Chron. ix. 22, 23; and xvi. 38, in R V. doorkeeper). Keepers were stationed at the city gate (2 Sam. xviii. 26; 2 Kin. vii. 10), at the doors of the temple (1 Chron. ix. 22), at the entrance of private houses (Mark xiii. 34). When David organized the Levites for the service of the tabernacle, he assigned the duty of acting as doorkeepers to a large section of them, 4000 in number. They were not all needed at once, so he distributed them into courses, officiating in succession (1 Chron. xxiii. 5; xxvi. 1-19).

Post.

1. The upright timber at the side of a door (1 Kin. vi. 33). A stone pillar sometimes took the place of wood. A Hebrew slave who did not desire to embrace the opportunity of freedom afforded by the arrival of the seventh year, but preferred to remain permanently in the master's house, allowed an awl to be thrust through his ear into the door or doorpost (Ex. xxi. 6; Dent. xv. 17) as a sign of attachment to the house.

2. A courier (Esth. iii. 13; Job ix. 25).

Pot.

The most frequent word is the Hebrew sir, a vessel made in various sizes, large and small (2 Kin. iv. 38), and of different materials, earthenware and metal (Ex. xxxviii. 3), and used for manifold purposes, such as for boiling flesh (xvi. 3; 2 Chron. xxxv. 13; Job xli. 31; and Ezek. xxiv. 3-5, in R. V. caldron), for washing (Ps lx. 8), for refining metals (Prov. xxvii. 21). The term dud might also designate a similar pot (Job xli. 20; in 1 Sam. ii. 14 rendered kettle; in 2 Chron. xxxv. 13 rendered caldron); so also might kallahath, which is rendered caldron (1 Sam. ii. 14; Mic. iii. 3). In Job xli. 20 the word translated caldron in A. V. should be rushes. Water for domestic purposes was kept in earthen pots (John ii. 6); see WATERPOT.

Pot'i-phar [who is of the sun].

The captain of Pharaoh's guard and owner of Joseph. His wife attempted to seduce the young slave from the path of virtue, and when she failed, she induced Potiphar to imprison him on a charge which she knew to be false (Gen. xxxix. 1-20).

Pot-i-phe'ra, in A. V. Poti-pherah [Egyptian Pet-p-ra, who is of the sun, belonging to the sun].

A priest of On, or Heliopolis, the city of the sun. He was the father of Asenath, who was given in marriage to Joseph (Gen. xli. 45-50; xli. 20).

Pot'ter.

One who makes earthenware pots and similar vessels. The clay was trodden by foot of man to reduce it to a paste (Is. xli. 25; Wisd. xv. 7). It was then placed on a horizontal wheel, before which the potter sat, turning the wheel with his hand as he shaped the vessel, or keeping the wheel in motion with his foot, while he fashioned the revolving clay with his hand and arm. The finished work was glazed and baked in a furnace (Jer. xviii. 3, 4; Eccles. xxxviii. 29, 30). The ability of the potter to mold the clay into any shape he desired is used in Is. xlv. 9; Jer. xviii. 5-12; Rom. ix. 20-25 to illustrate God's sovereignty over man. God, of course, in the exercise of sovereignty acts only in accordance with his infinite perfections of wisdom, justice, goodness, and truth.

Eastern Potter.

Potters at the Kiln in Ancient Egypt.

Pot'ter's Field. See AKELDAMA.

Pound. See MONEY and WEIGHTS.

Pow'der.

The fine particles into which any substance is crushed or ground (Ex. xxxii. 20). Pulverized spice of any kind, intended to be burnt as incense (Song iii. 6).

Præ'tor.

One of the chief civil magistrates in a

Roman colony, in Greek commonly designated stratēgos (Acts xvi. 12, and 20, 35, R. V. margin). There were usually two, elected annually by the colonists; and occasionally styled consuls. Two lictors attended each prætor; cleared the way before him, saw that due respect was shown him by the public, and executed his orders (35, 38, R. V. margin).

Præ-to'ri-um [belonging to a prætor]

The tent of a general; the official residence of a provincial governor; a palace. In the N. T. it denotes.

1. The palace occupied by Pontius Pilate at Jerusalem and where his judgment seat was erected (Mark xv. 16; and margin of R. V. of Mat. xxvii. 27; John xviii. 28, 33; xix. 9, cp. 13). Some have understood the castle of Antonia; but Herod's palace was the building occupied by the procurators. See HEROD, PALACE OF.

2. Herod's palace at Cæsarea, in which Paul was confined (Acts xxiii. 35, R. V. margin; in text, palace; in A. V., judgment hall).

3. The prætorian guard at Rome, the duty of which was to guard the imperial palace and its occupant, the emperor (Phil. i. 13; in A. V., palace; on the margin, Cæsar's court).

Prayer.

Prayer is communion with God. It implies that God is a person, able and willing to hear us, who has created the universe and still preserves and governs all his creatures and all their actions. He is not the slave of his own laws. He can produce results by controlling the laws of nature or cooperating with them as readily as a man can; nay more readily, for he is God. He can influence the hearts and minds of men more readily than even a man can induce his fellow-men to action. God has foreordained both the prayer and its answer. He has had a plan from the beginning; and he accomplishes this plan both by the manner in which he established the universe and the laws which he set in operation, and also by his constant presence in the universe, upholding it and controlling it.

Prayer is instinctive with man. In his extremity of need he cries out to God. And God requires prayer of all men; but to pray to God implies a right relation to him. Acceptable prayer can be offered unto God by the righteous only. The prayer of the wicked is abomination unto him (Prov. xv. 29; xxviii. 9). Only those who have forsaken sin are authorized to draw nigh unto God in prayer. There is no propriety in rebels against the authority of God approaching him, except with renunciation of their rebellion and a petition for pardon. Prayer is the communion of the child of God with his Father in heaven. It consists of adoration, thanksgiving, confession, and petition (Neh. i. 4-11; Dan ix. 3-19; Phil iv. 6). It has been engaged in by God's people from the beginning.

Prayer is thus the natural expression of the religious feelings, and further God's blessings are given in answer to prayer (1 Kin. ix. 3; Ezek. xxxvi. 37; Mat. vii. 7). God is attentive to every prayer that is rightly offered to him. He heareth the young ravens when they cry; and God's people have the promise that he will answer their prayers (Ps. lxxv. 2). James, citing history, says that the supplication of a righteous man availeth much in its working (Jas. v. 16, R. V.). Christ speaking to his disciples said: "Whatsoever ye shall ask in my name, that will I do" (John xiv. 13). God's people present their petitions to God and leave to him to decide whether it is wise to grant the request or not. They know that God alone can tell whether the granting of the prayer would be for their own good or for the welfare of the kingdom of God or for God's glory. The apostle John, writing to believers, states the doctrine of prayer with its necessary condition when he says: "This is the boldness which we have toward him, that, if we ask anything according to his will, he heareth us" (1 John v. 14, R. V.). "The answer will be such as we, if duly enlightened, would ourselves desire." God often blesses his children best when he denies their requests. And when they pray they desire him to deny their requests if in his sight it is best to do so.

We must pray in the name of Christ, because sinful man cannot approach God. We must draw near, not claiming any inherent right of our own to come, but in the name of him who hath washed us from our sins in his blood and made us to be priests unto God.

Prayer is addressed to God in his fullness, as the triune God. Prayer to each of the three persons in the Godhead Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, is involved in the apostolic benediction: "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God, and the communion of the Holy Ghost, be with you all" (2 Cor. xiii. 14). Prayer was addressed to the risen Christ. Christians called upon his name (1 Cor. i. 2). Stephen petitioned him, Paul besought him and rendered thanks to him, the redeemed ascribe glory and dominion to him (Acts vii. 59, 60; 2 Cor. xii. 8, 9; 1 Thes. iii. 11; 1 Tim. i. 12; Rev. i. 5, 6).

Prep-a-ra'tion.

The day before the Sabbath (Mark xv. 42; John xix. 31; Antiq. xvi. 6, 2; cp. Judith viii. 6). The preparation for the Sabbath of the passover was the eve of a peculiarly high day (John xix. 14, 31).

Pres'by-ter-y.

The whole body of presbuteroi, elders in a church (1 Tim. iv. 14). See ELDER and LAYING OF HANDS.

Pres'ents. See GIFTS.

Priest [contracted from Latin presbyter, Greek presbuteros, elderly, an elder].

An authorized minister. It sometimes denotes a minister of state or responsible adviser of the king (2 Sam. viii. 18; see R V margin). In 2 Sam. xx. 26 the official is described as priest to David (see R V margin), and in 1 Chron. xviii. 17 as chief about the king. In 1 Kin. iv. 5 the title is qualified and explained by friend of the king (see FRIEND OF THE KING). Very frequently the ministers at the sanctuary are described as Levitical priests, as though the designation kohen, minister, priest, rather needed descriptive qualification.

An authorized minister of a deity who, on behalf of a community, officiates at the altar and in other rites. The essential idea of a priest is that of a mediator between man and God. The priests formed a distinct class in the nations of antiquity generally; as in Egypt, Midian, Philistia, Greece, Rome (Gen. xlvii. 22; Ex. ii. 16; 1 Sam. vi. 2; Acts xiv. 13).

In the absence of a regularly organized priesthood, priestly functions were exercised from time immemorial by private individuals, as Cain, Abel; and by patriarchs in behalf of a family or tribe, as Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Job. The natural head of a body of people acted as priest. There were those among the Israelites at the time of the exodus who possessed this prerogative by natural right, and who had been influenced by the pressure of increasing priestly duties, arising from the growth of the Hebrew population, and by the spectacle of the Egyptian priesthood, to devote themselves professionally to priestly functions (Ex. xix. 22). Even after the organization of the Levitical priesthood priestly prerogatives existed outside of that order. When God himself dispensed with the mediation of the ordained priests and manifested himself immediately to a man, that man recognized his right to offer sacrifice at once without the intervention of the regularly constituted mediators (Judg. vi. 18, 24, 26; xiii. 16); and when for political reasons it became impossible for those who feared God in the northern kingdom to avail themselves of the offices of the Levitical priests, the primitive law was recalled and the father of the family or other person indicated by ancient custom erected the altar and offered sacrifices to Jehovah (1 Kin. xviii. 30).

When the Hebrew nation was organized at Sinai a national sanctuary and service were projected on a noble scale, such as became the essential dignity of Jehovah, and appeared to no disadvantage when brought into comparison with the purest worship of the most cultured nations of that age. Priests were needed for its altar. Aaron and his sons were appointed to that office, and the priesthood was made hereditary in the family and restricted to it (Ex. xxviii. 1; xl. 12-15;

Num. xvi. 40; xvii.; xviii. 1-8; and cp. Deut. x. 6; 1 Kin. viii. 4; Ezra ii. 36 seq.). All the sons of Aaron were priests unless debarred by legal disabilities (Lev. xxi. 16 seq.). Accordingly when they are referred to as a class, they are mentioned either simply as the priests or as the priests the sons of Aaron, in allusion to their descent as a family (i. 5; 2 Chron. xxvi. 18; xxix. 21; xxxv. 14; cp. Num. iii. 3; x. 8; Josh. xxi. 19; Neh. x. 38), or as the priests the Levites, in allusion to the tribe to which they belonged (Deut. xvii. 9, 18; xviii. 1; Josh. iii. 3; viii. 33; 2 Chron. xxiii. 18; xxx. 27; Jer. xxxiii. 18, 21; cp. Ex. xxxviii. 21), or later as the priests the Levites the sons of Zadok, as designation of a branch of the family (Ezek. xliv. 15; cp. xlii. 19). This method of designating the priests, as will be seen from the passages cited, was in vogue at a time when beyond all question the distinction between priest and Levite was firmly established. The distinction is recognized in the history: the ministers at the altar of the tabernacle and temple and the users of Urim and Thummim always belong to the family of Aaron.

The duties of the priests were mainly three: to minister at the sanctuary before the Lord, to teach the people the law of God, and to inquire for them the divine will by Urim and Thummim (Ex. xxviii. 30 and Ezra ii. 63, Num. xvi. 40; xvii. 5, 2 Chron. xv. 3; Jer. xviii. 18; Ezek. vii. 26; Mic. iii. 11). The priest was subject to special laws (Lev. x. 8 seq.); and in respect to marriage, he could only take to wife one of his own nation, a virgin or a widow who had not been divorced, and her genealogy in the ancient records must be as regular as that of the priest himself (xxi. 7; Ezra x. 18, 19, con. Apoc. i. 7). His dress when on duty consisted of 1. Short breeches, reaching from the hips to the thighs. 2. A coat fitting close to the body, woven in one piece without seam, at least in later times extending to the ankles, and which was gathered about the loins with a symbolically ornamented girdle. 3. A cap shaped like a cup. These several articles were made of white linen (Ex. xxviii. 40-42; Antiq. iii. 7, 1-3). Priests and others officially connected with the solemn service often wore a linen ephod; but it was not prescribed and it was not made of varied and costly materials like the one worn by the high priest (1 Sam. ii. 18; xxii. 18; 2 Sam. vi. 14).

On the conquest of Canaan, in view of the present needs of the descendants of Aaron, who were then doubtless in the third generation, but more especially with a view to future demands, thirteen towns were designated where residence and lands for pasturing cattle were legally theirs (Josh. xxi. 10-19). In the course of centuries they increased to a numerous body. Accordingly David divided them into twenty-four courses. Except during the great festivals, when all the courses were employed, each course officiated for a week at a time, the change being made on the Sabbath before evening sacrifice (1 Chron. xxiv. 1-19; 2 Kin. xi. 5, 9; Antiq. vii. 14, 7). Four only of these courses appear to have returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra. 36-38); but the old number was eventually reconstructed (cp. Luke i. 5, 9). There were distinctions in rank among the priests. The supreme pontiff was the high priest (q. v.). Next to him stood the second priest (2 Kin. xxv. 18), who was probably the same as the ruler of the house of God (2 Chron. xxxi. 13; Neh. xi. 11) and the captain of the temple (Acts iv. 1; v. 24). The chief priests who are mentioned in the N. T. were the officiating high priest, former high priests still alive, and members of their families. They were an anomaly of the times. The law which regulated the succession to the high-priesthood had come into abeyance through political confusion and foreign domination. High priests were made and unmade at the will of the rulers.

Prince.

A person of chief rank or authority in any official relation; as the king of a nation (1 Kin. xiv. 7), satrap over a province (Dan. iii. 2, A. V.), head of a tribe (Num. i. 16) or of a tribal family (xxv. 14), a sheik (Gen. xxiii. 6), a chief officer over the servants of a king (Dan. i. 7). Prince is the rendering of various Hebrew and Greek words.

Seven princes of Media and Persia had access to the king's presence and held the highest official position after the throne (Esth. i. 14). Apparently they were the seven counselors of the king (Ezra vii. 14). In the year 521 B. C. an event occurred which perhaps explains the origin of these privileges. Seven men of the first rank in Persia (Herod. iii. 77), having slain the false Smerdis, entered into a compact with each other, as they were about to choose one of their number to be king, that each of the seven should have liberty to enter the palace without being announced, and that the king should not be allowed to marry outside of these seven families (84).

Pris'ca and Pris-ci'l'a [old woman and little old woman].

The wife of Aquila, who went with him in his wanderings, and showed at least equal zeal with her husband in advancing the Christian cause. Paul's estimate of her was high (Acts xviii. 1-3, 18, 26, Rom. xvi. 3, 2 Tim. iv. 19), and in three out of five verses she is named before her husband. See AQUILA.

Pris'on.

A special place was set apart in Egypt for the confinement of criminals. It was under the charge, and in the house, of a military officer, and the prisoners were often bound as well as kept in ward (Gen. xl. 3, 4; xlii. 16, 17). The prison was an institution among the Philistines also; Samson was imprisoned, blinded, bound with fetters, and compelled to labor (Judg. xvi. 21).

Among the Hebrews there was a prison in Samaria in the reign of Ahab, which was under the charge of the governor of the city (1 Kin. xxii. 27). Later there is notice of the detention of prisoners at Jerusalem in the court of the guard (Jer. xxxvii. 21), and in the dry cistern that was in the court (xxxviii. 6); but private houses were also used for the purpose (xxxvii. 15). The prison fare was bread and water (1 Kin. xxii. 27). In the Roman period the procurator's palace at Cæsarea on the sea, the castle of Antonia, and doubtless the palace of Herod at Jerusalem, had rooms where accused persons were confined (Acts xxiii. 10, 35). The prison at Jerusalem into which Herod Agrippa I. cast Peter was protected by iron gates, and important prisoners were bound with chains and guarded by soldiers in the cell, while other soldiers kept watch before the door (xii. 6, 10).

The Mamertine prison at Rome, where Jugurtha was left to starve to death, and where according to tradition Peter was confined, is on the slope of the Capitoline hill toward the forum. It dates from the earliest ages of the city. It consists of two cells, one over the other. The lower one is 19 feet long, 10 wide, and 6½ high. It is entirely underground. It is vaulted, the walls gradually contracting. To judge by the slope of the walls, the chamber was originally about 10 feet in height, and was closed by a conical vault, arched in shape, but not constructionally an arch. Entrance to it was originally obtained only through a hole in the ceiling, through which criminals were let down. The floor is the native rock, from which a spring bursts, said in the legend to have been miraculously caused to flow by Peter in order to baptize his jailers.

Proch'o-rus [probably, leading in a choric dance].

One of the seven men elected to look after the Greek-speaking widows and probably the Christian poor at Jerusalem (Acts vi. 5).

Pro-con'sul [one acting for a consul].

The governor of a Roman province which was administered by the senate (Acts xiii. 7; xviii. 12; xix. 38, R. V.). He was appointed for one year, exercised in this province all the powers of a consul, and was attended by quaestors, who collected the revenues and paid them into the treasury managed by the senate.

Proc'u-ra-tor [steward, administrator].

The agent of the Roman emperor, who resided in imperial (as distinct from senatorial) provinces, received the revenues and paid them into the emperor's private exchequer. The military governor and chief magistrate was called proprætor or legate; but in the smaller imperial provinces and sometimes in parts of larger ones the office of legate was dispensed with, and the entire government civil and military was intrusted to a procurator. Such was the case in Judæa. When Archelaus was deposed by the emperor Augustus in A. D. 6, Judæa, Samaria, and Idumæa were erected into a division of the prefecture of Syria, called the province of Judæa, and placed under procurators (Antiq. xvii. 11, 4; 13, 5; Tacitus, Annal. xii. 23, Hist. v. 9). They were successively Coponius (Antiq. xviii. 1, 1; 2, 2; War ii. 8, 1); Marcus Ambivius; Annus Rufus, in whose time the emperor Augustus died; Valerius Gratus, who held office eleven years (Antiq. xviii. 2, 2); Pontius Pilate, who was appointed by the emperor Tiberius, deposed after ten years, and arrived at Rome just after the death of Tiberius, which occurred in March 37 (Antiq. xviii. 2, 2; 4, 2; 6, 5; War ii. 9, 2; Tacitus, Annal. xv. 44; Luke iii. 1); Marullus, appointed by the emperor Caius (Antiq. xviii. 6, 11), and after an interval which concluded with the three-year reign of Herod Agrippa over Judæa (Acts xii. 1-23), Cuspius Fadus, who was appointed by the emperor Claudius; Tiberius Alexander (Antiq. xix. 9, 2; xx. 1, 2; 5, 2; War ii. 11, 6); Cumanus, appointed after the death of Herod, king of Chalcis and later recalled by the emperor Claudius (Antiq. xx. 5, 2; 6, 2 and 3; War ii. 12, 1 and 6), Felix, appointed by Claudius (Antiq. xx. 7, 1; War ii. 12, 8; Tacitus, Hist. v. 9; Annal. xii.); Porcius Festus, sent out by Nero (Antiq. xx. 8, 9; War ii. 14, 1; Acts xxiv. 27); and on the death of Festus, Albinus (Antiq. xx. 9, 1; War ii. 14, 1); and finally Gessius Florus, appointed by Nero shortly before the twelfth year of his reign (Antiq. xx. 11, 1; War ii. 14, 2 seq.; Tacitus, Hist. v. 10).

As appears from the cited passages and their context, these procurators were subject to the governor of Syria; but in Judæa itself their authority was supreme. The Roman garrison stationed in the province stood at their command; all important matters came before their judgment seat; they had the power of life and death (War ii. 8, 1); and their sentence was executed by the soldiers. They commonly resided at Cæsarea by the sea; but they were wont to go up to Jerusalem at the feasts and sometimes to winter there (Antiq. xviii. 3, 1), and they visited various cities of their dominion as occasion required. When in Jerusalem, they were accustomed to occupy the palace of Herod. See HEROD, PALACE OF.

Proph'et.

An authoritative and infallible teacher of God's will. Speaking of the order of prophets conceived of as a unity, God promised to raise them up from among the chosen people, qualify them by putting his words into their mouth, enable them to speak all that he commanded them, and maintain the authority of his word which they should speak (Deut.

xviii. 18, 19). Every prophet of God, and preeminently Christ, was like unto Moses (18; Acts iii. 22, 23), in similarity of endowment, of doctrine, of attitude toward the law, of didactic work. The same authoritative and representative character of the prophet is referred to by Zechariah. Words are given to the prophet by God; the words are sent by his Spirit to the prophets, are given to be taught to the people, and have been accredited in the past by their fulfillment (Zech. i. 6; vii. 12, also Neh. ix. 30). The same facts regarding the prophet are abundantly illustrated in individual instances. The prophets did not inherit the office nor receive it by human appointment, but were chosen, prepared, and called of God; and the call was often soul-searching (Ex. iii. 1-iv. 17; 1 Sam. in. 1-20; Jer. 1. 4-10; Ezek. i. 1-iii. 15). The word of the Lord came to them in various ways. They are strenuously commanded to speak and not keep silence. They were accredited by signs, by the fulfillment of their predictions, and by their doctrine itself. Their authority was repeatedly upheld by divine judgment visited on the disobedient.

But there were also false prophets. Besides heathen prophets who spoke in the name of an idol (Deut. xviii. 20; 1 Kin. xviii. 19; Jer. ii. 8; xxiii. 13), there were false prophets who spoke in Jehovah's name (Jer. xxiii. 16-32). They were of two classes: first, conscious impostors, enticed to claim the gift by the consideration and influence which true prophets enjoyed; and courted on account of their smooth words (1 Kin. xxii. 5-28; Ezek. xiii. 17, 19; Mic. iii. 11; Zech. xiii. 4); and probably, secondly, sincere and even godly men, whose doctrine might be based on the law of God, but who were self-deceived in that they had not been called to the prophetic office by God and were not infallible religious guides. Tests were therefore established for distinguishing the true from the false. The true prophet was recognized—1. By signs (Ex. iv. 8; Is. vii. 11, 14). But signs alone were not sufficient, for they might occasionally come to pass accidentally or be wrought by artifice (Deut. xii. 1, 2; cp. Ex. vii. 11, 22; 2 Thes. ii. 9). 2. By the fulfillment of his predictions (Deut. xviii. 21, 22). This credential gains in evidencing power as time goes on and the historic events and developments take place which the prophets foretold of old. 3. By his teaching (Deut. xiii. 1-5; Is. viii. 20). If the doctrine taught by the claimant of a call from God led men away from the Ten Commandments, the speaker was manifestly not a man of God. The true prophet's teaching was found to agree with the doctrine of the law concerning God, his nature, character, and worship, and concerning the conduct of man. But there was more than mere servile agreement with the law of God. Planting themselves on the doctrines of the law, the prophets unfolded its principles in their application to human conduct and in their revelation of God. And among the sages of all history the prophets whom Israel accepted tower aloft and stand alone in the purity, value, and fitness of their teaching.

Prophecy included the prediction of future events (Is. v. 11-13; xxxviii. 5, 6; xxxix. 6, 7; Jer. xx. 6; xxv. 11; xxviii. 16; Amos i. 5; vii. 9, 17; Mic. iv. 10). Prediction was an important part of the prophet's work, and it furnished his credentials in part. But more important still, the prophet had to deal with the present and the past, and to instruct men in God's ways (Is. xli. 26; xlii. 9; xlii. 9). The use of the English word prophet must not be permitted to emphasize unduly the predictive side of prophecy. The English word is derived from the Greek prophētēs, which means one who speaks for another, an interpreter or proclaimer, and one who speaks beforehand, a predictor. This twofold meaning is due to the two senses of the preposition pro, for and before.

The Hebrew word nabi', which is translated prophet, means one who announces. It seems to have been a comprehensive general term at first. The active participle is used in another Semitic language, the Assyrian, for an announcer. In the Hebrew Scriptures Abraham is called a prophet (Gen. xx. 7). Between him and God there was direct personal intercourse, with him was the secret of the Lord, to him God revealed himself and his purposes (Gen. xv. 1-18; xviii. 17), he was able to teach his descendants the true knowledge of God (xviii. 19), and he had power of intercession with God (23-32). Miriam, who expressly claims that the Lord had spoken by her, was a prophet (Ex. xv. 20; Num. xii. 2, 6). Aaron as the spokesman of Moses is called his prophet (Ex. vii. 1; cp. iv. 16). The nabi', or prophet, was a person qualified by God to be his spokesman to men. And this is the fundamental idea which underlies the term as used in Deut. xviii. 18. One of the qualifications was prophetic vision (1 Sam. iii. 1). Looked at in this aspect, the prophet was sometimes called a seer (1 Sam. ix. 9, in Hebrew ro'eh; Is. xxx. 10, in Hebrew hozeh). And when this was the main aspect in which he was regarded by the people, and this qualification was the one of highest value in popular estimation, seer was the designation in vogue among the people. This was the case for a considerable period in the early history of Israel. Samuel and Gad and Iddo were known by this title. But Samuel ceased to be merely a seer to whom the people resorted when they would inquire of the Lord, desiring to know God's will as to duty, or seeking direction in national affairs, or craving light upon private matters. Samuel went out among men as an authoritative teacher of the nation sent by God, and this public proclamation was the distinctive idea in prophecy (1 Sam. x. 10-13; xix.

20). The teaching function, as seen in Moses, became prominent again; and beginning with Samuel and his followers, and with renewed force several centuries later, the prophet became a constant presence in the national life, an ambassador of heaven to the kingdom of Israel, an authoritative preacher of righteousness, an interpreter of past and present history on its moral side, an admonisher of the consequences which God the judge has annexed to conduct, a forewarner of the certainty of the divine judgment on sin, and a fosterer of fidelity toward Jéhovah. To foretell the future or make known the secret counsel of God, as did Nathan when he forbade David to build the temple and announced God's purpose to establish David's throne, forever remained functions of the prophet; but they became a comparatively small part of his work. Other features were more constantly in evidence, and as a result the restricted name of seer gave place again to the broader designation of prophet (1 Sam. ix. 9). Samuel was called a seer by his contemporaries, but his great successors, whom God raised up and inspired to teach the nation, were commonly designated prophets by the men of their generation. Seer was not banished from use, but the title of prophet, which had never been entirely disused (Judg. iv. 4; 1 Sam. x. 10-13; xix. 20), was raised again to its former prominence (iii. 20). Amos had prophetic vision (Amos i. 1; vii. 1; ix. 1) and was called a seer by the priest of Bethel (vii. 12); but he was also called to prophesy on the basis of this prophetic sight, and he did so (vii. 15).

Referring to the prophet's special endowment from on high, he was called a man of the Spirit (Hos. ix. 7). In common with other ministers of God, official or private, he is a man of God, a servant of God, a messenger of the Lord, a shepherd of God's people, a watchman, an interpreter.

That the prophet was to be raised up from the people of Israel alone did not prevent God, who worketh when and where he will, in caring for his kingdom to send a dream to a Philistine, an Egyptian, a Midianite, a Babylonian, a Roman (Gen. xx. 6; xli. 1; Judg. vii. 13; Dan. ii. 1; Mat. xxvii. 19). Even Balaam, who was a soothsayer, and as such was invited by the king of Moab to curse Israel, was temporarily used by God. These foreigners were in momentary contact with the kingdom of God. For its protection and advantage a glimpse of the future was given to them. They did not thereby become prophets, any more than did Hagar or Manoaah and his wife, to whom the angel of the Lord appeared and afforded a glimpse of the future. They were not men of the Spirit, the intimates of God.

The prophets were taught of the Spirit of God (1 Kin. xxii. 24; 2 Chron. xv. 1; xxiv. 20; Neh. ix. 30; Ezek. xi. 5; Joel i. 28; Mic. iii. 8; Zech. vii. 12; Mat. xxii. 43; 1 Pet.

i. 10, 11). In this God worked in accordance with the psychological nature of man. An audible voice or an angelic messenger occasionally came (Num. vii. 89; 1 Sam. iii. 4; Dan. ix. 21); but the instruction was ordinarily imparted by dreams, visions, and inward suggestions recognized by the prophets as not of themselves. They were not under the permanent influence of the Spirit. The word of the Lord came unto them. They waited for revelation (Lev. xxiv. 12). And their natural mental discernment is distinguished from the divine word which came to them. Samuel's private thought is distinguished from God's (1 Sam. xvi. 6, 7). Nathan at first approved of David's purpose to build a temple for the Lord, but afterwards told the king that God had forbidden its construction (2 Sam. vii. 3). The prophets did not exercise the prophetic power at all times, but when God told them to speak.

From the time of Samuel the office was regularly transmitted. Though the prophets who are mentioned by name are few, there were many anonymous ones (1 Kin. xviii. 4; 2 Kin. ii 7-16). The office seems not to have ceased until the death of Malachi. At the approach and advent of Christ the tongue of prophecy was again loosed (Luke i. 67; ii. 26-38). In the church of the N. T. also there were prophets (1 Cor. xii. 28). They were not an order, like apostles and elders. They were men and women (Acts xxi. 9), and they were specially illumined expounders of God's revelation. They spake by the Spirit, occasionally foretold the future (xi. 27, 28; xxi. 10, 11), and taught and exhorted to great edification (1 Cor. xiv. 3, 4, 24). Paul ironically gives the title to a heathen writer, who so correctly described the immoral character of the Cretans that he had proven himself to that extent a mouthpiece of the truth (Tit. i. 12).

The call of the prophets came immediately from God himself (Amos vii. 15). The prophet was aware of a definite moment when the call came. Moses was called to his comprehensive work at the bush (Ex. iii. 1-iv. 17). Samuel had a special revelation in his youth (1 Sam. iii. 1-15), which was the beginning of his reception of revelation (iii. 19-iv. 1). Elisha knew when he was called to the office and also when he was qualified for the work (1 Kin. xix. 19, 20; 2 Kin. ii. 13, 14). The vision seen by Isaiah in the year that Uzziah died (Is. vi.) has been supposed by many to have been his original call, but it may have been a later experience, designed to fit him for a new and greater work, like the vision that came to the apostle John long after his call (Rev. i. 10), to Peter at Joppa (Acts x.), to Paul in Jerusalem (Acts xxii. 17), and like the experience of Ezekiel (Ezek. xxxiii. 1-22) who had been called to the prophetic office by a vision many years before (i. 1, 4), and of Elijah, whose inaugural call is not mentioned, but who was afterwards commissioned at Horeb for a special work (1 Kin. xix.). Jeremiah knew when he was called, and interposed objections (Jer. i. 4-10). Hosea refers to the time when Jehovah spake at the first by him (Hos. i. 2). In the call of the prophets human instrumentality is mentioned but once, namely, in the case of Elisha (1 Kin. xix. 19). Evidence that the prophets were anointed with oil and inducted into office has been sought in Ps. cv. 15. But the psalmist is speaking of the patriarchs. He speaks in the name of God, and uses the language of his own time in alluding to them as prophets (Alexander, Wellhausen; anointed with the Spirit), or as priests, who were anointed ones, and prophets (Perowne), or as kings, who also were anointed, and prophets (Gen. xx. 7; xxiii. 6; Dehltzsch; Baethgen, tribal chiefs equal in rank to anointed kings). Is. lxi. 1 has also been cited, but the anointing there spoken of is the unction of the Spirit. The case of Elisha has also been appealed to (1 Kin. xix. 16), where Elijah is told to anoint Elisha to be prophet in his room. But there is no evidence that even Elisha was ever anointed with oil. Elijah carried out the command by casting his cloak upon Elisha. Figuratively speaking, he anointed Elisha when he cast his mantle upon him (cp. 1 Kin. xix. 15 with 2 Kin. viii. 13, where the command to anoint is fulfilled by speaking a word). The prophet's cloak was the sign of the prophet's vocation (2 Kin. i. 8; ii. 9, 13-15), so that throwing it to him was a symbol of the call to the prophet's office.

To the prophets' mode of life there is only incidental allusion. Evidently in most respects it was like that of other men. As an appropriate dress for their work a garment of hair was frequently worn by them (2 Kin. i. 8; Zechar. xiii. 4; cp. Mat. iii. 4); not as an ascetic's habit, but as a mourner's garb, symbolic of mourning for the sins of the people. Sackcloth also was worn for the same purpose (Is. xx. 2). The rough garment was not worn next to the skin, after the manner of ascetics; but was a mantle, cast about the shoulders over other raiment. For the subsistence of the prophets wild fruits were at their disposal (2 Kin. iv. 39, Mat. iii. 4). Contributions were made for their support (1 Sam. ix. 8; 1 Kin. xiv. 2, 3; 2 Kin. iv. 42). Hospitality was shown them (1 Kin. xvii. 9; xviii. 4; 2 Kin. iv. 8, 10). Some were Levites, and shared in the Levitical revenues. Some had private means; as Elisha and Jeremiah (1 Kin. xix. 19, 21; Jer. xxxii. 8-10). Perhaps some were supported at court by royal bounty, like Gad, the king's seer, and others who bore the same title (2 Sam. xxiv. 11; 1 Chron. xxv. 5; 2 Chron. xxxv. 15). The prophets usually dwelt in houses like other men (1 Sam. vii. 17; 2 Sam. xii. 15; 1 Kin. xiv. 4; 2 Kin. iv. 1, 2; v. 9; xxii. 14; Ezek. viii. 1). See also PROPHETIC ASSOCIATIONS.

Literary activities and duties devolved upon the prophets, as historians and writers of prophecy. The events of the reigns of David and Solomon were recorded in the histories of Samuel the seer, Nathan the prophet, and Gad the seer, and in the prophecy of Ahijah (1 Chron. xxix 29; 2 Chron ix 29). Events of the reign of Rehoboam were written in the histories of Shemaiah the prophet and Iddo the seer (2 Chron xii. 15), and of Jeroboam in the vision of Iddo the seer (ix 29), of Abijah in the commentary of Iddo the prophet (xiii 22), of Jehoshaphat in the history of Jehu, son of Hanani (xx 34 with xix. 2), of Uzziah first and last and of Hezekiah in the writings of Isaiah (xxvi 22; xxxii 32). The four great historical works, the books of Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, were classed by the Jews as the Former Prophets in the canon, and were evidently written by prophets. In the time of Isaiah and Hosea the prophets entered upon their great careers as writers of prophecy. They committed their prophetic utterances in summary, or in considerable detail, or as isolated and individual prophecies, to writing.

Spiritually the prophets were prepared to receive divine communications. They were holy men, men who were surrendered to God's service and who lived in communion with God, men of habitual prayer (like Samuel, 1 Sam vii 5; viii 6, xii 23; xv. 11), who retired at times to their watch tower, that is, composed their minds and gave themselves up to quiet contemplation, in order to wait for revelation (Is xxi 8; Hab. ii. 1). Moses withdrew for forty days into the quiet and solitude of mount Sinai for communion with God, when the pattern of the tabernacle was to be shown him. Occasionally, in the early period, music was employed to stimulate devotion and awaken religious feeling (1 Sam x 5), or to soothe the mind and attune the heart for meditation, when the will of the Lord was sought (2 Kin iii. 15). It was perhaps not accidental that the prophets were sometimes by a river's side and soothed by the steady flow or the placidness of the stream, when the communication came (Ezek i 3; Dan x 4), and that Samuel heard the Lord speak when night had fallen (1 Sam. iii 2-10). By these various means the prophet's soul was kept or made ready for the operation of the Holy Spirit. God in holding communication with men worked in accordance with the laws of man's mind.

There were men who possessed and exercised the prophetic gift, who were not officially prophets, David was a prophet; he wrote of Christ; but he was not a prophet officially. He was king, and his writings were not assigned a place among the prophetic Scriptures. Daniel had the gift of prophecy in an eminent degree; but he did not devote his life to teaching the people; he was officially a statesman and governor under Babylonian and Persian kings. His writings, like those of David, were placed among the Hagiographa or sacred writings, and not with the works of official prophets. See CANON. The Former Prophets and the Latter Prophets are designations in the Hebrew canon for the authors respectively of the historical books of Joshua, Judges, 1 and 2 Samuel, 1 and 2 Kings, and of the strictly prophetic books beginning with Isaiah. The authors were prophets; anonymous in the case of the Former Prophets, but named in the case of the strictly prophetic books. The reason was that prophecy, not history, required authentication. The designation does not refer to the time when the books were composed, but to the respective places of these two groups of books; Kings, for example, being written after Isaiah, but holding a place among the Former Prophets. There were great prophets, like Elijah and Elisha, who did not commit their discourses to writing. They are termed oral prophets by modern scholars. The literary productions of other prophets who recorded their prophecies are cited, excerpted from, and incorporated in the books of the Former Prophets and other Scripture (see a foregoing paragraph).

Of the Latter Prophets, Hosea, Amos, and Jonah labored in the northern kingdom, the rest exercised their office among the people of Judah and Benjamin, either in Palestine or in the land of exile. Classed chronologically, and including Daniel, they are: 1. In the Assyrian period, from shortly before the accession of Tiglathpileser, 745 B. C., to the decay of the Assyrian power, about 625 B. C., Hosea, Amos, and Jonah in the north, and Joel, Obadiah, Isaiah, Micah, and Nahum in Judah. 2. During the Babylonian period in Judah, from 625 B. C. to the fall of Jerusalem, in 587 B. C., Jeremiah, Habakkuk, and Zephaniah. 3. During the exile in Babylonia, Ezekiel and Daniel. 4. During the period of the restoration, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. See MUSIC, NAÏOTH.

Prophet-ess.

1. A woman called of God to the prophetic office. Deborah was a prophetess (Judg. iv. 4). The Israelites resorted to her for judgment, and the Lord revealed his will through her to the nation (5, 6, 14). Huldah also was a prophetess. She was consulted by the high priest at the command of the king in regard to the teaching of Deuteronomy, and she declared the counsel of the Lord (2 Kin. xxii. 12-20). Four virgin daughters of Philip the evangelist prophesied (Acts xxi. 9).

2. A prophet's wife, as is probably meant in Is. viii. 3.

Pro-phetic As-so-ci-a'tions.

The presence of a company of prophets at Gibeah of God, the home of Saul, is mentioned in 1 Sam. x 5. Whether they were a wandering band of prophets, going from town to town, or formed a community of prophets resident at Gibeah, cannot be determined. The designation of the place as the hill of God was probably derived, not from the abode of these prophets, but from the high place of worship that was upon it (verse 5). The word rendered company in A V, band in R V, is not the word translated company in 1 Sam. xix. 20; and the phrase is not definite, but is merely a band of prophets.

Samuel dwelt at Ramah (1 Sam. vii. 17; xxviii. 3), where he was the head of a company of prophets (xix. 18-20). More definitely, he was at Naioth, in Ramah, a building or locality in the town of Ramah inhabited by this community of prophets (see NAIOTH). Jewish tradition is represented by the Targum of Jonathan, which renders the word Naioth by house of instruction; and this translation has given rise to the phrase "school of the prophets," with its misleading suggestions. The prophets who gathered together naturally, indeed, employed their leisure in the study of things pertaining to God: but there is no hint in the narrative that they were at school or were novitiates in training for the prophetic office. The word and the narrative indicate that there was at Ramah a community of men already endowed with the prophetic gift and with power, in co-operation with God, spiritually to affect those who came in contact with them (1 Sam. x. 10; xix. 20-23); who dwelt together at or round about Samuel's house; under his conduct engaged in worship, giving utterance in praise and exhortation to their exalted religious feelings and apprehension of truth (cp. prophesying, 1 Sam. x. 5; 1 Chron. xxv. 1-3), and doubtless standing likewise under his direction in whatever other religious duties devolved upon them as prophets. The situation may be conceived thus: Shiloh, the religious meeting place of Israel, had been forsaken of God. The prophets gathered about God's great representative and the chief spiritual force of the time in order to cultivate their own spiritual life in common worship, to praise God together as the Spirit gave them utterance (1 Sam. xix. 20), to engage in united prayer in behalf of the nation (xii. 23; xv. 11 with 35; xvi. 1), and to go forth in companies for the revival and instruction of the people (x. 5, 10). They sought on the one hand to benefit themselves by religious fellowship, hold prolonged communion with God amidst favorable surroundings, and thereby not only to satisfy their spiritual longings, but also to quicken their spiritual apprehension and qualify themselves for God's use of them as his spokesmen; and they sought on the other hand to afford a center of reformation in the midst of great apostasy.

Two hundred years later, in the northern kingdom, prophetic communities made their appearance for a brief while. They were probably founded by Elijah, on the model of the earlier society under the presidency of Samuel. The members were designated sons of the prophets. The name denotes that they belonged to the prophetic order; just as a son of the apothecaries was one who followed the trade of an apothecary, a son of the goldsmiths was a professional practitioner of the goldsmiths' art, and sons of the singers were members of the singers' guild (Neh. iii. 8, 31; xii. 28). The members of the prophetic order were called prophets and sons of the prophets indifferently, and the word of the Lord was revealed to them (1 Kin. xx. 35-38, 41; 2 Kin. ii. 3, 5; ix. 1). The associations which they formed were comparatively large (2 Kin. ii. 7, 16; iv. 42, 43), occupied a common building or compound (iv. 34, vi. 1-4), and were located at Gilgal, Bethel, and Jericho (ii. 3, 5; iv. 38). Bethel was a prominent seat of idolatrous worship, and Jericho was hard by another such place, and the establishment of an organized society of prophets at them shows that the founder intended the prophetic community to be a counterpoise to apostate worship and a center of reformation. Elijah, and after him Elisha, stood at the head of these communities, visited them in turn (ii. 1, 2, 4; iv. 38), was looked up to with respect and called master (vi. 5). Elisha was regarded with peculiar affection; they desired his presence with them, sat before him as having him for their president (and perhaps teacher), referred their plans and their difficulties to him, and were sent forth by him to perform prophetic functions (iv. 38, 40, vi. 1-7; ix. 1). Though not without revelation themselves they could learn much of the will of God from the greater prophet, as Miriam and Aaron did from Moses (ii. 16-18, cp. sitting before a prophet as equivalent to inquiring of God, Ezek. viii. 1; xiv. 1-7; xx. 1). The spiritual condition even of prophets could be promoted by the use of the means of grace, and meditation on God's law could benefit even inspired men of God.

There is no evidence that these societies existed after the time of Elisha, neither in Is. viii. 16 nor in Amos vii. 14. Huldah the prophetess was not connected with such a society; she did not dwell in the college, as the A. V. renders, but in the second quarter of the city (2 Kin. xxii. 14, R. V.).

Pros'e-lyte.

In the N. T., a convert to Judaism. The Pharisees compassed sea and land to make one proselyte (Mat. xxiii. 15). The Roman poet Horace mentions the trait as characteristic of the Jews (Sat. i. 4, 142 and 143). Proselytes were present when the pentecostal effusion took place (Acts ii. 10). One of the men chosen to look after the poor in the early Christian church was Nicolas, a proselyte of Antioch (vi. 5). They were quite numerous in Antioch (War vii 3, 3). At Damascus great numbers of women were converts to Judaism (ii. 20, 2). The chamberlain of queen Candace was evidently a convert (Acts viii 27), and the royal family of Adiabene, east of the Euphrates, adopted the Jew's religion (Antiq. xx 2-4). At Antioch, in Pisidia, many proselytes followed Paul and Barnabas (Acts xiii. 43). The rabbins recognized two orders of proselytes. One were proselytes of righteousness. They consented to be circumcised and baptized, and to offer sacrifice. They adopted Judaism in its entirety. The proselytes of the gate or of sojourning were much less advanced. They agreed to observe what were called the seven precepts of Noah (see NOAH), but declined to be circumcised or to embrace Judaism.

Prov'ers, The.

A poetical book on practical piety. It follows the Book of Psalms in the Hebrew collection and also in the Greek, Latin, and English versions. The Hebrew word which has been rendered proverb embraces more than a maxim. It includes also the fable, the riddle, the satire, the parable (Num xxiii 7; Is. xiv 4; Ezek xvii 2). The several parts of the book of Proverbs are 1 Title, 1 1-6, descriptive of the entire book; declaring the purpose of the collection to be "to know wisdom and instruction; . . . the words of the wise and their dark sayings," and designating it the proverbs of Solomon, son of David, king of Israel. This title, however, does not affirm that the book in all its parts is from Solomon (cp Ps lxxii 20, although each psalm in the book is not thereby ascribed to David; see titles of Ps xlii. 1.) 2 Main contents. I. Praise of wisdom, i. 7-ix. 18; a didactic poem in the form of addresses by a father to his son, and specially designed for young men. II. The proverbs of Solomon, x-xxii. 16; maxims arranged in no precise order and consisting in each case mostly of two contrasted sentences. III. Without formal superscription, but which may be called from the opening verse, compared with xxiv 23, the words of wise men, xxii 17-xxiv 22. Among these words is a poem on the drunkard's woes. Supplemented by the sayings of the wise, xxiv. 23-34, including an ode on the sluggard. IV. Proverbs of Solomon copied out by the men of Hezekiah, xxv-xxix; having all the characteristics of the popular proverb, and consisting of pithy sentences not only of two, but also of three, four, or five parallel clauses each. Three appendices: (1) The words of Agur, xxx.; enigmatical sayings in which numbers play a significant part. (2) The words of king Lemuel, xxxi. 1-9; maxims on practical life addressed to him by his mother. (3) Praise of the virtuous woman, xxxi. 10-31; a poem in which each of the twenty-two verses begins with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet in regular order.

The particular ascription of certain sections of the book to Solomon, and of other sections apparently to other authorship, indicates that Solomon was not the author of the entire work; and the title of the fourth section, "These also are proverbs of Solomon, which the men of Hezekiah king of Judah copied out," is valid evidence that the book of Proverbs did not receive its present shape before the reign of Hezekiah. The brief introduction (1 1-6) fittingly describes the entire book, and the poem in praise of wisdom (7-ix. 18) is not ascribed to Solomon, and forms the preface to the proverbs of Solomon, which immediately follow, or more probably to all the maxims of wisdom which constitute the remainder of the book. The introduction and poem may, therefore, be safely attributed to the hand and brain of another literary man than Solomon, and dated not earlier than the reign of Hezekiah. The second and fourth sections, chap x.-xxii 16 and xxv.-xxix., or nearly two-thirds, of the book, are ascribed to Solomon. The absence of a polemic against idolatry has been urged as evidence that the proverbs in these sections originated or were collected after the cessation of the great struggle which the prophet carried on with encroaching heathenism. It may with equal justice be advanced as proof that these sections antedate that struggle. If the absence of polemic proves anything, it affords evidence that these proverbs were collected either before the division of the kingdom and the encroachments of idolatry, or after the exile, when idolatry had lost its attractiveness. The language of these sections favors, though it does not establish, the ascription to Solomon, for it is pure Hebrew. It is free from foreign orthography and forms, such as are found in some books which were written immediately before the exile or subsequently to it. Furthermore proverbial literature is very ancient. It appeared early among the Hebrews also (1 Sam. xxiv. 13; 2 Sam. xii. 1; Judg. ix. 7). That Solomon composed and collected proverbs has early attestation (Prov. xxv. 1, 1 Kin. iv. 32, x 1 seq; Ecclus. xlvii. 13-17). The titles, therefore, which attribute the maxims in these two sections of the book of Proverbs, may safely be regarded as authentic.

Prov'ince.

The rendering of the Hebrew and Aramaic M'dmah, jurisdiction, and the Greek Eparchia, government.

The young men or servants of the princes of the provinces, who fought under Ahab against Benhadad (1 Kin. xx. 14), were not Israelites (15). They probably served the chieftains who ruled various districts in Gilead and the Hauran, and made common cause with Israel in resisting the encroachment of the Syrians upon the country south of Damascus.

The provinces of the Babylonian and Per-ian empires were divisions of the realm for administrative purposes (Dan i 49; iii. 3) Darius the Great, who as king of Persia, had dominion from India to Ethiopia (Herod ii. 0-94), divided this great empire into twenty overnments called satrapies (i 192; iii 89); see SATRAP. These satrapies or large provinces were subdivided into smaller governmental districts, which the Jews designated likewise by the general term province (Ezra iii. 36; Neh. ii 7, 9; Esth. iii 12; viii 9; p. Herod. iii 120, 128, vi 42; with iii 127; . 11, 27, 30; see also DARIUS 2). In the days of Ahasuerus these minor provinces numbered one hundred and twenty-seven (Esth. i. 1). During the Persian period Judah was at first under the jurisdiction of the governor beyond the river (Ezra v 3, 6), but by royal decree it was made a separate province and granted a governor of its own (i. 63; v. 8).

The provinces of the Roman empire were of two classes, imperial and senatorial. The imperial provinces were under the direct and sole control of the emperor; they comprehended all the frontier provinces which were supposed to need the presence of an army of occupation to hold them in subjection; they were governed by a military officer called a legate, who was appointed by the emperor; their revenues were received by imperial procurators termed procurators, and were paid to the private exchequer of the emperor. The smaller imperial provinces, and parts of larger ones like the subprovince of Judaea, were ruled by a procurator only, the presence of a legate not being deemed necessary. Syria (Acts xxiii 34), Galatia, and Syria, of which Judaea was a part, were imperial provinces. The senatorial provinces were administered by the senate; they did not require to be kept under control by military force; their governor was styled a proconsul and was attended by quaestors, who received the revenues and paid them into the public treasury, which was managed by the senate. Cyprus (Acts xiii 4, 7), Macedonia (xvi. 12), Achaia (xviii. 12), and Asia (xix. 10) were senatorial provinces.

Psalms, Book of.

A collection of religious poems which were especially employed in the public worship of the God of Israel. In Hebrew it is called Sefer Tehillim. The title in the English version is borrowed from the Greek translation (cp. Luke xx. 42). The general designation Psalms of David is derived from the number of psalms, seventy-three in all, expressly ascribed to David in the Hebrew titles (cp. Job. iv. 7).

The psalms number 150. They are divided into five books; in imitation, it is thought, of the fivefold division of the Pentateuch; see footnote, PENTATEUCH. This division is ancient. It is indicated in the Septuagint, and is marked by headings in the Hebrew text. Its existence in the chronicles' day is, however, scarcely evidenced by 1 Chron. xvi. 35, 36, compared with Ps. cvi. 47, 48, as Delitzsch believes, for the passage in the psalm is as probably derived from the words in Chronicles as vice versa. These books begin respectively with Ps. i., xlii., lxxiii., xc., and cvii. Each book is arranged to close with a doxology. In the first book all the psalms are attributed to David except four (i., ii., x., xxxiii.). These are so-called orphan psalms; that is, they are anonymous. In the Septuagint all except i., which is introductory, and ii. are ascribed to David; x. being united to ix. and xxxiii. bearing the title "To David." The divine name Jehovah is generally employed in the psalms of this book. In the second book, of the thirty-one psalms the first eight are a collection of songs of the sons of Korah. Seven are expressly ascribed to them; and xliii., whether written by them or not, was composed as the conclusion of xlii. This group is followed by a psalm of Asaph. Then comes a group of twenty psalms attributed to David with the exception of two (lxvi., lxvii.). Of the two exceptions, however, lxvii. is ascribed to David in the Septuagint. The book closes with an anonymous and a Solomonic psalm (lxxi., lxxii.). In this book the divine name is prevalently Elohim, God; and two psalms duplicate two of the first book, substituting the word God for Jehovah (liiii and lxx; cp. xiv. and xl 13-17). The third book contains seventeen psalms. The first eleven are attributed to Asaph, four to the sons of Korah, and one each to David and Ethan. This collection of psalms was gathered after the destruction of Jerusalem and burning of the temple (lxxiv 8, 7, 8; lxxix 1). The fourth book likewise contains seventeen psalms. The first is ascribed to Moses, two to David; and the remaining fourteen are anonymous. The Septuagint gives eleven to David, leaving only five anonymous (xcii., c., cii., cv., cvi.). The fifth book has twenty-eight anonymous psalms, while fifteen are assigned to David and one to Solomon. The ascriptions differ considerably in the Septuagint. This collection was made late, for it includes psalms which refer to the exile (cxxvi., cxxxvii.). It will be seen that the composition of the psalms ranges over a long period of time. That David was the author of psalms is supported by abundant early testimony, direct and indirect. See DAVID.

The titles of the psalms are ancient. They were not only in their place when the Greek version was made, but they were old at that time; for musical and other terms which occur were not understood by the translators. As they stand, they are not infallible; lxxxviii., for example, having two titles. The titles have been exposed, like the rest of the text of the Old Testament, to the ordinary vicissitudes of transmission; and errors have doubtless crept in during the process of copying which must be discovered and removed by textual criticism. In the titles the Hebrew preposition lamed constantly occurs. It is translated "to" in the phrase "to the chief musician" (Ps. iv. title, in R. V. for), and "of" in such expressions as a "psalm of David" (Ps. iii.), a "Michtam of David" (xvi.), "a psalm of the sons of Korah" (xlvii.), "a psalm of Asaph" (i.), "a song of David" (lxxv.), "a prayer of Moses the man of God" (xc.), "a prayer of the afflicted" (ciii.), and "a psalm of David" (xi.), "a psalm of the sons of Korah" (xlv.), "a psalm of Solomon" (lxxxii.), and simply "of David" (cxvii.), "of Solomon" (cxxxvii.), and "for" in "a song for the Sabbath day" (xcii.), "a psalm for the thank-offering" (c, R. V. margin). The force of this preposition in Hebrew speech was manifold. In the titles prefixed to poems four important meanings must be borne in mind by the interpreter. It may denote—1. Possession, belonging to (Ps. xxiv. 1, represented by the possessive case). 2. Authorship (Hab. iii. 1) 3. Dedication (Gen. xvi. 14, Beer-lahai-roi, the well [consecrated] to the Living one who seeth me; Is. viii. 1). 4. Intended purpose. When the preposition is employed several times in a title, it may, of course, be used each time in a different sense (Ps. iv, rendered for, of, in A. V. to, of; xviii, for, of, of, unto; Is. v. 1, for or to, and touching). The simple phrases "of David" (Ps. xi.), "of Asaph" (lxxxii.), and the Hebrew order of the words "of David, a psalm" (Ps. xxiv.), "of the sons of Korah, a Michtam" (xlvii.), "of the sons of Korah, a psalm" (xlvii.), suggest that the word psalm or Michtam or prayer (iv. xvi, xvii.) is an epithet descriptive of the poem, and in these and similar cases might be separated by a comma or other punctuation from the prepositional phrase that follows, thus "a psalm; of David," "a song; for the Sabbath day." Further, the preposition seems often to refer to a collection to which the particular psalm originally belonged, as in the phrase "of the sons of Korah." This clue leads to the belief that the similar phrase "of David" refers to a collection prepared by David.

The book of The Psalms, as at present constituted in the Old Testament, was the hymn book of the second temple. Its rich devotional songs were also sung in private gatherings for the worship of God (Mat. xxvi. 30; see PASSOVER). Like modern hymn books, it was composed of the hymns of the ages, and in many cases the source from which these psalms were derived is stated in the titles. From these it appears that there were collections in use before the present Psalter was compiled. 1. The collection of David. Seventy-three psalms of the completed Psalter belonged originally to this earlier book of praise, according to the notes in the Hebrew text (iii.-ix., xi.-xxxii., xxxiv.-xli., li.-lxx, lxviii.-lxx, lxxxvi., c, ciii., cviii.-cx., cxvii., cxviii., cxxxii., cxxxiii., cxxxviii.-cxlv.). In the Greek version the note is not found with cxvii. and cxviii., and occurs with xxxiii, xliii, lxvii, lxxi, xci., xciii.-xcix., civ, and cxxxvii., in addition to the psalms provided with it in the Hebrew text. In this collection a number of psalms were provided with a prose introduction stating the occasion; and all that had this preface, or at least thirteen of them, were taken over into the completed book of The Psalms (iii., vii., xviii, xxxiv, li, lii, liv, lvi, lvii, lix., lx, lxiii, cxlii.). No psalm of the completed Psalter has an introduction of this kind, except those that are marked "of David." To judge from the name, from the definite ascription of the authorship to David by means of a relative clause in the title of certain psalms thus marked (vii, xviii), from David's known possession of poetic gifts, and from the ancient testimony to his interest in the musical service of the sanctuary (see DAVID), this collection was formed by David, and was the psalm book of the temple in pre-exilic times. Probably it contained both sacred poems of David's own composition and psalms selected by him from various sources; and it would be quite in accordance with the history of hymnody if this collection of sacred songs, used by many generations in public and private worship, received additions of appropriate hymns as time went on, yet retained its original title of Prayers of David (Ps. lxxii. 20). Is not the present book of The Psalms, although it contains sacred poems written after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians, nevertheless often entitled the Psalms of David? (see first paragraph). When the contents of this Davidic collection were combined with other collections each of its psalms was marked as taken from the book of David. Writings of prophets, priests, and poets who lived before the Babylonian exile survived that calamity, and it is not surprising that a body of religious songs should have outlived the catastrophe and been ultimately incorporated in the new hymnal. 2. A collection used by the sons of Korah, a family some of whom were officially connected with the sanctuary as singers (see KORHITE). Eleven psalms are attested as having belonged to this collection (xlii, xlv.-xlix., lxxxiv., lxxxv., lxxxvii., lxxxviii.). 3. A collection arranged by Asaph or members of his family, who were official musicians and singers at the sanctuary (see ASAPH). Twelve psalms are known to have belonged to this body of hymns, and in all the divine name kept prominent is God (i., lxxiii.-lxxxiii.). Besides these three collections there were many fugitive hymns which in course of time received the approval of the religious authorities for use in public worship. But the three primary collections supply two-thirds of the psalmody admitted into the completed Psalter.

After these collections had been formed three minor groupings of psalms came into existence. 1. By culling mainly from the three primary collections a group of psalms was assembled in which the prominent thought is God in the fulness of his attributes (xlii-lxxxiii). Because the word God, in Hebrew Elohim, predominates, these psalms are sometimes designated Elohistic. The group contained the collection of Asaph, perhaps the whole of it, consisting of twelve numbers, seven Korahite psalms, about a score from the psalter of David, and one from a book of Solomon's. It was made for the purpose of meeting a felt need in the worship; and it included, first, psalms that were written originally in adoring contemplation of God, in the fulness of the conception; and, secondly, psalms in which the divine name, if it was not originally God, was Jehovah, and was changed to God or Lord in order to adapt the psalm to the special use (cp. xiv with liii, and cviii. 1-5 with lvi 7-11, Jehovah being changed to God or Lord or vice versa). Scarcely an Elohistic psalm is found in the Psalter outside of this group (consider xc.). The group was given a place as a whole, and, so far as known, without diminution of number, in the completed Psalter; but the division of the Psalter into five books cut it in twain. 2. A collection of fifteen psalms was formed from various sources, mostly from fugitive pieces, and entitled Songs of Ascents. It, too, was kept intact in the final arrangement of the Psalter. 3. Further, and mainly from the three primary collections, a selection was made by the chief musician. It contained fifty-five psalms which appear in the completed Psalter, namely, thirty-nine from the collection of David, nine from that of the sons of Korah, and five from that of Asaph, with one or two from anonymous sources (lxvi. and lxvii., unless the latter is Davidic, see Septuagint). To these fifty-five the Septuagint adds the xxxth, from David's collection. The prayer of Habakkuk was also included (Hab. iii. 19). All the psalms in the present Psalter that are provided with musical directions once belonged to this collection. Not all the psalms that once had a place in it, however, have musical notes. This latter fact, rather than the former, indicates a collection; since the musical notes might conceivably be mere instructions to the director of the temple music and account for the mention of him. The fact that a psalm had belonged to the chief musician's collection is noted in connection with it in the completed Psalter.

Internal evidence for the date of a psalm may come from several sources. 1. Diction and grammatical constructions. The inquiry along these lines demands caution in view of the limited amount and scope of the literature available for comparison, the draughts upon the common Semitic stock of words enforced on the poet by the insistent call for synonyms in the parallelism of Hebrew verse (cp. Ps. xix. 2-4), the vocabulary of poetry, which is characteristically rich in unusual words and constructions, and the dialects among the Hebrews in Palestine with their different content of words and forms (cp. Judg. v.; 1 Km. xvii-2 Km. viii; Hosea; Jonah). 2. Historical events and conditions reflected in the psalm. Unless an occurrence of known date is explicitly mentioned (Ps. cxxxvii), the evidence is inconclusive; for a suitable occasion which is familiar to the modern interpreter (as for Ps. xlvii the deliverance from Sennacherib) may not have been in the mind of the psalmist at all. The critical question must ever be: Are the terms of the description so specific as to determine the event with certainty and render negligible the consideration of other similar crises? 3. The stage of religious development which the psalm reveals. The argument from this source is apt to turn on theories regarding the date of the documents contained in the Pentateuch or of other Old Testament literature, or on opinions about the insight into spiritual things and the depth of religious experience possessed by earnest men in the early days of the monarchy. There are writings, however, which are acknowledged by all schools of criticism to be some of them earlier than David, others contemporary with him, and yet others not later than the eighth century. These writings afford a common, though limited, ground on which to discuss the extent of the religious knowledge and experience of individual men. 4. The fact that the speaker in the psalm, who uses the pronoun of the first person singular or plural, in many instances represents the community, and is not the psalmist voicing his own personal emotions. The individualization of the nation, however, was common from the earliest times to the latest in Israel. It is found in the Ten Commandments and their preface, and frequently in the prophets. Hence its employment in a psalm is practically no aid towards determining the date of composition (cp. first person singular, Deut. vii. 17; viii. 17; ix. 4, Is. xii. 1, 2; Jer. iii. 4; x. 19, 20; xxxi. 18, 19, Hos. viii. 2; xii. 8; xiii. 10; Mic. ii. 4). Moreover, these various criteria determine the date of those sections only to which they apply (Ps. xix. 7-14; li. 18, 19), and do not necessarily fix the date of the entire psalm. The cautious investigator discovers that in many cases a negative result only is attainable, namely, that sufficient reason does not exist for denying the authenticity of the title; or the outcome of the inquiry, stated positively, may be that the contents of the psalm are suitable to the occasion attested by the title.

Technical terms used are Neginah, astringed instrument, and its plural Neginoth; and Nehiloth, wind instruments (iv, v., lxi). Terms probably musical: Alamoth, maidens, perhaps maiden or treble voices (xlv; 1 Chron. xv. 20); Gittith, a either of Gath, perhaps, or a march of the Gittite guard (viii., lxxxi., lxxiv.); Selah, an orchestral interlude or a change from piano to forte (iii. 2), Sheminith, the eighth (vi.; xii.; 1 Chron. xv. 21). Terms indicative of the character of the psalm: Maschil, a didactic or reflective poem (xxxii., and twelve others); Michtam, perhaps epigrammatic (xvi., lvi-lx); Mizmor, a lyric poem, regularly translated psalm (iii., et passim), Shiggaion, probably a wild dithyrambic (vii., Hab iii. 1). Other terms are understood to indicate familiar melodies: Ayeleth hash-Shahar, hind of the dawn (xxii.); Jonath elem rehookim, the silent dove of them that are afar off, or, changing the pronunciation of the second word, the dove of the distant terebinths (lvi.); Mahalath, heaviness (liii., lxxxviii.); Muth-labben (ix.); Shoshannim and Shoshannim Eduth and Shushan Eduth, lilies the testimony (xlv., lx., lxxx). The songs of accents or degrees were probably designed for pilgrims going up to Jerusalem.

Psal'ter-y.

The usual rendering of the Hebrew Nebel, when a musical instrument is intended. In four passages it is translated viol (Is. v. 12, in R V lute; xiv. 11, Amos v. 23, vi. 5). Nebel is doubtless the Greek nabla, which was reputed to be of Sidonian origin, and it is usually translated by this Greek word in the Septuagint (1 Sam. x. 5, 2 Sam. vi. 5, 1 Chron. xiii. 8; xv. 16, 20). The body of the instrument was made of wood (2 Sam. vi. 5, 2 Chron. ix. 11), or, later, of metal (Antiq. viii. 3, 8). The strings were of gut (minum), and their number in the common instrument is unknown, but in a special variety they were ten (Ps. xxxiii. 2; xcii. 3). It was tuned to the soprano register (1 Chron. xv. 20). It could be carried about while it was played (1 Sam. x. 5; 2 Sam. vi. 5). The name psaltery, which is occasionally given to this instrument in the Septuagint (Ps. xxxiii. 2; lvii. 8), has been thought to identify it with the santir of the Arabs; but the history of the santir and its name seems to be as follows: The Assyrians used a musical instrument consisting of a long, low, horizontal body over which strings were strung. It was played with a plectrum. See illustration under MUSIC. The Greeks adopted it as the twenty-stringed magadis and the forty-stringed epigonicon. Later the magadis received the name psalterion, and was apparently borrowed with its new name from the Greeks by the Arameans (Dan. iii. 5, if psantrion does not represent a different instrument here) and by the Arabs. By the latter it was called santir. In the light of this probable history of the santir, the identity of its name with psaltery is seen not to identify it with the Hebrew nebel. The tradition regarding the nebel indicates that it was a kind of harp. Josephus says that the difference between the kinura [Hebrew kinnor, harp] and the nabla was that the former had ten strings and was played with the plectrum, while the latter had twelve notes and was played with the hand (Antiq. vii. 12, 3). According to Eusebius, the psalterion was called nabla by the Hebrews and had the metallic sounding-board above; and Augustine on Ps. xlii. describes it as having the sounding-board above the strings, and not below as in the cither, the strings of the psaltery being stretched between a curved arm and the drum or resonance box in which it terminates above. Isidorus and Cassiodorus describe the psaltery as triangular in shape, like the Greek letter delta. If they do not confound it with the trigonon, which had a triangular frame, and if they correctly give the shape of the psaltery, it appears to have resembled the upright harp which Assyrian musicians carried while they played it. See illustration under MUSIC. The original form of the sounding-board and the arm probably bore resemblance to a skin bottle and its neck, and obtained for the musical instrument its name of nebel, bottle. It was one of the instruments which the company of prophets whom Saul met were playing when he came in their way (1 Sam. x. 5), and one of those used at David's removal of the ark to Jerusalem (2 Sam. vi. 5). When he permanently organized the instrumentalists into an orchestra for the sanctuary, some were appointed to perform on the psaltery (1 Chron. xv. 16, 20, 28; xvi. 5, xxv. 1, 6); and it was subsequently in continual use for divine worship (2 Chron. v. 12). It was played also at festive gatherings (Is. v. 12; Amos vi. 5). It was often combined with the harp (1 Sam. x. 5; 2 Sam. vi. 5; 2 Chron. ix. 11, Ps. lxxxi. 2; cviii. 2). For its use in the sanctuary, see MUSIC.

Ptol-e-ma'is. See ACCHO.

Ptol'e-my.

The name borne by all the male rulers of Egypt of the house of Lagus, which began with Ptolemy Soter, one of the generals of Alexander the Great, and lasted until the Roman conquest of Egypt and the death of Cleopatra. The early Ptolemies, especially the first three, were wise and efficient rulers and raised Egypt to a high position of power and influence. They held many foreign possessions, among which were Phoenicia, Coele-syria, Cyprus, and Cyrenaica, and for a while Palestine. They patronized art, letters, and science, and raised Alexandria, their capital, to be the leading university center of Grecian culture. They were friendly to the Jews, encouraging them to settle in Alexandria, granting them special privileges and giving to many of them high civil and military positions.

The later rulers of this house were, however, weak and wicked. Wars with their neighbors were frequent, revolts on the part of their people at home became common, incest and the murder of relatives were well known in the palace, and the loss of all the foreign possessions heralded the loss of the throne itself.

Three of the rulers of this line and several men of humbler rank are mentioned in the Books of the Maccabees:

1. Ptolemy IV., called Philopator. He was suspected of causing the death of his father, and his first act on coming to the throne was the murder of his mother and younger brother. His whole reign was a series of debaucheries and crimes. Encouraged by the weakness and profligacy of Ptolemy, Antiochus III., king of Syria, made war on him with a view to wresting Phœnicia from Egypt, but was utterly defeated by the Egyptian army at the battle of Raphia, 217 B. C. (3 Mac i 1-5). After this battle, Ptolemy sacrificed in Jerusalem, but being prevented from entering the holy of holies, attempted to assassinate all the Jews in Alexandria in revenge. A somewhat fanciful account of this is found in the Third Book of Maccabees. He died in 205 B. C.

2. Ptolemy VI., called Philometor, began to reign in 181 B. C., at the age of seven, under the regency of his mother, Cleopatra. He reigned for some years alone and for some years conjointly with his brother, Physcon, called Ptolemy VII. Later, the kingdom was divided between them, Physcon ruling over Cyrene and Libya, and Philometor over Egypt and Cyprus. His generals invaded Syria and so came into contact with Antiochus Epiphanes, by whom they were completely defeated at Pelusium 171 B. C. Cyprus also was taken by Antiochus, and Alexandria would doubtless have fallen but for the interference of the Romans, who began at that time to exercise a quasi protectorate over Egypt. Philometor interfered frequently in the affairs of Syria, siding one time with the pretender Alexander Balas (1 Mac. x. 51-57) and afterwards with Alexander's rival, Demetrius Nicator (xi 1-18). While engaged in battle in Syria, he fell from his horse, and died shortly afterwards from the effects of the injury, 145 B. C. Ptolemy showed special favor to the Jews. It was by his permission that Onias built a Jewish temple at Leontopolis copied after the temple at Jerusalem.

3. Ptolemy VII., Physcon, also called Euergetes, was first co-regent with his brother Philometor, 170-164 B. C., but after the death of the latter reigned alone, 145-117 B. C. He is sometimes reckoned as Ptolemy VIII., his nephew Eupator, son of Philometor, reigning for a few days after his father's death. The early part of his reign was a series of crimes against his own family and such debauchery as alienated and disgusted his subjects, who revolted several times. Like his predecessors, he interfered in the affairs of Syria, lending aid first to Zabīnas, and then against him. He is mentioned (1 Mac. xv 16) as in correspondence with Rome, and it is probably he who is meant in 1 Mac. i. 18.

4. Ptolemy, a general of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Mac iv. 45; vi 8; viii. 8). He took part in the expedition which Lysias organized against Judas Maccabeus (1 Mac. iii. 38). It is possible that he is identical with Ptolemy Makron (2 Mac. x. 12), who, first served Ptolemy Philometor in Cyprus, then passed into the service of Antiochus Epiphanes and later into that of Antiochus Eupator. Falling into disfavor with the latter, he ended his life by taking poison, 164 B. C.

5. Ptolemy, son-in-law of the high priest Simon. He murdered his father-in-law and two of his brothers-in-law in the stronghold of Dok, near Jericho (1 Mac. xvi. 11 seq.).

Pu'a. See PUVAH.

Pu'ah.

One of the Hebrew midwives who disobeyed the command of the Egyptian king to kill the male children at their birth (Ex. i. 15).

For others called Puah in the English versions, but which is a different word in Hebrew, see PUVAH.

Pub'li-can.

A farmer of the Roman taxes and customs. In place of appointing revenue officers to raise fixed taxes from the community, the Romans and their deputy princes like the Herods were accustomed to put up to auction the privilege of farming the public revenues, or some specified part of them, in the several provinces, cities, towns, and districts. Those who bid at the auction were necessarily wealthy men or representatives of wealthy companies; for they undertook to pay a given sum into the treasury (in publicum), and they were obliged to give security to the government for the sums they promised to pay. In some cases they in turn sold the right of farming portions of the revenue to subcontractors, in others they engaged a number of subordinate agents to do the actual work of collecting the taxes. They themselves were generally Romans of equestrian rank, while their subordinates, of course, were of inferior dignity. The subordinates or actual collectors of the taxes and customs are called publicans in the English version of the N. T. It was understood that the farmers were to repay themselves for their labor and the risk they had undertaken by taking from the taxpayers a fraction more than they paid over to the government. No proper means were adopted to prevent that fraction from assuming great proportions. With a few honorable exceptions, the publicans, great and small, were extortioners (cp. Luke iii. 12, 13; xix. 8). They were unpopular among all classes in the provinces, except, perhaps, with the Roman governors, who often received part of the plunder for conniving at the oppressions practiced. Sometimes the subcontractors, and in most cases the subordinate taxgatherer, in the conquered countries belonged to the native population. Thus Zacchæus, a Jew, seems to have been subcontractor for the revenues of Jericho (Luke xix. 1, 2), and Matthew, or Levi (also a Jew), apparently a tax collector paid by the farmer for the revenues of Capernaum (Mat. ix. 9; Mark ii. 14; Luke v. 27). It added to the unpopularity of the Jews who accepted office as the agents of the Roman publicans, or themselves became farmers of the revenue from particular towns, that they raised taxes for a foreign and heathen government. They were not admitted into society; nay, it was considered disreputable for anyone to be their friend and associate. It was one of the charges brought against our Lord that he ate with publicans and sinners (Mat. ix. 10-13) and that he was their friend (xi. 19). He honored them by choosing one of their number as an apostle (ix. 9; x. 3). Quite agreeing with popular opinion as to the low moral state of the average publican (v. 46, 47; xviii. 17), he still invited them as freely as he did others into the kingdom of God. His kindness touched their hearts, and not a few of them were baptized (xxi. 31, 32; Luke iii. 12; vii. 29; xv. 1; xviii. 13, 14). He introduced a penitent publican into his parable of the Pharisee and the publican (9-14).

There is no passage in the N. T. in which publican signifies the keeper of a public house.

Pub'li-us.

The chief man and a land owner on the island of Melita, when Paul was there. He entertained the apostle and his companions for three days. He was rewarded; for Paul by prayer and the laying on of hands cured the father of Publius of fever and dysentery (Acts xxviii. 7, 8). His name suggests that he was a Roman; and his title, which is also found in inscriptions relating to Malta, seems to mean that he was the highest Roman official on the island.

Pu'dens [bashful, modest]

A Christian at Rome who joined Paul in sending salutations to Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 21). In an inscription found in that capital, a man of the same name and perhaps the same as he is stated to have been a servant of Tiberius, or Claudius. The facts that in the letter to Timothy Pudens, Linus, and Claudia go together, and the poet Martial, who went to Rome about A. D. 66 and abode there many years, mentions three persons bearing the same names, have suggested that the poet may have referred to Paul's three friends. If so, Pudens was an Umbrian, who became a centurion and was sent on military duty to the remote north, and Claudia was the wife of Pudens and apparently of British origin, being probably the daughter of king Tiberius Claudius Cogidubnus, mentioned in a Latin inscription found at Chichester in A. D. 1723. With the sanction of king Tiberius Claudius Cogidubnus, a man named Pudens gave the site at Chichester for the erection of a temple by a guild of carpenters.

Pu'hites. See PUTHITES.

Pul.

1. An African country and people. The latter are coupled with Tarshish and Lud, apparently all three being skillful in archery (Is. lxvi. 19). One opinion is that Pul is the island of Philæ on the Nile in Upper Egypt on the confines of Ethiopia. It is, however, more probably a copyist's error for Put (q. v.).

2. A king of Assyria; see TIGLATH-PILESER.

Pulse.

Leguminous plants or their seeds, specially peas and beans, which are eminently nourishing. On these Daniel and his companions desired to be fed (Dan. i. 12, 16, R. V. margin, herbs). Parched pulse is mentioned in 2 Sam. xvii. 28, but the word pulse is plausibly supplied by the translators; it is not in the original.

Pun'ish-ment.

The penalty due for sin inflicted for the satisfaction of justice. So Adam, Eve, and Cain were punished by God. Punishment is not inflicted for the good of the offender. The destruction of the men of Sodom for their wickedness was not intended to benefit them. The execution of the murderer does not aim at his reformation. Chastisement, not punishment, is intended to reform the offender. Nor is punishment primarily inflicted with a view to the prevention of crime, although this is a great end. The civil authority enforces law by penalty for the protection of the state, since purely moral considerations, such as the inherent righteousness of an act or the sense of justice, fail to prevent men from violating the rights of others. Detering the evil-disposed was an object in the infliction of punishment which the Mosaic law had in view, but it was not the principle on which the law was based (Deut. xii. 11; xvii. 13; xix. 20; xxi. 21). If the prevention of sin were the main end, justice would be merged into benevolence toward the citizens of the state. Yet the chief end of punishment is not to restrain the criminal from further crime nor to deter others from doing similar acts of violence. Sin ought to be punished irrespective of the effect which the punishment may have in preventing others. The indignation which men feel toward the offender himself, when they witness a flagrant act of wrongdoing, such as murder, oppression, or cruelty, and the demand which they instinctively make for his punishment show that they discern guilt in the sinner, and that they do not think in the first instance of the need of deterring others from the commission of like crimes. The wrongdoer is punished because he deserves to be. So, under the Mosaic law, the state must execute justice and punish the offender, or be held guilty of participating in and condoning the crime (Lev. xx. 4, 5; Num. xxv. 4, 11; Deut. xxi. 8; Josh. vii. 11-15). The people must cleanse Jehovah's land from the blood of murder. The execution of the murderer was an expiation of the land (Num. xxxv. 33, 34; Deut. xxi. 8).

The majesty of the law is maintained only when the punishment bears an adequate proportion to the crime committed, neither too little nor too much. The penalty need not be, and seldom is, an exact equivalent. The penalty for theft is not the restitution of the stolen property nor its exact value in money. Enforced restitution does not clear the thief. Law has been violated, guilt incurred, and punishment is demanded.

The laws of the Hebrews were stern, but the punishments were not cruel. In rare cases the family of the criminal was extirpated by the immediate act of God or by his express command (Num. xvi. 32, 33; Josh. vii. 24, 25; 2 Kin. ix. 25, 26); but this extent of punishment was recognized as extraordinary; it was not appointed by the law as the prescribed penalty for any crime, and the law expressly forbade that fathers should be punished for the children (Deut. xxiv. 16). For a special case of impurity, the heinousness of which was aggravated by the relation of the party concerned to the sanctuary of God, and for incestuousness of peculiar abhorrence, the penalty was burning with fire (Lev. xx. 14; xxi. 9; cp. Gen. xxxviii. 24).

But there was no cruelty involved. The guilty ones were not burnt alive; they were first stoned to death, and then their bodies were consumed by fire (cp. Josh. vii. 15, 25; see also Deut. xxi. 22, 23). The hand of a woman who had used it in a shameless act to assist her husband in his struggle with an adversary was cut off (Deut. xxv. 11, 12). Was this undue severity? Retaliation for bodily injury, when inflicted willfully and not in a quarrel, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, was legalized. So it was by ancient Greek law and by the Roman laws of the twelve tables. In the later Jewish law (Antiq. iv. 8, 35), and perhaps in the earlier law as well, a ransom in lieu of the maiming might be accepted by the injured person. This exemption was based on Ex. xxi. 29, 30 on the principle that, since in so great a matter as the infliction of death by one's ox, a fine might take the place of the surrender of the owner's life, in all lesser cases of injury a fine might also be accepted. In its humanity the Hebrew administration of justice compares favorably with Roman methods. Unlike Roman law, the Hebrew penal code did not authorize the punishment of the parricide by scourging him to the effusion of blood and then sewing him up in a sack and drowning him; nor did it sanction the torture of witnesses, who were slaves, and of accused persons to extract testimony (Acts xxii. 24; see DEACONESS), the punishment of the condemned by stocks and cruel scourging (Mat. xxvii. 26; Acts xvi. 24; War ii. 14, 9), the mockery of those about to be executed (Mat. xxvii. 27-31), crucifixion (26, 32, 44; Antiq. xvii. 10, 10), condemnation of criminals to fight with each other as gladiators or with wild beasts (1 Cor. xv. 32; War vi. 9, 2; vii. 2, 1), scourging to death, starving to death (see PRISON), and burning to death, not infrequently by clothing the victim in a shirt steeped in pitch and setting it on fire.

The Hebrew law did not rudely abolish established usage, even when custom fell short of the standard erected by God (see SLAVE, CONCUBINE, DIVORCE); it recognized the people's hardness of heart (Mark x. 5); but it brought custom under law, checked excesses, reformed abuses; it took solemn account of man's conception of right and justice as prevalent in that age, guarded against vengeance and vindictiveness, satisfied the sense of justice, and thus maintained the august majesty of law; and it set higher standards before man and was a distinct advance toward perfection. The form of punitive justice was further determined by the essential idea of the theocracy, which required that not only crimes against the state and society, but also violations of religious ordinances should be punished. The relation of the Israelites to their divine King resulted in God's punishing sin when man failed to do so, and in God's reserving to himself the right to punish certain specified sins, e. g., to inflict childlessness (Lev. xx. 4-6, 20, 21). Furthermore, the administration of justice was a matter in which the entire community was concerned, and consequently the people participated in its execution. The people stoned the criminal condemned to death.

The offenses mentioned in the penal law were

1. Violation of the religious duties of the covenant. There were (1) capital offenses, which the human tribunal punished with death. They were five: sacrifice to idols (Ex. xxii. 20; Lev. xx. 2; Deut. xiii. 6-17; xvii. 2-7), sorcery, professed intercourse with a familiar spirit, soothsaying (Ex. xxii. 18; Lev. xx. 27), profanation of the Sabbath (Ex. xxxi. 14, 15, xxxv. 2), blasphemy (Lev. xxiv. 10-16), and false prophecy, whether uttered in behalf of heathen deities or in the name of Jehovah (Deut. xiii. 1-5; xviii. 20). The penalty was death by stoning. Instances of the infliction of the death penalty on persons charged with these offenses are recorded in the history; for sacrificing to idols (2 Kin. x. 18-25; xi. 18; xxiii. 5, 20), for exorcising the dead (1 Sam. xxviii. 3, 9), for profaning the Sabbath (Num. xv. 32-36), for blasphemy (1 Kin. xxi. 13), for uttering false prophecy (xviii. 40; xx. 27, 28). (2) Offenses punishable by cutting off the offender from his people. They endangered covenant institutions and the fundamental ordinances of worship. They were refusal to receive circumcision, the sign of the covenant (Gen. xvii. 14), neglect of the passover, the covenant sacrifice, and consumption of leavened bread during the feast of unleavened bread (Ex. xii. 15; Num. ix. 13), performance of work and refusal to fast on the day of atonement (Lev. xxiii. 29, 30), use of blood or fat for food, since they belonged to sacrifice and atonement (vii. 25-27, xvii. 14), offering elsewhere than at the sanctuary (xvii. 4), slaughtering sacrificial animals without making a peace offering, and eating the peace offering after the prescribed limit (vii. 18, xvii. 9; xix. 8), use of the holy anointing oil and the incense for common purposes (Ex. xxx. 33, 38), neglect to purify one's self from defilement, and eating sacrifice in an unclean condition (Lev. xxii. 3; Num. xix. 20). The punishment of cutting off is in some instances accompanied by the death penalty or by threat of divine judgment. When accompanied by the death penalty, the execution of the offender was committed to man. The threat of divine judgment reserved the infliction to God himself. The question whether the punishment of cutting off in all cases implied death, even when the death penalty was not expressly annexed, has given rise to much debate. The phrase has been interpreted to mean excommunication, as rabbinical writers understand; or loss of the rights belonging to the covenant; or death, which in breaches of the ritual was intended to be commuted to banishment or deprivation of civil rights, or death in all cases, either invariable and without remission, or else voidable by repentance and use of the means of propitiation for ceremonial defilement. It probably means expulsion from the fellowship of Israel or, as is otherwise stated, the congregation of Israel (Ex. xii. 15, 19; Num. xvi. 9, xix. 13), and, whether specifically stated or not, includes divine intervention for the extermination of the evil-doer (Gen. xvii. 14 with Ex. iv. 24; Lev. xvii. 10; xx. 3, 5, 6; xxiii. 30). Accidental breach or mere neglect did not involve this dire punishment. Only when a person offended with high hand and showed bold contempt for the law was he cut off from his people (Num. xv. 30, 31).

2. Unchastity. (1) Abominations that defile the people and the land. The penalty was death. They were adultery and the seduction of a betrothed virgin, not a slave girl (Lev. xx. 10, Deut. xxii. 21-27), unnatural lust, both bestiality and sodomy (Ex. xxii. 19, Lev. xx. 13, 15, 16), incestuous relations with mother-in-law or daughter-in-law (11, 12, 14). Unchastity on the part of a priest's daughter, since it defiles at the same time the father who was set apart to holy service, was punished not only by death, but also by burning the body (xxi. 9). (2) Unclean, but less repugnant, conjugal relations were punished by cutting the offenders off from their people or by childlessness (Lev. xx. 17-21). (3) The hand of a woman, which was used in a shameless and unchaste act to distress the adversary of her husband, was to be cut off (Deut. xxv. 11, 12). (4) Unchastity which is neither adulterous, unnatural, nor incestuous. The seduction of a virgin entailed marriage, the payment of the usual price for a wife, and in certain cases a fine (Ex. xxii. 16, 17); and the ravisher was obliged to marry the maid and pay her father fifty shekels, and forfeited the right of divorce (Deut. xxii. 28, 29).

3. Insubordination to the constituted authorities. The penalty was death. (1) Impiety toward parents: striking or cursing father or mother (Ex. xxi. 15, 17; Lev. xx. 9), incorrigibility coupled with habitual drunkenness (Deut. xxi. 18-21). (2) Refusal to submit to the decree of the priest or judge (xvii. 12). (3) Treason, which is not treated in the law, but, according to the history, was punished by death and confiscation of property (1 Sam. xx. 31; xxii. 16; 2 Sam. xvi. 4, xix. 29; 1 Kin. ii. 8, 9, xxi. 13, 15).

4. Crimes against the person, life, character, and property of another. (1) Willful murder and man-stealing were punished by death (Ex. xxi. 12, 16; Deut. xxiv. 7); see MURDER. (2) Bodily injury, inflicted intentionally or through carelessness, was punished according to circumstances by compensation or retaliation, an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth (Ex. xxi. 18-36). (3) A false witness incurred the penalty of the crime for which the accused was on trial (Deut. xix. 16, 19), and a false accusation against a young wife's honor was punished by chastisement, a fine of 100 shekels, and forfeiture of the right of divorce (xxii. 13-19). (4) For injury to property the law required, according to circumstances, either simple compensation or a fine paid to the owner and amounting to several times the value of the stolen goods (Ex. xxii. 1-15).

The punishments recognized by the Mosaic law were death, chiefly by stoning, and in extreme cases the burning or hanging of the body; chastisement, the stripes not to exceed forty (Deut. xxv. 3); retaliation, compensation, which is scarcely a punishment, and fine; forfeiture of rights; and in a special case the loss of a hand. Death was sometimes inflicted by the sword, spear, or arrow, but without the forms of Hebrew law and in extraordinary cases (Ex. xix. 13; xxxii. 27; Num. xxv. 7; 1 Km. ii. 25). The sword of the magistrate did not symbolize Hebrew judicial authority. Imprisonment, chains, and stocks were used by the authority of priests and kings, but they were not an institution of the early days of the Hebrew nation (Ezra vii. 26; Jer. xx. 2; Acts v. 40).

Pu'non [perhaps, darkness or fog]

A station of the Israelites in the wilderness not long before their arrival in Moab (Num. xxxiii. 42, 43). Probably the small town called Phainon by Eusebius, in the desert east of mount Seir, between Petra and Zoar; cp. PINON

Pu'rah, in A. V. Phurah [bough]

The servant, doubtless armor-bearer, of Gideon (Judg. vii. 10, 11).

Pu-ri-a-ca'tion.

Under the Mosaic law there were of four kinds: 1. Purification from uncleanness contracted by contact with a corpse (Num. xix.; cp. v. 2, 3), not a carcass (Lev. v. 2). For this purpose the ashes of a heifer were required, a female animal as in the case of the sin offering for the common people. It was necessary for the heifer to be red, the color of blood in which the life resides, to be without blemish, and never to have been used in the service of man. It was slain without the camp, its blood was sprinkled toward the sanctuary, and the carcass was burned together with cedar, hyssop, and scarlet. The ashes were gathered and preserved without the camp. When needed, they were mingled with living water; and a clean person, with a bunch of hyssop, sprinkled them upon the unclean on the third and seventh day. It only remained for the defiled to wash his clothes and bathe, in order to be ceremonially clean. The defilement of a Nazirite, whose consecration had been interrupted by contact with a corpse, was of greater moment, for he was specially dedicated to ceremonial purity. After a week's separation, on the seventh day he shaved off his hair, the sign of his vow. On the eighth day he brought the same offerings as a man who had been defiled by an issue or as a mother might after childbirth (Num. vi. 9-12). A guilt offering followed (ver. 12), preparatory to his reinstatement as a Nazirite, cp. the guilt offering of the leper.

2. Purification from uncleanness due to an issue (Lev. xv.; cp. Num. v. 2, 3). On the seventh day after recovery, the unclean person after bathing in living water and washing the raiment was clean; and on the eighth day he repaired to the sanctuary and offered two doves or young pigeons, one for a sin offering, the other for a burnt offering. Uncleanness due to contact with a person having an issue, or with anything rendered unclean by such a person, was in ordinary cases cleansed by a bath, the uncleanness remaining until evening (Lev. xv. 5-11).

3. Purification of a mother after childbirth. After the days of uncleanness, which were seven for a man child and fourteen for a female child, were over, those of purification followed, during which she touched no hallowed thing, lest she defile it, and for the same reason was forbidden access to the sanctuary. For a son these were to continue thirty-three, and for a daughter sixty-six days, after which she brought a lamb of the first year or, in case of poverty, two pigeons or two doves for a burnt offering and a young pigeon or dove for a sin offering (Lev. xii. 8; Luke ii. 21-24).

4. Purification of the leper (Lev. xiv.). The candidate for purification presented himself on the appointed day at the gate of the camp, later at that of the city. The priest killed a clean bird, holding it so that the blood flowed into an earthen vessel of living water. He made a sprinkler by binding a bunch of hyssop with a scarlet cord on a cedar handle, and dipped the sprinkler and a living bird into the bloody water, sprinkled the person undergoing purification, and released the bird; see AZAZEL. This much of the ritual was also performed in purifying a house of leprosy. The candidate was then pronounced clean and having washed his clothes, shaved off all his hair, and bathed, he might enter camp or city, but must remain outside of his habitation seven days. On the seventh day he again washed his raiment, shaved and bathed, and was clean. On the eighth day he appeared at the sanctuary with two male lambs and a ewe lamb of the first year or, if his means were limited, with one lamb and two doves or pigeons, together with a meal offering and a measure of oil. One he lamb was taken for a guilt offering. The priest put some of its blood on the candidate's right ear, right thumb, and right great toe. He did likewise with some of the oil, after sprinkling a little of it before the Lord, and poured the rest on the candidate's head. The ceremony was completed by offering the remaining lambs or pigeons for a sin offering and a burnt offering.

Pu'rim [from Persian pur, a lot; or perhaps Babylonian pur or bur, a stone].

A Jewish festival, instituted to celebrate the deliverance of the exiles in Persia from the wholesale massacre of their race planned by Haman. He had cast pur, or a lot, to ascertain a favorable day for carrying out his scheme. The festival was kept on the fourteenth and fifteenth days of the month Adar, approximately February (Esth. ix. 20-28). In 2 Mac. xv. 36 it is called the day of Mordecai. Josephus mentions that in his time all the Jews in the inhabited world kept the festival (Antiq. xi. 6, 13). Some have thought that the feast of the Jews mentioned in John v. 1 was that of Purim; but the statement that Jesus went up to Jerusalem is opposed to this view, for Purim was celebrated throughout the land, and only at three great feasts was a visit to Jerusalem compulsory. Purim was not one of the three. From the time of its institution it has enjoyed great popularity among the Jews. The celebration has assumed a fixed form. The 13th of Adar they keep as a fast day. In the evening, which is the beginning of the 14th day, they assemble in their synagogues. After the evening service the reading of the book of Esther is begun. When the name of Haman is reached, the congregation cry out, "Let his name be blotted out," or "The name of the wicked shall rot," while the youthful worshippers spring rattles. The names of Haman's sons are all read in a breath, to indicate that they were hanged simultaneously. Next morning the people repair again to the synagogue, and finish the formal religious exercises of the festival and then devote the day to mirth and rejoicing before the Lord, the wealthy giving gifts to the poor. The keeping of the Purim festival on the 14th of Adar from age to age is a strong argument for the historic character of the incidents recorded in the book of Esther. See ESTHER.

Purple.

A color which in ancient and modern usage comprehends violet and all the hues intermediate between violet and crimson. In ancient times it included crimson and other reds (Pliny, Hist. Nat. ix. 61, 62; Mark xv. 17 with Mat. xxvii. 28). Purple raiment was costly, and consequently its use was the privilege of the rich exclusively. It was worn by persons of wealth and high official position (Esth. viii. 15; cp. Mordecai's elevation to office, 2; Prov. xxxi. 22, Dan. v. 7; 1 Mac. x. 20, 62, 64; 2 Mac. iv. 38; cp. 31; Luke xvi. 19; Rev. xvii. 4), and especially by kings, as by the kinglets of Midian (Judg. viii. 26). Indeed, it was a sign of royalty (1 Mac. viii. 14; Homer, Iliad, iv. 144), and was put on Jesus in mockery of his claims.

Rich cloths of purple were used as coverings for the seats of princely palanquins (Song iii. 10), awnings for the decks of luxurious ships (Ezek. xxvii. 7), and drapery for idols (Jer. x. 9). It was largely employed in the hangings of the tabernacle (Ex. xxv. 4; xxvi. 1, 31, 36), and in the garments of the high priest (xxviii. 5, 6, 15, 33; xxxix. 29). The Jews interpreted the color symbolically (War v. 5, 4).

Purple dye was obtained from various kinds of shell fish (1 Mac. iv. 23; War v. 5, 4), and was yielded by a thin liquor, called the flower, secreted by a gland in the neck. The amount yielded by each fish was very small, much labor was required to collect it in quantity, and the price was correspondingly great. The larger purples were broken at the top to get at the gland without injuring it, but the smaller ones were pressed in mills (Pliny, Hist. Nat. ix. 60). Two species of Murex were used by the ancient Tyrians, Murex trunculus.

Murex trunculus and Murex brandaris, and yielded crimson. The Murex is common throughout the Mediterranean Sea, but the shade of color varies with the coast.

Purse.

A bag for carrying money (Luke x. 4; xii. 33; xxii. 35), which, however, was not a necessity, as money was often carried in the girdle (Mat. x. 9, R. V. margin). The purse or common treasury of the disciples was in charge of Judas (John xii. 6; xiii. 29, R. V. margin, box); the same word was used to describe it as that which designated the chests for offerings at the temple. Before coins came into use, pieces of silver and gold of various sizes and shapes were tied in a bag or in the girdle, or rings of the precious metal were strung on a cord (Gen. xlii. 35; Prov. vii. 20), and weights and scales were carried for weighing out the desired quantity (Deut. xxv. 13; Mic. vi. 11).

Put, in A. V. Phut in Gen. x. 6; Ezek. xxvii. 10; xxxviii. 5, margin.

A people related to the Egyptians (Gen. x. 6), and the country inhabited by them. The prevalent opinion is that the name denotes Libya in whole or in part. It is mentioned in association with Egypt and other African countries, especially with Lubim (Nah. iii. 9) and Lud (Ezek. xxvii. 10; and Is. lxvi. 19 in Septuagint; between Cush and Lud, Jer. xli. 9; Ezek. xxx. 5); it is rendered Libyans by the Septuagint in Jeremiah and Ezekiel; it is also identified with Libya by Josephus (Antiq. i. 6, 2); and the western part of Lower Egypt is called in Coptic Phaiat. Another view is strenuously defended by Ebers and Brugsch, which connects Put with Punt. Punt lay south or southeast of Cush, and is commonly identified with the Somali country in Africa, east of the straits of Bab el-Mandeb, and on the adjacent coasts of Asia, near Aden, in Arabia.

Put-e'o-li [little wells].

A seaport in Italy which Paul's vessel reached the day after it had been at Rhegium. The apostle found Christians there, and enjoyed their hospitality (Acts xxviii. 13). Founded in the sixth century B. C., it was originally called Dicæarchia, and was the ordinary landing place of travelers to Italy from Egypt and the East (Antiq. xvii. 12, 1; xviii. 7, 2; Life 3). It was on the southern shore of the bay of Naples, near the site where the modern city of that name now stands. Its old name of Puteoli still exists, little changed, as Pozzuoli. The whole region round is volcanic, and the crater of the Solfatara rises behind the town.

Puth'ites, in A. V. Puhites.

A family in Kirjath-jearim (1 Chron. ii. 53).

Put'i-el [probably, afflicted by God].

Father-in-law of Eleazar, Aaron's son (Ex. vi. 25).

Pu'vah and Puah; instead of first form A. V. has Phuyah (Gen. xli. 13), Pua (Num. xxvi. 23).

1. A son of Issachar and founder of a tribal family (Gen. xli. 13; Num. xxvi. 23; 1 Chron. vii. 1).

2. A man of Issachar, son of Dodo, and father of the judge Tola (Judg. x. 1).

Py'garg.

The rendering of the Hebrew Dishon, treader or leaper, the name of a clean animal (Deut. xiv. 5). The pygarg of the ancients was a white rumped antelope. It seems to have been the addax (Antelope addax, or Addax nasomaculatus). The horns, which exist in both sexes, are twisted and ringed. It has a white patch on the forehead, and the hinder parts are grayish-white. It is about the size of a large ass. It is a native of northeastern Africa (cp. Herod. iv. 192), but its range extends to the southeastern frontier of Palestine.

Pyr'rhus.

The father of Sopater (Acts xx. 4, R. V.).

Q.

Qoph. See קוֹפֶה.

Quail.

A bird which the children of Israel twice during their journeying near Sinai providentially had for food in great abundance. In the wilderness of Sin the birds covered the camp on one evening (Ex. xvi. 12, 13); at the graves of lust they were driven by the southeast wind from the sea, and fell in vast quantities in and around the camp, lying in places three feet deep (Num. xi. 31-34; Ps. lxxviii. 26-31). Each time it was the spring of the year. The bird was called in Hebrew s'lar, and the similarity between the Hebrew word and the Arabic salwad, a quail, proves that to be the bird intended. It is the quail of Europe, not of America, is called Coturnix dactylis ionans, or communis, and is placed in the Tetraonidae or grouse family, and the Perdix, or partridge subfamily. It is the smallest species of the partridge type, being only about $7\frac{1}{2}$ inches long. Its general color is brown, with buffy streaks above and buff below. It is migratory, arriving in Palestine from the south in immense numbers in March, and going southward again at the approach of winter. Quails fly rapidly and well, and take advantage of the wind, but if the wind changes its course, or the birds become exhausted from long flight the whole immense flock is apt to fall to the ground, where they lie stunned (cp. Antiq. iii. 1, 5). In this condition they are captured in great quantities on the coasts and islands of the Mediterranean Sea. The Israelites spread the quails, which they could not eat at once, round about the camp (Num. xi. 32) in order to dry them in the sun and air, as the Egyptians did with fish (Herod. ii. 77).

Quail (Coturnix dactylis ionans)

Quar'tus [fourth].

A Corinthian Christian who joined with Paul in sending a salutation to the church of Rome (Rom. xvi. 23).

Qua-ter'ni-on.

Four united persons or things; a guard of four soldiers (Acts xii. 4). Four quaternions, i. e., four companies, each of four soldiers, sixteen in all, were set to look after Peter when he was in prison at Jerusalem, each quaternion discharging the duty for one watch of three hours. During the night watches, two soldiers slept with the apostle in his cell, while the other two mounted guard before the door.

Queen.

The consort of a king, or a woman who reigns by her own right. Vashti and Esther were queen consorts (Esth. i. 9; ii. 22). Even after the death of the king her husband, the queen, especially if mother of the new monarch, retained respect and influence (2 Kin. x. 13); for the practice of polygamy made the position of even the chief wife precarious, and at any time the king might capriciously promote over her head some one of her rivals; but the queen mother, i. e., the mother of the king, had an unalterable relation to the monarch, and was often the most potent female personage. Three queens regnant or women who occupied the throne are mentioned in Scripture: Athaliah, who, after perpetrating a massacre of the seed royal, usurped the throne of Judah; the queen of Sheba (1 Kin. x. 1-13; 2 Chron. ix. 1-12); and Candace, queen of the Ethiopians (Acts viii. 27). The last two, it is believed, came to their high dignity in a perfectly legitimate way.

The queen of heaven was a false divinity, in honor of whom the Jews in Jeremiah's time made cakes, burnt incense, and poured out drink offerings (Jer. vii. 18, xlv. 15-30). She was probably the Phœnician goddess Ashtoreth (q. v.), partly the moon and partly the planet Venus personified.

Quick'sand.

A sandbank which moves, quick being used in the nearly obsolete sense of living. The quicksands of which the sailors on board Paul's ships were afraid (Acts xxvii. 17), and which were the terror of ancient mariners, were two in number, the Greater and the Lesser Syrtis, the former constituting the southeastern, and the latter the southwestern part of that great indentation in the north African coast south of Sicily. The Greater Syrtis, now called the gulf of Sidra, curves inward on the African coast for about 126 miles, and measures 264 miles between the two promontories at its mouth. It is shallow, and full of quicksands. The Lesser Syrtis does not run so far inland. At its mouth it measures about 69 miles from the island of Kerkenna on the north to that of Jerba on the south. It is dangerous to navigate, owing to its winds and tides. It is now called the gulf of Cabes.

Qui-ri'ni-us, in A. V. Cyrenius; the former being the original Latin name, the latter the modification it underwent among the Greeks.

A Roman who became governor of Syria (Antiq. xviii. 1, 1). Under him an enrollment was made which led Joseph to go with Mary his espoused wife to Bethlehem. This visit to Bethlehem took place in the reign of Herod the Great, at the close of the year 5 or beginning of 4 B. C. The enrollment was not a local affair, but was made in pursuance of a decree of the Roman emperor Augustus that all the world should be taxed. This was the first enrollment made when Quirinius was governor of Syria (Luke ii. 1-5, R. V.). Quirinius was twice sent as legatus Augusti, i. e., governor, to Syria. His first administration fell somewhere between 7 and 2 B. C. During it he carried on the war with the Homonadenses of Cilicia, probably sharing the official duties and title with Varus, who was governor of Syria from 7-4 B. C. Thus Varus directed the civil business of the province while Quirinius conducted its military and foreign affairs (cp the dual administration of Vespasian and Mucianus). Quirinius was proconsul of Asia in 3-2 B. C., if the Tivoli inscription is correctly interpreted by Ramsay, and he was legatus Augusti for Syria the second time A. D. 6-9. The first enrollment was conducted in the Jewish manner, by tribes and families. The second, made in A. D. 6-7 after Judæa had been incorporated into the Roman empire, was resented as a mark of servitude and occasioned disturbances, stirred up by Judas, a Galilean (Acts v. 37; Antiq. xvii. 13, 5; War ii. 8, 1). Luke connects the first enrollment with Quirinius, without mentioning Varus, because it was commonly spoken of as the first enrollment under Quirinius in distinction from the notable enrollment under him which gave rise to the tumults.

A brief biography of Quirinius is furnished by Tacitus (Annal. iii. 43). He says: "About this time he [the emperor Tiberius] asked the senate that the death of Sulpicius Quirinius [which occurred in A. D. 21] might be celebrated by public obsequies. Quirinius was in no way related to the old and patrician family of the Sulpicii, but was born at Lanuvium, a municipal town. As a reward for his military and administrative services, he obtained the office of consul under Augustus [in 12 B. C.], and soon afterwards the honors of a triumph for having taken the strongholds of the Homonadenses in Cilicia. While attending Caius Cæsar as rector, when the former obtained Armenia, he paid court to Tiberius, who was staying at Rhodes. Tiberius mentioned the fact in this letter, praised him for his good offices, and accused Marcus Lollius of being the author of the depravity of Caius Cæsar and his animosity. But to other people the memory of Quirinius was by no means dear, because of his persistence in the trial of Lepida [his wife, whom he had convicted of adulteries, poisonings, and treasonable dealings, but who yet succeeded in gaining the compassion of the people], and also of his sordid avarice in his old age, although very powerful."

Quiv'er.

A case for containing arrows (Is xlix. 2; Lam iii. 13). The Assyrian archers on foot carried the quiver on the back, with the opening usually at the right shoulder, but archers who fought from chariots hung the quiver at the side of the vehicle; see illustration under Bow and RAM. The Egyptians also slung the quiver across the back, but they seem to have allowed it to hang horizontally and to have drawn out the arrows from beneath the left arm

R.

Ra'a-mah, in R V once Raama (1 Chron. i. 9), the Hebrew spelling in this instance [shaking, quivering, trembling].

Collective name for a Cushite people, associated with Sheba (Gen. x 7; 1 Chron i. 9). Men of the two tribes brought precious stones and gold to the markets of Tyre (Ezek xxvii 22). Raamah is mentioned in inscriptions of Sheba as a place near Ma'in, in southwestern Arabia.

Ra-a-mi'ah [trembling caused by Jehovah]. See REELIAH.

Rab'bah, in A V twice Rabbath (Deut. iii. 11; Ezek xxi 20), the Hebrew form when joined with a following word [great, i. e., the capital].

1. A city on the southern tributary of the Jabbok, 23 miles east of the nearest point on the Jordan. It was the chief city of the Ammonites. In the war which was waged against the children of Ammon to avenge the disgrace put upon the ambassadors of David, Abishai drove the Ammonites into Medeba (1 Chron. xix 7-15). The next spring Joab besieged Rabbah. During a sally from the gate, Uriah the Hittite was killed. That part of the city lying between the citadel and the river, and called the city of waters, fell into the hands of Joab, but the citadel held out. David was then sent for to complete the conquest and associate it with his name. He did so, treating the vanquished inhabitants with cruel severity (2 Sam. xi. 1; xii. 26-31; 1 Chron. xx. 1-3). In time the Ammonites recovered the city. Judgments were denounced against it by Jeremiah (xlix. 2-6) and Ezekiel (xxi. 20). It was embellished by Ptolemy Philadelphus (285-247 B. C.), and in his honor named Philadelphia, though the old name never ceased to be used by the natives. Philadelphia was the eastern limit of Peræa (War. iii. 3, 3); and it was the southernmost of the ten cities of the Decapolis. The commercial highway between Damascus and Arabia which skirted the desert passed through the city, and there was also a trade road from Philadelphia by way of Gerasa and Pella to Scythopolis. The city was once the seat of a bishopric, and among the chief ruins are those of a church. As in various other cases, the more modern name has lapsed, and 'Ammân, a curtailment of Rabbath Ammon, has taken its place.

2. A city, with dependent villages, in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv. 60). Perhaps its site is the ruin Rubba, about 14 miles west by south of Bethlehem.

Rab'bath. See RABBAH.

Rab'bi, and Rabboni.

A doctor, teacher, or master; a respectful term applied by the Jews to their spiritual instructors (Mat. xxiii 7; John i. 38). The later Jewish schools are said to have had three grades of honor: rab (master), the lowest; rabbi (my master), the second; and rabboni (my lord, my master), the highest of all. When John wrote, the termination which denotes my had lost its especial significance as a possessive pronoun, for John explains rabbi and rabboni as meaning simply master (John i. 38; xx. 16).

Rab'bith [multitude].

A frontier village of Issachar (Josh. xix. 20). Consider doubtfully identifies it with the present village of Râba, among hills 8 miles south of mount Gilboa, and 7 southeast of Jenin.

Rab-bo'ni. See RABBI.

Rab'-mag.

A title of high office, borne by Nergal-sharezzer, a chief officer in Nebuchadnezzar's army (Jer. xxxix. 3). Four explanations have been offered, none of which rests on a sure foundation. 1. It denotes the chief of the Magi. According to this view, the Median and Persian religious caste was influential in Babylonia in the reign of Nebuchadnezzar, who had a Median princess for his wife, and its head man accompanied the army. The Magi are, however, called in Greek Magoi, singular Magos, which appears in Semitic as Maqushu, not as mag. 2. It is the Hebrew modification of rubâ imqa, exalted prince, a title which Nabuna'id ascribes to his father and which Nebuchadnezzar assumes. The word imqa is not well understood, and its long initial vowel is a strong argument against its identity with mag. 3. It represents rab mahhâ, chief prophet or soothsayer, who appears from this passage in Jeremiah to have accompanied the army, as did the augurs of Rome. 4. Since mah denotes a prince, as does rab, the combination prince-

RABBATH-AMMON
Remains of the ancient theater

Prince is the title for a high military official. but such a title seems scarcely distinctive.

Rab'-sa-ris [rah sha reshu, chief who is read, the latter part being modified to suit the Hebrew ear into saris, eunuch].

An official title. A rab-saris accompanied the armies of Sennacherib and Nebuchadnezzar (2 Kin. xviii. 17; Jer xxxix 3). The officer at Nebuchadnezzar's court, who is called master of the eunuchs in the English version and whose title is given in Hebrew as rab sarisum, perhaps, held the same office (Dan. i. 3).

Rab'sha-keh [Assyrian rab shak, head officer, general]

Title of a military official, associated with the tartan and the rab-saris of Sennacherib in command of an expedition against Jerusalem (2 Kin. xviii 17). On this occasion he conducted the parley with the officials of Hezekiah (19, 26, 27, 37), and was perhaps head of the expedition (xix. 8).

Ra'ca.

An Aramaic term rela', worthless; an expression of contempt (Mat v 22).

Ra'cal, in A. V. Rachal [trade, commerce]

A place in Judah to which David sent some of the recovered spoil of Ziklag (1 Sam. xxx. 29). Site unknown.

Ra'chel, in A. V. once Rahel (Jer xxxi 15) [ewe].

The younger daughter of Laban. She was possessed of much personal beauty, and Jacob fell in love with her at first sight, when he met her at the well near Haran, in Mesopotamia, where she was watering her flock. As he possessed no property and it was customary to pay the parents a price for the bride, he served her father seven years for her, and then, being cheated by the substitution of the elder sister, Leah, who was much less highly favored, served another seven for the younger maiden, the only one who had gained his affections. He married her also (Gen. xxix. 1-30), and she became the mother of Joseph (xxx 22-25) and Benjamin, dying when the latter was born (xxxv. 16-18). She was buried a little to the north of Ephrath, better known as Bethlehem. The grave was situated at a place which a traveler from Bethel would reach before he came to Bethlehem. Jacob erected a pillar to mark the spot. This pillar long remained (19, 20). It was near Zelzah (1 Sam. x. 2). The reputed site was alluded to by Jerome and the Bordeaux pilgrim in the fourth century, and is accepted as correct by Jews, Christians, and Mohammedans. The erection called Kubbet Râhil, tomb of Rachel, is a small building like a mosque, with a dome. It has an open apartment toward the east and a small enclosure toward the west. The present structure is of no great antiquity.

Tomb of Rachel.

The prophet Jeremiah represents Rachel as weeping for her children, the descendants of her son Joseph, the people of Ephraim and Manasseh who were in captivity (Jer. xxxi 15, cp 9, 18). At Ramah was her voice heard; not because the prophet foresaw that the captives of Judah and Benjamin would be brought to Ramah after the fall of Jerusalem before being led into exile (xl. 1), for Rachel is not weeping over the Jews; but either because a town called Ramah was perhaps near Rachel's grave (cp 1 Sam. x. 2, and RAMAH 2), or more probably because Ramah was a height in the territory of Rachel's remaining children, the descendants of Benjamin, and near the border of depopulated Ephraim, whence the desolation of the land was visible. This picture which the prophet drew of weeping Rachel found fulfillment in the slaughter of the innocents at Bethlehem in the land of Judah (Mat ii. 18), although the descendants of Leah, not Rachel, wept. Rachel looking on the wasted land of Ephraim, and bewailing her slain and exiled children, was witness that the process had begun which terminated in the possession of the promised land by foreigners, the occupation of the throne by an Edomite, and the slaughter of Leah's children in the endeavor to slay the legitimate king and destined saviour of all Israel. Ephraim, Benjamin, and Judah alike. The picture of Rachel found more than a counterpart in the sorrow of the women of Bethlehem. It found completion, and it found renewed realization. Rachel wept again, this time with Leah. Rachel's hope for the return of her children to the Lord their God and David their king (Jer. xxx. 9) was bound up in Leah's yearning for that son of David in whose days Judah should be saved and Israel dwell in safety (xxiii. 6). Rachel's cry was the first wail of that lamentation which continued through the centuries and was heard at Bethlehem when a foreign king, in hostility to the son of David, legitimate king of the Jews, was able to send armed men to the city of David and slay the children. The process begun when Rachel first wept was being completed. The prophetic picture was finding final fulfillment.

Rad'dai [cutting under, subjugating].

A son of Jesse, and brother of David (1 Chron. ii. 14).

Ra'gau. See REV.

Ra-gu'el. See REUEL.

Ra'hab I. [ferocity, insolence, violence]

A poetical name for Egypt (Ps. lxxxvii. 4; lxxxix. 10; Is. xxx. 7, R. V., h. 9). In Is. li. 9 it is parallel with dragon; see DRAGON. In Job. ix. 13; xxvi. 12, R. V., especially, some interpreters understand a sea monster, and some even discern an allusion to the Semitic myth of the sea monster Tiamat who attempted to reduce the ordered universe to chaos, but was subdued by the sun-god Marduk. This interpretation is not necessary, but it is possible. The inspired poets and prophets might, of course, borrow the creations of fancy to illustrate truth, cp. LEVIATHAN.

Ra'hab II., in A. V. of N. T. once Rachab (Mat. i. 5) [broad].

A harlot whose house was on the wall of Jericho. She harbored the spies sent by Joshua to explore the city, hid them when they were searched for, and, finally, let them down by a cord on the outer side of the wall, so that they escaped to the Israelite camp (Josh. ii. 1-24). When Jericho was taken, Rahab and her family were spared, and incorporated with the chosen people (vi. 22-25; Heb. xi. 31; James ii. 25). It was probably she who became the wife of Salmon and the mother of Boaz, and a link in the chain of ancestry both of king David and of our Lord (Mat. i. 5).

Ra'ham [affection, tenderness]

A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Caleb (1 Chron. ii. 44).

Ra'hel. See RACHEL.

Rain. See YEAR.

Rain'bow.

A bow appearing in the part of the heavens opposite to the sun, consisting of the prismatic colors, and formed by the refraction and reflection of the sun's rays from drops of rain or vapor. It is exceeding beautiful (Ecclus. xliii. 11, 12). After the flood God selected the rainbow, which had often before been seen in the sky, and appointed or consecrated it as the token of the promise that he would not again destroy the earth by a flood (Gen. ix. 12-17). It became the symbol of God's faithfulness and of his beneficence toward man (Rev. iv. 3).

Rai'sin. See VINE.

Ra'kem [variegated]. The Hebrew word is elsewhere rendered Rekem.

A Manassite (1 Chron. vii. 16).

Rak'kath [a shore].

A fenced city of Naphtali, and, from its etymology, presumably on the shore of the sea of Galilee (Josh. xix. 35). The rabbins place it where Tiberias now stands.

Rak'kon [thinness, or perhaps a shore].

A village of Dan (Josh. xix. 46). Conder suggests as its site Tell er-Rekket, 2½ miles north of the mouth of the 'Aujah, and 6 north of Joppa.

Ram, I.

1. The male of the sheep (Ezek. xxxiv. 17); see illustration under SHEEP. It was used as food (Gen. xxxi. 38), might be brought as a burnt offering or a peace offering (xxii. 13; Lev. i. 10 viii. 18, and iii. 6; ix. 4), and was appointed for a guilt or trespass offering (v. 15, vi. 6). Rams' skins dyed red were used, with other appliances, as coverings of the tabernacle (Ex. xxvi. 14), and rams' horns as war and apparently jubilee trumpets in the time of Joshua (Josh. vi. 4-6, 8, 13). The two-horned ram seen by Daniel in prophetic vision was the Medo-Persian power, the first or smaller horn that came up being the empire of the Medes, the second or greater horn which rose at a later period that of the Persians (Dan. viii. 3-7, 20).

2. The battering-ram was an instrument of war, used to beat down the gates and walls

Attack on a City by means of Battering-ram and Archers of a besieged city (Ezek. iv. 2, xxi. 22; War v. 6, 4). It consisted of a log of wood iron-pointed, swung by ropes from a support above and generally within a tower (War v. 11, 5). In attacking a fort or city, it was often necessary to throw up a mound of earth to serve as an inclined plane and enable the besiegers to bring the battering-ram and other military engines against the walls (Ezek. iv. 2), see also illustration under LACHISH.

Ram, II., in A. V. of N. T. Aram, in imitation of the Greek form [high]. The name assumes various Greek forms, as Aram, Arran, Arni

1. A man of Judah, a son of Hezron, and brother of Jerahmeel (Ruth iv. 19; 1 Chron. ii. 9; Mat. i. 3; Luke iii. 33, R. V., text and margin).

2. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 25, 27).

3. A descendant of Buz, founder of a family of the Buzites, and an ancestor of Elihu (Job xxxii. 2). He has sometimes been identified with Aram of Gen. xxi. 21, but Aram was not descended from Buz (nor vice versa), and Aram and Ram are different names in Hebrew.

Ra'mah, in A. V. of N. T. Rama, in imitation of the Greek [a height]

1. A town in Benjamin (Josh xviii. 25), not far from Gibeah, Geba, and Bethel (Judg. iv. 5, xix. 13, 14, Is. x. 29). It was fortified by Baasha, king of Israel, to keep the people of Judah from making military excursions northward (1 Kin. xv. 17, 21, 22, 2 Chron. xvi. 1-6) hence apparently south of Bethel. It seems to have been the place where the captives of Judah were massed together before their deportation to Babylon (Jer. xl. 1). The town was reoccupied after the captivity (Ezra ii. 26, Neh. xi. 33). According to Josephus, Ramah was distant 40 stades from Jerusalem (Antiq. viii. 12, 3). Robinson located it at er-Ram, on a height 5 miles north of Jerusalem. His views have been generally accepted. It is now a small Arab village, having, however, hewn stones and fragments of pillars, the remains of antiquity.

2. A town where the parents of Samuel lived (1 Sam. i. 19, ii. 11; cp. with i. 1), where he himself was born and had his residence (vii. 17; viii. 4; xv. 34; xvi. 13; xix. 18, 19, 22, 23, xx. 1), and where he was buried (xxv. 1; xxviii. 3). For the sake of distinction from other towns of similar name it was called Ramathaim-zophim (cp. i. 1 with 19, etc.). The town cannot be located with certainty. 1. It has been identified with Ramah of Benjamin. On this theory the place is rightly described, so it is contended, as situated in the hill country of Ephraim (1 Sam. i. 1), and it is different from the unnamed town in the land of Zuph where Saul first met Samuel (ix. 5 seq.). Robinson called this identification in question, and probably justly, although his opinion has not been followed by all authorities. 2. It lay south of Benjamin, for (a) The passage 1 Sam. i. 1 does not clearly locate Ramathaim in the hill country of Ephraim, but rather states that a certain man of the family of Zuph dwelt in Ramathaim, a city of the Zophites, who were a branch of the Kohathite Levites, and were called Ephraimites because their assigned home was in the hill country of Ephraim, whence they had migrated (cp. Josh. xxii. 5; 1 Chron. vi. 22-26, 35, 66 seq.). (b) If this be the true interpretation, then the unnamed city where Saul met Samuel is doubtless Ramathaim-zophim, for it is in the land of Zuph. This district lay outside the borders of Benjamin (1 Sam. ix. 4-6), and south of Benjamin, i. e., in such a situation that a person going from a city in or quite near it to Gibeah of Benjamin came to Rachel's sepulcher on the borders of Benjamin (x. 2), between Bethel and Bethlehem (Gen. xxxv. 16, 19). (c) It is now plain why Saul did not know the prophet Samuel by sight, which could scarcely have been the case had the prophet resided at Ramah of Benjamin, only 2½ miles from Saul's home (cp. also 1 Sam. viii. 1, 2). 3. Another location for Ramathaim may be sought in the territory of Ephraim (Antiq. v. 10, 2) where the Zophites dwelt; but not in Benjamin and not the nameless town of 1 Sam. ix. 5. Beit Rima, 13 miles northeast of Lydda, has been suggested. Compare with caution RAMATHAIM.

3. A town on the boundary line of Asher (Josh. ix. 29). If it is not the same town as Ramah of Naphtali (36), its site may be at Rameh, about 13 miles S. W. by S. of Tyre.

4. A fenced city of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 36). It is believed to have been situated at er-Rameh, about 5 miles southwest of Safed and 17 east of Acre.

5. Ramoth-gilead (cp. 2 Kin. viii. 28 with 29, and 2 Chron. xxii. 5 with 6).

6. A village in Simeon (Josh. xix. 8; in A. V. Ramath). It is doubtless the same as Ramoth of the South (1 Sam. xxx. 27); and was also known as Baalath-beer (q. v.).

Ra'math [height], the Hebrew form of Ramah when joined to a following word.

A village of Simeon (Josh. xix. 8, in R. V. Ramah), known also as Ramoth of the South (1 Sam. xxx. 27). See RAMAH 6.

Ra-math-a'im, in A. V. Ram'a-them [twin heights].

A town which gave name to one of three governmental districts which were detached from Samaria and added to Judaea (1 Mac. xi. 34; cp. x. 30, 38). Its location must be sought near the southern border of Ephraim.

Ra-math-a-im-zo'phim [the twin heights (of the) Zophites].

The residence of Samuel's father (1 Sam. i. 1); see RAMAH 2.

Ra'math-ite.

A native or inhabitant of any town called Ramah (1 Chron. xxvii. 27). Which of them is referred to in the passage is not known.

Ra-math-le'hi. See LEHI.

Ra-math-miz'peh. See MIZPAH 2.

Ram'e-ses [Egyptian, Ra-mes, son of the sun].

A town of Egypt in the most fertile district in the land (Gen. xlvii. 11). It was in the land of Goshen (6). By Pharaoh's orders, Joseph located his father and brothers there. The store city Raamses or Ramses, which the Israelites afterwards built for Pharaoh (probably Ramses II.), is probably meant (Exod. i. 11); see EGYPT III. 8. When the exodus took place the Israelites marched from Ramses to Succoth (Exod. xii. 37; Num. xxxiii. 3).

Ra-mi'ah [exalted is Jehovah].

A son of Parosh, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 25).

Ra'moth [high places, height].

1. A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 29). The R. V. reads Jeremoth in the text, and relegates Ramoth to the margin.

2. A town of Issachar, assigned for residence to the Gershonite Levites (1 Chron. vi. 73); see JARMUTH.

3. A town in Gilead; see RAMOTH-GILEAD.

4. A town of the south (1 Sam. xxx. 27); see RAMAH 6.

Ra-moth-gil'e-ad [heights of Gilead]. See MIZPAH 2.

Ram'ses.

A method of anglicizing the Egyptian Ra-mes. See PHARAOH and RAMESES.*

Ra'phah and Rapha [he has healed]

1. A son of Benjamin (1 Chron. viii. 2); but he is not enumerated with those who accompanied Jacob into Egypt (Gen. xlv. 21), and was probably born after the descent into Egypt. He did not found a tribal family; his descendants, if there were any, were included in other families of the Benjamites. Compare remarks under NOBAH.

2. A descendant of Jonathan (1 Chron. viii. 37). Called in ix. 43 Rephaiah, a synonymous name.

Ra'phon.

A town of Gilead, besieged by the Ammonites, but relieved by Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac. v. 37). It was apparently not far from Carnaim (43). It may be identical with Raphana, which was one of the original cities constituting the Decapolis, and was situated south of the sea of Galilee and east of the Jordan.

Ra'phu [healed, cured].

A Benjamite, father of Palti (Num. xiii. 9).

Ra'ven.

A bird, black in color (Song v. 11), omnivorous, feeding even on carrion (Prov. xxx. 17), and hence ceremonially unclean (Lev. xi. 15). Noah sent one forth from the ark. It did not return to him, finding, doubtless, floating carcases on which it was able to feed (Gen. viii. 7). It frequents valleys (Prov. xxx. 17), and makes its nest in solitary places (Is. xxxiv. 11). By divine providence ravens fed Elijah with bread and flesh morning and evening at the brook Cherith during the drought and famine (1 Kin. xvii. 2-7). The consonants of the words for ravens and Arabians are the same in Hebrew; and when the text is written without vowels, as originally, it is impossible to determine, if the context does not decide, whether Arabs or ravens are meant. It is generally admitted now that the Septuagint and Vulgate are right, and that the Hebrew writer intends to state that Elijah was fed by ravens. The bird referred to in Scripture is undoubtedly the common raven (Corvus corax), which is found in every part of Palestine. It is black, with steel-blue and purple iridescence, and is about 26 inches long. The name is broad enough, however, to include other Corvidæ. Another species (Corvus umbinus) occurs in southern Palestine and in the valley of the Jordan.

Ra'zor.

A sharp instrument for removing the beard or hair (Is. vii. 20; Ezek. v. 1). See KNIFE, BEARD, HAIR.

Re-a'iah, in A. V. once Reala (1 Chron. v. 5) [Jehovah has seen, or provided for].

1. A son of Shobal, and descended from Judah through Hezron (1 Chron. iv. 2), called in ii. 52 Haroeh, i. e., the seeing One.

2. A Reubenite (1 Chron. v. 5).

3. Founder of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from captivity (Ezra ii. 47; Neh. vii. 50).

Re'ba [perhaps, a fourth part or quarter].

One of the five Midianite kings, allies or vassals of Sihon, slain by the Israelites in the war waged by Moses against Midian, because they seduced Israel to licentious idolatry (Num. xxxi. 8; Josh. xii. 21).

Re-bek'ah, in N. T. Rebecca (Rom. ix. 10) [a rope with a noose, i. e., a young woman whose beauty ensnares men].

A daughter of Bethuel. When she came with her pitcher to a well near the city of Nahor, in Mesopotamia, the servant of Abraham, who had been sent to obtain a wife for Isaac, presented himself and asked permission to drink from her pitcher. She not only granted his request, but volunteered to draw water for his camels. He had asked God for this very sign; her conduct showed that she was of a generous disposition, he saw that she was beautiful; and he at once gave her expensive presents, as for a future bride. He did not at the time know her name, but asked what it was, and then added the inquiry whether he might lodge at her father's house. She was willing, and when her brother Laban's consent had been obtained, the delegate took up his temporary residence in their dwelling, and explained the object of his journey to Mesopotamia. He ended by petitioning that Rebekah should accompany him to Canaan and become the wife of Isaac. Laban gave his consent, and the maiden, adding hers, went with the servant, married Isaac, and became the mother of Esau and Jacob (Gen xxiv. 1-67). She preferred Jacob to Esau; and although she had the prophecy that Jacob should have the pre-eminence, she did not leave the matter in God's hands, but suggested a deceit by which the younger obtained the blessing belonging by birth to the elder (xxv. 28, xxvii. 1-xxviii. 5). She died apparently while Jacob was in Mesopotamia, and was buried in the cave of Machpelah (xlix. 31).

Re'cah, in A V Rechab

An unknown place in the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 12).

Re'chab [a horseman].

1. A son of Rimmon, a Beerothite. He was a captain of a band under Ish-bosheth and one of Ish-bosheth's murderers (2 Sam. iv. 2, 6).

2. A Kenite (1 Chron. ii. 55), father of that Jehonadab who was invited by Jehu to mount his chariot and see his zeal for the Lord (2 Kin x. 15, 23), and who placed his tribe under a rule of life. See RECHABITES.

3. Father of Malchijah, the ruler of Beth-achcherem (Neh iii. 14).

Re'chab-ites

A Kenite tribe, which dwelt among the Israelites. Their chief Jonadab, son of Rechab, commanded them to abstain from wine and all intoxicating liquor, not to live in houses, or plant or possess vineyards, but to dwell in tents. The object of these regulations was the preservation of primitive simplicity of manners. When Jeremiah tested their obedience years later he found them faithful. A promise was therefore given them that they should never want a man to represent them in all succeeding time (Jer xxxv. 1-19). Professed descendants of the sect still exist in Mesopotamia and Yemen.

Re'chah. See RECAH.

Re-cord'er.

An official of high rank in the Hebrew government from the time of David onward. He was called mazku, one who brings to mind, and probably derived his title from his official duty of recording important events and advising the king respecting them. At any rate he held one of the highest offices of state. He was numbered among the chief officials of David and Solomon (2 Sam viii. 16; 1 Kin. iv. 3). The prefect of the palace, the scribe, and the recorder represented Hezekiah in public business (2 Kin. xviii. 18, 37); and in the reign of Josiah the scribe, the governor of the city, and the recorder were placed in charge of the repairs of the temple (2 Chron. xxxiv. 8).

Red Sea.

The sea called by the Hebrews Yam suph, or sea of sedge. The Greek term, of which Red Sea is the literal translation, is Erythra Thalassa, used by Herodotus (ii. 8), the Septuagint (Ex. xv. 4, 22), Josephus (Antiq. ii. 11, 1; 15, 1). The Greeks derived the name from Erythras, a fabulous king who reigned in the adjacent country (Strabo xvi; Pliny, His Nat vi. 23). He possibly corresponds to Edom, or represents the red-skinned people, including Edomites, Hemyarites, and original Phœnicians. Not unlikely the name denotes sea of the red land, contrasted with the black soil of Egypt (Ebers). "The Eocene and Cretaceous limestones assume by weathering a rich reddish-brown hue, and under the evening sun the eastern range glows with a ruddy radiance, which in the morning is equally seen on the western cliffs, while these colors contrast with the clear greenish-blue of the sea itself. Such an appearance would naturally suggest to early voyagers the name Red Sea" (Dawson, Egypt and Syria, 59).

By the Erythrean Sea, the ancients understood not merely the Red Sea as limited by modern geographers, but also the Indian Ocean, and ultimately the Persian Gulf. In the restricted sense in which the term is used in modern geography, the Red Sea is about 1490 miles long, with an average breadth of about 150 miles. At its northern part it terminates in two gulfs, Suez and Akaba, which enclose between them the Sinaitic Peninsula. The gulf of Akaba lies on the east, and is about 100 miles long by 15 broad. At its northern end stood the towns of Elath and Ezion-geber. The gulf of Suez, on the west of the peninsula, is about 180 miles long by 20 broad, but it formerly extended farther northward and included, in prehistoric times at least, lake Timseah and the Bitter Lakes. The shores of both lakes abound in reeds, and this feature sufficiently accounts for the Hebrew designation, sea of sedge. The Hebrew term Yam suph denotes the Red Sea of modern geography, or at least so much of it as embraces the peninsula of Sinai; for it lay to the east of Egypt (Ex. x. 19), on it was an encampment of the Israelites not far from Sinai (Num. xxxiii. 10, 11), by taking the way of the Yam suph the Israelites compassed the land of Edom (xxi. 4), and Ezion-geber in the land of Edom was on this sea (1 Kin ix. 26). The Yam suph was crossed by the Israelites, and the pursuing Egyptian hosts sank into its depths (Ex. xv 4, 22). Brugsch advocated the view that the sea crossed was not the Red Sea, but the weedy Serbonian bog, which is separated from the Mediterranean by a narrow isthmus. The general opinion, however, based on constant Scripture representation, is that the sea crossed by the Israelites was the gulf of Suez, probably at a point immediately north or just south of the Bitter Lakes.

The navigation of the sea is at all times somewhat perilous, from the sudden changes of the wind and the strength with which it often blows. The voyage from end to end was rendered slow by the prevalent wind in the northern part of the sea blowing toward the south during nine months of the year, and in the southern part blowing northward during the same period. Besides this, the mariner has to be on his guard against coral reefs and small islands, which in many places rise above the surface of the sea.

Reed.

1 Any tall, broad-leaved grass growing in a wet place. It is called kaneh in Hebrew, kalamos in Greek (Is xlii 3 with Mat xii 20). When an odorous variety is intended, it is translated calamus or cane. It grows or grew in the Nile and elsewhere in the water (1 Kin. xiv. 15; Is. xix. 6; xxxv. 7), and is so tall and in such abundance that it helps to furnish shelter and concealment even for the bulky hippopotamus (Job xl. 21). It is easily shaken by the wind (1 Kin. xiv. 15), and so fragile that if one lean upon it, it will break with a ragged fracture, the projecting points entering and piercing the hand (2 Kin. xviii. 21; Is. xxxvi. 6; Ezek. xxix. 6, 7). In this last respect, it affords a lively picture of the treatment Egypt had given to the Israelites when they leaned upon that power in seasons of emergency. It was a reed which the persecutors of our Lord thrust into his hand for a scepter, and with which they afterwards struck him on the head; and it was to this or another stem of the same plant that the sponge was affixed which they dipped in vinegar and put to his lips (Mat xxvii 29, 30, 48). The plant referred to is probably Arundo donax, which grows in the Nile and is common throughout Palestine, is at least 10 feet high, and has leaves as long and as broad as those of a sword. It is cultivated in France, where its long, straight, and light stems are made into fishing rods, arrows, fences, poles for vine-

Reed (Arundo donax)

A reed stalk was used as a measuring rod, and came to denote a fixed length of six long cubits (Ezek. xl 5; xli 8). Likewise in Babylonia six cubits made a reed or kannu.

2 The rendering in Jer. li. 32 of the Hebrew 'agam, a marsh. It does not seem to be a plant, and is translated marsh on the margin of the R. V.

Re-el-a'lah [trembling caused by Jehovah].

One of the leading men who accompanied Zerubbabel and Jeshua from Babylon (Ezra ii. 2). Called in Neh vii. 7 by the synonymous name of Raamah.

Re-fin'er.

One who refines the precious metals, as silver or gold, by causing them to pass repeatedly through the furnace till their dross is taken away (Zech. xiii 9; cp. Ps xii 6). It is said that the refiner knows when the process is complete by seeing his image reflected in the precious metal purified. God is compared to a refiner of silver, by which is meant that he casts his people into the furnace of affliction, till they are refined and purified (Mal. iii 2, 3). Then they clearly reflect his image in their souls.

Ref'uge. See CITY OF REFUGE.

Re'gem [friend].

A man of Judah, a son of Jahdai (1 Chron. ii. 47).

Re-gem-me'lech [friend of the king].

A man sent from Bethel with companions to put a question to the priests regarding fasting (Zech. vii. 2).

Re-ha-bi'ah [Jehovah is comprehensive]. Son of Eliezer, and grandson of Moses (1 Chron. xxiii. 17; xxiv. 21; xxvi. 25).

Re'hob [an open space, a broad street].

1. A place situated toward Hamath; see BETH-REHOB.

2. A town on the boundary line of the territory of Asher (Josh. xix. 28), perhaps the same as Rehob, which belonged to Asher (30). From Rehob the Canaanites were not expelled (Judg i. 31). Rehob was assigned to the Levites (Josh. xxi. 31; 1 Chron. vi. 75). The site is unknown.

3. Father of Hadadezer, king of Zobah (2 Sam viii. 3, 12).

4. A Levite who sealed the covenant (Neh. i. 11).

Re-ho-bo'am, in A. V. of N. T. Roboam [the people is enlarged].

Son of king Solomon by Naamah, an Ammonitess, one of his wives (1 Kin. xiv. 31). Although son of a wise father, he was himself a man of small mind. On the death of Solomon about 931 B. C., representatives of all the twelve tribes promptly assembled at the central city of Shechem to make Rehoboam, who was his lawful successor, king. Various causes more or less remote had led to jealousy and a growing coldness between Judah and the tribes to the north and east; see HISTORY. Recently the people had suffered under grievous taxation levied to support Solomon's splendor, and opportunity was taken to lay the grievances of the people before the future ruler. The spokesman was Jeroboam, an able man who had been an official under Solomon and had been told by the prophet Ahijah that he should become king of ten tribes. The popular demand was that taxation might be lightened. Rehoboam asked three days for deliberation. He consulted the old men who had till lately been counselors of his father, who advised him to accede to the request and speak good words to the petitioners, and assured him that the people would then be his servants forever. He next consulted the young men who had grown up with him, and they urged him to say to the people: "My little finger is thicker than my father's loins. And now whereas my father did lade you with a heavy yoke, I will add to your yoke; my father chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions." It indicated the mental caliber of Rehoboam that he rejected the counsel of the sages and uttered the words of folly which his young companions had put into his mouth. The effect was instantaneous. Ten out of the twelve tribes renounced their allegiance to Rehoboam, departed to their homes, and were forever lost to the house of David. The king sent after them Adoram, who was over the tribute, but they stoned him to death, on which his master, fearing that the next missiles would be directed against himself, hastily mounted his chariot, and drove to Jerusalem (1 Kin. xii. 1-20; 2 Chron. x 1-19). Judah and a large part of Benjamin, together with the Simeonites, were left him. He mustered the entire militia of his kingdom to attempt the subjugation of the revolted tribes, but the prophet Shemaiah forbade the enterprise (1 Kin. xii. 21-24; 2 Chron. xi. 1-4). He therefore contented himself with fortifying a number of cities in Judah and Benjamin and provisioning the garrisons (5-12). The erection of the golden calves by his rival at Bethel and Dan drove southward almost the whole body of the priests and Levites, which greatly increased the strength of the kingdom of Rehoboam; but after three years he himself lapsed into idolatry (1 Kin. xiv. 21-24; 2 Chron. xi. 13-17, xii. 1). In the fifth year of his reign, Shishak, king of Egypt, invaded his kingdom, capturing some of the fenced cities, ultimately taking Jerusalem itself, and plundering the temple and the palace (1 Kin. xiv. 25-28, 2 Chron. xii. 2-12); see PHARAOH. Rehoboam had eighteen wives and sixty concubines, twenty-eight sons and sixty daughters (21). Ahijah his son claimed that at the time of his great mistake he was young and tender-hearted, in reality, he was at that time forty-one years old. He reigned seventeen years, and died about 915 B. C., leaving his son, Ahijah, to ascend the throne (1 Kin. xiv. 21, 31. 2 Chron. xii. 13, 16).

Re-ho'both [broad places, streets, figuratively roominess, freedom]

1. A well dug by Isaac in the valley of Gerar. Since the Philistine herdsmen did not claim it, as they had its two predecessors, he named it Rehoboth, meaning river (Gen. xxvi. 22). Robinson identified the valley as the wady Ruheibeh, a day's journey south of Beer-sheba; but he could find no wells. Stewart met with one, which was subsequently seen also by Rowlands. Palmer and Drake fell in with a second one, which had previously escaped notice from having been covered by fallen masonry.

2. A suburb of Nineveh (Gen. x. 11), see REHOBOTH-IR.

3. A town "by the river" (Gen. xxxvi. 37, 1 Chron. i. 48). "The river" commonly denotes the Euphrates. Chesney suggested as its site Rahabeh, 3 miles from the right (the west) bank of the river, 8 miles below the mouth of the Khabour. There is a castle at the spot, with extensive ruins around. Four or five miles lower down, and on the eastern bank, is a second Rahabeh, called Rahabeh Malik (Royal Rahabeh). One or other is probably the proper site, but it is not possible to decide on their relative claims. Jewish tradition is in favor of the second.

Re-ho'both-ir [open spaces or markets of the city]

A city which formed part of the great city Nineveh or, as we would say, Greater Nineveh (Gen. x. 11; in A. V. the city Rehoboth).

Re'hum [beloved].

1. A chancellor of Persia in the country beyond the river, who in the time of Artaxerxes complained against the Jews for rebuilding the temple (Ezra iv. 8, 9).

2. One of the principal men who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra ii. 2).

xiii. 15-23). The four cities of Bezer, Jahaz, Kedemoth, and Mephaath, with their suburbs, were assigned to the Merarite Levites (Josh. xxi 7, 36, 37; 1 Chron. vi. 63, 78, 79); the first of these, Bezer, was a city of refuge (Josh. xx. 8; 1 Chron. vi. 78). The Reubenites had an exposed position, the Moabites being in their immediate vicinity, while desert marauders could invade their territory both from the east and the south. If the list of Reubenite cities given in this section be compared with those in Moabite possession incidentally mentioned in Is. xv., xvi., Jer. xlviii., and on the Moabite stone, it will be seen that in the times of Mesha and these prophets Reuben had its limits greatly curtailed by Moabite conquest. The whole territory, which is a table-land quite capable of cultivation, is now deserted by its settled inhabitants, and is given up to the nomad and plundering tribes of the desert.

Reu'el, in A. V. once Raguel (Num. x. 29) in imitation of the Greek form [friend of God].

1. A descendant of Esau and also of Ishmael (Gen. xxxvi. 2-4).

2. Moses' father-in-law (Ex. ii. 18). See JETHRO.

3. A Benjamite, a son of Ibniyah (1 Chron. ix. 8).

4. A Gadite, father of Eliasaph (Num. ii. 14); see DEUEL.

Reu'mah [exalted].

A concubine of Nahor, Abraham's brother (Gen. xxii. 24).

Rev-e-la'tion [an unveiling]. It is derived from the Latin revelatio, unveiling; hence to reveal, to expose to sight, and, metaphorically, to disclose to the mind truth otherwise unknown. Greek Apokalupsis; whence English Apocalypse.

In the O. T. the noun revelation does not occur; but the verb reveal is used in the sense of making known secrets (e. g. Prov. xi. 13) and then of God's disclosure of his will to man (e. g. Deut. xxix. 29; Is. xxii. 14; Dan. ii. 19, 22, 28; Amos iii. 7). In the N. T. revelation is used for the disclosure by God or Christ or the Spirit of truth concerning divine things previously unknown (e. g. Rom. xvi. 25; 1 Cor. xiv. 6, 26; 2 Cor. xii. 1; Gal. i. 12; Rev. i. 1) or of duty specially required (Gal. ii. 2), and then for the manifestation or appearance of persons or events previously concealed from sight (e. g. Rom. ii. 5; 1 Pet. i. 13). In theology revelation means the communication of truth by God to man, and is usually applied to such communications as have been conveyed through supernatural agencies.

The Revelation of St. John the Divine is the last book of the N. T., also called, from the Greek, the Apocalypse. The name is given to it because, as its opening words state, it is a disclosure of the future, and, therefore, preeminently a revelation. Its author describes it as a communication concerning "things which must shortly come to pass," which God gave to Jesus Christ, and which Christ gave by his angel to his servant John, to be in turn communicated to the church (Rev. i. 1-3). The work is addressed to seven churches of the Roman province of Asia: Ephesus, Smyrna, Pergamum, Thyatira, Sardis, Philadelphia, and Laodicea (4, 11), the number seven being selected probably because, as the sacred number, it signified completeness, and thus indicated that the book was really addressed to the whole church. The author calls himself, after the manner of the Hebrew prophets (cp. Is. i. 1; Joel i. 1; Amos i. 1, etc.), simply John (Rev. i. 4, 9; xii. 8), and relates that the visions of the book were seen by him when confined in the island of Patmos "for the word of God and the testimony of Jesus" (i. 9). Patmos lies off the southwestern coast of Asia Minor, and John had been banished to it because he was a Christian. This points to a period of persecution by the Roman government. The opening vision was of the exalted Christ, who is represented in a symbolic portraiture as standing in the midst of seven golden candlesticks which represent the seven churches (10-20). Christ gives to the seer messages to the seven churches, and after that follows a succession of other visions. The revelation is said to have been given on the Lord's day (10), by which we are doubtless to understand the first day of the week. The visions described are of a highly symbolical character. Many of the figures and much of the language are taken from the O. T. prophets, especially from Daniel and Ezekiel, and the meaning cannot be understood without constant reference to them.

Examining the book more closely, we find that after the introduction (i. 1-3) and salutation (4-8), it consists of seven chief divisions, extending to xxii. 7, after which the book closes with an epilogue (8-21). These divisions constitute in fact seven visions, or series of visions, and are themselves subdivided usually into seven parts. Each series opens with a vision, which presents as a whole the idea of the series, and which is then followed in most instances by a sevenfold representation of its elements. These visions are probably not to be understood as representing events which were to follow one another in history in the order of time, but as symbolical portraitures of certain religious truths or principles which were to be realized in the experience of the church. The whole is intended for the church's comfort and warning amid the conflicts of time and in preparation for the second coming of her Lord (i. 7, 8; xxii. 7, 10, 17, 20). The seven series of visions, which show the analysis of the book, are the following:

1. The vision of the glorified Christ amid his church, followed by seven messages to the seven churches of Asia (i. 9-iii. 22). Here the main thought is of instruction, warning, and encouragement for the church in her present condition.

2 The vision of God, presiding over the destinies of the universe and adored by all creation, and of the exalted, but redeeming, Lamb of God, who holds in his hand the sealed book of the divine decrees (iv, v), followed by the breaking of the seals in seven visions, whereby is portrayed the sevenfold purpose of God from the going forth of Christ to conquer unto the last judgment (vi. 1-viii. 1). Between the sixth and seventh seals an episode is introduced, which shows the safety of the people of God amid the judgment which befalls the world (vii).

3 The vision of the trumpets (viii 2-xi. 19). It opens with the vision of an angel offering the prayers of the saints to God (viii 2-6). Then each trumpet is followed by a vision of destruction upon the sinful world, ending again with the last judgment. Between the sixth and seventh trumpets an episode again is introduced, descriptive of the preservation of the witnessing church (x 1-xi 14). The main thought here appears to be that in reply to the prayers of the saints for God to vindicate his truth, they are shown the desolations which befall the sinful world amid which they are to bear their testimony.

4 The vision of the church, under the figure of a woman, bringing forth the Christ, against whom the dragon, or Satan, wages war (xii). followed by visions of the beasts, which Satan will use as his agents (xiii), of the militant church (xiv 1-5), and of the advancing stages of Christ's conquest (6-20). This may be called the vision of conflict.

5. The vision of the vials, or bowls, containing the last plagues, or judgments of God (xv, xvi). The opening vision (xv) depicts the triumph of the saints, while the seven bowls represent the sevenfold judgment of God on a wicked world (xvi).

6. The vision of the harlot city, Babylon (xvii), followed by the victory of Christ over her, and over his enemies in league with her, ending again in the last judgment (xviii 1-xx. 15). Between the sixth and seventh scenes of this triumph an episode is introduced (xx. 1-10), which is probably descriptive of the complete safety and spiritual deliverance of Christ's people throughout the whole period of the age-long battle. Some scholars, however, place the division between the sixth and seventh series of visions at xix. 11.

7. The vision of the ideal church, the bride of Christ, or new Jerusalem (xxi 1-8), followed by a description of her glory (9-xxii. 7).

General agreement prevails among both critical and devotional students of the Revelation that the book as it stands has unity, and a unity that is easily recognized. Structural unity is apparent in its having a framework consisting of seven groups of usually seven episodes and in a general grammatical and linguistic similarity.

The author of the book of the Revelation was a Jewish Christian, with a noble universalistic outlook, thoroughly conversant with the contents of the Old Testament and with its literary forms, and able to mold characteristic prophecies of Daniel and Ezekiel into his own picture of the church's conflict and final glory (see DANIEL and EZEKIEL). His name was John (Rev. i. 1, 4, 9; xxii. 8). That he was John the apostle has been the constant tradition of the church from the earliest time. It is specifically so stated by Justin Martyr in the middle of the second century, by Melito also and Irenæus of the same century. It is confirmed also by a comparison of the book with the Gospel and First Epistle of John, for all three books have in common many doctrinal ideas and many more peculiarities of language. The Revelation, indeed, is less smoothly written than the Gospel or Epistle; but that is partly because of its subject, which led the author to employ unusual expressions in his descriptions, and partly because he was bent on repeating and combining the language of the older prophets. Some scholars, indeed, both in ancient and modern times (as Dionysius of Alexandria, A. D. 247-265), have contended that the Revelation and the Gospel could not have been written by the same person. But examination, as well as the steadfast tradition of the church, makes the division of authorship both improbable and unnecessary.

An effort has been made to trace the source of the Revelation, especially of chapters xii. and xiii. and related passages, to Babylonian mythology. Thus far the investigation—1. Has ignored the plain meaning of these chapters, which unquestionably depict the church opposed by Satan's spiritual power (Rev. xii. 3-17; see verse 9), by the powers of the world united and subservient to Satan (xiii. 1-10), and by false prophecy, like Elijah calling down fire from heaven, coming in sheep's clothing, and perhaps impersonating the Lamb (xiii. 11-17). 2. Has overlooked the inherent symbolism of nature, which speaks to poets of all races independently of each other. 3. Has assumed details for Babylonian myths for which there is no archaeological evidence. 4. Has failed to see that for the author the immediate and sufficient source of the imagery is Hebrew Scripture as contained in Gen. iii. and Dan. vii. (see DANIEL), while the imagery and thought of Jer. li. 1-12 lend a further deep coloring to chap. xvii.

Concerning the date of the Revelation, two principal opinions have been held. One assigns it to the year or two immediately preceding the fall of Jerusalem in A. D. 70. This was after the persecution of the Christians by Nero had broken out, and it is supposed that the terrors of the fall of Jerusalem, combined with those of the Neronian persecution, provide many of the lurid figures used by the seer. Most rationalistic critics also accept approximately this date, and see in Revelation no inspired prophecy at all, but only a human vaticination suggested by the calamities of the age. But the traditional opinion, voiced by Irenæus as early as A. D. 175-200, has ever assigned Revelation to the close of the reign of Domitian, A. D. 96. The testimony is strong that John was imprisoned in Patmos by Domitian, and returned to Ephesus after that tyrant's death. It is unlikely that so specific and unanimous a tradition should be mistaken. The condition of the seven churches likewise suits the later date better than the earlier; the style does not require the Revelation to precede the Gospel, nor are most of the reasons advanced for the earlier date satisfactory to those who believe in the inspiration of the book.

The interpretations of Revelation have been innumerable. Four general classes of interpretation may, however, be distinguished. (1) The præterist interpretation, which regards the work as a description of what was taking place when the book was written. This view destroys its prophetic character, and is certainly to be rejected. (2) The futurist interpretation, which sees in the book predictions of events yet to be fulfilled. This view is met by the difficulty that all prophecy, and this one in particular, closely connects itself with the situation of the church and prophet, to whom it was given. (3) The historico-prophetic interpretation, which sees in the visions a successive portrayal of the events of Christian history. The difficulty with this view is that few expositors can agree on the details of the fulfillment, and that it disregards the contemporaneous character of the seven series of visions. (4) The spiritual, symbolic interpretation, which regards the visions as figurative portrayments of certain truths or principles, destined to find their place in the history of the church, and the contemplation of which in pictorial representation is intended to encourage and comfort Christ's people until he comes again in glory and to judgment. While no expositor can feel sure that he has understood the meaning of all the contents of the Revelation, the last method of interpretation has the advantage of directing the attention of readers to certain large and important truths, under the form of pictures, thus making this most mysterious book of Scripture practically helpful. Re-ven'ger. See AVENGER OF BLOOD Re'zeph [a hearthstone for cooking upon, a pavement].

A place which the rabshakeh boasted that the Assyrians had destroyed (2 Kin. xix. 12;

Is. xxxvii. 12). It is doubtless the town Rasappa, long residence of an Assyrian governor, the modern Rusafa, some miles west of the Euphrates on the route to 'Almyra.

Re-zí'a. See RIZIA.

Re'zin.

1. A king of Damascus. About 738 B. C. he paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria. Four years later, in the time of Ahaz, he joined with Pekah, king of Israel, in an effort to capture Jerusalem and place a creature of their own upon the throne of David. They failed, after eliciting from Isaiah a celebrated prophecy (Is. vii. 1-ix. 12). On this campaign, before attempting to unite his troops with those of Pekah, Rezin marched to Elath on the gulf of Akaba and took the town from Judah (2 Kin. xvi. 6). The aid of Tiglath-pileser had been purchased by Ahaz; and the Assyrian king, after chastising the Philistines for their participation in the hostilities against Judah, marched against Damascus, besieged it during the years 733 and 732 B. C., ravaged the surrounding district, finally captured the city, and slew Rezin (7-9, and Assyrian inscriptions).

2. Founder of a family of Nethunim, members of which returned from the captivity (Ezra ii. 48; Neh. vii. 50).

Re'zon [importance, princeliness]

A son of Elhada, and a subject of Hadad-ezer, king of Zobah. When David captured Zobah, Rezon gathered a band of men, seized Damascus, and founded the Syrian kingdom, with which, while it lasted, the Israelites had continual relations, hostile or friendly (1 Kin. xi. 23-25).

Rhe'gi-um.

A city of Greek origin on the coast of Italy, opposite to Messina in Sicily. Paul's vessel touched at Rhegium after having made a circuit from Syracuse (Acts xviii. 13). Rhegium is now called Reggio, and is the capital of Calabria. It is a town of considerable size, and exports oranges, lemons, wine, oil, etc.

Rhe'sa.

A descendant of Zerubbabel, and an ancestor of Christ (Luke iii. 27).

Rho'da [a rose bush].

A servant girl of Mary, the mother of Mark. When Peter, after having been miraculously released from prison, knocked at the door of the gate of Mary's house, Rhoda was sent to see who was there. On hearing Peter's voice, she was elated with joy, and, forgetting in her excitement to let him in, ran back to tell that it was Peter. The apostle had for some time to continue the knocking before he could gain admittance (Acts xii. 13-16).

Rhodes, in A. V. of 1 Mac. xv. 23 Rhodus [a rose bush]

An island off the coast of Caria, in the southwest of Asia Minor. It is about 45 miles long by 20 broad, and is remarkable for its orange and citron groves. The island was at the junction of great commercial routes for coasting vessels, and became a commercial center which ranked with Alexandria and Carthage. Its capital, also called Rhodes, was famed for its Colossus, a great lighthouse, said to have been 70 cubits, or about 105 feet, high. It was erected between 300 and 288 B. C. The Rhodians were semi-independent under the Romans (1 Mac xv 23), except during nine years in the reign of Claudius, beginning A. D. 44, and again in the time of Vespasian. The vessel in which Paul sailed to Palestine from Assos touched at Rhodes (Acts xxi. 1) which was then a splendid city. As the Rhodians long remained unsubdued by the Romans, so, led by the knights of St John, who in A. D. 1310 had possessed themselves of the island, they defied the power of the Turks till 1522, when they had to surrender on terms, the knights being allowed to transfer themselves to the isle of Malta. Since that time Rhodes has remained subject to the Turks.

Ri'bai [contentious].

A Benjamite of Gibeah, and the father of Ittai, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 29; 1 Chron. xi. 31).

Rib'lah [fertility].

A town in the land of Hamath (2 Km xxiii 33; xxv 21). The Egyptians were encamped there when Jehoahaz was brought in as a prisoner (xxiii. 33). When Zedekiah was captured after his escape from Jerusalem, he was brought to Nebuchadnezzar, then encamped at Riblah, who put out his eyes, and had him bound to be carried to Babylon. His sons and the princes of Judah were also slain at Riblah (xxv. 6, 7, 21; Jer. xxxix. 5-7; in 9-11, 27). Buckingham, in 1816, met with ruins at a place called by him Rubla, but now more generally spelled Riblah, on the right bank of the Orontes, about 36 miles north by east of Ba'al-bek, in the midst of the great plain of Coele-syria, very suitable for the encampment of a great army, and with easy access southward or northward if commotion arose. The ruins consist of low mounds surrounded by the remains of old buildings. It is extremely doubtful whether it is identical with Riblah on the northern boundary of Palestine, east of Ain (Num. xxxiv. 11).

Rid'die.

In biblical usage, any dark saying, of which the meaning is not at once clear and must be discovered by shrewd thought (Num. xii. 8, in E. V. dark speeches; Prov. i. 6, R. V. margin). It may be a parable (Ps. xlix. 4; lxxviii. 2; in E. V. dark saying), and be proposed merely in order to arouse attention and start inquiry, and make the truth more vivid and impressive, the propounder intending to give an explanation immediately (Ezek. xvii. 2-24); or the riddle may be set forth for men to guess, as the riddle of Samson and those of Solomon and Hiram to which Josephus refers (Judg. xiv. 12-19; Antiq. viii. 5, 3). The riddle of Samson was proposed in verse. It was not properly a riddle at all, since the discovery of its meaning was not within the realm of possibility for the Philistines. It was not guessable, for they were not acquainted with the facts on which it was based.

The Greeks and Romans were fond of the riddle or enigma. One of the most celebrated was put into the mouth of the monster named the sphinx, which had been sent to ravage the territory of Thebes. She asked "What animal goes on four feet in the morning, on two at noon, and on three in the evening?" After many had failed, Oedipus answered that it was man, who in infancy creeps on all fours, at maturity walks on two feet, and in old age uses a staff. Thereupon the sphinx flung herself to the ground and perished.

Rie, obsolete spelling of Rye. See SPELT.

Rim'mon I., in A. V. twice Remmon (Josh. xiv. 7, 13), in R. V. once Rimmono (1 Chron. vi. 77) [a pomegranate].

1 A Benjamite, whose two sons were captains under Ish-bosheth, and became his murderers (2 Sam. iv. 2).

2 A town in the south of Judah near Ain (Josh. xv. 32; 1 Chron. iv. 32; Zech. xiv. 10), so near indeed as to form, apparently, one community with it (Neh. xi. 29). It was soon transferred with Ain and other towns to Simeon (Josh. xix. 7). It is identified with the ruin Ummi er-Rumânin, about 10 miles northeast by north of Beer-sheba.

3 A border town of Zebulun, but assigned to the Levites (Josh. xix. 13; 1 Chron. vi. 77; and Josh. xxi. 35, where Dimnah is doubtless a misreading, resh being mistaken for dalet, q. v.). Methoar in A. V. of Josh. xix. 13 is improperly regarded as part of the name, whereas it describes the boundary as "stretching" to Neah. The name of the town is preserved in Rumânneh, a village 6 miles north, slightly east, of Nazareth.

3 A rock near Gibeah, where 600 vanquished Benjamites took refuge and remained four months (Judg. xx. 45-47; xxi. 13). It is probably the detached limestone eminence 3½ miles east, slightly north, of Bethel. It is separated from all approach on the south, the north, and the west by ravines, and has caverns, in which the refugees may have lived. The name still lingers in Rammun, a village on the summit.

Rim'mon II. [thunderer].

A Syrian god, who had a temple at Damascus, in which Naaman and his royal master were accustomed to bow themselves for worship (2 Kin. v. 18). In Assyria Rimmon, or Rammun as his name was pronounced there, was numbered among the twelve great deities. He was the god of rain and storm, lightning and thunder. Sometimes he was treated as the destroyer of crops and the catterer of the harvest, and at others was adored as the lord of fecundity. He was identical with Hadad, the supreme god of the Syrians. The two names are combined in Hadad-Rimmon.

Rim'mo-no. See RIMMON.

Rim-mon-pe'rez, in A V Rimmon-parez pomegranate of the breach or cleft].

A camping ground of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. xxxiii. 19, 20). Situation unknown.

Ring. See ORNAMENT and SEAL.

Rin'nah [a wild cry, a shout].

A man of Judah, a son of Shimon (1 Chron. v. 20).

Ri'phath.

A people descended from Gomer (Gen. x. 5; in 1 Chron. i. 6 Diphath; see DALETH). Josephus identifies them with the Paphlagonians (Antiq. i. 6, 1). The name is perhaps preserved in the Riphæan mountains, which were supposed by the ancients to skirt the northern shore of the world.

Ris'sah [a ruin, or dew, rain].

A camping ground of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. xxxiii. 21, 22). Exact situation unknown.

Rith'mah [broom, plant].

A camping ground of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. xxxiii. 18, 19); perhaps at Kadesh in the wady known as Abu 'etemat, the equivalent of the ancient name; see KADESH 1.

Riv'er.

Of several words translated river, only three require mention here: 1. Nahar, a stream, in Greek potamos, applied to the largest rivers known to the Hebrews, as the Tigris and Euphrates (Gen. ii. 14; Rev. ix. 4), the Abana and Pharpar (2 Kin. v. 12), the Jordan (Mark i. 5), and the affluents of the Upper Nile (Zeph. iii. 10). The river or the great river usually denotes the Euphrates (Gen. xv. 18; xxxi. 21). 2. Nahal, sometimes a perennial stream like the Jabok (Deut. ii. 37), but usually a winter current, the bed of which is dry in summer; wady. See BROOK. 3. Y'or, a stream, used almost exclusively of the Nile and its mouths, and sounding much like the native Egyptian name of that river (Gen. xli. 1; 2 Kin. xix. 24; Ezek. xxix. 3). It once denotes the Tigris (Dan. xii. 5-7; cp. x. 4, R. margin).

Riv'er of E'gypt.

1. The Nile, and specifically its most eastern channel, the Pelusiac branch (Gen. xv. 3); see SHIHOR. In this passage the two great rivers, the Nile and the Euphrates, are named broadly as the boundaries of the promised land. The brook of Egypt or wady el-'Arish was commonly regarded as the southwestern limit of Palestine; but the country between this wady and the eastern branch of the Nile was mainly desert, and the Nile was virtually on the boundary of Egypt. The passage means that the descendants of Abraham should possess the land as far as Egypt. The distinction between the Nile and the wady el-'Arish is well established; for the former is a nahar and the latter a nahal.

2. A great wady or nahal, uniformly called in the R. V. the brook of Egypt. It was the southwestern border of Canaan (Num. xxxiv. 5; 1 Kin. viii. 65; 2 Kin. xxiv. 7), and the limit in the same direction of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 4, 47). It was known to the Assyrians by the same name as to the Hebrews, and likewise as a boundary. It is the wady el-'Arish, a watercourse nominally dry, but which after heavy rains runs northward from the desert, being fed by tributaries, one of which passes Kadesh-barnea. It falls into the Mediterranean, about 50 miles south of Gaza.

Ri-z'ia, in A. V. Rezia [delight].

An Asherite, a son of Ulla (1 Chron. vii. 39).

Riz'pah [a hot stone].

A daughter of Aiah and concubine of Saul. On her account the quarrel arose between Ish-bosheth and Abner, which resulted in Abner's going over to David (2 Sam. iii. 6-8). Her children, Armoni and Mephibosheth, were put to death during the famine which arose in David's reign on account of Saul's treatment of the Gibeonites (2 Sam. xxi. 8-11).

Road.

An inroad, a raid, an incursion into an enemy's country (1 Sam. xxvii. 10, in R. V. raid). This sense is now obsolete in ordinary language. When a road in the modern sense is intended, the A. V. and R. V. generally use the term way, or sometimes path. See PALESTINE 5.

Rob'ber. See THIEF.

Ro-bo'am. See REHOBOAM.

Rock.

Rocks were found nearly everywhere in the hilly and mountainous districts of Palestine. Some had definite names, as the rock of Oreb (Judg. vii. 25), the rock of Etam (xv. 8). See OREB, ETAM.

Rock-badger'er.

The rendering of the Hebrew Shaphan, on the margin of the R. V., where cone appears in the text. The animal intended by the Hebrew word is small and wary, dwells among the rocks (Ps. civ. 18; Prov. xxx. 24, 26), and chews the cud, but does not part the hoof (Lev. xi. 5; Deut. xiv. 7). The corresponding name in the dialect of southern Arabia denotes the Hyrax syriacus, the so-called rock-badger. The hyrax looks like a rabbit or badger, but has more affinity to the rhinoceros and the tapir; indeed, its structure is so anomalous that it has been given a whole order, Hyraecordea, to itself. It moves its jaws as if it were chewing the cud, but it does not really ruminate. The species syriacus is found in the peninsula of Sinai, northern Palestine, and the region round the Dead Sea. Its fur is tawny, with a yellow spot on the back. It lives in clefts of rocks, but does not scoop out a hole. Small parties meet together, with a sentinel on some eminence to give warning of danger. It is rarely seen except in the morning and evening, when it comes forth to feed.

Rock-badger (Hyrax syriacus).

Rod'a-nim [a plural form, Rodanites].

A people descended from Javan (Hebrew text of 1 Chron. i. 7, and Septuagint and Samaritan text of Gen. x. 4). If Rodanim is the correct reading, the people of Rhodes and of the neighboring islands of the Ægean Sea are probably intended. See DODANIM.

Roe.

A deer (Capreolus caprea, the Cervus capreolus of Linnæus) which is described under ROEBUCK (2 Sam. ii. 18; 1 Chron. xii. 8, in Hebrew שְׁבִי; and Prov. v. 19, A. V., in Hebrew יָאֵלָה); see GAZELLE and DOE.

Roe'buck.

1 The rendering in A. V. of the Hebrew שְׁבִי in Deut. xii. 15, 22; xiv. 5; xv. 22; 1 Kin. iv. 23. R. V. substitutes gazelle (q. v.).

2 The rendering in R. V. of the Hebrew יָהֲמוֹר. The animal was ceremonially clean and used for food (Deut. xiv. 5; 1 Kin. iv. 23, in A. V. fallow deer). Etymology indicates that its color was reddish. According to Arabian authorities, it casts its horns every year, which is characteristic of deer. In northern Galilee the name yahmur is still given to the roebuck (Capreolus caprea, or Cervus capreolus). In Europe it is a small deer about two feet high at the shoulder, but in Asia it attains to a larger size. In summer it is dark reddish-brown, in winter yellowish-gray. It has a large patch of white on the rump. The antlers are about a foot long, with three points. It is wild over a great part of Europe and Asia. In Palestine it is found on mount Carmel and mount Lebanon.

By many, however, the yahmur is identified with the bubale, one of the bovine antelopes. It is about the size of a large stag, has a long head, a narrow forehead, and reddish or pale brown hair. Its flesh is most savory.

Ro'ge-lim [fullers, perhaps, or spies].

A town in Gilead where Barzillai lived (2 Sam. xvii. 27; xix. 31). Site unknown.

Roh'gah [clamor]

An Asherite, family of Beriah, house of Heber (1 Chron. vii. 34).

Roll.

The sheet of papyrus or the parchment on which documents were frequently written in ancient times was rolled up or wound around a stick, like a modern map, and thus constituted a roll (Jer. xxxvi. 2) or a volume in the original sense of the term (Ps. xl. 7, A. V.); see BOOK. The word rendered roll in Is. viii. 1, A. V., should be translated tablet.

Ro-mam-ti-e'zer [I have exalted help].

A singer, a son of Heman (1 Chron. xxv. 4). He obtained the twenty-fourth lot among the courses of the singers (31).

Ro'mans.

1 Inhabitants of Rome (1 Mac. viii. 1; Acts ii. 10, "sojourners from Rome," R. V.).

2 Those who represent the Roman government (John xi. 48; Acts xxv. 16; xxviii. 17).

3 Those, wherever born or of whatever race, who possessed the rights of citizenship in the Roman empire (Acts xvi. 21, 37, 38; xxii. 25, 26, 27, 29). By the Porcian Law, which was so named because it was proposed and carried by P. Porcius Læca, a tribune of the people, 248 B. C., it was declared that no magistrate had the right to bind, scourge, or kill a Roman citizen. The life of one so privileged could not be taken away except by a decision of the whole people met in the comitia centuriata, a general assembly of the people, voting in divisions called centuries. If a magistrate or ruler of any kind gave orders to scourge one entitled to the protection of this law, the latter had only to utter the words, "I am a Roman citizen," and all procedure was stayed till the people had decided on his case. When the power formerly possessed by the people was transferred to the emperor, it was to him that the right of appeal lay. The privileges of Roman citizenship were first limited to residents in Rome itself: then they were extended to various Italian tribes and cities; then to the greater part of Italy; then to places beyond the Italian peninsula; and so on and on till, it is said, Caracalla (A. D. 211-217) conferred them on every inhabitant of the Roman empire. During the transition period individuals who had rendered service to Rome might be declared citizens, or the privilege might be purchased for money, even in towns or districts which were not as yet enfranchised. Sometimes also manumitted slaves were granted citizenship. These explanations make it easy to understand how Paul, though of Jewish descent (Phil iii. 5), could still be a Roman citizen; and how Claudius Lysias thought it worth his while to purchase the privilege for a great sum of money (Acts xxii. 28); and how, when he had given orders that Paul should be scourged, and was informed by the centurion that the apostle was a Roman citizen, procedure was immediately stopped (25-29). One can also understand the alarm of the authorities at Philippi when they had taken the responsibility of having Paul and Silas openly beaten, and, to make matters worse, uncondemned, without first taking means to ascertain whether or not they were Roman citizens (xvi. 36-38). It will appear also that Paul simply exercised his legal right when he took his appeal to Caesar; that is, to the Roman emperor (xxv. 11).

Ro'mans, E-pis'tle to the.

The first of St. Paul's epistles according to the order in which they are placed in our N. T. In order of composition, however, it was the sixth, since it was written from Corinth, as appears from the salutations (cp. xvi. 23 with 1 Cor i. 14 and 2 Tim. iv. 20), and from the fact that it was carried to Rome by Phœbe, a servant or deaconess of the church at Cenchræ (Rom. xvi. 1), which was near Corinth (Acts xviii. 18); and, if so, it must have been written during the visit to Greece mentioned in Acts xx. 2, 3. That was in the winter of A. D. 57-58. The apostle had long wished to visit Rome (Rom. i. 10-12; xv. 23), and it was his purpose, his work in the east having been finished (xv. 23), to visit the capital on his way to Spain (28). Before doing so, however, he was determined to return to Jerusalem to present the gifts of the gentile churches (25, 26). Not knowing, however, what might be his fate on this dangerous journey (30-32; Acts xx. 22), he sent this letter to the Christians at Rome, where he had many friends (cp. Rom. xvi.), for, as the apostle of the gentiles, he considered the church at Rome to be under his care (xv. 15, 16), although he had never visited it. The theme of the epistle, which is one of the most elaborate ever written by him, was naturally determined by the controversies through which he had passed and by the need of stating, formally and completely, the gospel which he preached among the gentiles. It is a full presentation, therefore, of the way of salvation. Hence its supreme importance. That he addressed it to the Christians at Rome indicates, no doubt, his appreciation of the influence which the church of the world's metropolis would exert, and the consequent necessity of establishing it in the faith that it might resist the assaults of error.

Whereas the Epistle of Paul to the Galatians is the magna charta of universal Christianity, the Epistle to the Romans is its constitution. The epistle may be analyzed as follows: After the salutation (1-7) and statement of his interest in them (8-15), he epitomizes the character of his gospel; and, in doing so, gives the theme of the epistle: "The gospel is the power of God unto salvation to every one that believeth. For therein is the righteousness of God revealed from faith to faith" (16, 17).

He then proves the universal need of righteousness (i. 18-iii. 20). He first shows that the gentile world is in a state of sin and just condemnation (i. 18-32), and then that the Jewish world is no exception, but is likewise guilty before God (ii.). To the objection that this destroys the privileges of the Jew, he replies by showing that their privilege consisted in being the trustees of revelation, but that their own Scriptures declared them to be sinful (iii. 1-19), so that there is no exception to the universal guilt. In fact, the law only increases the consciousness of sin (20).

He then states the righteousness which God has provided for every believer through the redemptive and sacrificial work of Christ (iii. 21-30), and proves that this way of salvation is that taught in the O. T. (31-iv. 25), that it is the basis of Christian experience (v. 1-11), and that it proceeds upon the same principle of moral government, on which God acted when he dealt with mankind in the person of their first head and representative, Adam (12-21).

The apostle then refutes three objections which would be brought against his doctrine of salvation by the work of Christ for us received through faith alone. The first objection is that on this doctrine men may continue in sin and yet be saved, to which he replies no, because faith in Christ involves vital union with him, whereby the believer rises with Christ into a new moral life (vi. 1-14). The second objection is that Paul's doctrine of deliverance from the law released men from moral obligation, to which he replies no, because the believer accepts a new and higher obligation, whereby he devotes himself to the will of God (vi. 15-vii. 6). The third objection is that Paul's doctrine makes the law of God an evil thing, to which he replies no, for the reason that the law cannot save is not that the law is evil, but that man is sinful and cannot keep it (7-25).

Having refuted objections, he shows (viii.) that on the basis of Christ's redemptive work provision is made for the spiritual renewal, complete sanctification, and final glorification of those who are in Christ, and who, being chosen and called by God, will certainly enjoy the perfect fruition of God's love. Having thus stated the gospel way of salvation, the apostle proceeds to adjust it to the fact that Israel, the chosen people, had as a nation rejected it. He does this by teaching that the saving promise of God had never been made to the Jews as a nation, but only to the "election," the true seed of Abraham, whom God had chosen (ix. 1-13), and he justifies from Scripture this doctrine of sovereign election (14-29); then, further, that the rejection of the Jews was due to their refusal of the very way of salvation taught by their own Scriptures (30-x. 21), yet that the rejection of Israel was not complete, for the promised remnant, the election, did believe (xi. 1-10), and, finally, that in the end the Jews will be converted, and with the gentiles trust in the promised Redeemer (11-36).

The rest of the epistle consists of an exhortation to Christian living (xii.), to the performance of civil and social duties (xiii.), and to Christian charity and unity (xiv. 1-xv. 13), ending with personal messages and salutations (14-xvi. 27) G T P.

Did the epistle to the Romans in early days ever exist in a shorter form than at present? In view of certain phenomena two theories especially have attracted attention. They have literary interest, but no doctrinal importance. According to one theory, an abridgment of the epistle was prepared for general circulation, being shortened by the omission of local references, such as "in Rome" (i. 7) and chapters xv and xvi, but retaining the entire doctrinal instruction and the essence of the practical appeal. Evidence for the existence of the epistle in this shorter form is sought in the presence of the doxology (xvi. 25-27) in some manuscripts at the end of chapter xiv. or both there and at the end of chapter xvi.; in the lack of quotation from chapters xv. and xvi. in the writings of Tertullian, Irenæus, and Cyprian; and in the apparent omission of these chapters by Marcion. The lack of citation from these chapters is without significance, however, in view of their character. They have never been much quoted. The salutations especially do not lend themselves to quotation. The theory of an abridged edition of the epistle must rest mainly on the occurrence of the doxology at the end of chapter xiv. in some manuscripts. This is a frail support; and it is especially weak in view of the fact that no extant manuscript is an abridgment, but all manuscripts of the epistle without exception contain chapters xv. and xvi.

The other theory, and one widely held, is that chapter xvi. did not form a part of the epistle originally, but constituted a brief note commending Phœbe to the church at Ephesus. For chapter xv. is not easily separated from chapter xiv., but follows it naturally, and simply develops the appeal that is made in chapter xiv. to the spirit of Christian self-sacrifice on the part of those who are strong in conscience. Moreover, chapter xv. closes, in verse 33, with a benediction such as occurs at the end of other letters written by Paul (2 Cor. xiii. 11; 1 Thes. v. 23, 2 Thes. iii. 16; Phil. iv. 9), and forms the natural conclusion to the epistle to the Romans. Chapter xvi. would, therefore, seem to be appended. That the latter chapter was originally a letter commending Phœbe to the church at Ephesus, not to the Christians in Rome, may be gathered, it is argued, from the following considerations: 1 It is intended to accredit Phœbe (xvi. 1). 2 Aquila and Priscilla, to whom salutations are sent (xvi. 3), were certainly living in Ephesus about three years before the epistle to the Romans was written, and they were not in Rome when Paul wrote the second letter to Timothy (2 Tim. iv. 19). 3 The reference to Epænetus, "the firstfruits of Asia" (Rom. xvi. 5, R V), would be more natural in a letter to Ephesus than to Rome. 4 It is unlikely that Paul would have as many acquaintances in a church he had not visited as he salutes in chapter xvi. The objections to this theory that chapter xvi. is a brief note to the church at Ephesus are—1 Salutations were occasionally added, as here, after a doxology or a benediction, even when followed by Amen (Phil. iv. 20; 2 Thes. iii. 16, cp. 2 Tim. iv. 18). 2 The fact that chapter xvi. forms part of the epistle in all extant manuscripts. 3 Aquila and Priscilla migrated from place to place a great deal. They were residing in Rome when all Jews were notified to leave the city, they lived at Corinth for about a year and a half and accompanied Paul to Ephesus, where actively working for Christianity they remained at least until he returned from a trip to Jerusalem. It would not be strange if they went back to Rome especially in connection with the apostle's plan to visit the city and introduce the Christian religion (Acts xix. 21). 4 That Epænetus, a convert of the province of Asia, found his way to Rome occasions no surprise, for Christians, Jews, and gentiles were constantly going to the imperial capital for various reasons from all parts of the world, for example, Epaphras of Colossæ and Aquila of Pontus and Herod the tetrarch. 5 The persons saluted in chapter xvi. bear names that are proven to have been current in Rome, and some of them were common among the early Christians of the city. 6 It is not necessary to assume that the people to whom he sends greetings were in every case personal acquaintances of the apostle; it is enough that they were known to him as earnest, active Christians through references to them in letters to him from Aquila, Priscilla, and others concerning affairs in Rome.

Rome.

The date 753 B C is accepted by the best authorities for the traditional founding of Rome by Romulus, who became its first king. The little kingdom grew in size and importance, absorbing its immediate neighbors through the reigns of seven kings, until the tyranny of Tarquinius Superbus drove the people to take the government into their own hands and establish a republic. In the beginning, the power was entirely in the hands of a few patrician families, the plebeians merely acquiescing in measures taken. The plebs, however, demanded and obtained privilege after privilege until every Roman citizen had a voice in the government. During the period of the republic, Rome extended her boundaries at first over all Italy, and finally over the whole known world.

Rome's first contact with Asia occurred 190 B. C. when the Roman army defeated Antiochus the Great, king of Syria, at the battle of Magnesia, and Rome assumed a protectorate over certain cities in Asia Minor (cp 1 Mac. i 10). Most of Rome's conquests after this were of a peaceful nature, other nations willingly acknowledging her superiority.

In 63 B. C. Judæa became formally subject to Rome, being taken by Pompey after he had reduced the Seleucid kingdom to the level of a province. It was required to pay tribute, but was left for a time under native rulers.

Meantime, several parties jealous of each other had been growing up in the state. As the result of an internal political struggle, the triumvirate of Cæsar, Pompey, and Crassus was formed to rule, but by the death of Crassus, and the defeat of Pompey in a civil struggle, the power fell into the hands of Cæsar alone. This did not last long. Cæsar was murdered by his enemies in 44 B. C., civil war again broke out, a second triumvirate was formed by Antony, Octavian, and Lepidus, and, like the first, was soon reduced to one man, Octavian. Full of ambition, Octavian had himself proclaimed emperor with the title of Augustus, and the Roman empire began.

It was during the reign of Augustus that Christ was born; during that of his successor Tiberius, that the crucifixion took place. The martyrdom of James the brother of John took place in the reign of the emperor Claudius (Acts xi. 28; xii 1, 2). It was to the emperor Nero that Paul appealed (xxv. 11). The destruction of Jerusalem prophesied by our Lord (Mat. xxiv.; Mark xiii.; Luke xix. 41-44; xxi 5-36) was accomplished in the year A. D. 70 by Titus, who afterwards became emperor.

When the empire was at its greatest size it extended 3000 miles from east to west, and 2000 from north to south, and contained a population of about 120,000,000.

Weakened by excesses and corruption within, and attacked by enemies without, the empire began to fail, receiving its first serious check on the final separation of the eastern empire in 395, and coming finally to an end by the capture of Rome by the Goth Odoacer in 476.

During the decline of Rome's civil power the Christians there had been growing in power and influence. Although it had been the policy of Rome to tolerate the religions of her conquered peoples, the Christians were persecuted almost from the first. This was due mainly to two causes: their uncompromising attitude toward all heathen rites and religions, and their unceasing efforts to make converts. The persecutions were especially severe under Nero, who attempted to throw on the Christians the blame for some of his own nefarious deeds. Persecutions were also very severe under Domitian, but notwithstanding constant imprisonment and death the Christians continued to grow in numbers and influence until the church in Rome and the bishop of Rome became no inconsiderable factor in the general growth of Christianity. The Christian religion was officially adopted and declared the religion of the state by the emperor Constantine early in the fourth century.

Roof. See HOUSE.

Room.

1. A chamber or other apartment in a house (Acts i. 13). See HOUSE and PALACE.

2. In A. V. room is also used in the sense of place or position in society, a meaning which is now obsolete (Mat. xxiii 6; Luke xiv. 7, 8; xx 46). Uppermost or chief room is the translation of the Greek prōtoklīsia, first place for reclining; see MEALS. The scribes and Pharisees were censured for seeking the place of honor at feasts, desiring to recline on the most important couch. R. V. substitutes place or seat for room, when used in this obsolete sense.

Rose.

The rendering of the Hebrew Ilhasseth (Song ii 1. Is xxxv 1), in the English versions and by several Jewish scholars of the Middle Ages. Modern interpreters are divided in opinion. The most important suggestions are the following: 1. Some expositors, including Tristram, following the Targum of Song ii. 1, and sometimes appealing to a doubtful etymology, understand the beautiful, white sweet-scented narcissus (Narcissus tazetta), common in spring in the plain of Sharon and in the hill country. 2. A Syriac word, seemingly kindred to the Hebrew name, denotes colchicum and the crocus, which are strikingly alike and which, when the rainy season sets in, carpet the fields with bright flowers. The prevalent opinion, perhaps represented by R. V. margin, is that meadow saffron (Colchicum autumnale) is meant, with its pale lilac flowers. 3. An Assyrian word still nearer to the Hebrew form, refers to marsh plants, so that the Hebrew has been understood by some interpreters of late to denote Cyperus syriacus, known also as Cyperus papyrus, which grows on the Nahr el-'Aujah in the plain of Sharon and in other marshy districts of Palestine. It flowers toward the end of autumn.

The true rose is a native of Media and Persia. It was early transplanted to the countries on the Mediterranean, and grows on the mountains of Palestine. The maid who recognized the voice of Peter at the gate, was named Rhoda, a rose (Acts xii 13); and the true rose is probably intended in Wisd. ii. 8; Eccles. xxiv. 14; xxxix. 13, l. 8, where the Greek word is used. Tristram, however, judges from its growing at Jericho and by the waters, that the oleander is meant in these passages.

Rosh [in Hebrew a head, a chief, a prince]

1. A son of Benjamin, who went down to Egypt with Jacob and his sons (Gen. xli 21). He did not give rise to a tribal family (Num. xxvi 38), because probably, like Er and Onan of Judah, he died without issue.

2. A northern people mentioned with Meshech and Tubal (Ezek. xxxviii. 2, 3; xxxix. 1, both R. V. text). Gesenius believes Rosh to be the Russians, though they are nowhere else mentioned by this or any similar name for centuries afterwards. The text of the A. V. and the margin of the R. V. render Rosh "chief prince," in which case Rosh as a proper name disappears.

Ru'by.

1. The plural, rubies, is the rendering of the Hebrew P̄nūm, which occurs only in the plural. The margin of the R. V. has coral, red coral or pearls. The name may signify branches and thus aptly describe coral; but this signification is not established. It was ruddy in hue (Lam. iv. 7), and was precious (Job xxviii. 18; Prov. iii. 15). The color is a good reason for not regarding it as a pearl. The true or oriental ruby is, like the sapphire, a variety of corundum. It is a clear, bright gem, rich red in color. The spinel ruby is a deep red, and the balas ruby a rose-red, variety of spinel.

2. The marginal rendering of the Hebrew 'Odem, red gem (Ex. xxviii. 17; Ezek. xxviii. 13). In the text it is translated sardius, which is the better rendering.

Rue.

A plant, in Greek pēganon, of which the Pharisees, careful about minute points, were scrupulously accurate in paying tithes (Luke xi. 42). It is Ruta graveolens, a half shrubby plant, two or three feet high, with pinnate bluish-green leaves, all dotted over with odoriferous glands and yellowish corymbose flowers, mostly with eight stamens. Its odor is very powerful. It is a native of the Mediterranean region. It was cultivated in Palestine as a medicine, and perhaps as a condiment for food. Had it been wild, it would not have been a titable plant.

Ru'fus [red].

A son of that Simon of Cyrene who was compelled to bear the cross of Christ (Mark xv. 21). He may have been the same as the Rufus at Rome to whom Paul sent a salutation (Rom. xvi. 13).

Rue

Ru-ha'mah [she hath obtained mercy].

One of the symbolical names with which the children of Judah and Israel shall eventually greet each other (Hos. ii. 1).

Ru'ler

In a general sense, any one who exercises authority. More particularly:

1. Officer of a synagogue (Luke viii. 41). See SYNAGOGUE.

2. Member of the sanhedrin, whether priest or layman (John iii. 1; vii. 26; Acts iv. 5 with 8 and 15, cp. xxiii. 5).

3. Archon or civil magistrate of a city (Acts xvi. 19). In Macedonia and regions under Macedonian influence such officials were technically called politarchs or rulers of the city (xvii. 6, 8).

Ru'mah [height, high place].

The place to which the father of Jehoia-kim's queen belonged (2 Kin. xxiii. 36). An ancient opinion is that it was the same as Arumah in the neighborhood of Shechem (cp. Antiq. x. 5, 2). It may, however, have been the town in Galilee (War iii. 7, 21), perhaps Rumeah near Nazareth.

Run'ners.

A class of soldiers who served as a body-guard to the king (1 Sam. xxii. 17, in A. V. footmen, R. V. guard), were posted at the door of the royal palace at Jerusalem (1 Kin. xiv. 27; 2 Kin. xi. 19), had their own guard room (1 Kin. xiv. 28), escorted the king to the temple (28), and executed the king's commands (1 Sam. xxii. 17; 2 Kin. x. 25). In each instance, see R. V. margin. Perhaps they ran before the royal chariot (see FORERUNNER).

Rush.

The rendering of the Hebrew Gome' in Job viii. 11 and Is. xxxv. 7 See PAPHYRUS.

Rust.

A corrosive or disfiguring accretion, in Greek ros, which denotes the rust of iron, the verdigris of brass, the tarnish on gold and silver (Jas. v. 3) The Greek word brōsis, eating, corrosion, is used in Mat. vi. 19, 20.

Ruth [possibly, sightly].

A Moabitess married first to Mahlon of Bethlehem, who was sojourning in Moab with his parents and brother because of a famine in Judah. The three men died. Ruth left her native land and accompanied her mother-in-law Naomi to Bethlehem. While gleaning in the field of Boaz, a kinsman of Naomi's deceased husband, she found favor in his eyes. Custom required a kinsman of Mahlon to marry Ruth; and Boaz took her to wife, after one nearer of kin than he had refused. By this marriage Ruth became an ancestress of David. The transaction between Boaz and Ruth was not a levirate marriage (Deut. xxv. 7-10; cp. Ruth i. 11-13), for Boaz was not a brother of Ruth's deceased husband. Custom required that when the widow of a childless man desired to sell his estate if there was no brother, then the nearest of kin and heir to the deceased should buy or redeem it of the widow (iv. 3, 4, 9) The property was thereby retained in the family. Custom was also urgent that the kinsman voluntarily assume levirate duties or take the woman to wife, if he would not thereby endanger his own inheritance (iii. 9; iv. 5, 6) It was considered magnanimous to do so, and a mark of loyalty to the family. A son born of such union was legally the son of the deceased (iv. 5, 10, 14, 17); and doubtless ultimately received the firstborn's right in the estate.

In the Hebrew collection the Book of Ruth is placed among the rolls which were publicly read on specified anniversaries; because, its scenery being the harvest field, it was read at Pentecost, the harvest festival. In the Septuagint and in Josephus' enumeration of the canonical books it stands immediately after Judges, as in the English version. The events recorded occurred in the days of the judges (i. 1), 60 years or more before David's birth (iv. 21, 22). The marriage of a pious Israelite with a Moabitess is recounted, and the issue of the marriage is an ancestor of David. After the exile such a marriage would have been regarded as discreditable, and would not have been invented. The narrative is, accordingly, historical. Its historical character receives confirmation from the appropriateness of the event to the period, for about that time friendly intercourse prevailed between Israel and Moab (1 Sam. xxii. 3, 4). The event is related without disapprobation and without explanation or apology; an indication that it was committed to writing before the exile

The language is also as pure as admittedly early writings, such as Judges v. The book did not receive its final literary form until a considerable time after the event; for it explains the drawing off of the shoe in matters of attestation as a custom of former times (iv. 7), and it brings down the genealogy to David.

S.Sab'a-oth [in Hebrew, hosts, armies].

The Lord of Sabaoth is the same as Lord of hosts, the second part of the title being left untranslated (Rom. ix. 29 with Is. i. 9; Jas. v. 4). See LORD.

Sa'bat. See SHERAT.Sab'bat [rest].

The divinely instituted day of rest, ordained for all men. God having completed the work of creation in six days ceased from creative work on the seventh day. And God blessed the seventh day, and hallowed it, because that in it he rested from all his work which he had made in a creative manner (Gen. i. 1-3), see CREATION. The next reference to a division of time into periods of seven days occurs in the account of the flood, when Noah was forewarned of the imminence of the storm a week before it broke in its fury, and again when he sent forth the birds at intervals of seven days to discover through them the stage of water (Gen. vii. 4; viii. 10, 12). But it is not only in this express mention of the week, but also in the entire chronology of the flood, when interpreted according to its own principles, that the hebdomadal division of time is found to have existed at that early date. The events are measured by intervals of the week both in the Hebrew narrative and in the Assyrian account; see FLOOD. And what is more, there is repeated evidence that the seventh day was regarded as a season of divine benevolence toward man. According to both accounts, and reckoning from the day when the flood began, the divine power which caused the storm was restrained at the close of a sixth day, and the first day that dawned fair and beautiful was a seventh day; and the day when the inmates of the ark were permitted to disembark, and when they offered sacrifices of thanksgiving, was likewise a seventh day. A glance at the chronology will show that not improbably Noah dispatched the birds in connection with the conventional seventh day because it was a day of divine favor.

From the days of Noah until the exodus there is no express mention in the Hebrew records of a sanctification of the seventh day by rest from labor and by religious worship. There is no reason why there should be.

There was no event specially to emphasize the day. And probably in that age the Sabbath was somewhat less sharply marked off from the other days of the week, even among the people of God, than it was later; for the nomad shepherds had certain labors which must be performed, and the Israelites in Egypt were not their own masters and could not rest on the seventh day - but when the nation was organized at Sinai a different mode of life was adopted, the people were able to frame their own laws, they formed an independent community, they led camp life in the wilderness and exchanged it for the settled life of agriculturists and traders, and as a natural result rest on the Sabbath made a greater outward difference than it had done before. Still, in both the Hebrew and Babylonian literature relating to the period before the exodus there are incidental references to a period of seven days (Gen xxix 27, 28). These are doubtless to be understood in the sense in which we use the term week, reckoning seven days from any date we please. At any rate time was frequently measured by periods of seven days. Several causes doubtless contributed to make this custom general, among others the phasing of the moon. But over and beyond the appropriateness of a lunar subdivision of the lunar month, there was the conception, traceable in the narrative of the flood, that the seventh day was one of divine rest and favor toward men.

It is disputed whether the name Sabbath was used for the recurring seventh day in Assyria and Babylonia. A day of propitiating the gods was called by a name which may be pronounced shabattu, Sabbath. But other pronunciations are equally possible, and yield a sense which satisfies the given description of the day. There is no evidence that it was a particular day of the week or a day when labor was suspended. Tablets, copied in the reign of Ashurbanipal, about 650 B. C., show that the seventh, fourteenth, nineteenth, twenty-first, and twenty-eighth days of each month were regarded as inauspicious for certain specified acts. These unlucky days, it will be observed, are not connected with the phasing of the moon; for it does not quarter on the nineteenth day, and in months of thirty days, as were those in question, it would only occasionally quarter on the seventh day. The unluckiness of the day was connected with the number seven. Not only was the recurring seventh day ill-fated, but also the nineteenth, that is the forty-ninth day, the seventh seventh day reckoned from the first day of the preceding month. These recurring seventh days were not days of national rest when the tablets were in force, a few specified acts only were dangerous on those days. Business and toil proceeded as usual. The most that can at present be claimed is that if these tablets bear witness to the Sabbath at all, they testify to the degradation of the nobler conception of an earlier age. They do not perpetuate the thought which is discoverable in even the Assyrian narrative of the flood. They are not up to the standard of the fourth commandment as promulgated in Israel centuries before at Sinai, and familiar in all its loftiness to the Israelites of the time of Jeremiah, who was a younger contemporary of Ashurbanipal.

As in these tablets, so among the Hebrews, it was not the moon which determined the Sabbath; for among the Hebrews it was not the seventh day only which was sacred, but the day which began and which consecrated the seventh month, and the entire seventh year, and the completion of the seventh seventh year. And these seasons were all associated with the idea of rest, of worship, of liberty, of good will to man, and of divine favor.

The first occurrence of the name Sabbath in the Hebrew records is in Ex. xvi. 23. The Israelites had not reached mount Sinai, nor had the ten commandments been spoken from its summit, but in the wilderness of Sin when manna began to be given a double amount fell on the sixth day; and Moses said: "This is that which the Lord hath spoken, To-morrow is a solemn rest, a holy sabbath unto the Lord: bake that which ye will bake, . . . and all that remaineth over lay up for you to be kept until the morning." None fell on the morrow, and Moses said in regard to what had been kept over. "Eat that to-day, for to-day is a sabbath unto the Lord: to-day ye shall not find it in the field. Six days ye shall gather it; but on the seventh day is the sabbath, in it there shall be none" (23-26; cp 5).

Shortly afterwards the commandment requiring the Sabbath to be kept was promulgated with nine other laws by Jehovah at Sinai, and afterwards written by the finger of God on tables of stone (Ex xxxi 18; Deut ix. 10). Like its companion laws, it was of perpetual obligation. It commences, "Remember the sabbath day to keep it holy," the word remember being appropriately used, since the people did not now for the first time learn that the Sabbath existed. In repeating the laws forty years later at Shittim, Moses recalls the fact that the Lord their God had commanded them to observe the day; and then instead of stating the reason for the ordination of the Sabbath, he assigns Jehovah's deliverance of his people from bondage or labor in Egypt as the reason why Israel specially is under obligation to keep the day of rest instituted by God (Deut v 15). The Sabbath was to be kept by a holy convocation for the worship of the Lord (Lev xxiii. 3; cp Ezek xli 3), and should be a sign showing that God was their sanctifier (Ex. xxxi 13). The doctrine clearly was that the day was ordained by God; that it was established as a day of physical rest and refreshment for man; that the obligation to keep it arises from God's own example, his connecting a blessing with it, and his explicit command, and that his redemption of his people lays them under special obligation to set the day apart; that it is to be observed by God's people as a Sabbath unto him, and is to include a holy assemblage for worship. It was a reminder of God's complacency in the contemplation of his finished work, and of Jehovah's redemption of his people from Egyptian service. In the tabernacle and temple worship the preëminence of the Sabbath over the other days of the week was shown by the offering upon it of two lambs, while one was sacrificed on an ordinary week day (Num. xxviii. 9, 19). The twelve cakes of showbread were also to be presented on that day (Lev. xxiv. 5-8, 1 Chron. ix. 32). In enforcing the law no fire was allowed to be lit by an Israelite in his habitation on the Sabbath day; anyone doing work on it was to be put to death; and one who gathered sticks on the Sabbath in the wilderness was in fact stoned to death (Ex xxxv. 3; Num. xv. 32-36); see PUNISHMENT. Isaiah (lvi. 2-6; lviii. 13) and Jeremiah (xvii. 21-27) strongly counseled the keeping of the day. A psalm or song was composed for the Sabbath, in which delight is expressed in the worship of Jehovah and thought is directed to God's works of creation (Ps. xcii). Ezekiel complains that the Sabbaths had to a large extent been profaned or polluted (Ezek. xx. 12, 24; xxiii. 8, 26; xxiii. 38). In Nehemiah's time, traders, especially those of Tyre, continually brought merchandise to Jerusalem for sale on the sacred day, till Nehemiah peremptorily forbade the practice to be continued, and took strong measures against those who attempted to disregard his directions (Neh. x. 31; xiii. 15-22). At the commencement of the war of independence under the Maccabee family, the Jews were of opinion that they had no right to defend themselves on the Sabbath if they were attacked by an enemy. The campaign therefore began with the slaughter of 1000 unresisting Jews, consisting of patriots and their families. The survivors resolved in future to defend themselves if they were directly attacked on the sacred day, but not to engage in offensive operations (1 Mac. ii. 31-41). Even then they were at a disadvantage with the gentiles, who labored under no such restriction. The latter pushed on siege and other operations on the Sabbath unmolested, provided they abstained from directly attacking the Jews. Pompey raised his banks and mounted his battering-rams against Jerusalem on the Sabbath without any interference from the inhabitants, but delayed the effort to breach the walls till the sacred day was over (Antiq. xiv. 4, 2 and 3). In the time of our Lord the Pharisees applied the law to the most trivial acts, and forbade many works of necessity and mercy. They denounced Jesus because he healed sick people on the Sabbath, though if ox, or ass, or sheep fell into a pit on that day, they did not consider it at all unlawful to take him out without delay. They also led forth the animals to be watered just as on ordinary week days (Mat. xii. 9-13, Luke xii. 10-17). It was not merely to healing on the Sabbath that they objected. When the disciples of Jesus, passing on the Sabbath through the grain fields, plucked some of the ears, and, rubbing them in their hands, ate them, being hungry, the Pharisees denounced this as though it were in essence the same as reaping, threshing, and grinding. Our Lord made a notable reply: "The sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath, so that the Son of man is Lord even of the sabbath" (Mark ii. 23-28). The Sabbath was instituted for the benefit of mankind, its obligation lasts as long as man has the same needs as at creation, the Son of man is not the slave of the Sabbath, but its lord.

The day for synagogue worship was the seventh day of the week Saturday (Mat. xii. 9, 10, Acts xiii. 14). The apostolic Christian church from the beginning held assemblages for worship on the first day of the week, which was the day on which Christ rose from the dead for our justification (Acts ii. 1, probably; xx. 7). On that day the apostle Paul directed the Christians of Galatia and Corinth to make their weekly contribution to the charities of the church (1 Cor. xvi. 1, 2). It was designated the Lord's day (Rev. i. 10); see LORD'S DAY. This day, like the former appointment of the seventh day, sets apart one whole day in seven to be a Sabbath unto the Lord. It is equally a reminder of the Lord's redemption of his people. It is accompanied by the same evidence of divine favor in the form of physical and spiritual blessings.

The Sabbath of the land was a year in which the land of Canaan had a solemn rest. It came round once every seven years. In it the ground was not sown or reaped, nor the vineyard pruned, nor its fruits gathered in. The spontaneous growth of field and orchard was free to all. In the Sabbath year also the creditor released the Hebrew debtor from his obligation and freed the Hebrew slave (Ex xxiii. 10, 11; Lev. xxv. 3-7, Deut. xv. 1-18; Neh. x. 31). On the completion of seven such Sabbath years, that is, at the end of forty-nine years, the trumpet was blown to proclaim liberty throughout the land, and the year of jubile was ushered in (Lev. xxv. 8-10); see JUBILE. Reliable historical notices of the observance of the Sabbathical year are the covenant of Nehemiah's time (Neh. x. 31), the 150th year of the Seleucidan era or 164-163 B. C. (1 Mac. vi. 49, 53; cp. Antiq. xii. 9, 5), the 178th Seleucidan year or 136-135 B. C. (Antiq. xiii. 8, 1; War. i. 2, 4), the decree issued by Cæsar exempting the Jews from tribute during the Sabbath year (Antiq. xiv. 10, 6; cp. Tacitus, Hist. v. 4), the year 38-37 B. C. (Antiq. xiv. 16, 2; xv. 1, 2), and the year before the fall of Jerusalem, A. D. 68-69 (Talmud). See also Antiq. xi. 8, 5. If the Israelites disobeyed God's laws, they were to be carried into captivity, the land lying desolate, having rest and being left to enjoy its Sabbaths, or the rest which the Israelites had not allowed it on their weekly and septennial Sabbaths (Lev. xxvi. 34-43). Jeremiah prophesied that the people should be punished for their idolatry by the desolation of their land and their bondage to the Babylonians for seventy years (Jer. xxv. 7-11). The chronicler also connects the captivity with the disobedience of the people and the pollution of the temple; and he adds that they were servants unto the Babylonians for seventy years, as Jeremiah had foretold they should be, until the land had enjoyed her Sabbaths; for as long as she lay desolate she kept Sabbath, to fulfill three score and ten years (2 Chron. xxxvi. 14, 16, 20, 21). It must not be inferred from these words that the people had ignored the Sabbath year exactly seventy times, or that the neglected Sabbath years were continuous; and it is not stated that the Sabbath year was neglected. Doubtless it had been neglected sometimes, for an idolatrous and disobedient people would scarcely obey an injunction when obedience would apparently involve pecuniary loss.

Evidently any period of time which was kept as a Sabbath could be called a Sabbath. Not only were the seventh day and the seventh year Sabbaths, but also the day of atonement on the tenth day of the seventh month (Lev. xxiii. 32).

A Sabbath-day's journey was a journey of limited extent proper, in the estimation of the scribes, on a Sabbath day. The expression occurs in Acts i. 12, where this is stated to be the distance between mount Olivet and Jerusalem, or from Jerusalem to a place on the mountain from which Bethany was visible (Luke xxiv. 50). If the measurement be made from the eastern gate of Jerusalem (the Jewish method of reckoning) to the site of the church of the Ascension, crowning the mount of Olives, the distance, as the crow flies, will be about 2250 English feet; but in actual travel it will be considerably more. According to Josephus, the mount was distant 6 or 7 stades from the city (Antiq. xx. 8, 6; War v. 2, 3). The regulation of the Sabbath-day's journey had its origin in the injunction not to leave the camp on the Sabbath (Ex. xvi. 29). It was reckoned at 2000 cubits, partly on the erroneous interpretation of Num. xxxv. 5, according to which the district pertaining to a Levitical city extended 2000 cubits from the wall on every side, and partly on the belief, derived from Josh. iii. 4, that the camp of the Israelites was 2000 cubits from the tabernacle, to which of course they might go on the Sabbath. A man might travel on the Sabbath within the city where he resided as far as its limits allowed, be the city never so large.

Sa-be'ans.

The people of Sheba (Is. xlv. 14), a nation far off (Joel iii. 8); also the people of Seba (Is. xlv. 14; cp. Ezek. xxiii. 42).

Sab'tah and Sabta.

A Cushite people (Gen. x. 7; 1 Chron. i. 9), probably of southern Arabia. The important city of Sabbatha or Sabota in the country of the Chatramotites (Hadramaut) is strongly advocated, but the identification is doubtful. Gesenius suggests Sabat, Saba, or Sabai, near the modern Arkiko, an Abyssinian town on a bay of the Red Sea.

Sab'te-ca, in A. V. Sabtecha and Sabtechah.

A Cushite people (Gen. x. 7; 1 Chron. i. 9), probably of southern Arabia. More precise geographical details cannot be given.

Sa'car [merchandise].

1 A Hararite, father of one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi. 35). In 2 Sam. xliii. '33 Sharar.

2 A son of Obad-edom (1 Chron. xxvi. 4).

Sack'but.

A mediæval wind instrument, having a long bent tube of brass with a movable slide for changing the pitch of the tone, as in the trombone. The instrument referred to by this name in the English version of Dan. iii. 5, belonged to an entirely different class. It was a stringed instrument. It is called in Aramaic sabb'ka', which, if Semitic, probably describes the lacing of the strings. The name is evidently identical with the Greek sambukē, which was an instrument of music somewhat like the harp or lyre, but with only four strings. Strabo affirms that the Greek word is of barbarian, i. e. oriental, origin; and Athenæus states that the instrument was invented by the Syrians.

Sack'cloth.

A coarse cloth, of a dark color, usually made of goat's hair (Rev. vi. 12). It was called in Hebrew sak, from which the English word is derived. It was worn customarily by mourners (2 Sam. in 31; 2 Kin. xix. 1, 2), often, if not habitually, by prophets (Is. xx. 2; Rev. xi. 3), and by captives (1 Kin. xx. 31; cp. Is. iii. 24). The garment of sackcloth probably resembled a sack, with openings made for the neck and arms, and slit down the front. It was cast about the loins (Gen. xxxvii. 34; 1 Kin. xx. 31), and girded on (2 Sam. iii. 31; Ezek. vii. 18; Joel i. 8); and was usually worn over other raiment (Jon. iii. 6; cp. 2 Sam. xxi. 10), but sometimes next to the skin (1 Kin. xxi. 27; 2 Kin. vi. 30; Job. xvi. 15; Is. xxxiii. 11).

The cloth was also used for making sacks, which were known by the same name as the material (Gen. xlii. 25; Josh. ix. 4).

Sac'ri-fice. See OFFERINGS.

Sad'du-ceeds.

A Jewish party, the opponents of the Pharisees (Antiq. xiii. 10, 6). They were comparatively few in number, but they were educated men, and mostly wealthy and of good position (ibid.; xviii. 1, 4). The name, judged by the orthography, is derived from Zadok, which was often written Sad-douk in Greek. The rabbins say that the party took its name from its founder Zadok, who lived about 300 B. C.; but since it appears that the members and adherents of the highest priestly aristocracy constituted the party, it is now generally believed that the name refers to the high priest Zadok, who officiated in David's reign, and in whose family the high-priesthood remained until the political confusion of the Maccabean times, his descendants and partisans being Zadokites or Sadducees.

In opposition to the Pharisees, who laid great stress on the tradition of the elders, the Sadducees limited their creed to the doctrines which they found in the sacred text itself. They held that the word of the written law was alone binding (Antiq. xiii. 10, 6). They maintained the right of private interpretation (xviii. 1, 4). They held to the letter of Scripture, even when it led to severity in the administration of justice (xx. 9, 1). In distinction from the Pharisees, they denied 1. The resurrection and future retribution in Sheol, asserting that the soul dies with the body (Mat. xxii. 23-33; Acts xxiii. 8; Antiq. xviii. 1, 4; War ii. 8, 14). 2. The existence of angels and spirits (Acts xxiii. 8). 3. Fatalism: contending for the freedom of the will, teaching that all our actions are in our own power, so that we are ourselves the causes of what is good and receive what is evil from our own folly, and affirming that God is not concerned in our doing good or not doing what is evil (Antiq. xiii. 5, 9; War ii. 8, 14). In denying immortality and the resurrection, they were relying on the absence of an explicit statement of these doctrines in the Mosaic law, and they failed to hold the faith of the patriarchs regarding Sheol, which, though it was undeveloped, yet contained the germs of the later biblical doctrine of the resurrection of the body and a future retribution. The patriarchs unquestionably believed in the continued existence of the soul after death. In affirming that there is neither angel nor spirit, the Sadducees were setting themselves against the elaborate angelology of the Judaism of their time; but they went to the other extreme, and again fell short of the teaching of the law (Ex. iii. 2: xiv. 19). They probably at first emphasized the truth that God directs affairs with respect to man's conduct, punishing or rewarding in this life according as man's deeds are good or evil. If they actually taught, as Josephus affirms they did, that God is not concerned in our doing good or refraining from evil, they rejected the clear teaching of the Mosaic law which they professed to believe (Gen. iii. 17: iv. 7; vi. 5-7). It is probable that they began by denying what is not expressly taught in the letter of Scripture; but as they yielded more fully to Greek influence, they adopted the principles of the Aristotelian philosophy, and refused to accept any doctrine which they could not prove by pure reason.

As to the origin and growth of the Sadducees, Schurer suggests that the priestly house of Zadok, which was at the head of affairs in the fourth and third centuries B. C. under the Persian and Grecian kings, began, unconsciously perhaps, to place political above religious considerations. In the time of Ezra and Nehemiah the family of the high priest was worldly and inclined to resist the strict separation of Jew from gentile. See ELIASHIB 5. In the time of Antiochus Epiphanes a large number of priests were friendly to Greek culture (2 Mac. iv. 14-16), and the high priests Jason, Menelaus, and Alcimus were pronounced Hellenizers. The people took a determined stand under the Maccabees for purity of Israel's religion; and when this party triumphed and the Maccabees secured the high-priesthood, the Zadokites were forced into retirement and driven to politics, and they continued to be ready to neglect the customs and traditions of the elders and favor Greek culture and influence. John Hyrcanus, Aristobulus, and Alexander Jannæus (135-78 B. C.) favored the Sadducees, and the conduct of political affairs was largely in their hands under the Romans and the Herods, for the high priests of this period were Sadducees (Acts v. 17; Antiq. xx. 9, 1). The Sadducees, as well as the Pharisees, who visited John the Baptist in the wilderness, were addressed by him as a generation of vipers (Mat. iii. 7). They joined with the Pharisees in demanding from our Lord a sign from heaven (Mat. xvi. 1-4), and Jesus warned his disciples against both (6-12). The Sadducees attempted to embarrass him by putting to him an ensnaring question regarding the resurrection, but he refuted their arguments, and reduced them to silence (xxii. 23-33). They joined with the priests and the captain of the temple in persecuting Peter and John (Acts iv. 1-22). Both Pharisees and Sadducees were in the sanhedrin which tried Paul, and the apostle, taking note of the fact, cleverly set them at variance with each other (xxiii. 6-10).

Sa'doc [Hebrew Sadok, just, righteous].

An ancestor of Christ, who lived after the exile (Mat. i. 14).

Saf'fron.

A fragrant plant (Song iv. 14), called in Hebrew karkom, in Arabic karkam. It is the saffron crocus (Crocus sativus), a native, apparently, of northern Italy and of western Asia. From a remote period of antiquity it has been largely cultivated in southern Europe and Asia. The flowers are light violet in color, veined with red. The dried stigmas, pulverized or pressed, yield a yellow dye. Clothing and rooms were sprinkled with water scented with saffron, olive oil perfumed with it was used as an ointment, food was spiced with it, and it was employed in medicine.

Sa'la and Salah. See SHELAH

Sal'a-mis.

A city on the east or southeast coast of Cyprus, traditionally reported to have been built by Teucer, from the island of Salamis, off the coast of Greece. It contained synagogues of the Jews, in which Paul on his first missionary journey preached (Acts xiii. 4, 5). The place was subsequently named Constantia, and is now called Famagusta.

Sa-la'thi-el. See SHEALTIEL.

Sal'e-cah, in A. V. Sal'cah and Sal'chah [perhaps, a road]

A city of Bashan, near Edrei (Deut. iii. 10; Josh. xii. 5; xiii. 11). It was on the boundary of Og's kingdom, and afterwards constituted the northern limit of the Gadites (1 Chron. v. 11). It is now known as Sal-khad, a slight modification of the ancient name, 35 miles east of Edrei, and 66 east, very slightly north of the Jordan, opposite to Beth-shean, in Samaria.

Sa'lem [complete, peaceful, peace].

A natural abbreviation of the name Jerusalem, the city or foundation of peace (Ps. lxxvi. 2; and probably Gen. xiv. 18). See MELCHIZEDEK and SHALEM.

Sa'lim [perhaps, Aramaic she'lem, completed].

A place near which were the waters of Enon (John iii. 23); see ENON.

Sa'lai [perhaps, exalted].

1. A chief of a family of Benjamites who resided at Jerusalem (Neh. xi. 8).

2. A father's house among the priests after the captivity (Neh. xii. 20); see SALLU.

Sa'lu [elevation, exaltation].

1. A Benjamite, a son of Meshullam and a chief of a family resident at Jerusalem (1 Chron. ix. 7; Neh. xi. 7).

2. A chief of the priests who came from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 7). In the next generation a father's house, which occupies the same position in the corresponding catalogue, bore the name Sallai (ver. 20). One of the two names has probably been misread, the difference being merely that between a jod and a vau (q. v.).

Sal'ma. See SALMON.

Sal'mai, in A. V. Shalmal, in R. V. of Ezra ii. 46 Shamlai; the forms being confused in the Hebrew text itself.

Founder of a family of Nethunim, members of which returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 46; Neh. vii. 48).

Sal'mon or Salmah or Salma.

Father of Boaz. He was a man of Judah, descended through Perez, Hezron, and Ram (Ruth iv. 18-21; Mat. i. 4; Luke iii. 32). In the Hebrew text of Ruth. iv. 20, not 21, the form Salmah is used, of which Salma is the later orthography (1 Chron. ii. 11). He has sometimes been thought to have been the ancestor of the inhabitants of Bethlehem, mentioned in 1 Chron. ii. 51, 54. But the genealogy of Salma, ancestor of the Bethlehemites, is traced back by the line of Caleb, not of Ram. The different lineage probably indicates a different person; though, of course, genealogies may intertwine. For Salmon of Ps. lxxviii. 14, see ZALMON.

Sal-mo'ne.

A promontory, constituting the most easterly portion of Crete (Acts xxvii. 7). It is called Salmonia in an inscription. It is now known as Cape Sidero.

Sa'lom. See SALLU.

Sa-lo'me [probably, whole, perfect, integrity, peace].

The wife of Zebedee, and the mother of James and John (cp. Mat. xxvii. 56 with Mark xv. 40 and xvi. 1). She was one of the Christian women who from a distance saw the crucifixion (Mat. xxvii. 56), and who went to the sepulcher of our Lord on the resurrection morning with sweet spices to anoint his body (Mark xvi. 1).

Salt.

Salt of poor quality could be scraped up on the shore of the Dead Sea, when the salty water had evaporated, or be cut from the neighboring cliffs. It was used in Canaan and the adjacent regions as a condiment and preservative for animal food (Job vi. 6; Eccles. xxxix. 26). Under the law, it was presented with offerings of all kinds (Lev. ii. 13; Ezek. xliii. 24; Antiq. iii. 9, 1). Salt land is unfruitful (Job xxxix. 6), and when a captured city was doomed to utter destruction the final step sometimes was to sow it with salt. Abimelech thus treated Shechem (Judg. ix. 45). Salt preserves from corruption and renders food palatable, and is therefore used figuratively for the true disciples of Jesus, who by their precepts and example raise the moral tone of society (Mat. v. 13; Mark ix. 50; Luke xiv. 34). Salt is also used for wholesome character and speech (Mark ix. 50, Col. iv. 6). The impure salt of Syria, when exposed to the rain and sun or stored in damp houses, is apt to lose its taste and become useless. It cannot be used like much other refuse as a fertilizer, for it is good for nothing (Mat. v. 13; Luke xiv. 35). During the convulsion in which the guilty cities of the plain were destroyed, Lot's wife, lingering in the doomed region, perished, and was transformed into a pillar of salt (Gen.

xix 26; Wisd. x 7; Antiq. i. 11, 4). She was probably overwhelmed by a shower of salt or incruusted with salt.

A covenant of salt was a covenant of permanent continuance and perpetual obligation (Lev. ii. 13; Num. xviii. 19; 2 Chron. xiii. 5).

Salt, City of.

A city in the wilderness of Judah. It is mentioned along with En-gedi on the shore of the Dead Sea, from which therefore, presumably, it was not far distant (Josh. xv. 62). Exact situation unknown.

Salt, Val'ley of.

A valley in which the army of David slew 18,000 men of Aram (2 Sam. viii. 13) or rather Edom (14; 1 Chron. xviii. 12; cp. 1 Kin. xi. 15-17; Ps. lx. title); see DALETH. Amaziah, king of Judah, slew 10,000 Edomites in the valley of Salt, and then took their capital, Sela (2 Kin. xiv. 7; 2 Chron. xxv. 11). The natural locality in which to look for the valley of Salt is at the southern end of the Dead Sea, where there is a range of hills 5 miles in length, consisting of layers of salt, and between this chain and the sea is a valley 6 or 8 miles long. It is against this identification, however, that the Hebrew word ge' applied to it is the appropriate one for a glen rather than a broad valley. It may have been a gorge descending from the Edomite hills, in the direction of the salt range.

Salt Sea.

The name given in the O. T. to what is now generally called the Dead Sea (Gen. xiv. 3; Num. xxxiv. 3, 12; Deut. iii. 17; Josh. xv. 2, 5). See DEAD SEA.

Salt/wort.

The rendering of the Hebrew Malluah, saline plant (Job xxx. 4; in A. V. mallows). It was used as food by the very poor. Two genera of plants are commonly so designated, Salicornia and Salsola, but neither is suitable for food. The plant intended is probably some other chenopod, as spinach or better sea purslane (Atriplex halimus). This latter is a bush. It grows abundantly in salt marshes along the Mediterranean and on the shores of the Dead Sea. Its small, thick, sour leaves would, in extreme need, furnish a miserable food.

Sal'tu [elevated, exalted].

A Simeonite, father of Zimri whom Phinehas slew (Num. xxv. 14; in A. V. of 1 Mac. ii. 26 Salom).

Sal-u-ta'tion.

Among the Hebrews salutation on meeting consisted in the expression of good wishes or a solemn blessing. The forms most prevalent were: 1. "Blessed be thou of the Lord," or "God be gracious unto thee," or the equivalent (Gen. xliii. 29; Ruth iii. 10; 1 Sam. xv. 13). 2. "The Lord be with thee," to which the rejoinder was, "The Lord bless thee" (Ruth ii. 4). 3. "Peace be unto thee," or "Peace be upon thee," peace meaning welfare (Luke xxiv. 36). This was the commonest of all salutations, and is still in use among the Jews. The reply is: "Upon thee be peace." If the occasion made the words appropriate, the form was: "Peace be unto thee, and to thine house" (1 Sam. xxv. 6, Luke x. 5). 4 "Hail!" a common salutation in the Greek period (Mat. xxvi. 49, xxvii. 29; xxviii. 9; Luke i. 28). 5 "Let the king live forever" was the salutation addressed by a subject to the Hebrew monarch (1 Kin. i. 31), and was employed in the Babylonian and Persian courts (Neh. ii. 3; Dan ii. 4; in. 9; v. 10; vi. 6, 21).

At parting a blessing was invoked (Gen. xxiv. 60; xxviii. 1; xlvii. 10; Josh. xxii. 6), which eventually assumed the conventional form, "Go in peace," or "Farewell" (1 Sam. i. 17; xx. 42; 2 Sam. xv. 8; Mark v. 34; Acts xvi. 36); and the rejoinder to a superior might be, "Let thy servant find grace in thy sight" (1 Sam. i. 18).

Abraham and Lot rose up to meet passing strangers, bowed before them to the earth, and pressed hospitality upon them (Gen. xviii. 2; xix. 1); Boaz exchanged greeting with his reapers (Ruth ii. 4); travelers on the road saluted workmen in the field (Ps. cxxix. 8); members of a family greeted each other in the morning and after long separation (Ex. iv. 27; Prov. xxvii. 14). The salutation was often withheld from men of a different religion (Mat. v. 47); and rightly so, when it was apt to lead to fellowship and to imply a wish for the success of a bad cause (2 John 11). Messengers might be charged to salute no man by the way (2 Kin. iv. 29, Luke x. 4), for the formality incident to offering a greeting and receiving a response involved delay. The bow was not a mere nod, but profound obeisance or prostration, and in deferential greeting a rider dismounted from his beast or left his chariot (1 Sam. xxv. 23; 2 Kin. v. 21).

Letters in Palestine, before the conquest of the country by the Hebrews, and in Egypt, always began with salutations. The greetings are all framed on the same model. A son begins a letter to his father thus: "To Dudu, my lord, my father, speaketh thus Aziru thy son, thy servant. At the feet of my father I prostrate myself. Unto the feet of my father may there be peace." A subject addresses his liege, the king of Egypt, after this manner: "To the king my lord, my god, my sun-god, speaketh thus Yapahi thy servant and the dust of thy feet. At the feet of the king my lord, my god, my sun-god, seven times seven times I prostrate myself." The governor of a district writes to his equals: "To the kings of Canaan, servants, my brothers, thus the king." And Pharaoh begins a letter to a neighboring monarch with the words: "To Kallima-Sin, king of Karduniyash, my brother, speaketh thus Nibnuariya [Amenophis iii.] the great king, king of Egypt, thy brother To me is peace [welfare]. May peace be to thee and thy house, to thy children, magnates, horses, chariots, in thy land may there be abundant peace"

The usual epistolary salutation in the Greco-Roman period in Palestine was briefer, more direct, more businesslike, and in it the name of the writer commonly stands first "King Alexander to his brother Jonathan, greeting" (1 Mac. x 18). "King Demetrius unto the nation of the Jews, greeting" (25; and so Acts xv. 23; xxiii 26; Jas i. 1). The letter was frequently concluded with a salutation, derived from Latin usage, "Farewell" (Acts xv. 29; xxiii. 30). To the brief salutation after the Latin manner, the Hebrews, following their own customs, often added a prayer for peace (2 Mac. i 1) Their salutation also was often elaborate (1-5), and the old order was frequently observed (ix 19, 20) The salutations with which Paul begins his letters are equally manifold (Rom i. 1-7) In the epistles to Timothy he wishes his true child in the faith, grace, mercy, and peace; but his usual greeting is, "Grace unto you and peace," and he was apt to close his letters with salutations from himself and others (1 Thes. i. 1; v. 26-28, his first letter).

Shemer; and as it expressed the idea of watching, guarding, keeping, it suggested an appropriate designation for a city on a hill. Accordingly Omri called the city Shom'ron, place of watch (1 Kin xvi 24). The eminence which the city crowned was sometimes denominated the mountain of Samaria (Amos iv. 1; vi 1). It stood in the midst of a fertile valley (Is xxviii 1). The site was so well chosen that the city continued to be the capital of the kingdom to the captivity of the ten tribes, the successive sovereigns reigning, and at their death being buried, there (1 Kin. xvi. 28, 29; xx. 43; xxii. 10, 37, 51, etc.). Scarcely was Samaria built before hostilities arose between Benhadad I, king of Syria, and Omri The former, if his son spoke the truth, had the advantage, and, to please the victor, Omri had to make streets in Samaria for Syrian merchants (1 Kin xx 34) During the reign of Ahab, Omri's son and successor, the city was unsuccessfully besieged by Benhadad II. (1-21). In or near the capital was a pool, on the side of which the royal attendants washed the blood-stained chariot in which Ahab's body was brought home from Ramoth-gilead (xxii 38) In the days of probably Joram it was unsuccessfully besieged by Benhadad II (2 Kin. vi 8-vii 20). The elders of Samaria, afraid of displeasing

Sa-ma'ri-a.

1. The capital of the ten tribes during the longest period of their history. It was built or commenced by Omri, king of Israel, on a hill purchased for two talents of silver or about $3800. The former owner's name was Jehu, obeyed his order to murder Ahab's seventy sons (x. 1-10). All along from the commencement of the city it had been a place notorious for its idolatry. Ahab had led the way in this heathen worship by rearing a temple and an altar to Baal (1 Kin. xvi.

32), and as in his reign reference is made to 400 prophets of the Asherah who ate at Jezebel's table (xviii. 19), it is probable that the idol so named remained till Jehu's reign (2 Kin. xiii. 6). Attendant on this idolatry was great corruption of morals (Hos. vii. 1-8; xiii. 16; Amos iv. 1; viii. 14). Against these idolatrous practices Elijah worked (1 Kin. xviii.). Elisha made the city his headquarters (2 Kin. v. 3-9; vi. 32). And doubtless Hosea labored there. Samaria and the kingdom were threatened with judgment by many prophets (Is. vii. 9; viii. 4; Jer. xxxi. 5; Ezek. xvi. 46, 51, 53, 55; xxiii. 33; Hos. viii. 5, 6; xiii. 16; Amos iii. 12; Mic. i. 5-9). At length, the menaced infiction came. The siege was begun by the Assyrians under Shalmaneser, 724 B. C., and three years later, in 722, the city was captured by the king of Assyria (2 Kin. xvii. 3-6). The glory of the capture is claimed by Sargon, Shalmaneser's successor, who in that year ascended the throne; province of Syria. Gabinius fortified it anew (Antiq. xiii. 15, 4; xiv. 4, 4; 5, 3). It was rebuilt and refortified by Herod the Great, who called it Sebaste, a Greek word corresponding to Augustus, the title of his patron, the first Roman emperor (xv. 8, 5). At Samaria the evangelist Philip labored successfully (Acts viii. 5-8), and the doubtful conversion of Simon Magus took place (9-13). To follow up Philip's success, Peter and John came for a time from Jerusalem (14-25). The site has been thoroughly identified as es-Sebustieh, a village and ruin on a hill 6 miles northwest of Shechem, in the center of Palestine. The sides are steep, the summit a table-land about a mile from east to west. There are broken columns, large, sometimes carved, stones, evidently from important buildings, and heaps of rubbish. Some of this débris has descended from higher to lower levels, recalling the prophecy of Micah (i. 6)

Herod's Colonnade at Sebustieh

see SARGON. The conquerors reseeded the town with foreigners (24); see SAMARITAN. In 332 or 331 B. C. Alexander the Great took Samaria, and transferred its inhabitants to Shechem, placing Syro-Macedonians in their room. About the year 109 B. C. Samaria was besieged by John Hyrcanus, who drew around it a wall of circumvallation 80 stades or about 9 miles in extent. The city held out for a year, but was ultimately forced by famine to surrender. The victor demolished it entirely, attempting to efface all proofs that a fortified city had ever stood on the hill (Antiq. xiii. 10, 2 and 3; War i. 2, 7 and 8). It was again inhabited in the time of Alexander Jannæus. Pompey annexed it to the 2 The territory occupied by the ten tribes, or the kingdom of Israel personified (1 Kin. xiii. 32; xxi. 1; 2 Kin. xvii. 24; Neh. iv. 2; Is. vii. 9; Jer. xxxi. 5; Ezek. xvi. 46; Amos iii. 9). See ISRAEL.

3. The district of Samaria, occupying central Palestine, between Galilee on the north and Judæa on the south (1 Mac. x. 30). Josephus' description of its limits (War iii. 3, 4, and 5) is not very intelligible, but he makes it plain that the northern limit passed through "a village that is in the great plain called Ginea." This is apparently Engannim (Josh. xix. 21; xxi. 29), at the southern angle of the plain of Esdraelon. The southern limit was the territory Acrahattene some 6 or 7 miles south of Shechem. Samaria extended to the Jordan on the east, but did not reach the Mediterranean on the west. Accho belonged to Judæa. The Talmud makes Antipatris the western limit. It comprehended the old territories of Manasseh west of the Jordan, and of Ephraim, with a portion of Issachar and Benjamin. Pompey, in 63 B. C., attached it to the province of Syria (Antiq. xiv 4, 4). In A. D. 6 the emperor Augustus erected Judæa, Samaria and Idumæa into a division of the prefecture of Syria, called the province of Judæa, and placed it under procurators (xvii. 13, 5; cp. 11, 4), and this arrangement obtained in the time of our Lord.

Sa-mar'i-tan.

In the only passage in which the word is found in the O. T. (2 Kin. xvii 29) it means an individual belonging to the old kingdom of northern Israel. In later Hebrew literature it signifies an inhabitant of the district of Samaria in central Palestine (Luke xvii. 11). How, then, did the Samaritan nationality or race arise? When Sargon captured Samaria, he carried into captivity, by his own account, 27,280 people. That he left many Israelites in the land is evident. Finding that the remaining Israelites were rebellious, he began a systematic course for their denationalization. He introduced colonists from Babylonia and Hamath (2 Kin. xvii. 24) and Arabia, who continued to practice idolatry in their new home. The population of the country had been thinned, and the cultivation of the soil interrupted, by these wars, so that opportunity was afforded for wild beasts to multiply, which God used as a scourge. Lions killed some of the idolaters. The newcomers concluded that they did not understand how to worship the particular god of the country, and they informed the king of Assyria. He sent them a priest from among the captive Israelites, who took up his residence at Bethel and began to instruct the people regarding Jehovah. He was unable to persuade them to abandon their ancestral idolatry. They erected images of their gods on the high places of the Israelites, and combined their idolatries with the worship of Jehovah (25-33). This dual worship they kept up until after the fall of Jerusalem (34-41). Esarhaddon continued the policy of his grandfather, Sargon (Ezra iv. 2), and the great and noble Assnapper, perhaps Ashurbanipal, completed the work by adding to the population people from Elam and elsewhere (9, 10).

The new province of the Assyrian empire was weak, and Josiah or his agents traversed its whole extent, everywhere destroying the high places with which it abounded (2 Chron. xxxiv. 6, 7). The idols were still on these high places, but it is probable that idolatry was decreasing under the influence of the Israelites who remained in the land and through the teaching of the priests. And this act of Josiah's was another blow to it. Several decades later some among the Samaritans were in the habit of visiting the temple at Jerusalem for worship (Jer. xli 5). When Zerubbabel led back his band of exiles from Babylonia to Jerusalem, the Samaritans asked permission to participate in the erection of the temple on the ground that they had worshiped the God of Israel ever since the time of Esarhaddon (Ezra iv. 2).

There was early a repugnance on the part of most of the Jews to social and religious association with the Samaritans, and this feeling developed into intense antipathy as years rolled on (Ezra iv. 3; Eccles. i. 25, 26; Luke ix 52, 53; John iv 9). The Samaritans were neither of pure Hebrew blood nor of uncontaminated worship. Josephus (Antiq. ix 14, 3) says that when the Jews were in prosperity, the Samaritans claimed that they were allied to them in blood; but when they saw them in adversity, they declared that they had no relationship to them, but were descended from the Assyrian immigrants. When the offer of the Samaritans to assist in rebuilding the temple was rejected by Zerubbabel, Jeshua, and their associates, the Samaritans made no further efforts at conciliation, but did their best with other adversaries to prevent the completion of the work (Ezra iv 1-10); they also opposed the rebuilding later on of the walls of Jerusalem by Nehemiah (Neh iv 1-23). Their leader on the latter occasion was Sanballat, the Horonite. It was he whose son-in-law was put out of the priesthood by Nehemiah; and the father-in-law probably founded the Samaritan temple on mount Gerizim, which he designed for the use of the expelled digitary; see SANBALLAT. Henceforward fugitives from discipline at Jerusalem were accustomed to go to the rival edifice on mount Gerizim where they were sure of obtaining a warm welcome (Antiq. xi 8, 7). During the persecution under Antiochus Epiphanes they declared that they were not of the same race as the Jews, and gratified the tyrant by expressing a desire that their temple on mount Gerizim might in future be dedicated to Jupiter, the defender of strangers (2 Mac vi. 2). About 129 B. C. John Hyrcanus took Shechem and Gerizim, destroying the Samaritan temple (Antiq. xiii 9, 1); but the worshippers continued to offer their adorations on the summit of the hill where the sacred edifice had stood. They did so when our Lord was on earth (John iv. 20, 21).

In the time of Christ their theological tenets did not essentially differ from those of the Jews, and especially of the Sadducean sect. They shared with them the expectation of a coming Messiah (John iv. 25). They, however, accepted no more of the O. T. than the Pentateuch. The main cause for the Samaritans' receiving the gospel so gladly when Philip preached to them was the miracles which he wrought (Acts viii. 5, 6); but another undoubtedly was that, unlike Judaism, Christianity followed the example and teaching of its founder and admitted Samaritans within its pale and to the same privileges as those possessed by the Jewish converts (Luke x. 29-37; xvii 16-18; John iv. 1-42). About 150 Samaritans still exist at and around Nablus, the ancient Shechem.

Sa-mar'it-an Pen'ta-teuch.

The Samaritans possessed the Pentateuch in Hebrew. It was quoted by Jerome, Eusebius, and other Christian fathers. In A. D. 1616 Pietro della Valle purchased a copy from the Samaritans of Damascus, which was placed in 1623 in the library of the Oratory in Paris. By the end of the eighteenth century fifteen other copies, more or less complete, had reached Europe, and the number has since been increased. Morin, or Morinus, who first studied it, considered the Samaritan text vastly superior to that of the Masoretes. Controversy on the subject went on, with occasional intervals, for nearly two centuries, till, in 1815, the great Hebrew scholar Gesenius, who had made a very careful examination of the Samaritan text, proved it to be far inferior to that of the Hebrew Masoretes, and of small critical value. Most of the Samaritan rolls, containing the whole or a part of the Pentateuch, are supposed not to be older than the tenth century of the Christian era; one or two in the custody of the Samaritans at Nablus, the ancient Shechem, are considered to be older. The several rolls are in the Samaritan character, that on the Maccabæan coins, which was also that of the Hebrews before they introduced the present square letters. The Samaritan text frequently differs from the Hebrew text of the Masoretes. In Deut. xxvii 4 we read that Moses directed the people when they passed the Jordan to set up certain stones in mount Ebal, plaster them, and write on them the law. Here the Samaritans have substituted Gerizim for Ebal, to increase the veneration for their sacred mountain. There are various other less important variations; see CHRONOLOGY. Most of them are manifestly due to the haste of the scribes or to alterations which they deliberately made. In about 2000 places the text agrees with that of the Septuagint against the Hebrew readings, which indicates that the Greek translators used a Hebrew text much like that possessed by the Samaritans. An interesting inquiry is: At what date and how did the Samaritans obtain this Pentateuch? An old and still widely-received opinion is that they did so by transcribing copies of the sacred volume which had existed among them prior to the disruption of the monarchy, under Rehoboam 931 B. C. Another view is that the volume was circulated among them by the priest who was sent to instruct the heathen colonists brought from Assyria to repeople Samaria after its original inhabitants had been carried captive, about 722 B. C. A third opinion is that the Samaritan Pentateuch was carried from Jerusalem by a renegade priest about the time that the temple was built on mount Gerizim. The form of the letters and the alteration already mentioned of Ebal into Gerizim in the sacred text afford a certain slight support to the third hypothesis. At any rate the change was made after Gerizim had become the scene of temple worship.

The Samaritan Pentateuch must not be confounded with the Samaritan version of the Pentateuch, made into the dialect of the Samaritans early in the Christian era. They possess an Arabic translation also, made in the eleventh or twelfth century, a book of Joshua, founded on the canonical book of the same name and written about the thirteenth century A. D., and some other literature.

Sa'mech, in A. R. V. SAMEKH.

The fifteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet. No letter of the English alphabet originally corresponds to it, and s is forced into service in anglicizing Hebrew names which contain it, as Joseph. It heads the fifteenth section of Ps cxix, in which section each verse of the original begins with this letter.

Sam-gar-ne'bo [Shumgr-Nabu, be gracious, Nebo!]

One of Nebuchadnezzar's princes who entered Jerusalem (Jer. xxxix. 3).

Sam'lah [a garment].

A king of the Edomites, a native of Masrekah (Gen. xxxvi. 36, 37).

Sa'mos [a height by the seashore].

An island about 80 miles in circumference off the coast of Asia Minor, south by west of Ephesus, and nearly opposite to the promontory of Trogyllum. After the defeat of Antiochus the Great by the Romans at Magnesia, in 190 B. C., it was independent (1 Mac. xv 23); but it was under the influence of Pergamos, and along with Pergamos it passed into the hands of the Romans in 133 B. C. At the time Paul reached it (Acts xx. 15), it still enjoyed the autonomy conferred upon it by the Romans in 19 B. C. Its inhabitants were noted for commercial enterprise. Many of their coins still exist.

Sam-o-thra'ce, in A. V. Sam-o-thra'ci-a [Samos of Thrace]

An island in the archipelago off the coast of Thrace and opposite the mouth of the Hebrus. It has an area of about 30 square miles, and has in it a mountain 5000 feet high. Paul's vessel made a straight course to the island from Troas, in Asia Minor (Acts xvi. 11).

Samp'sa-mes.

A country, rather than a king, which was friendly to Rome (1 Mac. xv. 23). Not identified.

Sam'son [sunny, little sun, perhaps, destroyer].

One of the most eminent of the Hebrew judges. He was the son of a Danite called Manoah, was born at Zorah, within the limits of the southern territory of Dan, and had his birth and his subsequent career announced beforehand to his parents by the angel of the Lord. He was a Nazirite from his birth, no razor coming upon his head, and no wine or strong drink entering into his mouth. As long as he submitted to these restrictions he was capable of heroic achievements against the Philistines (Judg. xiii. 1-24). Circumstances conspired at this time to separate Judah and Dan from the rest of the Hebrews and to compel these two tribes to act alone. They were at the mercy of the Philistines, who had promptly embraced the opportunity to oppress them. Isolated, Judah was able to do little more than harass the oppressors by bold deeds and stratagems. The Spirit of the Lord early moved Samson to commence his lifework in the camp of Dan (25); but almost from the outset he showed one conspicuous weakness in his character. He was the slave of passion. He was betrothed to a Philistine woman, a native of Timnath; but she married another man, and in revenge Samson, aided perhaps by his friends, caught 300 jackals or foxes, tied them together in pairs by the tails, with a burning torch between, and turned them loose amidst the ripened grain of the Philistines (xiv. 1-xv 5). The Philistines invaded Judah and demanded that Samson be delivered unto them. He permitted his craven countrymen to bind him in whom they failed to perceive their deliverer. But when he was about to be surrendered to the uncircumcised Philistines the Spirit of the Lord came mightily upon him, and he snapped the ropes asunder. The Philistines, amazed at his display of strength, feared him. He seized the jawbone of an ass, and as the Philistines turned to flee, he pursued them and slew a thousand men in round numbers. They fell in several heaps. Samson acknowledged that the work was of God, and confessed his own need of help lest he die of thirst. God in his providence caused a spring to give forth its water. The men of Judah now recognized him as their deliverer (6-20). Afterwards he fearlessly went to Gaza, and there he fell into sin. The Gazites thought that their opportunity had come to seize him, and they shut the city gates; but at midnight he came to the gate, and, finding it closed, laid hold of its doors and plucked them and the bar away and carried them to the top of a hill in the direction of Hebron. An entanglement with the woman Delilah, from the valley of Sorek, caused his ruin. By direction of her countrymen, she importuned him to tell her in what his great strength lay. At first he gave her deceitful answers, but at last he revealed the secret. If his head were shaved, he would become weak as another man. The Philistines at once shaved his head, and found that his strength had departed. They therefore put out his eyes, and made him grind in the prison house at Gaza. They brought him out to exhibit him to the people on occasion of a great festival and public sacrifice to their god Dagon. His hair had by this time begun again to grow, and he was again fulfilling his Nazirite vow. The great temple was full of people, and some three thousand more were on the roof. Samson knew the structure of the building, for he had been in Gaza before when he possessed his sight. He asked the lad who attended him to let him rest himself against the two middle pillars on which the roof was supported, and grasping them he prayed to God for one more manifestation of favor and the gift of strength that he might be avenged on the Philistines. He then dragged the pillars from their position, brought down the roof and perished with a multitude of his foes (xvi 1-31). Notwithstanding the defects in his character, the N. T. names him with those Hebrew heroes whose animating principle was faith (Heb. xi. 32).

Samson had the strength of a man in a preternatural degree. When the Spirit of the Lord impelled him from time to time, he accomplished his great deeds. His strength did not reside in his long hair. His unshorn locks were the external evidence of his relation to God, a public profession that he was acting as the servant of the Lord. When he allowed his hair to be cut, he broke his vow, and it is significantly said that the Lord abandoned him. His marvelous strength failed when God left him, and it returned when God granted his prayer. His preternatural strength was a sign, testifying to the men of Judah that this Nazirite was indeed called of God to deliver them from their enemies, and bearing witness among the Philistines to the superiority of the servant of Jehovah.

Various attempts have been made to group the deeds of Samson. Ewald, led by a favorite theory of his, thought he could discover a drama in five acts. In fact the narrative itself describes five groups of related deeds. 1. Those that resulted from his wooing of the woman of Timnath; namely, his rending the lion, slaughter of thirty Philistines at Ashkelon, release of the jackals bearing burning torches among the ripened grain of the Philistines, and a defeat of the Philistines who had burned the woman. 2. The events at the rock of Etam, when his fellow-countrymen asked permission to deliver him into the hands of the Philistines, and he broke his bonds of rope in the presence of the uncircumcised, slew a thousand of their number with the jawbone of an ass, and by prayer obtained water to quench his thirst. 3. The visit to Gaza, when he carried off the doors of the city gate. 4. His passion for the Philistine woman Delilah, when he broke the seven green withes wherewith she had bound him and then the nine cords with which she next bound him, and tore away the web with which she had woven his locks. 5. A blind slave at Gaza, when he pulled down the pillars on which the roof of Dagon's temple rested. The particular achievements in the five groups are twelve as enumerated. Samson's name may be interpreted as meaning sunny, and a strenuous effort has been made by Roskoff, Steintal, and others like minded, to connect them with the twelve labors of Hercules or with the Babylonian Izdubar or otherwise with the sun-god Shamash. Hercules wandered in search of adventures, slew a lion, slept, was sold as a slave, immolated himself voluntarily. Izdubar overcame the lion, rejected the advances of Ishtar, the goddess of love. Hercules is a sun-myth. The story of Izdubar is the history of an ancient king of Erech embellished with legend and wrought out into an epic in twelve parts; see NIMROD. But with neither the sun-god nor the king of Erech is Samson to be identified; for—1. The ancient Hebrews themselves assigned Samson to a time well within their historical period, in the generation before Samuel and Saul. 2. The Hebrew account of Samson states definitely the place of his birth and his deeds, and gives the location of his grave. 3. The enumeration of twelve labors is a matter of some importance to those who would identify Samson with Hercules or Izdubar, but in itself the number is not of consequence. And the number twelve is not so readily made out. The cry of Samson to God for drink can scarcely be called a labor of Samson's. The narrative speaks of other deeds of Samson which it does not specify (Judg. xiii. 25), showing that the narrator did not think of twelve achievements only. 4. While the strength which Samson exercised was the gift of God and was not inherent in him as a man, while it failed when he was left to himself, yet it was preternatural in the sense that what he accomplished by it might have been a work of nature, but was not. In most of the examples afforded of it, it finds parallels in human annals. David without a weapon slew a lion and a bear; Jonathan and his armor-bearer, and Eleazar and Shammah and Abishai each single-handed performed prodigies of valor equal to Samson's (1 Sam. xiv. 1-17; 2 Sam. xxiii. 9-12, 18), and modern history presents other parallels. The nature of the feats performed in carrying off the doors of Gaza's gate and in dragging the two columns from their position cannot be determined until information is at hand regarding the structure of these particular doors and the architecture of Dagon's temple. The deeds may have been superhuman and miraculous.

Sam'u-el, in A. V. once Shemuel (1 Chron. vi. 33) [name of God].

The earliest of the great Hebrew prophets after Moses and the last of the judges. His father, Elkanah, was a Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar (see ELKANAH 4); he was a Zophite, because descended through Zophai or Zuph (1 Sam. i. 1; 1 Chron. vi. 26, 35); and he was a man of the hill country of Ephraim or an Ephraimite, because the family had been assigned residence in that tribe (Josh. xxi. 5; 1 Chron. vi. 66). Elkanah lived in Ramah or, as it was called to distinguish it from other towns of the name, Ramathaim of the Zophites (1 Sam. i. 1, 19; ii. 11). He had two wives, Peninnah and Hannah. Hannah had no child and prayed earnestly to God that she might give birth to a boy, vowing that if her prayer were answered the infant should be devoted for life to Jehovah, apparently as a Nazirite, for she added, "There shall no razor come upon his head" (cp. Num. vi. 1-5). Her petition was granted. She named the boy Samuel; and when he was weaned she brought him to the tabernacle at Shiloh, and put him in charge of the high priest, Eli, to train him for his sacred duties (1 Sam. i.; ii. 1-17). While yet a child he ministered before God, clad in the simple linen ephod which was worn by ordinary priests when engaged in the sanctuary and even by laymen (ii. 18). He lived at the tabernacle, sleeping in some chamber connected with it, opened the doors of the sanctuary in the morning, and otherwise assisted Eli in his ministrations (iii. 1, 3, 15). He had not advanced beyond early boyhood when Jehovah revealed to him the approaching doom of Eli's house for the foolish indulgence which the father had shown to his unworthy sons (iii. 1-18). Josephus says that Samuel was twelve years old at this time (Antiq. v. 10, 4). His statement is about right; but his authority for it is unknown. By the time that the child had reached manhood all Israel, from Dan even to Beer-sheba, knew that he was established to be a prophet of the Lord, for the Lord revealed himself to Samuel in Shiloh (1 Sam. iii. 20, 21). Soon afterwards the judgment threatened against Eli and his house began by the death of Eli's two sons in battle, the capture of the ark by the Philistines, and the death of Eli on hearing the fatal news (iv. 1-22). The ark was soon restored to the Israelites; but it was kept in seclusion and placed for safe keeping with a proper guardian at Kirjath-jearim until the people should be spiritually prepared to receive it. Samuel was an accredited prophet and, since the death of Eli, the chief religious authority in the land. He addressed himself to the work of reforming the people. Twenty years after the restoration of the ark he found the moral condition of the nation improved, and he convoked an assembly at Mizpah, near the place where the ark had been lost, to make confession of sin, to fast before the Lord, and to beseech a return of his favor. The Philistines gathered their forces to battle when they heard of this assembly; but Samuel exhorted the people to pray for deliverance, and he himself besought the Lord for Israel. A thunderstorm discomfited the Philistines, the Israelites discerned the hand of God, embraced the opportunity, pursued the enemy, and gained such a victory over the Philistines as deterred those pertinacious foes from again invading the land while Samuel was at the head of affairs (1 Sam. vii 3-14); see PHILISTINES and SAMUEL, BOOKS OF. This signal deliverance indicated that God had raised up Samuel to be judge, in the usual sense of defender and director. Like Deborah, and more fully like Moses, Samuel was accredited prophet and judge. In the discharge of his duties he went annually in circuit to Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpah; but his residence was at Ramah, where a company of prophets gathered about him to be at his service in the work of reform (vii. 15-17; xix. 18-20). Here he built an altar to the Lord; for God had forsaken Shiloh, the ark was in necessary seclusion, the covenant was in abeyance because the Israelites had broken it by their idolatries and sacrilege, and he was Jehovah's representative, see ALTAR. During the years of his vigorous administration the land enjoyed freedom from foreign domination. When he was old he made his two sons judges at Beer-sheba. They proved themselves unworthy of their high trust, taking bribes and perverting justice. Their misconduct and the threatening attitude of the surrounding heathen nations produced the request on the part of the Israelite elders and people for the institution of kingly government, and Samuel was divinely commissioned to anoint first Saul, and when he was rejected, David; see the detailed account in SAMUEL, BOOKS OF. Samuel died while David was a fugitive from Saul in the wilderness of En-gedi. He was buried in his house at Ramah, all Israel lamenting his loss (xxv 1). On the night before the battle of Gilboa, Saul desired the woman with the familiar spirit at En-dor to call up Samuel from Sheol (xxviii. 3-25); see SAUL. Heman, one of David's singers, was a grandson of Samuel (1 Chron. vi 33, R. V.; cp 28). Samuel is in the list of O. T. heroes whose animating principle was faith (Heb xi. 32).

Sam'u-el, Books of.

Two books of the O. T. They were originally one, as appears from the Masoretic note to 1 Sam. xxviii 24, which states that this verse is the middle of the book. They are treated as one by Josephus in his enumeration of the books of the O. T., and in Hebrew manuscripts. The division was introduced into the printed Hebrew Bible in 1517, and was derived from the Septuagint and Vulgate. As Samuel is the leading person during the first half of the period covered, as he was one of the greatest of the prophets that Israel ever had, the organizer of the kingdom, the agent in the selection of both Saul and David for the throne, and the coadjutor of Saul so long as the king remained faithful to his theocratic obligations, the book appropriately bears Samuel's name. As it contains the history of the first two kings, it is divided in the Septuagint into two books, and called First and Second of Kingdoms; and the two books which continue the history, and are known in the English version as First and Second Book of the Kings, are called Third and Fourth of Kingdoms in the Septuagint. Jerome substituted Book of Kings for Book of Kingdoms in his Latin version.

The work is divisible into three sections: 1 Samuel, the prophet and judge (i.-vii.), including his birth and early life, the causes which led to his call to the prophetic office (iii 20), and which left him as prophet in possession of the sole authority and opened the way for his judicial administration (iv.), his reformatory work, and the attestation of his right to the judgeship, which was afforded by the deliverance of Israel from Philistine oppression by his hand (vii. 1-12). Summary of his administration (13-17). 2 Saul the king (viii.-xxxi.), including (a) The popular demand for a king in Samuel's old age and Samuel's promise to accede to it (viii.), the interview between Samuel and Saul and the anointing of Saul in private (ix 1-x 16), the public assembly called by Samuel at Mizpah, and the selection of Saul by lot (17-26), the dissatisfaction of a portion of the people (27), the occasion which won the people for their divinely appointed king and his induction into office (xi.), Samuel's farewell address (xii.). (b) Revolt against the Philistines, and Saul's failure to observe his theocratic obligations (xiii.), the feat of Jonathan, leading to the rout of the Philistines (xiv 1-46), summary of Saul's wars (47, 48), his family (49-51), the particulars of one of these wars, that with Amalek, in which Saul again and in aggravated manner shows his contempt for his theocratic obligations (xv.). Then follows (c) An account of the latter years of Saul's reign, with special reference to the relations between the king and David (xvi.-xxxi.); Saul having been rejected by God, Samuel by divine direction anoints David (xvi 1-13), Saul troubled by an evil spirit summons David as harpist to court (14-23), David slays Goliath and becomes a permanent attaché of Saul's court (xvii. 1-xviii. 5), jealousy of Saul and his attempts on David's life (6-xix 17), flight of David from court and his wandering life (18-xxvii. 12), invasion of the Philistines and Saul's inquiry of the woman with the familiar spirit (xxviii.), David, expelled from the Philistine camp, pursues a marauding band of Amalekites (xxix., xxx.), battle of Gilboa and death of Saul (xxxi.). 3. David the king (2 Sam. i.-xxiv.). Announcement of Saul's death to David (i.), contest for the throne between David, supported by the men of Judah, and Ish-bosheth as head of the other tribes (ii.-iv.), David made king by all Israel (v. 1-3), his reign (4-xxiv.). See DAVID.

The author of the double book was a prophet, for it is placed among the prophets in the Hebrew canon. Samuel wrote a book and laid it up before the Lord (1 Sam. x 25), and part of the double book may be derived from the History of Samuel the Seer (1 Chron. xxix. 29); but scarcely half of the book could have come from his pen, for he died before the end of Saul's reign (1 Sam. xxv. 1). It was written after David's death (2 Sam. v. 5). An allusion to the kings of Judah probably indicates that the book was not completed until after the division of the Israelites into the kingdoms of Judah and Israel (1 Sam. xxvii. 6), but the distinction between Israel and Judah existed in the time of David (xi. 8; xvii. 52; xviii. 6; 2 Sam. iii. 10; xxiv. 1). From Jer. xv. 1 it has been inferred that Jeremiah was acquainted with 1 Sam. xii. There is no reference to the captivity, and it is universally believed that the book was composed before the fall of Jerusalem.

There were several documents relating to the period treated in the book, such as the History of Samuel the Seer, the History of Nathan the Prophet, and the History of Gad the Seer (1 Chron. xxix. 29), but the author does not mention the sources whence he derived his information, as do the authors of Kings and Chronicles, and it is uncertain what records he used. Wellhausen presents an analysis of the books and their sources (Prolegomena). 1. Samuel as a youth. He is in training for the priesthood, and he foretells the collapse of the government which existed before the kingdom was established (1 Sam. i.-iii.). The story was invented after Samuel's career had made him noted. Chap. ii 1-10 is an addition of unknown origin, and verses 27-36 are a Deuteronomistic but preëxilic insertion (pp. 126, 281, 415; cp. Kittel ii. 29, Anm. 6). 2. Account of the fall of the house of Eli (iv.-vi.); but iv. 18^b is an addition (p. 254). 3. Saul's elevation to the throne. There are two accounts of this. (a) According to one account, Saul was privately appointed king by Samuel, who is a seer, and uses his authority to arouse Saul to the help of Israel (ix. 1-x. 16); but ix. 9 is a gloss, and x. 8 is from a later hand. Samuel bade Saul to await the fitting opportunity to come forward (x. 7), and about a month later (ver. 27^a, R. V. margin) the opportunity is afforded by the investment of Jabesh-gilead by the Ammonites. Saul summons the people to arms, leads them against the foe, is victorious, is hailed as deliverer, and is taken to Gilgal and made king (xi.); but verses 12-14 are an interpolation by the author of viii. and x. 17 seq., intended to harmonize this account with his own. The Philistines in Israel and their defeat by Saul and Jonathan (xii., xiv., except that xiii. 7-15, with x. 8, are from a later hand, but older than chap. vii.). (b) According to the other account, Samuel called the people to repentance (vii. 2-4). Then he summoned them to Mizpah, near Jerusalem, to pray for relief from the oppression of the Philistines. The Philistines fell upon the assembly, but were routed and driven from the borders (5-14). Samuel administered the government successfully until he became old (15-17). Samuel having grown old and his sons proving ill-fitted to rule, the elders of Israel ask for a king, desiring to cast off the rule of God and become like other nations (viii.). Saul was accordingly chosen king by lot at Mizpah (x. 17-27^a), and Samuel delivered a farewell address (xii.). 4. Chap. xv is a secondary production. It is the original from which xiii 7-15 is copied, and it is closely related to xxviii. 3-25. 5. There are two complete documents about David, which supplement each other. The first is contained in 1 Sam. xvi.-2 Sam. viii. The second account embraces 2 Sam. ix.-1 Kin. i. It is mutilated at the beginning, but is otherwise intact, except that 2 Sam. xxi.-xxiv. are additions. The first account embodies a history of David from his anointment by Samuel to his flight from Saul. It is connected with 1 Sam. xiv 52 in xvi. 14. David, as a brave man, recommended by his skill in playing the harp, comes to Saul's court and is made his armor-bearer (xvi 14-23); but ver. 14 shows marks of the redactor. Something followed this originally, telling of wars with the Philistines, but quite different from the fight between David and Goliath, which now stands here. In the conflict with the Philistines David acquires himself with distinction, is promoted step by step, and is given the king's daughter to wife (xviii 6-30); but the reflections on Saul are due to a late reviser. Chap. xviii 29^a, Septuagint, is continued in the reference to the popular applause which is accorded David, and which arouses the jealousy of Saul, so that in a fit of madness he hurls a spear at David (xix 9, 10). After discussing the matter with Jonathan, David fled. Saul slew the priests at Nob, because their chief had befriended David (xxi. 2-7, E. V. 1-6; xxii. 6-23). The fugitive gathered a band of desperate men about him and abode in the wilderness of Judah (xxii. 1-5). There are various additions to this continuous history of David. The anointing of David (xvi. 1-13), which depends on the legend of the battle of the shepherd boy with Goliath (xvii 1-xviii. 5). Saul's purpose to slay David is urged by Jonathan as a reason why David should hide himself (xix. 1-7), which is a late addition, for it shows acquaintance with chap. xvii. After Saul had hurled his spear at David, the latter fled for the first time (xix. 8-10). But David is still at home, and with the aid of his wife escapes a second time, fleeing to Samuel in Ramah (xix. 11-24); but verses 18-24 are corrupt and were unknown to the author of xv. 35. Verse 18 seems to look back to xvi. 1-13. David is in Gibeah. The king misses him at the feast; and when the deadly hatred of Saul is proven, David finally flees for good (xx.); but this account is impossible in its present setting. David at Nob obtains the sword of Goliath from the high priest (xxi. 8-10, E. V. 7-9). For fear of Saul David flees that day to Achish, king of Gath (11-16, E. V. 10-15). The account of David's life in the wilderness, a fugitive from Saul (xxii-xxvii), contains three additions to the early document, namely, xxvii. 7-12; xxvi. 1-25; and xxiii. 14-xxiv. 23, E. V. 22. The last two are parallel. Chapter xxvi was placed before chapter xxvii. on account of xxvi. 19, and the passage xxiii 14-xxiv. 23 was placed before xxv. to avoid juxtaposition with xxvi. Chapter xxviii. 1, 2 is the immediate continuation of chapter xxvii., and is itself continued in xxix-xxxi. Verses 3-25, Saul's interview with the woman of En-dor, is closely related to xv., which is the original from which xiii 7-15 is copied. Neither xv nor xxviii. belongs to the fundamental tradition. Each is a prelude to the events that follow.

Biblical critics of all schools are agreed that the author of the Books of Samuel derived the material for his history from various sources, and all critics would rejoice to have these sources definitely determined. But all are not agreed that Wellhausen's analysis, which is essentially that of the divisive school, is successful nor that his method is legitimate. The analysis is based upon contradictions which are alleged to exist between certain parts of the narrative. To this allegation of contradictions and consequent evidence of diversity of document it is replied:

I The author saw no contradictions between these separate parts

II The argument that contradictions exist in the account rests upon a special private exposition of the narrative, and upon a manipulation of the text, which combine to produce inconsistencies. Other interpretation is valid which, without effort, shows a consistent narrative throughout. 1 Sam. vii. 13, 14 is said to be irreconcilably contradictory to all else that has been transmitted. Subsequently we find the domination of the Philistines in no wise overthrown; they not only continue to press across the borders in Samuel's lifetime, but they are in possession of the Israelite land, one of their officials dwells at Gibeah of Benjamin (Wellhausen). Driver, with more caution, says: "The consequences of the victory at Eben-ezer are in vii. 13 generalized in terms hardly reconcilable with the subsequent history: contrast the picture of the Philistines' ascendancy immediately afterwards (x. 5; xiii. 3, 19), etc." The passage does not affirm, as Wellhausen assumes it does, that the Israelites captured Ekron and Gath. They may have done so; the passage states that Israel recovered possession of its ancient territory. The Philistines came no more as occupants within the border of Israel, but Israel delivered its border from Ekron to Gath out of the hand of the Philistines (vii. 13, 14; cp. border, Jer. xxxi. 17). The hand of the Lord was against the Philistines all the days that Samuel ruled (ver. 13); all his days being equivalent, as the expression frequently is in Scripture, to his administration. The Philistines, however, repeatedly crossed the border of Israel afterwards. They did so before Samuel died. They even placed officers in towns of Judah for the collection of tribute, as David did in Damascus (2 Sam. viii. 6; in E. V., garrisons). But they did not settle in the country again, nor did they expel the Hebrews who inhabited it (as Judg. i. 34-36).

By the victory at Eben-ezer Samuel delivered the Israelites from the dominion of the Philistines and recovered the borders of Israel, and during his vigorous administration the dread of his name deterred the Philistines from renewing their invasions, and his presence inspired the Israelites with confidence; but when he grew old, and began to relinquish the reins of government to his inefficient sons, the people lost heart at the thought of their inveterate enemies. Samuel was too old to lead them to battle, his sons were despicable, the Ammonites and the Philistines were as mighty as ever and only biding their time. The senility of a ruler, or the accession of a new and untried king, was usually the opportunity for which a waiting foe watched. Nahash the Ammonite may have already begun to harass the Israelites across the Jordan (1 Sam. xii. 12), though this interpretation is not absolutely necessary. "Make us a king," the elders of Israel said to Samuel, "that he may go before us and fight our battles" (viii 5-20). The claim of a foreign prince to suzerainty over a people might be ignored for years; but in time, when the former lord became strong enough, he himself visited the refractory with an army and punished them, or else trusting to the fear which his prowess had begun to inspire, on noting the weakness and helplessness of his former tributaries, he sent his officials to inquire why the tribute had been withheld, and to receive it anew. If the demand was acceded to, the domestic government of the subject people was not disturbed. This latter course the Philistines pursued. When the inability of Israel to offer resistance became evident, perhaps after the rejection of Samuel by the representatives of the people was known, the Philistines asserted their authority (ix. 16), sent officials into the country (x. 5), and ultimately, as a precautionary measure, perhaps not until Saul was proclaimed king at Gilgal, went so far as to forbid fires in the forges lest the Israelites should provide themselves with weapons (xiii. 19-22).

When the elders of Israel, dismayed by the strength of the hostile nations by which they were surrounded, demanded a king, the aged Samuel was hurt at the slight which was apparently put upon him; but he was divinely informed that the people were not rejecting him, but through lack of faith were repudiating the rule of the invisible King, and he was instructed to accede to the popular request. Accordingly he dismissed the elders with the promise that he would do as they desired (1 Sam. viii).

Shortly after this God revealed to the prophet that a man of Benjamin should come to him, and that he should anoint this Benjaminite to be king and the deliverer from the Philistines (1 Sam. ix. 16). When Saul arrived Samuel entertained him, and in the evening the two sat on the housetop and communed together. The subject of their conversation is not hard to divine. The prophet told Saul of his call to deliver Israel from the newly reimposed yoke of the Philistines, instructed him out of his experience how to meet the foe, and informed him upon what conditions he might have God's help in war. On the morrow, before Saul left, Samuel privately anointed him, gave him several signs by which he should know of a surety that God had called him to the work, and dismissed him with the charge to be governed by providential indications, "and," said the prophet, "go down to Gilgal and tarry seven days till I come and show thee what thou shalt do" (x. 7, 8). The meaning of this charge must be gathered from the housetop conference and from the event (ix. 16-25; xiii. 8). Saul was not to proclaim himself king nor to attempt to free the nation from Philistine domination until circumstances indicated the time, and then he was to make Gilgal the rendezvous and wait seven days for the prophet to come to offer sacrifice, to entreat the favor of the Lord on the undertaking, and to instruct him (x. 8; xiii. 12). The object of this delay at Gilgal was to declare publicly that the king was merely the vicegerent of heaven, to show the people that Saul recognized that his royal authority did not include the priestly office, that king and prophet must work together. It was clearly the idea of the two men that they should cooperate. Saul observed the principle that underlay this advice. For a time he exalted the prophet and ranked himself only as a collaborer (xi. 7), and he felt that he needed to know the will of the Lord through the prophet (xxviii. 15); and Samuel for his part, when Saul was established on the throne, purposed still to assist the people of God (xii. 23), and even after Saul's sin and God's rejection of him Samuel went up to Gibeah of Benjamin, where Saul held court, to assist him in the administration of the kingdom by instructing him as to God's will (xiii. 15).

As directed by Samuel, Saul returned to his father's house. The signs occurred, and especially when he met a band of prophets, prophesying as they passed the station of the Philistine official, the Spirit of the Lord smote him there, and he, too, prophesied. His countrymen were worshiping God while their enemies triumphed over them. He discerned the anomaly and prophesied. The man was awakening to the religious aspect of his appointed work (1 Sam. x. 9-13).

Samuel now fulfilled his promise to the representatives of the nation. He did not use his authority to place Saul on the throne; the matter was too delicate and the issues too great. He summoned the people to Mizpah and the choice was left to God. The lot was cast before the Lord, and Saul was chosen, a man of fine appearance, fitted to call forth the admiration and win the confidence of the people; a man of the tribe of Benjamin, the border tribe between north and south, in order to avoid the ancient and growing dissension in the nation. The choice was publicly committed to God in order to secure the allegiance of the pious part of the people for the divinely appointed king. The people shouted "God save the king," and the kingdom was formally established (1 Sam. x. 24, 25). The precautions taken by Samuel were fully justified by the event. The selection, although made by God himself, did not approve itself to all the people; there were jealousies, and the dissatisfied asked in disdain, "How shall this fellow, out of one of the smallest families of a small tribe, save us?" (27). But Saul quietly retired to his father's house, accompanied by certain men of valor, to bide his time and await developments. He made no claim to the throne in the face of disaffection, he did not begin a civil war to secure the crown; but he let the matter drop until God should change the heart of the people and place him on the throne without shedding the blood of his brethren. He devoted himself to attending to his father's estate.

About a month elapsed in this manner (1 Sam. x. 27, R. V. margin). Nahash the Ammonite had pushed his invasion almost to the Jordan and was now besieging Jabesh in Gilead. The people of that town were in sore straits. Nahash imposed ignominious conditions of surrender, as a taunt to all Israel. The men of Jabesh, however, secured a week's respite in order to send messengers into all the coasts of Israel. Some of these messengers, or all of them, came to Gibeah and made known their distress. Saul was in the field, but when he returned and learned the extremity of his fellow-countrymen, and the reproach offered to Israel by their heathen foe, the Spirit of God came mightily upon him, and he sent through all the borders of Israel calling the people to follow him and Samuel. They responded as one man. Saul led them to victory, raised the siege of Jabesh, and put Nabash to flight (xi. 1-11). The Philistines had no cause to forbid the relief of Jabesh in Gilead, on the contrary, it was to their advantage that the country tributary to them should be kept intact. The same story of subject peoples being left by the sovereign state to settle their own domestic disputes and fight out their quarrels with their neighbors is familiar in the annals of Assyria and Egypt. Flushed with victory and proud of their leader, the people asked "Who is he that said, Shall Saul reign over us? bring the men that we may put them to death." Saul forbade slaughter, and at Samuel's suggestion the people went to Gilgal, which was not far off, renewed the kingdom and made Saul king, and this act being accomplished, Samuel formally delivered the government into Saul's hands (xi. 12-xi. 25).

Saul was now king, but the work which he had been raised up to do was only begun. The Ammonites were driven from the borders, but the Israelites still suffered the humiliation of subjection to the Philistines. They managed indeed their own internal affairs, they had a king of their own with a royal guard of three thousand men; but they paid tribute to the Philistines, must tolerate Philistine officials in their borders, and were compelled to keep their forges idle. Saul was biding his time. Two years, according to the present questionable Hebrew text, passed by, when the opportunity arrived. Jonathan smote the Philistine official at Gibeah, and the Philistines assembled their armies to avenge the insult and quell the insurrection. The time for action had come, Saul blew the trumpet for war, and the Israelites assembled after him at Gilgal. This was what Samuel had charged him to do (1 Sam. xiii. 1-7). Wellhausen excludes the interview between Samuel and Saul at Gilgal from the original narrative as being a late addition. He bases his exclusion of it on the change of place between verses 4 and 16. Wellhausen identifies Gibeah of Benjamin with Geba of Benjamin (vers. 3, 4, 16). He may be right in so doing, for the two names are confused also in the text of Judges. But he does not accurately give the statements of the Hebrew account. "At the beginning of the narrative," he says, "Saul is at Gibeah, and there the Philistines seek for him, stopping before the place because they meet with resistance there. Suddenly it is silently assumed (xiii. 7) that Saul has remained at Gilgal since his selection as king." In view of verse 4, this is misrepresentation on the part of Wellhausen. What the passage plainly says is quite different. Saul's troops were in Michmash and Bethel and Jonathan's in Gibeah of Benjamin when Jonathan smote the Philistine official in Geba (2, 3). Then Saul blew the trumpet and the people gathered together after him to Gilgal (3, 4; cp. 7). According to the analysis of Wellhausen, xiii. 1-6 is continued in verse 16, "Now, as for Saul and Jonathan and the people that were found with them, they were dwelling in Geba of Benjamin and the Philistines had encamped in Michmash." This is straightforward and consistent, but Wellhausen continues: "In xiii. 16 the reader again has the impression that Saul had been long at Gibeah with his men, when the enemy pitched their camp opposite. Only thus can the contrast between the circumstantial participle and the inchoative perfect be understood." But the statement of Wellhausen is again inaccurate. The narrative had left the Philistines at Michmash (ver. 5) and Saul at Gilgal according to Wellhausen's analysis (ver. 4), and still at Gilgal, if verse 7 be included in the narrative. Now it states that Saul and his men were abiding at Geba of Benjamin, but the Philistines had encamped in Michmash. The same difficulty, if difficulty it be, lies against the narrative which Wellhausen calls original, as against the narrative which appears in the present Hebrew text. This simply means that the section which Wellhausen omits, verses 7 to 15, is in place, which tells of the events at Gilgal, and concludes by saying that Samuel arose and went up from Gilgal unto Gibeah of Benjamin; and Saul after having numbered his troops, was with Jonathan and these men at Geba of Benjamin. The departure from Gilgal is expressly stated with regard to Samuel, and it is not necessary explicitly to repeat it in regard to Saul and his men, it is understood of itself. And the author used the participle to indicate the continuing circumstance that Saul was abiding at Geba.

The passage is intelligible with the present Hebrew text. The supposed difficulty likewise vanishes when the text is emended by the aid of the Septuagint. The Greek translation has an additional clause, and Driver conjectures that the original text read: "And Samuel arose and gat him up from Gilgal [and went on his way. And the rest of the people went up after Saul to meet the men of war; and they came from Gilgal] to Gibeah of Benjamin and Saul numbered," and so forth. "The omission in the Masoretic text is evidently due to the recurrence of 'from Gilgal'" (Text of Samuel, p. 78). In view of verse 16 this new text justifies Wellhausen's identification of Gibeah and Geba in this chapter; but it implies that verses 7 and 8^b form an integral part of the original narrative. And this result Driver accepts, rejecting Wellhausen's exclusion of x. 8 and xii. 7-15, from the original narrative (Introduction, p. 176). Thus either with the Masoretic text upon which the English version is based, or with the text as emended by the aid of the Septuagint, the entire chapter is a unit.

But while 1 Sam. xiii. is a unit in itself, it is asserted to be distinct in authorship from chap. xv.; for in these two chapters there is a double and contradictory account of Saul's rejection by God. But the assertion cannot stand examination. Samuel indeed twice rebuked Saul at Gilgal, but he only once declared that God had rejected Saul from being king. When at the beginning of his reign, when about to undertake the special work to which he had been called, Saul failed to obey Samuel's charge to wait seven days until the prophet should come to implore God's aid by sacrifice, he was rebuked but he was not rejected: "Hadst thou been faithful to the theocratic requirements, thy kingdom would have been established forever; but now it shall not continue. God hath chosen a man after his own heart and appointed him to be prince over his people" (xiii. 13, 14). Saul is not declared unworthy to be king over God's people, Samuel does not abandon him, but goes to the capital, where he can still assist him. The prophet only declares that Saul's kingdom shall not continue forever; it shall eventually pass from Saul's family under the control of another. But after Saul's second flagrant violation of his theocratic obligations, when he disobeyed the command of God in the war with Amalek, he was rejected from being king (xv. 23); and Samuel abandoned him and came no more to see him until the day of his death (34, 35), a man of a different tribe was anointed (xvi. 1, 13), the spirit which qualified the theocratic king for his high office departed from Saul and came nightly upon David (13, 14), and not Saul, out David, became the deliverer of Israel (xvii.).

The account of Samuel's judgeship and of Saul's elevation to the throne, the earlier years of his reign, and his rejection by God, is thus found to be capable of consistent interpretation throughout. Examination of the history of David reveals its consistency likewise. See DAVID and JONATHAN. There is no ground, therefore, for the assumption that contradictory documents have been combined to form the First Book of Samuel.

III. It further appears that while the contents of the alleged documents into which he narrative has been distributed are consistent, they also imply each other. (1) The original narrative in 1 Sam. ix. 16, and x. 5, implies that the Philistines had renewed the exercise of sovereignty over Israel. The explanation is found in the preceding chapter, which is alleged to be a later narrative; for the threatening attitude of the Philistines and other ancient foes, when Samuel began to relax the reins of government, is implied in viii. 1, 5, 20. The original narrative thus requires chap. viii. as an integral part. The only escape is to magisterially declare that the Israelites had been subject to the Philistines ever since the ark was taken, that

Samuel never delivered Israel from the Philistine yoke, that the story of the second battle of Ebenezer is a pure fabrication (vii. 2-17). And this dogmatic assertion Wellhausen does not hesitate to make. He says that "there cannot be a word of truth in the entire narrative." Driver does not explicitly deny that the event occurred, but he admits that chaps. ix. and x. do not connect directly with vii. 1, and says that "it is probable that the original sequel of iv. 1^b to vii. 1, has here been omitted to make room for vii. 2 ff." In other words, vii. 2-17 and viii. afford a consistent picture of the times, as has been already shown; and it is the theory of the divisive critics which fails to explain the existing phenomena. (2) The original narrative in xi. implies the public selection of Saul to be king which is related in the alleged later narrative (x. 17-27). If, as asserted, Saul had only been anointed in private (x. 1), what gave him such respect in the eyes of the people a month later that men from all the tribes sprang to arms at his summons and followed him to the relief of Jabesh in Gilead? Chapter xi. requires that some event preceded like that which is recorded in the alleged later narrative (x. 17-27). (3) The original narrative of David's career, it is said, first mentions him as an adult man, accustomed to arms, who is skillful in playing the harp and is accordingly summoned by Saul to court, to soothe him with music whenever he is suffering from his malady (xvi. 14-23), and it is continued in xviii. 6-30. But it is manifest that these two passages do not connect; xviii. 6 refers to the return of David from the slaughter of the Philistine (R. V. margin, Philistines). The account of the combat between David and Goliath, which is assigned to a different and later author, intervenes and supplies the missing link; but this has been eliminated from the original narrative by the divisive critics, largely on the allegation that in xvii. 33 David is represented as a youth, and in verses 55-58 Saul does not know David. On other equally valid interpretation these alleged inconsistencies with the original narrative do not exist. See DAVID. To make them out the divisive critics are obliged to discard xvii. 14. Saul is not asking who David is, but is inquiring who and what David's father is. That something is needed between xvi. 23, and xviii. 6, is admitted. Wellhausen says it was something quite different from what now stands there, because chap. xvii. tells of David's killing but one man, whereas xviii. 7 speaks of him as having slain his ten thousand. As though the slaying of their champion, and thereby putting the Philistines to flight, was not in the language of song the slaying of ten thousand! The author of the Book of Samuel evidently understood it so. Thus the original narrative of David's career implies the existence of the alleged later story, and again the only escape from this dilemma is to assert that some part of the original narrative has been replaced by something quite different. The Book of Samuel does not make the difficulty. It is the theory which fails to explain the existing phenomena.

San-bal'lat [the moon-god Sin hath given life].

An influential Samaritan (Neh. ii. 10). He was a Horonite. This designation scarcely means a native of Horonaim in Moab, else he would probably be called a Moabite; but rather describes him as a man of Beth-horon (cp. iv. 2; vi. 2). He was opposed to the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem by Nehemiah and tried, unsuccessfully, to stop it (iv. 7, 8). Next he plotted with others to invite Nehemiah to a conference, and assassinate him when he came (vi. 1-4). This new device failing, he tried intimidation, but in vain (5-14).

Sanballat the Horonite was a contemporary of the high priest Eliashib, great-grandfather of Jaddua; was associated with Tobiah the Ammonite; and opposed the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem by Nehemiah in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes. A son of the high priest Joiada took Sanballat's daughter to wife, and for this offense was expelled by Nehemiah (Neh. iii. 1; iv. 3, 7; xiii. 4, 28). Josephus mentions one Sanballat, a Cuthean by birth, whom Darius, the last king [of Persia, 336-330 B. C.] sent to Samaria as governor (Antiq. xi. 7, 2; 8, 2), but who, on the defeat of Darius, went over to Alexander the Great, 332 B. C. (8, 4). His daughter Nicaso was taken to wife by Manasseh, brother of the high priest Jaddua. This foreign marriage offended the Jewish authorities, and they drove Manasseh from the altar at Jerusalem; but Sanballat, with the approbation of Alexander, built a temple on Mount Gerizim and made his son-in-law its priest (7, 2; 8, 2 and 4). These statements of the Jewish historian do not accord with the facts of Sanballat's history already recited. The older commentators thought that Josephus speaks of a later Sanballat. Josephus, however, doubtless has in mind Sanballat the Horonite and the marriage referred to in Neh. xiii. 28; but he has probably lowered the date of Sanballat 100 years to conform the facts to his belief that the son-in-law of Sanballat not only founded or greatly promoted the Samaritan religion, but also built the temple on Gerizim, and that this temple was erected after Alexander's conquest of the country (Antiq. xiii. 9, 1; 200 years before 128 B. C. or thereabout), and that Alexander and the high priest Jaddua were contemporaries (xi. 8, 5). Josephus assigns a false date here; as he also does when he dates Nehemiah's commission in the twenty-fifth year of Xerxes, who reigned but 21 years (Antiq. xi. 5, 7), instead of in the twentieth year of his successor, Artaxerxes (Neh. ii. 1), and when he dates the arrival of Ezra in Jerusalem in the seventh year of Xerxes (Antiq. xi. 5, 2), instead of 21 years later, in the seventh year of Artaxerxes (Ezra vii. 1, 8), and when he confounds Onias I. with Onias III., who lived a century later (1 Mac. xii. 7, 20; Antiq. xii. 4, 10).

San'dal. See CLOTHING, SHOE

San'he-drin and Sanhedrim [Talmudic Hebrew, from Greek sunedrion, a council].

The name generally given by writers on Jewish antiquities and history to the highest Jewish assembly for government in the time of our Lord. The English version uses the more familiar word council; see COUNCIL.

San-san'nah [a palm leaf].

A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 31); perhaps the same as Hazarsusah, which occupies the corresponding position in the list of cities assigned to the Simeonites (cp. Josh. xix. 5).

Saph [a basin, foundation, threshold].

A Philistine giant, slain by Sibbechai in a battle at Gob (2 Sam. xxi. 18). Called in 1 Chron. xx. 4 Sippai.

Sa'phir. See SHAPHIR.

Sap-phi'ra [beautiful, or, less probably, a sapphire].

The wife of that Ananias who was struck dead for having lied unto God. She shared her husband's sin and its penalty (Acts v. 1-10).

Sap'phire.

A precious stone (Tobit xiii. 16), called in Hebrew sappir, in Greek sappheiros. It was the middle gem in the second row of the high priest's breastplate (Ex. xxviii. 18), and adorned the second foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 19). It was susceptible of a fine polish (Lam. iv. 7), and was of great value (Job xxviii. 16; cp. Song. v. 14; Is. liv. 11). The sapphire is one of the three varieties of corundum, the others being corundum proper and emery. It is of a bluish color, and transparent or translucent (cp. Ex. xxiv. 10). It is inferior in hardness only to the diamond, and is still greatly prized. The ancients obtained it from India and Ethiopia. Fine specimens are brought from Ceylon.

Sa'rah, in A. V. of N. T. twice Sara (Heb. xi. 11; 1 Pet. iii. 6) [a princess].

1. The wife of Abraham, ten years his junior, married to him in Ur of the Chaldees (Gen. xi. 28-31; xvii. 17). She was also his half-sister, being the daughter of his father, but not of his mother (xx. 12). Her name was originally Sarai, meaning perhaps princely or contentious. When Abraham departed from Haran to go to Canaan, Sarai was about sixty-five years old (xii. 4). Evidently she was a well-preserved woman: for she lived to be one hundred and twenty-seven years old; and shortly after leaving Haran, when about to enter Egypt, Abraham feared lest her beauty should attract the Egyptians and lead to his murder, and he represented that she was his sister, keeping back the fact that she was his wife (10-20). Years later he did so again at the court of Abimelech, king of Gerar (xx. 1-18). Why he did so is not stated, nor is it said that Abimelech was influenced by her beauty. The king of Gerar may have thought of the desirability of an alliance with the powerful Hebrew chieftain, and, with this end in view, determined to take a woman of the immediate family of Abraham into his harem, as was frequently done by princes of that period when they concluded alliances. Sarai had a female slave, Hagar, but she herself worked for the household with her own hand (xviii. 6). Sarai was childless; and when about seventy-five years old she concluded that she was an obstacle to the promise made to Abraham of numerous posterity, and she entreated her husband to take Hagar as a secondary wife. He did so, apparently without asking divine direction before doing so, and became the father of Ishmael (xvi. 1-16). Afterwards Sarai, when about eighty-nine, received a promise from God that she should herself bear a son (cp. Heb. xi. 11, 12), and in the course of a year gave birth to Isaac the child of promise. It was when this promise was made to her that God changed her name to Sarah, meaning princess (Gen. xvii. 15-22; xviii. 9-15; xxi. 1-5). When Isaac was weaned, his parents made a great feast, at which Sarah saw Ishmael, Hagar's son, mocking. She insisted that both mother and son should be sent away (9-21). Sarah died at Kirjath-arba (Hebron) at the age of 127 (xxiii. 1, 2), and was buried in the cave of Machpelah, which Abraham purchased at that time for a family sepulchre.

Sar'dis.

A city first of the Mæonians and then the capital of Lydia. It was situated at the foot of mount Tmolus, on the banks of the river Pactolus, a tributary of the Hermus. Most of the city was on a somewhat swampy plain, but the citadel was on a hill flanked on one side by a precipice. It was the capital of a very fertile region. One of its kings was Croesus, who was proverbial for his wealth. In 546 B. C. it was captured by Cyrus the Great, and afterwards became the seat of a Persian satrap. The burning of Sardis by the Athenians, 499 B. C., brought on the Persian invasion of Greece in the reigns of Darius and Xerxes. In 334 B. C. it surrendered to Alexander the Great, after his victory at the Granicus. In 214 B. C. it was taken by Antiochus the Great, but he lost it again, after having been severely defeated, in 190 B. C., by the Romans at the battle of Magnesia. They annexed it for a time to the kingdom of Pergamos, but in 129 B. C. constituted the Roman province of Asia, within the limits of which Sardis fell. Jews dwelt in the city (Antiq. xiv. 10, 24), and a Christian community early grew up there (Rev. i. 11; iii. 1, 4). Sardis (now called Sert-Kalessi) is only a miserable hamlet, consisting of a few houses. But there are remains in its vicinity of a magnificent temple, coming down, it is believed, from Lydian times, with the ruins of a course for foot-racing, a theater, and Christian churches. The citadel is of sandstone, partly rent asunder as if by one of the earthquakes which have frequently visited the region.

Sar'di-us, in A. V. of Rev. iv. 3 Sardine.

A variety of chalcedony, which the Greeks called sardios and sardion. It was a precious stone (Rev. iv. 3), and constituted the sixth foundation of the wall about the New Jerusalem (xxi. 20). Two sorts, distinguished by their color, were known by the name of sardius: the transparent red being our carnelian and the brownish red being the variety of carnelian to which we restrict the name sardius. According to Pliny, it was found near Sardis, whence it derived its name, but the finest qualities were brought from Babylon. The best carnelians now come from India; some also occur in Arabia, whence the ancient Hebrews may have obtained them.

In the O. T. sardius is the rendering of the Hebrew 'Odem, reddish gem. It was the first stone in the first row on the high priest's breastplate (Ex. xxviii. 17), and was one of the stones with which Tyre adorned itself (Ezek. xxviii. 13). The marginal reading is ruby, but the Septuagint renders 'odem by sardion. So does Josephus in one place (War v. 5, 7), while in another he has sardonix, which is but another variety of chalcedony (Antiq. iii. 7, 5).

Sar'do-nyx.

A variety of chalcedony, called by the Greeks sardoniz, finger-nail onyx. It forms the fifth foundation of the wall surrounding the New Jerusalem (Rev. xxi. 20). It is like the onyx in structure, but includes layers of carnelian along with others of white, whitish-brown, or sometimes of black color. It was obtained chiefly in India and Arabia (Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxxvii. 23).

Sa-rep'ta. See ZAREPHATH.

Sar'gon [Assyrian Sharrukinu, the constituted king].

A king of Assyria, mentioned by name in Scripture in Is. xx. 1 only. He succeeded the last Shalmaneser. He was perhaps of royal blood, as he claims; but it is believed that he usurped the throne, assuming the name of Sargon, an ancient and celebrated Babylonian king. He either secured the throne and then completed the siege of Samaria, which Shalmaneser had begun in 724 B C, or else he ascended the throne immediately after the fall of Israel's capital, and, perhaps as the general who had brought these military operations to a successful termination, claimed the capture as an act of his accession year. The biblical record is not clear (2 Kin. xvii 1-6). The Hebrew writer relates that Shalmaneser came against Hoshea, and proceeds by saying that the king of Assyria found conspiracy in Hoshea and cast him into prison, and that the king of Assyria besieged Samaria three years, and in the ninth year of Hoshea took the city. Until the claim of Sargon to have captured Samaria came to light, readers of the Hebrew narrative inferred that Shalmaneser was the conqueror of Samaria. But the inference was not warranted, for the writer continues to speak of the king of Assyria, where it is probable that he does not mean the conqueror of Samaria (Jer. 24 26, 27). He does not specify the particular king, but uses the general title; and when he recurs to the siege, he names Shalmaneser as the besieger, but continues by saying, "They took it" (xviii 9, 10). At any rate, Samaria fell in the closing months of 722 B C, and Sargon ascended the throne on the 12th of Tebet, the tenth month, of that year. Immediately after his accession, the Babylonians, assisted by the Elamites, revolted, and Sargon was for a time unable to reduce them to subjection. In 720 the remaining Israelites of Samaria in alliance with the men of Hamath rebelled, but Sargon subdued them, and placed captive Hamathites as colonists in Samaria. In the same year he defeated the allied forces of Hanun, king of Gaza and Sib'e, better known to readers of the Bible as So, the tartan of Egypt in a battle fought at Raphia. Sargon took Carchemish, the capital of the Hittites, in 717, and with the capture of their capital the empire of the Hittites fell. In 716 his armies waged war in Armenia, in 715 they were still engaged in war in Armenia, and were carrying on operations in Media. In this year also Arab tribes were planted as colonists in Samaria by his orders, and he received tribute from Pharaoh of Egypt. He boasts of having subjugated Judah. The tablet on which this boast appears was inscribed before the close of 714, to judge from its contents. The combined Assyrian and Hebrew data point to the end of 715 or the beginning of 714 as the date when Hezekiah acknowledged the suzerainty of Assyria by beginning to pay tribute. Merodach-baladan incited the nations from Elam to the Mediterranean Sea to revolt from Assyria. In 711, therefore, Sargon dispatched troops against Ashdod, and in 710 he captured Babylon and assumed the title of king of Babylon. He began to erect a new palace and town 10 miles northeast of Nineveh in 712 and named it Dur-sharrukin, Sargonsburg. The ruins are known as Khorsabad; see NINEVEH. He took up his residence there about 707. He was murdered in 705 and was succeeded by his son Sennacherib.

Sa'rid [survivor].

A village on the southern frontier of Zebulun (Josh xix 10, 12). Conder, reading with Septuagint and Syriac version d instead of r, places it doubtfully at Tell Shadûd, on the northern part of the plain of Esdraelon, 5 miles southwest of Nazareth.

Sa'tan [Hebrew satan, an adversary].

The devil (Mat iv 1 with 10, 11; Mark i. 13), preeminently "the adversary" (Job i 6; Zech iii. 1, margin), because animated by a disposition hostile to all goodness and the chief opponent of God and man (Job ii. 3; Luke xxii 3, cp 1 Chron xxi. 1 and Ps cix. 6, but see R V), aiming to undo the work of God (Mark iv 15), seeking to persuade men to sin (Luke xxii 3; Acts v. 3; xxvi. 18), desirous of leading them to renounce God (Job ii 5; Mat iv 9, 10), and endeavoring to prevent their acceptance and salvation by God (Zech iii. 1, 2). He is sometimes influential in bringing about physical sickness, pecuniary loss, bereavement (Job i. 11-22, ii 4-7; Luke xiii 16). He is, however, under the control of God. Only by God's permission can he pursue his malicious designs (Job i. 12; ii 5, 6; Luke xxii. 32). When permission is granted him to carry out his evil plots, it is only that he may become an instrument in furthering the divine plan. In Job's case, the vain efforts of Satan to induce the patriarch to sin resulted in disciplining his character and maturing his faith in God. In the fully revealed doctrine of Satan, which is seen in the N. T., he is the god of this world who has access to the hearts of men deceives them, and receives their witting or unwitting obedience (Luke xxii. 3; Acts v. 3; xxvi. 18; 2 Cor. iv. 4; 2 Thes. ii 9; Rev. xii. 9). He is the ruler of a kingdom, having principalities, powers, and demons under him (Mat. xii. 24, 26; Luke xi. 18; Rev. xii. 7).

Satan was the seducer of Adam and Eve (2 Cor. xi. 3; Rev xii 9). This fact may have become known to them. If not, it was discerned as soon as the existence of the devil and his work became known, for the temptation of Eve came from without through the persuasions of an irrational creature. The malignant spirit behind the serpent, hostile to good, seeking to undo the work of God, and supernaturally lending speech to the reptile, or communicating with the mind of the woman, so that she thought she heard articulate speech, was evidently Satan. This doctrine went hand in hand with the doctrine concerning the devil, and received the highest sanction (Wisd. ii. 24; John viii. 44; Rom. xvi. 20; 2 Cor. xi. 3; Rev. xii. 9); see SERPENT. Satan produced demoniacal possession (Mat. xii. 22-29; Mark iii. 22-27; Luke xi. 14-23). He approached Jesus with temptation (Mat. iv. 1-11). He steals the word from the heart of the ignorant or inattentive hearer (Mark iv. 15). He entered into the heart of Judas before the commission of the great crime (Luke xxii. 3; John xiii. 27). He had to do with Peter's fall (Luke xxii. 31). It was under temptation by Satan that Ananias and Sapphira lied to the Holy Ghost (Acts v. 3). He hindered Paul in his ministry (1 Thes. ii. 18), having previously sent a messenger to buffet him (2 Cor. xii. 7). Pergamos, where a faithful Christian, Antipas, suffered martyrdom, was a place where Satan dwelt (Rev. ii. 13). Men with hearts unchanged are under Satan's power (Acts xxvi. 18). An assembly of those who have grievously erred from the faith, and perhaps from morality, is the synagogue of Satan (Rev. ii. 9; iii. 9; cp. 1 Tim. v. 15). Those who are expelled from the church are said to be delivered to Satan; but this is designed to produce their reformation, and not their destruction (1 Cor. v. 5; 1 Tim. i. 20). There are depths in Satan which inexperienced Christians fail to fathom (Rev. ii. 24). He is, moreover, so plausible that he seems to be an angel of light (2 Cor. xi. 14). He sometimes gains advantages over Christians (ii. 11), but he shall ultimately be bruised under their feet (Rom. xvi. 20). He is the real agent in the operations carried on by the man of sin (2 Thes. ii. 1-12), but the day will come when, after a temporary triumph, Satan shall be expelled from the earth, and, being bound, shall be cast into the abyss (Rev. xii. 9; xx. 1, 2). See DEVIL.

Simon Peter was called Satan when he took it upon him to contradict Christ's prophecy of his death and resurrection, for he was a stumbling-block to Christ, opposed him, and minded not the things of God (Mat. xvi. 23; Mark viii. 33).

Sa'trap [from Persian khshatrāpāwan, abbreviated khshatrāpā, protector of the land, in Hebrew 'hashdrapan].

The official title of the viceroy, who, in behalf of the Persian monarch, exercised the civil and military authority in several small provinces combined in one government. Each of these provinces had its own governor (Ezra viii. 36 and Esth. iii. 12, in A. V. lieutenant). The title is used in Aramaic historical documents written after the Persian conquest, in referring to high officials of the Babylonian empire and of the kingdom ruled by Darius the Mede (Dan. iii. 2 and vi. 1, in A. V. prince).

Sa'tyr.

A sylvan god of the Greeks and Romans, a companion of Bacchus. At first he was represented with long-pointed ears, snub nose, and goat's tail. At a later period goat's legs were added. He was supposed to possess a half brutal and lustful nature. Satyr is the rendering of the Hebrew S'ir, he goat, and is applied to wild animals or demons which should dance among the ruins of Babylon (Is. xiii. 21) and of the Edomite cities (xxxiv. 14). The word commonly signifies a he goat. In two passages it denotes an object of idolatrous worship (Lev. xvii. 7; 2 Chron. xi. 15, both R. V.). In the latter place it is mentioned with calf idols, suggesting that it refers to idols having the likeness of goats. In Is. xiii. 21, 22 it is associated with wild animals, in xxxiv. 14 with a creature of the night also, which may be either some nocturnal animal (in A. V. the screech owl) or a nocturnal demon; see NIGHT MONSTER. In the adaptation of Isaiah's words in Revelation, the language is quoted from the Septuagint and the word demons is used (Rev. xviii. 2, R. V.). Accordingly, interpreters dispute whether the Hebrew prophet meant that wild goats, ostriches, wolves, jackals, and other beasts of the desert should wander among the forsaken ruins, or whether he introduced into the imagery of his poetic description a popular belief in demons which appeared in the form of goats and haunted desert places.

Saul [asked (of God)].

1 A king of Edom, from Rehoboth, on the Euphrates (Gen. xxxvi. 37, 38, in R. V. Shaul).

2. The first king of Israel, son of Kish, a Benjamite; see KISH. The prophet Samuel had grown old; his sons showed by their conduct that they did not possess his upright character and could not carry on his work; and the surrounding nations were evidently ready to harass and oppress Israel (1 Sam. viii. 1, 3, 20; xii. 12). The elders of Israel accordingly came to Samuel and demanded that the form of government be changed and that a visible king be set over them, so that they might be like the well-organized nations about them, and have one who could lead them to victory over their foes (viii. 4, 5, 19, 20). Although the ultimate organization of the Hebrews as a kingdom, with an earthly monarch as the representative of Jehovah, had long been contemplated (Gen. xvii. 6, 16; xxxv. 11; Deut. xvii. 14-20), yet the spirit of the people in demanding a king at this crisis was irreligious. They lacked abiding faith in God, without which the rule of Jehovah as theocratic king was impossible. They were turning from faith in the invisible God to put confidence in a visible king. By divine direction Samuel informed the elders what the people would have to endure from a king, but on their persisting in their demand, he promised to do as they desired and dismissed them.

The elevation of Saul to the throne. About this time the asses of Kish, a Benjamite, went astray, and his son, Saul, was sent to seek them. Saul was at the time a young man, perhaps thirty-five years old; and he was head and shoulders taller than any of the people. Not finding the asses, after three days' search, he was about to give up the quest and return home. His servant, however, suggested one further effort. Persons of whom the servant made inquiry concerning the asses probably told him that there was a man of God in the neighboring city who might give the desired information, and he persuaded Saul to go to him. The man of God was Samuel, who had been told by God to expect a Benjamite and to anoint him prince over Israel. Saul and his family in Gibeah knew Samuel well by report (1 Sam. x 14-16), but Saul seems not to have met the prophet before and not to have understood that Samuel was the man of God of whom the people spake. He refers to him as the man (ix 7), and on meeting him at the city gate does not know him (18, 19). Samuel informed Saul that the asses had been recovered, intimated to him that he would be chosen king, and put him in the place of honor at the sacrificial feast which he was about to celebrate. Next morning, as the guest was leaving the town, the prophet took a vial of oil, poured it upon his head, and having kissed him, said, "Is it not that the Lord hath anointed thee to be prince over his inheritance?" and charged him not to disclose the secret, to go to Gilgal at the proper time and tarry there seven days, until he himself should come and offer sacrifice and give instruction (ix 20-x. 16). Samuel soon summoned the people to Mizpah. The choice was left to God. The lot was cast, and Saul was chosen. But he had hidden himself. When he was brought from his hiding place and stood forth, towering above the multitude, he was received with enthusiasm. God had selected a man of fine appearance in order to win the admiration and confidence of all the Israelites, and a man of the tribe of Benjamin, which stood on the border between Ephraim and Judah, in order to satisfy both north and south. Samuel had committed the choice to God in order to secure the allegiance of the godly men for the king. A large company of men, obedient to God, escorted Saul home; but certain men of Belial were nevertheless dissatisfied, and Saul retired to private life until private jealousies should be overcome. He devoted himself to the cultivation of his father's fields. A month later (x. 27, R. V. margin) the town of Jabesh in Gilead was straitly besieged by the Ammonites. At the request of the citizens, the besiegers scornfully granted a truce of seven days in order that the townspeople might invoke the aid of their fellow-countrymen. The messengers, or some of them, came to Gibeah with their mournful story. Saul heard it when he returned from the field. The Spirit of God stirred him. He sent summons to the tribes to follow him and Samuel to the rescue of their imperiled brethren. Jabesh was relieved. The people asked where were they who had refused to recognize Saul as king, and they carried Saul to Gilgal, the nearest place of customary sacrifice, where he was inducted into office and Samuel laid down his judgeship (xi. 1-xii. 25); see SAMUEL, BOOKS OF.

The reign of Saul. The age of Saul when he began to reign is unknown, as the Hebrew text of 1 Sam. xii. 1 is defective, the numeral being omitted. The number thirty is derived from the Septuagint. He was at any rate old enough to have a son capable of holding a military command. Saul established a small standing army of 3000 men; 2000 of these were with him at Michmash and Bethel, and 1000 were stationed with Jonathan at Gibeah (xii 2). Jonathan smote a Philistine garrison, or rather deputy, at Geba (3); see GARRISON. The Philistines heard thereof, and held the Israelites in abomination. The Israelites, learning of their danger, responded to Saul's summons to assemble at Gilgal (3, 4), whither Samuel had promised to come in this emergency and entreat the favor of the Lord (8, 11, 12; x. 8). A Philistine army advanced into the land of Israel and pitched at Michmash. Great fear seized the Israelites, Samuel intentionally delayed to appear, the people began to scatter and leave the king, and a descent of the Philistines upon Saul and his decreasing forces seemed imminent (xiii. 8, 11, 12); and therefore Saul presumed to conduct the sacrifice. But Samuel came, rebuked the king for transgressing God's command (x. 8), and declared that Saul on account of his disobedience should not found a dynasty (xiii 9-14). Samuel went up to Saul's town of Gibeah, where he would be near the king. Saul and Jonathan took post at Geba of Benjamin, while the Philistines lay encamped at Michmash. By a feat of valor, Jonathan started a panic in the garrison of the Philistines, which spread to their camp and to their prowling bands. Saul took advantage of it, and secured a victory (xiii 15-xiv. 46). Afterwards Samuel directed Saul to wage a war of extermination against the Amalekites. Saul undertook the war, but he spared the best of the cattle to sacrifice to the Lord at Gilgal, and also saved their king. For this second act of disobedience, by which he showed that he could not be trusted to act as God's instrument, but desired to assert his own will in God's kingdom, he was rejected from being king (xv 1-35); see SAMUEL, BOOKS OF. Samuel, therefore, was sent to Bethlehem to anoint David king (xvi. 1-13). The Spirit of the Lord now departed from Saul, and he began to be troubled by an evil spirit. A harper was required to charm away his melancholy madness, and David was selected to discharge the duty (14-23). The plaudits with which the youthful son of Jesse was welcomed on returning from his great victory over Goliath so excited Saul's jealousy that before long the hero was a fugitive, pursued with relentless fury by the now vindictive monarch (xvii.-xxx.); see DAVID. At last the end came. The Philistines, invading the Israelite territory, pitched in Shunem, near the valley of Jezreel. Saul, following to give them battle, established his headquarters on the slope of mount Gilboa. Sad forebodings of his fate troubling him, he made a night journey quite close to the Philistine camp, to En-dor, where lived a woman who was reputed to have the power of calling up even the dead, and he was there informed that he and his sons should perish on the morrow (xxviii. 1-25). The morrow came, and the battle began. The Philistine archers did great execution in the Israelite ranks. They slew three of Saul's sons, including the eldest, the unselfish and heroic Jonathan. They seriously wounded Saul himself, on which he called to his armor-bearer to thrust him through. The young man declined the responsibility, whereupon the erring monarch fell upon his sword, and died. The victorious Philistines, finding his corpse, severed the head from the body, and affixed the latter, with the bodies of his sons, to the wall of Beth-shean, whilst they sent his armor as a trophy to be kept in the temple of Ashtaroath. The men of Jabesh-gilead, whom Saul had saved in the early part of his reign, feeling gratitude for their deliverance, crossed the Jordan by night to Beth-shean, took down the bodies, and gave them honorable interment, while David mourned the fate of the Lord's anointed and the beloved Jonathan in plaintive poetry (xxxix. 1; 2 Sam. i.). The length of Saul's reign is not stated in the O. T., but both Paul and Josephus are able to assign it forty years (Acts xiii. 21, Antiq. vi. 14, 9).

Saul and the woman of En-dor. The old man covered with a robe, who figures in the interview between the woman of En-dor and Saul (1 Sam. xxviii. 3-19), has been explained in three different ways. He was the woman's accomplice, and when he appeared she uttered a loud cry, and she pronounced the man who had come to seek her aid to be Saul. The loud cry was her customary trick. She knew that the king was in the neighborhood, and she had at once detected that her visitor was he, in his tall stature, in his bearing, in his words, and in the manner of his attendants. Or else the appearance was a spirit, quite unexpected by her, at which she uttered a loud cry, because she was really startled. If an unexpected appearance, it was either the devil, as Luther and Calvin believed, and as those understand who think that certain phenomena of ancient sorcery and modern spiritualism are due to Satanic agency (see DEVIL and DEMONIAIC), or else Samuel, reappearing as did Moses and Elijah on the mount of Transfiguration (1 Chron. x. 13, Septuagint Ecclus. xlii. 20), and so most of the evangelical interpreters since the Reformation. The basis for the opinion that Samuel appeared is that the narrator refers to the person as though he is Samuel (1 Sam. xxviii. 14, 15, 16, 20), and that the words spoken by him were fulfilled. The biblical recorder simply describes what occurred. It is to be noted that the woman was a law-breaker, and was also condemned by the religion of Jehovah. Moreover, she alone saw the apparition, and she described the appearance in most vague terms—an old man rising from the earth and covered with a robe. This description would apply to any aged person, but Saul concluded that Samuel had really appeared. The words which were uttered by the robed figure boldly forecast the future as a fortune teller does or else predicted it with full knowledge. The words came true, but they were in part fulfilled by Saul's own deliberate act. If Samuel himself appeared, then this is the sole instance recorded in Scripture where the spirit of a departed saint has returned to earth and conversed with men, since the case of Moses and Elijah in converse with the transfigured Christ is not analogous. Moreover, it would be strange, indeed, if, after God had refused to answer Saul, either by dreams or by prophets, his servant Samuel should appear, and especially if he should appear at an interview strictly forbidden by God, and at the behest of a woman who was condemned alike by the law of the land and by the law of God (Ex. xxii. 18; Lev. xx. 27; Deut. xviii. 10-14; 1 Sam. xxviii. 3, 9; 1 Chron. x. 13).

3. The original name of the apostle Paul (Acts vii. 58; xiii. 9).

Sav'our.

One who saves from any evil or danger (2 Kin. xiii. 5; Neh. ix. 27). In the O. T. it is especially used of God, Jehovah, viewed as the deliverer of his chosen people Israel (2 Sam. xxii. 3; Ps. cvi. 21; Is. xliii. 3, 11; xlv. 15, 21; xlix. 26; lxiii. 8; Jer. xiv. 8; Hos. xvi. 4). The Greek word sōtēr, preserver, deliverer (Herod. vii. 139), is used by the classical writers specially of their gods, though sometimes a king assumed the title, as did Ptolemy Soter and Demetrius I. In the N. T. it is used of God the Father (1 Tim. i. 1; iv. 10; Titus i. 3; iii. 4; Jude 25), but especially of Jesus Christ the Son, who saves his people from their sins (Mat. i. 21), delivering them out of their sinful condition and misery, from guilt, the wrath of God, the power of sin and the dominion of Satan, and bringing them into a state of salvation in blessed communion with God (Luke. xix. 10; Acts v. 31; Rom. v. 8-11; Phil. iii. 20, 21; 1 Tim. i. 15; 2 Tim. i. 10; Tit. ii. 13, 14; Heb. vii. 25).

Saw.

A toothed tool for cutting wood and for shaping stone (1 Kin. vii. 9; Is x. 15). Victims of persecuting rage were sometimes sawn asunder (Heb. xi. 37). If David cut the Ammonites of Rabbah, and other towns which fell into his hands, with saws, harrows, and axes (2 Sam. xii. 31; 1 Chron. xx. 3), it was an act of exceptional severity on his part, and foreign to all else that is known of his character. A change of resh to mem in the verb used in Chronicles, and of resh to dalet in the verb in Samuel, would make the record state that David exacted labor from the captives (2 Sam. xii. 31, R. V. margin).

The saws used by the ancient Egyptians had, so far as known, but one handle. The blade was usually of bronze, let into the handle or bound to it by thongs. The teeth commonly inclined toward the handle. The wood was placed perpendicularly in a frame, and was sawn downward. The Assyrians used a double-handled saw also, with a blade of iron.

Scape/goat. See AZAZEL.

Scar'let.

A bright, rich crimson, not the hue of recent origin known as scarlet. The coloring matter was obtained by the Israelites from an insect (Coccus ilicis), called ke'mez by the Arabs, whence the English word crimson is derived. The insect abounds in Palestine on the holm oak (Quercus coccifera). The female alone yields the coloring matter. She attains the form and size of an ordinary pea, is violet-black in color, covered with a whitish powder, and wingless. Filled with eggs containing red matter, she adheres to the leaves and twigs of the oak, and feeds on its juices. From the resemblance of the insect to a berry, the Greeks called it kokkos, berry. It is related to the cochineal insect of Mexico (Coccus cacti); but it yields a much less valuable dye, and has been supplanted commercially by its Mexican congener. The color was called by the Hebrews shani, brightness, crimson, sh'ni tola'ath, brightness of the worm, worm crimson, tola'ath shani, worm of brightness, crimson worm, tola', worm, and in Greek kokkynos, pertaining to the coccus.

The color and the method of obtaining it were early known (Gen. xxxviii. 28). It was much used in the hangings of the tabernacle and in the high priest's vestments. It was employed in the ceremony attending the purification of the leper, and in the preparation of the water of separation (Lev. xiv. 4; Num. xix. 6; Heb. ix. 19).

Scep'ter.

A rod held in the hands of kings as a token of authority (Ps. xlv. 6; Amos i. 5; Wisd. x. 14; Heb. i. 8; War. i. 33, 9). It has been used from time immemorial. The staff was not, however, a symbol of royal sovereignty exclusively. It might be carried by any leader (Judg. v. 14, R. V.; Baruch vi. 14); among the Greeks by kings, judges, heralds, and speakers given the floor by the herald (Iliad i. 238; ii. 100, vii. 277; xxiii. 568). Nor is the Hebrew name shebet a specific term, but it denotes any rod, such as the walking stick, which was often carried as a mark of dignity (Gen. xxxviii. 18), the shepherd's staff (Lev. xxvii. 32; Ps. xxiii. 4; Mic. vii. 14), or the rod used in threshing cummin (Is. xxviii. 27). The royal scepter was doubtless often of wood. The scepter of Ahasuerus was made of gold (Esth. iv. 11), and so too was the famed scepter of Agamemnon (Iliad ii. 100). A reed was placed in Christ's hand when he was mocked as king (Mat. xxvii. 29).

Sce'va.

A member of one of the Jewish families from which the high priests were ordinarily chosen. His seven sons were exorcists (Acts xix. 14).

School.

There were no schools for children in ancient Israel. But instruction was not lacking. Parents gave their children religious instruction (Gen. xviii. 19; Deut. vi. 7; Susanna 3; 2 Tim. iii. 15). The older people had opportunity for obtaining further knowledge from the priests and Levites, who could be found at the sanctuary and in the towns assigned to them throughout the land, and who occasionally itinerated for the purpose of publicly teaching the statutes of the law (Lev. x. 11; 2 Chron. xvii. 7-10; Hag. ii. 11). Every seven years, at the feast of tabernacles, the law was read publicly in the audience of assembled Israel (Deut. xxxi. 10-13). The great festivals themselves, and songs written for the purpose (19, 30; xxxiii. 1-43), kept alive the knowledge of those events at the birth of the nation which obligated the Israelites as a people to serve Jehovah, their redeemer and bountiful benefactor. The prophets by their public preaching spread religious knowledge and quickened religious life. Business negotiations and legal processes were conducted in the open street, affording constant instruction to the public through eye and ear. Reading and writing were perhaps not uncommon among the young (Judg. vii. 14, Is. x. 19).

In the Greco-Roman period the education of the young was carefully attended to (con. Apion. i. 12, ii. 19). Elementary schools were established in connection with the synagogues, where the children were taught to read from the Scriptures, to write, and to cipher. About 75 B. C. attendance upon this primary instruction was made compulsory, and under Gamaliel the age for attendance was fixed at six years. Slaves and others were employed as tutors by the wealthy (Antiq. xvi. 8, 3). The scribes also imparted advanced instruction. The subject which they discussed was the law. Chambers connected with the outer court of the temple, and outside of Jerusalem a room in the synagogue, were used as lecture rooms (Luke ii. 46). The instruction was nominally free, but it is said that in the time of Herod the Great the porter collected entrance money. Not only was instruction imparted directly to the pupils in these schools, but learned men held public disputations with each other there in the presence of the scholars.

School'mas-ter.

The rendering in Gal iii 24, 25, A. V., of the Greek Paidagōgos, one who leads a boy, a pedagogue. It is translated tutor in the R. V. of this passage and 1 Cor. iv. 15. The paidagōgos, or pedagogue, in a Greek household was a trusted slave, to whose care the children were committed (Life 76; Herod. viii. 75). He always accompanied them when they were out of doors. He was responsible for their personal safety, guarded them from physical evil and bad company, and led them to and from school. The law as a pedagogue led us to Christ. It prepared us to receive him as our Redeemer. It displayed the justice of God and convinced us that we were unrighteous; its threatenings pressed us to seek refuge from the wrath and curse of God; it made apparent the inability of man to obtain salvation by the works of the law; it exhibited the plan of salvation in types and ceremonies and excited to faith in the coming Redeemer (Gal. iii. 24; Rom. iii. 19-21; iv. 15; vii. 7-25).

Sci'ence.

The rendering of the Hebrew Madā' and the Greek Gnōsis in Dan i 4 and A. V. of 1 Tim. vi 20. The word is not used in its modern sense. It does not denote knowledge gained by observation of phenomena and systematized. The Hebrew and Greek words mean simply knowledge. The false knowledge spoken of by Paul is the teaching of Judaizing and mystic sects in the apostolic age, which they boastfully claimed to be certain (cp. Col. ii. 8), against which Paul urgently warns men (1 Cor. viii. 1, 7), and which counterfeits the true knowledge which he praised and in which he desired Christians to grow (xii 8; xiii. 2; Phil. i. 9).

Scor'pi-on.

A small animal with a tail armed with a sting which inflicts great pain (Rev. ix. 5, 10). It was called 'akrab by the Hebrews, and skorpīos by the Greeks. It abounds in Palestine, and is common in the wilderness south of Judah (Deut. viii 15); see AKRABIM. Rehoboam threatened to chastise his subjects, not with whips, but with scorpions (1 Kin. xii. 11; 2 Chron. x. 14), which many interpreters think mean whips armed with sharp points to make the lash more severe. The scorpion is a small invertebrate animal of the order Arachnida. It is closely akin to the higher spiders, having, like them, eight legs;

but it differs in shape, and in having the poison bag not in proximity to the jaws, but at the extremity of the tail. It has a pair of nippers like the lobster. The tail is long and jointed, and capable of being curled up over the back. The last joint is swollen, contains the venom gland, and is armed with a perforated sting by means of which the poison is discharged. The scorpion feeds principally on beetles and locusts, which it seizes with its nippers and stings to death. Some eight or more species exist in Palestine. The largest is about eight inches long, and black.

Scorpion

Scourge and Scour'ing.

Scourging is severe punishment or torture by lashing. It was not imposed as a penalty by the Mosaic law, not even according to Lev. xix. 20 (see R. V. against A. V.). The law authorized beating, when the culprit lay down and was smitten on the back (Deut. xxv 2, 3); but this was not scourging, and is distinguished from scourging (2 Cor. xi. 24, Roman Scourges.

25). Scourging is perhaps alluded to by Rehoboam as a known punishment (1 Kin. xii. 11, 14), and it was employed by Antiochus Epiphanes to drive the Jews by its tortures to eat swine's flesh (2 Mac. vi. 30; vii. 1). As a legal penalty it was recognized by the later Jewish law, which prescribed beating or scourging for ecclesiastical offenses; such as transgression of ceremonial ordinances for which the Mosaic law did not specify the punishment, disobedience of the orders of the sanhedrin, and heresy. Rods were used for beating (2 Cor. xi. 25); and for scourging a whip was employed, which consisted of three thongs, one of ox hide and two of ass's hide. The number of stripes ranged from a few blows up to thirty-nine, this limit being set in order to avoid all danger of exceeding the forty blows allowed by the Mosaic law in corporal punishment (Deut. xxv. 2, 3). When the punishment was inflicted in the synagogue (Mat. x. 17, xxiii. 34), it was administered by the hazzan or attendant; but culprits were also beaten before the sanhedrin (Acts v. 40).

The Romans used a scourge of cords or thongs, made more painful by various expedients which cruelty suggested. Pieces of lead or brass, or small, sharp-pointed bones, were attached to the lashes. The Romans employed scourging as a punishment or as torture to extract confession or testimony. After the Porcian law of 248 B. C. and the Sempronian law of 123 B. C., Roman citizens were exempted from scourging (Livy x. 9); but free persons not Roman citizens might be beaten, and slaves scourged, and lawless governors did not scruple to scourge free provincials and Roman citizens (War. ii. 14, 9, Tacitus, Hist. iv. 27). Criminals condemned to crucifixion were ordinarily scourged before being executed (Livy xxxiii. 36); so Jesus, and many of the Jews before the revolt and after the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans (Mat. xxvii. 26; War. ii. 14, 9; v. 11, 1). The victim was stripped to the waist, and bound in a stooping position, with the hands behind the back, to a post or pillar. The suffering under the lash was intense. The body was frightfully lacerated. The Christian martyrs at Smyrna about A. D. 155 were so torn with the scourges that their veins were laid bare, and the inner muscles and sinews, and even the bowels, were exposed (Eusebius, Hist. iv. 15).

Screech Owl.

The rendering of the Hebrew Lilith, a nocturnal being (Is. xxxiv. 14; in R. V. night monster). It frequents the ruins of cities. Tristram believes it to be the tawny owl (Syrnium aluco), which is found in Gilead, Bashan, Lebanon, and the valley of the Jordan, breaking in on the stillness of night with its hooting. See NIGHT MONSTER and SATYR.

Scribe.

1 A public writer (Ezek. ix. 2), who was employed as an amanuensis to write at dictation (Jer. xxxvi. 4, 18, 32), and to draw up legal documents (xxxii. 12, probably).

2. A secretary; a government or other clerk (2 Kin. xii. 10; Ezra iv. 8). Levites were employed as scribes for the business of repairing the temple (2 Chron. xxxiv. 13).

3. A copier of the law and other parts of the Scriptures (Jer. viii. 8). The most noted of these earlier scribes was the priest Ezra, who was a ready scribe in the law of Moses, and had set his heart to seek the law of the Lord and to do it, and to teach in Israel statutes and judgments (Ezra vii. 6, 10). In this latter respect he is the prototype of the scribes of later times, who were professional interpreters of the law. In the N T they are called grammateis, or more exactly nomikoi, rendered lawyers, and nomodidaskaloi, teachers of the law. They devoted themselves: 1 To the study and interpretation of the law, which it will be remembered was both civil and religious, and to determining its application to the details of daily life. The decisions of the great scribes became the oral law or tradition.

2. To the study of the Scriptures generally in regard to historical and doctrinal matters.

3. To teaching, each noted scribe having a company of disciples about him; see SCHOOL. The profession of scribe received a great impulse after the return of the Jews from exile, when prophecy had ceased and it only remained to study the completed Scriptures and make them the basis of the national life. The scribes were becoming numerous in the Maccabean period (1 Mac. vii. 12), and at the time of Christ had attained paramount influence among the people. The sanhedrin counted many of them among its members (Mat. xvi. 21; xxvi. 3). Though there were candid men among them who believed in Christ's teaching (viii. 19), yet the mass of them were hopelessly prejudiced against him. They murmured at or found fault with much that he and his disciples said or did (xxi. 15), and they had a large share in the responsibility for his death. They were also associated with the rulers and elders in the persecution of Peter and John (Acts iv. 5, etc.), and in that which led to the martyrdom of Stephen (vi. 12): but the section of them which agreed with the Pharisees in opinion took Paul's part with respect to the resurrection (xxiii. 9).

Scrip.

A bag or wallet for carrying provisions or articles required on a journey (Mat. x. 10, in R. V. wallet). The scrip of modern Palestine is the skin of a kid stripped off whole from the carcass and tanned, and slung from the shoulder by straps. Every shepherd and farmer has such an article. David when a shepherd carried one (1 Sam. xvii. 40).

Scripture.

A writing, a narrative or other matter committed to writing (Dan. x. 21, in R. V. writing); especially the sacred writings of the Hebrews, viewed either collectively or individually, or even a single passage or quotation from them, as in Mark xii. 10; xv. 28; Luke iv. 21; John xix. 37. When this collection of sacred documents is thought of as forming one book, the word is singular, the Scripture (John vii. 42; x. 35; xvii. 12; xix. 28; Gal. iii. 22). More frequently the many documents from different authors which constitute the O. T. are in mind and the plural is used, the Scriptures (Mat. xxi. 42; Luke xxiv. 27; John v. 39; Rom. i. 2). The epistles of Paul at once took their place with the other Scriptures as authoritative (2 Pet. iii. 16). See CANON, INSPIRATION.

Scyth'ian.

A native of Scythia. This name was applied originally to the region immediately north of the Black Sea, and east of the Carpathian mountains. When the conquests of Alexander the Great revealed the existence of men in Asia like the European Scythians in race, an Asiatic Scythia began to be recognized; and finally, all northeastern Europe and central and northern Asia were supposed to be traversed by the nomad Scythian race. They were far behind in civilization; so that at last the name Scythian was used as we now use Tartar, or the Greeks and Romans used the term Barbarian (2 Mac. iv. 47; Col. iii. 11); see BETH-SHEAN.

Sea.

1. The ocean or general gathering of the waters, as distinguished from the dry land of the globe (Gen. i. 10; Ps. viii. 8; Rev. vii. 1-3; xxi. 1).

2. A more or less detached portion of that ocean (Gen. xlix. 13; Acts x. 6), or a large inland lake of fresh or salt water (Num. xxxiv. 11, 12; Mat. iv. 18). The chief seas with which the Israelites had to do were the Mediterranean, the Red Sea, the Dead Sea, and the sea of Galilee. The Mediterranean was referred to as the sea, or was called the great sea, the sea of the Philistines, the hinder or western sea, in A. V. the utmost and uttermost sea; see MEDITERRANEAN SEA. The Dead Sea was variously known as the Salt Sea, the eastern sea, sea of the Arabah or the plain, and according to A. V. of Zech. xiv. 8, the former sea; see DEAD SEA. The sea of Galilee was also named the sea of Chinnereth, lake of Gennesaret, and sea of Tiberias; see GALILEE, SEA OF.

3. A large river with its network of branches, channels, and irrigating canals, as the Euphrates (Jer. li. 36, 42) and the Nile (Nah. iii. 8).

4. The large basin in Solomon's temple where the priests washed their hands and feet preparatory to ministering in the sanctuary or at the altar (1 Kin. vii. 39); see MOLTEN SEA.

Sea Mew.

The rendering in R. V. of Lev. xi. 16 and Deut. xiv. 15 of the Hebrew noun Shahaph, a bird ceremonially unclean. The A. V. makes it the cuckoo. The Septuagint and Vulgate regard it as a sea mew or gull. Sea mew is an indefinite term, broad enough to include gulls, terns, and petrels, all of which abound on the shore and lakes of Palestine. If any single species is meant, perhaps it is the Sterna fuscata, the common tern, or sea swallow. This bird looks lean, which the name shahaph may denote; and it might be included under the designation sea mew, for the Sterna, or terns, are a sub-family of the Laridae, or gulls. It is plentiful along the shores of Palestine.

Sea Mon'ster.

Any great fish of the sea (Gen. i. 21; Job vii. 12; in A. V. whale). It is the rendering of the Hebrew Tannin. See DRAGON. In Lam. iv. 3, the Hebrew tannim, although it is singular number, stands in the Hebrew before a plural verb. It is doubtless a copyist's error for tannim, jackals. This reading is adopted by the R. V.

Seal.

1. The rendering of the Hebrew Tahash in R. V., with porpoise on the margin (Ex. xxvi. 14, xxxv. 7; Num. iv. 25; Ezek. xvi. 10); in A. V. badger. Its skin was used for the outer covering of the tabernacle and for sandals. Tahash corresponds to the Arabic tuhay, which embraces seals and specially denotes the dugong (Halicore hemprichii). The latter belongs to the order Sirenia, of which the nearest allies are mammals of the whale order. It is generally ten to twelve feet long, with a round head, breasts for suckling its young, and a fish-like tail. The color is slaty above and white below. It is believed to be one of the animals, if not indeed the animal, which gave rise to the fabled mermaid, half woman, half fish. It is common among the coral banks of the Red Sea, whence it extends as far as the coasts of Australia.

2. A signet ring or cylinder, engraved with the owner's name or some design, or both (Ex. xxviii. 11; Esth. viii. 8). It was worn on the finger, if a ring, or was strung on a cord and hung around the neck (Gen. xxxviii. 18, R. V.; Jer. xxii. 24). Men affixed their seal as signature to letters or other documents (1 Kin. xxi. 8; Neh. ix. 38; Esth. viii. 8; Jer. xxxii. 10, 44; John iii. 33). These were usually written on clay, and the seal was pressed on the soft material and left its mark (Job xxxviii. 14). Chests, boxes, tombs, or anything which required to be guarded from being opened, were sealed with the signet of the person who had authority to prohibit intrusion (Job xiv. 17; xli. 15; Dan. vi. 17; Mat. xxvii. 66; Rev. v. 1).

Se'ba.

A Cushite people (Gen. x. 7), who probably dwelt originally in southern Arabia. Seba is associated with Sheba as a remote southern country (Ps. lxxii. 10); and with Egypt and Ethiopia as though in Africa, whither many Cushites migrated (Isa. xliiii. 3; xlv. 14).

Josephus identifies Seba with the isle of Meroc (Antiq. ii. 10, 2). The region so named is situated between the Nile and its affluent, the Atbara. It is about 400 miles long by 200 broad. But this district is not called Seba in Egyptian documents, and was known to the Hebrews as Cush. Rather then is Seba identical with the neighboring country on the Red Sea, possessing the harbor Saba and the town Sabai.

Se'bam, in A. V. Shebam. See SIBMAH.

Se'bat. See SHEBAT.

Sec'a-cah [hedge, inclosure].

A village in the wilderness of Judah (Josh. xvi. 61). Conder places it doubtfully at the ruin called Sikkah or Dikkeh, about 2 miles east of Bethany.

Se'cu, in A. V. Sechu [hill, watchtower].

A village near Samuel's town of Ramah (1 Sam. xix. 22), probably in the direction of Gibeah (9). Conder doubtfully suggests as its site Shuwekeh, about 3 miles northwest by north of er-Ram (Ramah 1).

Se-cun'dus [second, secondary, following, favorable].

A man of Thessalonica who accompanied Paul from Macedonia into Asia Minor (Acts xx. 4).

Seer. See PROPHET.

Se'gub [exalted].

1. The youngest or younger son of Hiel. He died when his father set up the gates of Jericho, which he was then fortifying (1 Kin. xvi. 34), completing the fulfillment of the curse pronounced by Joshua (Josh. vi. 26).

2. Son of Hezron, by a daughter of Machir (1 Chron. ii. 21, 22).

Se'ir [hairy, shaggy].

1. A land and its inhabitants. Seir was the mountain range of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 21; Num. xxiv. 18, Ezek. xxxv. 15). The original inhabitants of these mountains were Horites or cave dwellers (Gen. xiv. 6). In Gen. xxxvi. 20 the original population is personified as an individual and the tribes descended from it are classed as children (cp. Mizraim or Egypt, Gen. x. 6, 13). Seir is elsewhere used collectively for the people (Ezek. xxv. 8). Esau took up his abode in mount Seir (Gen. xxxiii. 3), and his descendants dispossessed the Horites (Deut. ii. 12; Josh. xiv. 4). A remnant of the Amalekites (1 Sam. xiv. 48, xv. 7; 2 Sam. viii. 12) took refuge in these mountain fastnesses, but were finally destroyed by the Simeonites (1 Chron. iv. 42, 43).

2. A ridge on the border line of the territory of Judah west of Kirjath-jearim (Josh. xv. 10). It is commonly supposed to be that on which the village of Saris stands.

Se'l-rah, in A. V. Se'l-rath [a hairy animal, she goat]. Applied to a locality, it may mean shaggy with trees.

A locality in mount Ephraim, probably in the southeastern part, to which Ehud escaped after murdering Eglon (Judg. iii. 26).

Se'la, in A. V. once Selah (2 Kin. xiv. 7) [rock].

A place in Edom taken by Amaziah, king of Judah, and named by him Joktheel (2 Kin. xiv. 7). It is scarcely referred to in Judg. i. 34, but probably in 2 Chron. xxv. 12, 14, xlii. 11; Obad. 3; and perhaps in Is. xvi. 1. The inhabitants dwelt high, among clefts (Obad. 3). These indications point to the ravine called by the Greeks Petra, which is simply a translation of the Hebrew Sela. About 300 B. C. Petra passed from the Edomites to the Nabathæan Arabs. The dynasty which now began to rule in Petra contained several kings of the name of Aretas, one of whom is mentioned in 2 Cor. xi. 32. The kingdom of the Nabathæans came to an end in A. D. 105 and Arabia Petræa was made a province of the Roman empire. See NEBATOTH. The place was rediscovered by Burckhardt in 1812, and has since been visited by various travelers. It lies in the nook of a deep chasm excavated by water on the northeastern flank of mount Hor. The valley, with branching side valleys, may be 4500 feet long by 740 to 1500 broad, and is surrounded on all sides by precipitous sandstone cliffs. The main gorge is called wady Mûsa, the valley of Moses, though probably he was never there. A rivulet traverses it through its whole length. The variegated colors of the rock—red, brown, purple, yellow—add to the beauty of the spot. There are tombs, remains of temples, an amphitheater, a triumphal arch, etc., most of them apparently of Roman times. Besides these, there are tombs and dwelling houses in the adjacent cliffs, some of which may be of older date. On the height above, overlooking the ancient city, is the great high place, and yet other altars stand on neighboring lofty sites.

Se'lah [elevation].

A word occurring seventy-one times in the Psalms, as well as in Hab. iii. 3, 9, 13. Stainer gives six distinct opinions as to its meaning: (1) a pause; (2) a repetition, like da capo; (3) the end of a strophe; (4) a playing with full power (fortissimo); (5) a bending of the body, an obeisance; and (6) a short, recurring symphony (ritornello). It probably means an orchestral interlude (cp. opinion 6) or a change from piano to forte.

Se-la-ham-mah'le-koth [rock of division or escapes].

A cliff in the wilderness of Maon. It was so called because David on one side of the eminence eluded Saul on the other (1 Sam. xxiii. 28). Conder points out that about 8 miles east-northeast of Maon there is a cliff at the wady el-Malâki, a narrow but deep chasm, impassable except by making a circuit of many miles. Saul might here have come near enough to see David, and yet not have been able to reach the place where David was, except by making a long detour.

Se'led [exultation].

A man of Judah, family of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 30).

Se-leu'ci-a [relating to Seleucus]

A city on the seacoast of Syria (1 Mac xi 8), north of the mouth of the Orontes. It was built on the site of an earlier town by Seleucus Nicator, founder of the Kingdom of Syria, and was the seaport of Antioch, which lay about 20 miles up the river. Pompey made the city free. Paul and Barnabas sailed thence for Cyprus (Acts xiii 4). At es-Suweidiyeh, about 4 miles to the south, two piers of the harbor are called Paul and Barnabas.

Se-leu'cus.

A king of Syria (1 Mac. vii. 1; 2 Mac iii 3), called Philopator. He was son and successor of Antiochus the Great, and reigned from 187-175 B. C., when he was murdered by Heliodorus, one of his courtiers. He was installed on the throne by Antiochus Epiphanes; see ANTIOCHUS. During his father's reign he fought in the disastrous battle of Magnesia. During his own administration he sought to strengthen his kingdom, and was conciliatory toward the Jews; although it is said that he attempted to plunder the temple (2 Mac. iii. 4-40), possibly to help raise the enormous tribute which he was compelled to pay the Romans.

Seleucus Philopator

Sem. See SHEM.

Sem-a-chi'ah [Jehovah hath sustained].

A Levite, descendant of the doorkeeper Obed-edom (1 Chron. xxvi. 7).

Sem'e-in, in A. V. SEMEI [Greek from Hebrew Shim'i, Shimei].

An ancestor of Christ, who lived after the time of Zerubbabel (Luke iii. 26).

Sem-it'ic.

The languages which, speaking broadly, were or are vernacular to the descendants of Shem are called Shemitic or Semitic, the former being derived from the Hebrew Shem, and the latter ultimately from the Greek form Sem. The Semitic languages constitute one of the leading families of languages. As not all the descendants of Shem speak these tongues, and some do so who are descended from other sons of Noah, it has been proposed to call them the Syro-Arabian languages, but the term Semitic holds its place. Doubtless there was at first but one Semitic language, but the separation of the tribes speaking it led ultimately to its divergence into several dialects. In each the roots of the words are nearly always trilateral, the three radical letters being three consonants. Many trilaterals appear to be based on preexisting bilaterals; and it is even supposed by some that originally there were but two radical consonants. The various modifications of meaning were produced from these roots by the use of vowels, of which three only, a, i, and u, were originally employed: thus the three consonants k, s, r suggest the idea of cutting off, and kaasar denotes he reaped, ka'sar reap, kóser reaper, ka'sár harvest, ka'sár reaped. The meaning was also modified by laying stress on certain of the consonants and by means of affixes: thus gadal he became large, gaddal he magnified, gaddel magnify, mgadal a tower.

The Semitic family of languages falls into two great divisions, northern and southern. The northern division subdivides into an eastern group consisting of the Babylonian and Assyrian; a central group composed of the various dialects of the Aramaic language, embracing Syriac, Neo-Syriac, Mandaitic, and the dialect of the Babylonian Talmud in the east, and in the west Samaritan, the so-called Chaldee of the Bible, Targums, and Jerusalem Talmud, and the dialect of the Palmyrene and Nabathæan inscriptions, and a western group containing Hebrew, Moabite, and Phœnician. The southern division is subdivided into Arabic, Himyaritic or Sabæan of southern Arabia, and Ge'ez or Ethiopic and Amharic of Africa.

Semitic writing is in most of the dialects from right to left: that is, in the other direction from English. Hence the title-page in the Hebrew Bible is at what looks like the end of the volume. From this it reads backward, till it ends at what, if it were English, would be called the beginning of the book.

The intellectual ability of the Semitic race is shown by the place which the Jews take in every Christian country where they settle. Its prowess is also great; but in by-gone history, whenever the Semites and the Aryans have encountered each other in war, the contest, however severe and protracted, has in the long run ended in favor of the Aryans. Thus the Aryan-Persian terminated the Semitic-Babylonian empire. Aryan Rome ultimately destroyed Semitic Carthage, and the Aryan warriors of Europe, after a time, set bounds to the Saracen Semites.

Se-na'ah. See HASSENAAH.

Se'neh [thorn bush, bramble].

A sharp rock, one of two which flanked a pass running east and west between Michmah and Gibeah. It was the more southerly of the cliffs, and nearer Gibeah than Michmash. It was between these two rocks that Jonathan and his armor-bearer passed when they were going to surprise the Philistine garrison (1 Sam xiv. 4, 5). It overlooked the wady Suweinait, about 3½ miles southeast by south of Michmash.

Se'nir, in A V twice Shenir (Deut. iii. 9, Song iv 8) [coat of mail]

The Amorite name of Hermon (Deut iii 9). In Song iv. 8 Senir and Hermon are distinguished, each probably being a distinct peak of the giant mountain. Fir timber was obtained on Senir (Ezek xxvii. 5).

Sen-nach'e-rib [the moon-god Sin hath increased the brothers.]

A son of Sargon, who succeeded to the Assyrian throne on the murder of his father, on the 12th of Ab, 705 B. C. Though a warrior, he was inferior to Sargon in ability. He was boastful, cruel, and not wise enough to perpetuate his conquests by conciliating those whom he had vanquished. On his accession Merodach-baladan of Babylon attempted to throw off the Assyrian yoke. Sennacherib defeated him and his ally, the king of Elam, placed Belibni on the Babylonian throne, and returned in triumph to Nineveh, laden with captives and spoil. Discontent and rebellion manifested themselves in the west also, among the peoples who had submitted to Sargon. To quell this revolt, Sennacherib in 701 appeared in Phœnicia, capturing Great and Little Zidon, Zarephath, Achzib, and Accho, but Tyre appears to have held out. Neighboring states hastened to announce their submission. Proceeding to the Philistine country, he took Ashkelon, Beth-dagon, and Joppa. Next he invested and captured Lachish, sent a detachment of his troops to Jerusalem, secured the release of the dethroned king of Ekron from Jerusalem, defeated the combined armies of Egypt and Ethiopia at the battle of Eltekeh, and added Ekron to his conquests. On this campaign he not only took Lachish and Eltekeh, cities of Judah, but by his own account took 46 fortified towns of Judah, carried away 200,150 people captive, and seized multitudes of horses, mules, asses, camels, and sheep. His career of conquest was cut short by the plague, which devastated his army and compelled him to return to Nineveh. No express mention is, of course, to be expected in the Assyrian inscriptions of his failure to possess himself of Jerusalem, but it is clearly implied; for he is unable to tell of the capture of the city, and he apparently covers up the inglorious conclusion of the campaign by placing at the close of his narrative the account of the tribute which he received from Hezekiah. Here is his own account of the matter: "Hezekiah himself I shut up like a bird in a cage in Jerusalem, his royal city. I erected fortifications against him and blocked the exits from the gate of his city. I severed his towns, which I plundered, from his dominions and gave them to Mitinti, king of Ashdod, Padi, king of Ekron, and Sulbel, king of Gaza. Thus I diminished his country. To the former contribution, their annual gift, I added the tribute of subjection to my sovereignty and imposed it on them. The fear of the glory of my sovereignty overwhelmed him, even Hezekiah; and he sent after me to Nineveh, my royal city, the Arabs and his loyal subjects, whom he had brought for the defense of Jerusalem, his royal city, and had furnished with pay, along with thirty talents of gold, 800 talents of pure silver, precious stones, couches of ivory, thrones of ivory, elephants' hides, ivory, rare woods of various kinds, a vast treasure, as well as his daughters, the women of his palace, and others; and he sent his ambassador to offer homage." A story was told the Greek historian Herodotus by the Egyptian priests that Sennacherib advanced against Egypt, and had reached Pelusium, when immense numbers of field mice destroyed the bowstrings of the Assyrians, who next morning commenced their flight from the country. For the series of historic events in which Sennacherib and Hezekiah figure as antagonists, see HEZEKIAH. Sennacherib's failure against Jerusalem was in 701 B. C. In the meantime new troubles for Sennacherib arose in Babylonia, and in the third year of Belibni, in 700 B. C. the Assyrian king marched to the south, removed Belibni, and placed his own son Ashurnadinshum on the throne. Freed from concern for the south Sennacherib next turned his attention to the northwest and brought Cilicia under the Assyrian yoke. In 694 he made a novel expedition by ship and attempted to root out the followers of Merodach-baladan from their last refuge, at the mouth of the Ulai.

The campaign was in a measure successful; but the Elamites invaded Babylonia, seized Ashurnadinshum, and placed a Babylonian king on the throne, who held the country for a year and a half. But though Sennacherib took Erech, captured the Babylonian king, and devastated Elam, yet another Babylonian king ascended the throne, and the Assyrians did not succeed in finally chastising Babylonia until 689. Then Sennacherib advanced against Babylon, captured and plundered the city, massacred the inhabitants, fired the buildings, razed the walls and temples, and flooded the ruins with water from the Euphrates and its canals. The last eight years of his reign were mostly peaceful. He had some time before surrounded Nineveh with a wall, 8 miles in circumference. About 695 B. C. he finished a great palace which he had built for himself in the northwestern part of Nineveh. It was 1500 feet long and 700 broad, with great courts, halls, and chambers. He restored another palace, and constructed a system of canals by which he brought good drinking water to the city. After a reign of twenty-four years and five months, he was assassinated on the 20th of Tebet, which possibly fell at the close of 681, but more probably corresponds with January, 680. The deed was done by two of his sons, Adrammelech and Sharezer, who were excited against him because his favorite in the family was another brother, Esarhaddon (2 Kin. xix 37, 2 Chron. xxxii. 21).

Se-nu'ah. See HASENUAH

Se-o'rim [barley]

A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David, and constituted the fourth course when David distributed the priests into divisions (1 Chron. xxiv. 1, 6, 8).

Se'phar [numbering].

A place which formed the limit in one direction of the territory settled by the descendants of Joktan (Gen. x. 30). It was probably in southern Arabia. Despite the first letter, it is commonly identified with Zafâr, which begins with the Arabic pointed za (teth). Two places bore this name. One was a seaport in Hadramaut, near the incense mountain; the other was in southern Yemen, and was the capital of the Himyarite kings.

Seph'a-rad.

A place to which the people of Jerusalem were to be carried away captive (Obad. 20).

Its situation is unsettled. Sparda, a district frequently mentioned in the Persian inscriptions along with Ionia, Armenia, and Cappadocia, and probably identical with Sardis in Asia Minor, has been suggested. It is named in Assyrian inscriptions as early as the time of Esarhaddon, 680-668 B. C. (Expository Times, xiii. 308). Perhaps happier is the identification with Shaparda, which Sargon, who transported Israelites to the cities of the Medes (2 Kin. xvii. 6), and boasts of having subjugated Judah, mentions as a district of southwestern Media.

Seph-ar-va'im [twin Sipparas]

A place from which the Assyrians brought colonists to inhabit Samaria (2 Kin. xvii. 24, 31). Not improbably the same town is referred to in xviii. 34 and xix. 13. On the eastern bank of the Euphrates, above Babylon and hard by the border of Mesopotamia stood the famous city of Sippar. It was a seat of the worship of the sun-god, and hence was known as Sippar of Shamash. But Anunit, wife of the god of the sky, was also specially worshiped there, apparently in a distinct section of the city. Hence there was also Sippar of Anunit. The duality of the town sufficiently explains the Hebrew name, which is dual in form and is equivalent to the twin cities of Sippara. It is now called Abu Habbâ.

Se'phar-vites.

The Hebrews, as a rule, buried their dead in caverns, natural or artificial (Gen. xxiii. 9; Is. xxii. 16; Mat. xxvii. 60; John xi. 38), natural caves being often extended by excavation (Gen. i. 5). The cliffs near Jerusalem are full of such sepulchers. The entrance to the cavern or its chambers was closed by a stone (Mat xxvii. 60) to exclude jackals and other beasts that prey upon dead bodies. It was desirable that the sepulchers should be at a distance from human habitations. They might be in gardens attached to dwellings

(2 Kin xxi 18, 26), or within the city walls (1 Kin ii 10); but they were generally outside the town. Even then trees or gardens might surround them (John xix 41). Often, however, they were excavated high up in the face of a precipitous cliff, with their entrance far above the ground. Frequently the tomb was whitewashed (Mat xxiii 27), not only shaft into the side of the cavern and closed by a flat stone or door, or a shelf for bodies was hewn around the chamber. Sometimes there were double tiers of niches or shafts. Coffins were not necessary, but occasionally among the wealthy the body was inclosed in a stone sarcophagus, and placed in the tomb. The entrance was sometimes richly ornamented. Sometimes a monument was erected. It might consist of a simple pillar (2 Kin. xxiii 17, R. V.), or it might assume the form of a mausoleum (1 Mac. xiii. 27). The Hebrews and their neighbors were fond of family burial places, and the sepulcher with its chambers and niches was adapted to this purpose (Gen. xlix 29-31; 2 Sam ii 32, 1 Kin. xiii 22; 1 Mac ix 19; xiii 25). Public burial places were used by the poor and were provided for strangers (2 Kin. xxiii 6; Jer. xxvi. 23; Mat. xxvii 7). When the Palestine explorers found a grave dug down in the ground and covered with earth, they assumed it to be a Christian tomb; but if they found one running horizontally into a cliff, they presumed it to be Jewish. See GRAVE.

The royal burial place in the city of David, not far from the king's garden and the pool of Shelah (1 Kin. ii 10; 2 Chron. xxi. 20; Neh. iii 15, 16), and doubtless in the field of burial which belonged to the kings (2 Chron. xxvi 23; cp 2 Kin xv. 7). Theodoret quotes Josephus as saying that the tomb is near Siloam, is in fashion like a cave, and reveals the

Portal of the so-called Tombs of the Judges, near Jerusalem for cleanliness and beauty, but also that it might be clearly seen and not touched, for the touch brought defilement. Inside the sepulcher the individual grave was sunk in the floor and covered by a slab of stone, or was cut as a niche in the wall, or driven as a royal lavishness (Quæst. 6 in iii Reg.). It consisted of several chambers (Antiq. vii. 15, 3). It was robbed of large treasure by John Hyrcanus; and the report of the sum which that prince had obtained led Herod the Great to search it, in the hope of securing additional plunder, but he became frightened, abandoned the search, and erected a propitiatory monument of white stone at its mouth (ibid.; xiii. 8, 4; xvi. 7, 1; War i. 2, 5). It was extant in the time of Christ (Acts ii. 29). All the kings from David to Hezekiah inclusive were buried in the city of David. The common royal sepulcher was by implication ordinarily used; but Asa and probably Hezekiah had tombs of their own (2 Chron. xvi. 14; xxxii. 33, R. V.), and Jehoram, Joash, Uzziah, and Abaz were not admitted to the royal sepulcher (xxi. 20; xxiv. 25; xxvi. 23; xxviii. 27). Manasseh, Amon, and Josiah were buried at Jerusalem in their own tombs (2 Kin. xxi. 18, 26; xxiii. 30 with 2 Chron. xxxv. 24). Jehoahaz died in Egypt, and Jehoiachin and Zedekiah doubtless in Babylonia. Jehoiakim was probably left unburied.

The caverns of the kings, which are referred to by Josephus (War v. 4, 2), may be what is now known as the grotto of Jeremiah.

Ser'rah, in A. V. once Sarah (Num. xxvi. 46) [abundance].

A daughter of Asher (Gen. xlii. 17; 1 Chron. vii. 30).

Se-ra'iah [soldier of Jehovah]

1. A son of Kenaz (1 Chron. iv. 13).

2. A scribe who had held office under David (2 Sam. viii. 17); see SHAVSHA.

3. A Simeonite, son of Asiel (1 Chron. iv. 35).

4. One of those sent to arrest Baruch the scribe and Jeremiah the prophet (Jer. xxxvi. 26).

5. The chief priest when Nebuchadnezzar captured Jerusalem. He was put to death by Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah (2 Kin. xxv. 18-21; Jer. lii. 24-27). He was the father of Jehozadak, who was carried into captivity; and the grandfather of Jeshua, who was high priest immediately after the exile; and he was also an ancestor of Ezra, the scribe (1 Chron. vi. 14, 15; Ezra iii. 2; vii. 1).

6. "A quiet prince," or "the chief chamberlain," or the "quartermaster," the son of Neriah. He was carried captive to Babylon (Jer. li. 59-64, A. V., R. V., and margin).

7. The son of Tanhumeth, a Netophathite (2 Kin. xxv. 23; Jer. xl. 8).

8. One of those who accompanied Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezra ii. 2). Called in Neh. vii. 7 Azariah.

9. A chief of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 1, 7). A father's house bore his name in the next generation (ver. 12). Possibly the same as number 8.

10. A priest, doubtless head of a father's house and probably of the father's house just mentioned, who with Nehemiah signed the covenant to keep separate from the heathen and observe the law of God (Neh. x. 2). Probably also he is identical with the following.

11. A priest, son of Hilkiah and ruler of the house of God after the exile (Neh. xi. 11; cp. the preceding). The name Azariah occurs in the corresponding place in 1 Chron. ix. 11. Different persons are probably intended, of whom Azariah lived before and Seraiah after the exile. Possibly, however, different persons are intended, each of whom lived after the exile, Azariah being a predecessor of Seraiah. Or the text may be corrupt; in one of the passages the name may have been misread by a copyist; or as both names belong to the high-priestly genealogy and succeed each other there (1 Chron. vi. 12-15), something may have slipped from the text, as, for example: "Seraiah, son of" may have been lost before Azariah in Chronicles, or "son of Azariah" after Seraiah in Nehemiah.

Ser'a-phim.

Celestial beings who stood before the enthroned Lord when he appeared in vision to Isaiah. Each had six wings; with twain he covered his face, and with twain he covered his feet, and with twain he did fly. And one cried unto another, and said: "Holy, holy, holy, is the Lord of hosts the whole earth is full of his glory" (Is. vi. 2, 3). The prophet having confessed his sinfulness, one of the seraphim flew unto him, having a live coal in his hand, which he had taken with the tongs from off the altar; and he touched the prophet's mouth with it, and said: "Lo, this hath touched thy lips; and thine iniquity is taken away, and thy sin purged."

Scripture affords no further information regarding the seraphim. They are mentioned in this one passage only. What were they? 1. Gesenius derives their name from the Arabic sharafa, high, noble. The Arabic root would regularly be saraph in Hebrew, but there is no evidence that it was ever used by the Hebrews. No other word in Hebrew is traceable to this root. Gesenius has sought his derivation outside of the Hebrew lexicon. These facts stamp his explanation as improbable. 2. Cheyne conjectures that the seraphim are the serpent-like lightning, referring to the fact that saraph and seraphim denote the fiery serpents in the wilderness (Num. xxi. 6, 8; Is. xiv. 29; xxx. 6). But even if the words seraphim and fiery serpent have the same form in the singular number, which is uncertain, and if they are from the same Semitic root, which is probable, they yet need not signify the same beings or similarly shaped beings. Shape is not denoted by the name. The common characteristic, which finds expression in the word, is burning, in the transitive sense; not ardent or glowing beings, but beings that burn things. Nor do the seraphim resemble serpents outwardly, for they have hands, feet, and wings. Cheyne admits that Isaiah did not regard them as animals in form. 3. The seraphim are identical with the Egyptian griffins, serref (Dillmann, quoting L. Stern), and were borrowed by the Israelites. If so, they were personifications of natural objects or phenomena; and in the vision of Isaiah they symbolically represent the powers of nature attendant upon nature's Lord (cp Zech. vi. 1-8, R. V.). 4. They are an order of angels. So the Jews understood. The Targum inserts the word in Ezek. i. 8, Zech. iii. 7. They are consuming beings, who cry "Holy, holy, holy," who are most impressed with the attribute of holiness in God, worship him most fondly in that character, and execute his purposes of holiness in the world (Dehtzsch, modified). The conclusive argument in favor of this theory against the third is that their adoration of holiness in God and their employment in the ministry of atonement indicate moral beings, and not physical powers personified.

Se'rad [fear].

A son of Zebulun, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. xlii. 14, Num. xxvi. 26).

Ser'gi-us Pau'lus [Paulus means small, little].

The proconsul of Cyprus, which constituted a senatorial province in Paul's time (Acts xiii. 5-12), see CYPRUS. The inscription on a coin found at ancient Soli, on the northern coast of the island, mentions "Paulus proconsul."

Ser'on [perhaps, a Greek form of Hiram (cp Herod. vii. 98)].

Commander of the army of Syria (1 Mac. iii. 13) in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes. He attempted to suppress the revolt of the Jews, but was defeated by Judas Maccabæus near Beth-horon in 166 B. C. (14-24). Josephus states that Seron lost his life in the battle (Antiq. xii. 7, 1).

Ser'pent.

1. An animal which creeps on its belly (Gen. iii. 1, 14); having head, tail, and body (15; Ex. iv. 4), but no limbs. It is generically called nāhash in Hebrew, ophis in Greek (Gen. iii. 13 with 2 Cor. xi. 3; Num. xxi. 9 with John iii. 14). As it wriggles along, its mouth is apt to come in contact with the dust, which it licks (Mic. vii. 17; cp Gen. iii. 14; Is. lxxv. 25). The bite of some species infuses fatal poison into the wound (Num. xvi. 6; Ps. lvi. 4; Prov. xxiii. 32). Some can be charmed (Ecc. x. 11). The serpent is found in the wilderness and in inhabited districts, by the road, in hedges, on rocks, in walls (Gen. xlix. 17; Num. xxi. 6; Prov. xxx. 19; Ecc. x. 8; Amos v. 19).

The fiery serpents which bit the children of Israel in the wilderness and caused death (Num. xxi. 6), were a kind of snake found in Arabia and elsewhere, whose bite produces the fiery burning of inflammation and thirst. See BRAZEN SERPENT.

The serpent of the temptation was an ordinary snake, one of the beasts of the field, comparable with them in subtlety and skill in securing prey, and, after it was involved in the temptation of man, cursed among them (Gen. iii. 1, 14). Perhaps Eve saw nothing more than a snake; but the devil was in this serpent, as afterwards the demons were in men and in the swine, controlling it, lending it supernatural subtlety, and using it as a means by which to approach Eve (Wisd. ii. 24; John viii. 44; Rom. xvi. 20; 2 Cor. xi. 3; Rev. xii. 9); see SATAN. It suffered in the punishment, as did other innocent animals when made the instruments of sin (Lev. xx. 15, 16). Its mode of locomotion was not new, it had doubtless always crept; but now this groveling on the earth and accidental swallowing of dust is made the memorial of its degradation. It does not suffer thereby, save as it is loathed and killed by man. But the more distinctly man recognizes that the evil spirit was the serpent's master, the more does man transfer his enmity to the archfiend.

2. A species of serpent, in Hebrew pethen (Ps. xc. 13, in E. V. adder). See ASP.

Ser'ug, in A. V. of N. T. Saruch [shoot, branch].

Son of Reu, father of Nahor, and ancestor of Abraham (Gen. xi. 20, 23; 1 Chron. i. 26; Luke iii. 35).

Serv'ant.

One who serves, in Hebrew usually 'ebed. It is a general term, including voluntary and involuntary service, and embracing all who are under obligation of any kind to render service to another, from the slave captured in war or purchased at a price, to the envied official of a king and the willing worshiper of God (Gen. xxxix. 1 with xli. 12; xl. 20; Ex. xxxii. 13; Acts xvi. 17). It is systematically employed by orientals when addressing a superior, whether man or God (Gen. xxxii. 4, 20; 1. 18; Deut. iii. 24; 2 Sam. ix. 2; Luke ii. 29; Acts iv. 29); and is applied to conquered nations compelled to pay tribute to their conqueror (2 Sam. viii. 2). God also designates his worshipers servants (Gen. xxvi. 24; Num. xii. 7; 2 Sam. vii. 5). See MINISTER, SLAVE.

Serv'ant of Je-ho'vah.

One who acknowledges Jehovah as his God and, by implication of the term, faithfully performs his will; as Abraham (Ps. cv. 6), Moses (26), David (cxxxii. 10), Isaiah (Is. xx. 3).

The prominent figure in Is. xl.-lxvi. The view most widely entertained by modern commentators is that the servant of the Lord in these chapters is Israel, the eye of the prophet being fixed sometimes on the nation as a whole, sometimes on the godly portion, sometimes on that perfect representative of Israel, that Israelite indeed, Christ. Against other views there may be urged: 1. The servant of chapter liii. is interpreted by the Jewish Targums as Messiah. 2. The prophet Zechariah apparently identifies the Branch, a familiar designation of Messiah, with the servant whereby the iniquity of the land is taken away (Zech. iii. 8-10; cp. Jer xxiii. 5-8). 3. The description of the suffering servant of chapter lii. actually finds its counterpart in Christ.

The interpreter of Is. liii must be ever mindful of certain controlling facts: 1. When this chapter was penned, the Hebrews were fully acquainted with the sense of guilt (Gen xxxix. 9; 2 Sam. xii. 5-13; Is. vi. 5-7; cp. Pss. xxxii and li.). 2. The godly among the Israelites recognized themselves as sinful and as involved in the guilt of the nation, in its disobedience to God's law and in its failure to fulfil the purpose of its selection to be God's servant among men. Israel's best men felt this truth keenly (Neh. i. 6, 7; Dan ix. 5-11, 20). Israel was a unit, a solidarity: the sin of a part of the people involved all in guilt (Deut xxi. 1, 7, 8; Josh vii. 1, 11, 13, 15, 25; Judg. xx. 6, 10, 13). 3. When this chapter, Is. liii, was written, the Israelites were familiar with the symbolism of atonement. Those critics who regard this prophecy as an utterance of Isaiah as a rule believe that the book of Leviticus had been in existence for centuries, while those who accept this chapter as a product of the exilic times hold it to be later than Ezekiel and written after the sacrificial system had long been in operation. The prophecy was uttered when the truths were well known that God might pardon after sufficient punishment had been inflicted (Is. xl. 2), yet the mere punishment of sin or compensation for an injury does not cleanse the sinner. Punishment and restitution and cleansing are required (Is. iv. 3, 4; vi. 6, 7; liii. 10; Lev. v. 14-16; Num. v. 5-8; Ps. li. 2, 7). 4. The doctrine of substitution was also known. It pervades the chapter (verses 5, 6, 11, 12). It was publicly illustrated on the annual day of atonement (Lev. xvi. 20-22). 5. To fulfil these conditions and satisfy the creed of Israel, the servant of Jehovah must be of sufficient worth to be substituted for Israel, must be identical with Israel in order that he may really represent Israel before God and that it may be said that Israel has actually met its obligations in him; and yet the servant must be distinct from Israel so as not to be involved in Israel's guilt and to have no obligation of service to discharge for himself. These doctrinal requirements point not obscurely to the need of divinity in him who fills the office assigned to the Lord's servant in Is. liii.

Seth, in A. V. once Sheth (1 Chron. i. 1) [appointed, substituted].

A son of Adam. He was born after the murder of Abel, for whom to a certain extent he became a substitute (Gen. iv. 25; v. 3). He became the father of Enos, and died at the age of 912 (Gen. v. 6-8; Luke iii. 38).

Se'thur [hidden].

The representative spy from the tribe of Asher (Num. xiii. 13).

Sev'en.

Seven is an ordinary numeral, and it was commonly used without religious significance, but it was also a sacred number among the Hebrews and other Semites, and also among the Aryans of Persia and even of Greece (Iliad xix. 243). Its sacredness is traceable to remote antiquity. It is seen in the seven pillars of wisdom's house (Prov. ix. 1), the seven locks into which Samson, who was consecrated to God, braided his hair (Judg. xvi. 13, 19), the seven victims to atone for the broken covenant (2 Sam. xxi. 6, 9), the seven stones of the ancient Arabs smeared with the blood of the covenanting parties (Herod. iii. 8), the seven lambs to attest the conclusion of a treaty (Gen. xxi. 28-30), the Hebrew words for oath and taking an oath, which incorporate the number seven, and the sacredness of the seventh portion of time. The idea that seven derived its sacred character from the fact that three plus four make seven, is pure fancy. It was sacred because men saw that God recognized the number. He placed seven luminaries in the sky, sun, moon, and five planets. He caused the moon to phase every seven days. These phenomena, however, were but confirmatory and served as reminders of a greater recognition. God had blessed the seventh day and hallowed it. Far more was needed than the signs of the sky to originate the sacredness of seven. Twelve did not become a sacred number, although God made the moon to mark off twelve months in the year, placed twelve starry signs in the zodiac, and made the sun to conform its course to the zodiac and to return in spring as nearly as the conclusion of twelve lunar months as the moon renews itself after four phases. Man noted these phenomena in the earliest times, adopted them into his daily life and language, and celebrated certain of them with religious festivals. In Babylonia man even made twelve the basis of an arithmetical system, and in Assyria his pantheon contained twelve great gods. Notwithstanding all this, twelve did not become a sacred number; but seven did become a sacred number, and the seventh portion of time a sacred season; and not merely was the recurring seventh portion of time sacred, but it involved a benediction. It was cherished in hoary antiquity as a season of divine favor toward man, when the manifestation of God's good will was to be expected. See SABBATH.

Se-ve'neh, in A. V. Sy-e'ne [Egyptian sun, affording entrance].

A town constituting the extreme limit of Egypt in one direction. Which direction depends on the translation of Ezek. xxix. 10; xxx. 6. If, as is probable, the preferable rendering is that of the margin, "from Migdol to Syene," then the town of Seveneh is in the south of Egypt, on the borders of Ethiopia, and is the Roman Syene, the modern Assouan, on the Egyptian side of the first cataract, where a few remains of the ancient city exist. Here, or on the island hard by, the border garrison was stationed (Herod. ii 30). On the island, as early as the time of the Persian conquest of Egypt, a Jewish colony maintained a temple to Jehovah (Elephantine papyri); see ALTAR

Sha-al'bim, once Sha-al-ab'bin (Josh. xix 42) [foxes]

An Amorite city within the territory of Dan (Josh xix 42), which the Amorites did not yield (Judg i 35) until some time after the settlement of the Hebrews in the land (1 Kin. iv. 9). Not identified. Selbit, 3 miles northwest of Ajalon, has little in its favor.

Sha-al'bo-nite.

A native or inhabitant either of an unknown town called Shaalbon, or more probably of Shaalbim (2 Sam xxiii. 32, 1 Chron. xi 33).

Sha'a-lim, in A. V. Sha'lim [foxes]

A district apparently in Ephraim, through which Saul, on leaving the land of Shalishah, passed in quest of his father's asses (1 Sam. ix 4) Situation unknown Sha'aph.

1 A son of Jahdai, included in the registry of Caleb (1 Chron ii 47)

2 A son of Caleb by his concubine Maacah. He was ancestor of the inhabitants of Madmannah (1 Chron ii. 49)

Sha-a-ra'im, in A. V. once Sharaim [two gates]

1 A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv. 36), apparently west of Socoh and Azekah (1 Sam. xvii. 52 with 1) Not identified. Sa'reh among the hills, 5 miles northeast by north of Socoh, has not the proper location; and the tell and village of Zakariya, on either side of wady es-Sunt and about 2½ miles to the northwest of Socoh, have only one consonant in common with Shaaraim, and besides appear to be named after the prophet Zechariah, whose grave is shown there.

2. A town of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 31); see SHARUHEN.

Sha-ash'gaz.

A chamberlain of king Ahasuerus (Esth. ii 14).

Shab'be-thal [pertaining to the Sabbath].

A chief Levite, prominent in Ezra's time (Ezra x. 15; Neh. viii. 7; xi. 16).

Sha-chi'a.

A Benjamite, son of Shaharaim (1 Chron. viii. 10)

Sha'drach [probably Babylonian, Shudur-aku, decree of the moon-god].

The name given by the prince of the eunuchs at Babylon to Hananiah, one of the three faithful Hebrews afterwards miraculously saved from the fiery furnace (Dan. i. 7; iii. 12-30).

Sha'ge-e, in A. V. Shage [wandering]

A Hararite, the father of one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi 34). Some expositors would read Agee instead of Shage, on the ground of 2 Sam xxiii 11. The more appropriate comparison with 2 Sam xxiii 32, 33, and the reading of Lucian's recension of the Septuagint render more probable the conjecture that the name is really Shammah; see SHAMMAH 4

Sha-ha-ra'im [the double dawning].

A Benjamite, who had numerous descendants (1 Chron. viii 8)

Sha-haz'u-mah, in A. V. Sha-haz'i-mah, as in Hebrew margin [not improbably, lofty places]

A town on the border of Issachar (Josh. xix 22) Situation unknown

Sha'lem [entire, safe]

A town near Shechem (Gen. xxxiii. 18), according to the Greek, Latin, and Syriac versions, followed by A. V. It is scarcely Salem (Gen xiv 18), for that town is probably Jerusalem; nor Salim, 4 miles east of Shechem, which is not mentioned in the O. T. The word is probably a common noun, to be rendered, with R. V., in peace or safety.

Sha'lim. See SHALIM

Shal'i-shah, in A. V. Shalisha [a third part]

A district apparently in the hill country of Ephraim, traversed by Saul in quest of his father's asses (1 Sam ix 4) Its situation is unknown. It does not seem to be the same as Baal-shalishah

Shal'le-etheth [casting out]

A gate of Solomon's temple on the west (1 Chron xxvi. 16)

Shal'um [retribution]

1 A son of Naphtali (1 Chron. vii. 13); see SHILLEM

2 A descendant of Simeon through Shaul (1 Chron iv. 24, 25)

3 A descendant of Judah through Sisamai (1 Chron. ii 40, 41)

4 The chief porter at the sanctuary (1 Chron ix. 17, 18) If before the exile, as is probable, he is mentioned by Jeremiah (Jer. xxxv 4) He was a son of Kore, a Korhite, and he and his family were keepers of the gates of the sanctuary (1 Chron. ix. 19). The name Shallum may be equivalent to Meselemiah or Shelemiah (xxvi 1, 14), whether the registry of chapter ix. be referred to the time before or after the exile. A comparison of ix. 21 with xxvi. 2 raises a strong presumption against the identification. If notwithstanding this, the registry be regarded as post-exilic and Shallum be identified with Shelemiah, then Shallum is not the name of a person, but of the family, in the registry.

5. A son of Jabesh, who murdered king Zechariah and reigned in his stead over the ten tribes, but in a month was himself assassinated by Menahem (2 Kin. xv. 8-15).

6. Father of a certain Jehizkiah (2 Chron. xxviii. 12).

7. A member of the high-priestly family of Zadok, and an ancestor of Ezra. He lived several generations before the capture of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar (1 Chron. vi. 12-15; Ezra vii. 2). Called Meshullam in 1 Chron. ix. 11; see MESHULLAM 4

8. A son of Tikvah, and the husband of Huldah, the prophetess, and in the reign of Josiah the officer who had charge either of the priests' garments which were kept in the temple or of the king's wardrobe (2 Kin. xxii. 14; 2 Chron. xxiv. 22).

9. Uncle of Jeremiah, and the father of Hanameel (Jer xxxii 7, 8). He was not a member of the high-priestly family, as some have thought; for his son lived at Anathoth, a town where priests of Ithamar's line dwelt (1 Kin. ii. 26), and the high priests of this time belonged to the line of Eleazar.

10. Another name for Jehoahaz, son of Josiah, king of Judah (2 Kin. xxiii. 30-34); see JEHOAHAZ.

11 and 12. A porter of the temple, and a son of Bani, each of whom was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 24, 42).

13. A son of Hallohes, ruler of half the district of Jerusalem. With his daughters, he repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 12).

Shal'lun [perhaps, spoliation]

A ruler of part of Mizpah, who repaired the gate of the fountains at Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 15).

Shal'mai. See SALMAI.

Shal'man.

Tiglath-pileser mentions Salamanu of Moab among the various princes who were tributary to him (II. R. 67, 60), and Schrader believes that this person is Shalman, the destroyer of Beth-arbel, to whom Hosea refers (Hos. x. 14), and that Beth-arbel is the town of that name east of the Jordan, near Pella. These identifications may be correct, but they are unsupported. It is not known that Salamanu of Moab invaded the land of Israel, but it is known that Shalmaneser of Assyria did. In the light of present knowledge, it is more natural to regard Shalman as an abbreviation of Shalmaneser, exactly such an abbreviation as is Benhadad, and to think of Beth-arbel as being the town of Galilee, from which Shalmaneser's army was certainly not far distant. See SHALMANESER 4.

Shal-ma-ne'ser [Assyrian Shulmanu-ashar-idu, god Shulman is chief].

The name of several Assyrian kings:

1. The builder, or rather rebuildr, and fortifier of the town of Calah (q. v.). He reigned about 1300 B. c.

2. The son of Ashurnasirpal. He reigned from about 860 to 825 B. c., and was the first Assyrian king who came into conflict with the Israelites. He was energetic and persistent in purpose. He crossed the Euphrates with hostile intent as early as his first year and wasted the Hittite country as far as the Mediterranean; and he repeatedly crossed the river later, besides waging war in the countries north, east, and south of Nineveh. To resist him in the west, the Syrian league was formed, which included Damascus, Hamath, and the twelve kings of the coast, and was at times reinforced by the soldiers of the neighboring nations. Thus, for instance, the army of Ahab of Israel was found fighting side by side with the men of Damascus against the common Assyrian foe at Karkar in 854 B. c.; see AHAB, BENHADAD. Shalmaneser claims to have won the battle of Karkar; but he gained nothing if he did, and at once led his army back to Nineveh. After three years he returned, but his onward course was again stopped by the allies. The following year, the eleventh of his reign, he crossed the Euphrates and plundered many towns of the kingdom of Hamath, but he was again checked. In his fourteenth year he returned and conquered. The power of the league was broken. In his eighteenth year, 842 B. c., he defeated Hazael of Damascus at mount Hermon. The kings of Tyre and Sidon, and Jehu of Israel, in dismay hastened to make submission by sending tribute.

3. King from 783 to 773 B. c. His reign does not touch Hebrew history.

4. Successor of Tiglath-pileser. Before his accession to the throne, and even afterwards, he was known by the name of Ululai, in Greek Iloulaios (Ptolemy's canon). He reigned from the 25th of Tebet, the tenth month, 727 B. c., to the 12th of Tebet, 722 B. c. In 725 he undertook an expedition to foreign parts. According to the Syrian annals cited by Josephus, Shalmaneser overran Phœnicia. On the approach of the Assyrians, Sidon, Acre, and Tyre on the mainland revolted from the dominion of island Tyre and acknowledged the suzerainty of the invader. The Assyrian king thereupon withdrew. He returned, however, to war against the island. His ships, manned by his Phœnician subjects, were scattered by the Tyrians in a naval engagement. After this defeat Shalmaneser marched away, leaving troops enough to maintain a siege of the city, which was sustained for five years (Antiq. ix 14, 2), when Tyre submitted to Sargon. When Shalmaneser arrived in the west, Hoshea paid him tribute, as he had done to his predecessor, but he soon stopped his payments, relying upon So of Egypt to aid him in fighting the Assyrians, and perhaps encouraged by the stern resistance of Tyre. Shalmaneser promptly had him seized and imprisoned. It is quite probable that Hoshea had gone forth with his troops to oppose Shalmaneser and was defeated and captured; and that this battle took place at the strategic point and noted battleground, Arbela in Galilee. This conjecture, which identifies Shalman of Hos x. 14 with Shalmaneser, is alluring; but it is only conjecture. After seizing the king, whether at Arbela or elsewhere, Shalmaneser laid siege to the capital. Samaria stood this siege for three years and then fell into the hands of the Assyrians (2 Kin xvii 1-6, xviii 9, 10). Whether Shalmaneser was still Sham'mah [desolation].

1. A descendant of Esau and also of Ishmael (Gen. xxxvi 3, 4, 13, 17). He became a duke of Edom (17).

2 Third son of Jesse, and brother of David (1 Sam. xvi. 9; xvii. 13). See SHIMEA 3

3 One of David's first three mighty men,

Shalmaneser receiving the Tribute of Jehu on the throne or had just been succeeded by Sargon, is still a question; see SARGON.

Sha'ma [hearing, or he hath heard]

A son of Hotham, the Aroerite. He was one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi 44).

Sham-a-ri'ah. See SHEMARIAH.

Sha'med. See SHEMED.

Sha'mer. See SHEMER.

Sham'gar.

A local Hebrew judge, the son of Anath. He lived not long before Deborah and Barak. In his days, through the oppression of the Philistines, the highways were unoccupied, and the travelers walked through byways (Judg. v 6). Shamgar made himself feared by the Philistines. Their dead, slain from time to time by his oxgoad, at length amounted to six hundred. Thus he was a savior of Israel (ni. 31).

Sham'huth [desolation]

An Izrahite, David's captain for the fifth month (1 Chron. xxvii. 8). Perhaps identical with Shammah, one of David's mighty men. See SHAMMAH 4.

Sha'mir [a thorn].

1 A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv 48); probably represented by the ruin Sômerah, about 13 miles west-southwest of Hebron.

2. A town in mount Ephraim, which the judge Tola, though a man of Issachar, made his residence, and where he was buried (Judg. x. 1, 2). Site unknown.

3 A Levite, a son of Micah (1 Chron. xxiv. 24).

Sham'ma [desolation].

An Asherite, a son of Zophah (1 Chron. vii. 37).

& son of Agee, a Hararite (2 Sam. xxiii. 11). Shammah the Hararite is named in ver. 33; and in view of 1 Chron. xi 34 and textual considerations, is reasonably believed to be this person mentioned again as father of Jonathan. The words in Samuel and Chronicles are to be read "Jonathan, son of Shammah the Hararite."

4. A Harodite, also one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii 25). In 1 Chron. xi. 27 the plural form Shammoth is used. Shammuth of 1 Chron. xxvii 8 is perhaps another external and unessential variation of this man's name.

Sham'mai [waste].

1. A son of Onam, house of Jerahmeel, tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ii 28).

2 A son of Rekem, house of Caleb, tribe of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 44).

3 A son of a certain Ezrah, registered with the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 17).

Sham'moth [desolations]. See SHAMMAH 4

Sham-mu'a, in A. V. once Shammuah (2 Sam. v. 14) [something heard, fame].

1 The representative from the tribe of Reuben sent to spy the land of Canaan (Num. xiii. 4).

2. A son of David by Bath-sheba, born at Jerusalem (2 Sam. v. 14; 1 Chron. iii. 5); see BATH-SHUA. He bore an uncle's name (ii. 13). In 1 Chron. iii. 5 he is called Shimea; an unessential variant, having the same meaning as Shammua, differing only in the mode of formation.

3. A Levite descended from Jeduthun (Neh. xi. 17).

4. A priest in the days of the high priest Joiakim. He was head of the father's house of Bilgah (Neh. xii. 18).

Sham'she-rai.

A Benjamite, a son of Jeroham (1 Chron. viii. 26).

Sha'pham.

A Gadite dwelling in Bashan (1 Chron. v. 12).

Sha'phan [hyrax, rock badger].

A scribe in the reign of Josiah. When Hilkiah found the book of the law, he gave it to Shaphan, who read it at first privately, and then to the king. Afterwards he was one of those who went to Huldah, the prophetess, to consult her regarding the threatenings contained in the book (2 Kin. xxii. 8-14). He was the father of Ahikam (Jer. xxvi. 24; xxxix. 14), Gemariah (xxxvi. 10), and Jaazaniah (Ezek. viii. 11), and the grandfather of Gedaliah (2 Kin. xxv. 22).

Sha'phat [he hath judged].

1. The representative from the tribe of Simeon who was sent to spy the land of Canaan (Num. xiii. 5).

2. A Gadite in Bashan (1 Chron. v. 12).

3. Son of Adlai, and David's overseer of the herds that were in the valleys (1 Chron. xxvii. 29).

4. Father of the prophet Elisha (1 Kin. xix. 16).

5. A son of Shemaiah, registered with the descendants of David (1 Chron. iii. 22).

Sha'pher. See SHEPHERSha'phir, in A. V. Saphir [beautiful].

A town in Judah (Mic. i. 11). Not identified. Robinson and others locate it at es-Suvâfir, 5 miles southeast of Ashdod.

Sha'rai [perhaps, free]

A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 40).

Shar'a-im. See SHAARAIM.Shar'ar [firm].

A Hararite, father of one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 33). Called in 1 Chron. xi. 35 Sacar.

Sha-re'zer, in A. V. Shereser in Zech. vii. 2 [protect the king].

1. A son of Sennacherib. With one of his brothers he murdered his father (2 Kin. xix. 37; Is. xxxvii. 38).

2. A man sent from Bethel to the priests at Jerusalem to inquire whether the fasts should be kept, now that the cause for them no longer existed (Zech. vii. 2).

Shar'on, in A. V. of N. T. Saron (Acts ix. 35) [a plain].

1. The seacoast between Joppa and Carmel, and extending back to the hills of Samaria. It was a fertile region (Is. xxxv. 2), a pasture land for flocks (1 Chron. xxvii. 29; Is. lxx. 10); but like a desert when devastated (Is. xxxiii. 9). Among its flowers, lilies and anemones are prominent; see LILY, ROSE. Lydda was at its southern limit (cp. Acts ix. 35). Its length is about 50 miles, its breadth 9 or 10. It is not flat, but agreeably undulated, with here and there groves of oak, and with excellent pasturage, except that in places thorns and thistles too much abound.

2. A pasture region east of the Jordan (1 Chron. v. 16). Situation undetermined.

Sha-ru'nen.

A village in the territory of Simeon (Josh. xix. 6), apparently the place called Shaaraim (1 Chron. iv. 31) and Shilhim (Josh. xv. 32). The fortified town Sherohan or Sheruhan, on the road from Egypt to Gaza, a place often mentioned in Egyptian military records, is probably intended.

Sha'shai [whitish, pale].

A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 40).

Sha'shak.

A Benjamite, a son of Elpaal (1 Chron. viii. 14, 25).

Sha'ul [asked].

1. A king of Edom, from Rehoboth on the Euphrates (Gen. xxxvi. 37, in A. V. Saul; 1 Chron. i. 48).

2. A son of Simeon by a Canaanitish woman (Gen. xli. 10; Ex. vi. 15; 1 Chron. i. 48). He founded a tribal family (Num. xxvi. 13).

3. A Kohathite Levite, descended through Korah, Abiasaph, and Tahath (1 Chron. vi. 24).

Sha'veh [a plain]

A valley, afterwards called the king's dale, near Salem, in which the king of Sodom met Abraham after the defeat of Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv. 17, 18). Absalom reared a memorial pillar for himself there (2 Sam. xvm. 18), which according to Josephus stood about a quarter of a mile from Jerusalem (Antiq. vii. 10, 3).

Sha'veh-kir-i-a-tha'im, in A. V. Shaveh Kiriathaim [plain of Kirathaim].

A plain near the city of Kiriathaim, in the territory afterwards assigned to Reuben. It was at first inhabited by Emim (Gen. xiv. 5). Exact situation unknown.

Shav'sha and Shisha [original Hebrew orthography and meaning of name unknown].

A scribe of David and afterwards of Solomon (1 Chron. xviii. 16; 1 Kin. iv. 3). Probably identical with the scribe Seraiah (2 Sam. viii. 17) and doubtless with the scribe Sheva (2 Sam. xx. 25).

She'al [an asking].

A son of Bani induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 29).

She-al'ti-el, in A. V. of 1 Chron. iii. 17 and of N. T. Salathiel, the Greek form [I have asked God].

A son of king Jeconiah (1 Chron. iii. 17; Mat. i. 12) and also of Neri (Luke iii. 27). He was the father of Zerubbabel (Ezra iii. 2, etc.), and yet apparently his uncle, or possibly, though not probably, his grandfather (1 Chron. iii. 17-19). The explanation probably is that, while neither the son of Jeconiah nor the father of Zerubbabel after the flesh, he was the legitimate successor of Jeconiah to the royal title, and on his own death the right to the throne passed to Zerubbabel. He is the link in the royal succession connecting Jeconiah with Zerubbabel. See ASSIR, ZERUBBABEL, and GENEALOGY II.

She-a-ri'ah [Jehovah hath esteemed].

A descendant of Jonathan (1 Chron. viii. 38).

Shear'ing House.

The place where Jehu slew the forty-two brethren of Ahaziah, king of Judah, who were going to Ahaziah at Samaria while he was on a visit to the wounded king of Israel (2 Kin. x. 12-14). It took its name either from the fact that shepherds there bound the sheep which they were about to shear, or because they were in the habit of meeting there (Targum; R V margin). The Hebrew name is Beth 'eked haro'rim, in the Septuagint Bathakath. The name perhaps lingers in Beit Kád, about 3 miles east by north of En-gannim, and about 16 northeast by north of Samaria.

She-ar-j'a'shub [a remnant shall return]

A son of Isaiah. His name was designed to embody a prophecy (Is. vii. 3; cp x. 21).

She'ba, I. [a man]

A Cushite people descended through Raamah and closely related to Dedan (Gen x. 7), but also classed as a Semitic people descended through Joktan (28) and, like Dedan, from Abraham through Jokshan (xxv. 3). So far as connected with Abraham, they migrated eastward (xxv. 6; cp. Job i. 15; vi. 19). They dwelt in the south (Mat. xii. 42), and traded in gold, incense, and precious stones (1 Kin. x. 1 seq.; Ps lxxii. 10; Is lx. 6; Jer vi. 20; Ezek xxvii. 22; xxxviii. 13). Sheba was a country and people of southwestern Arabia, well known from its own records and classical geographers. Its capital was Saba, where is now the ruin of Maraba. The Sabaeans were a great commercial people. They traded not only in the products of their own land, but also in those of India and Ethiopia. Their language was Semitic. They spread widely, and have left traces of their name on the eastern coast of Arabia, and in the northern desert along with the Nabathæans. It is readily conceivable that in their dispersion they became mingled with other tribes by intermarriage or attached to them by political relations, and hence they might trace their descent by different lines and be classed variously in a genealogy.

She'ba, II. [seven, an oath].

1. A Simeonite town, mentioned after Beer-sheba (Josh xix. 2). Three views are entertained regarding it. 1. Its site may be Tell es-Sab'a, 3 miles east of Beer-sheba. 2. It is a corruption of Shema (cp. Septuagint and xv. 26). 3. Since it is lacking in 1 Chron. iv. 28, and this agrees with the summation in Josh xix. 6, it is an abbreviated form of Beer-sheba (see R. V.) or accidentally introduced into the text by dittography.

2. A Benjamite, a son of Bichri. After the collapse of Absalom's rebellion and the concurrence of the ten tribes with Judah in restoring David to his throne, Sheba blew a trumpet, and summoned the ten tribes to renounce their allegiance. He was besieged in Abel of Beth-maacah and lost his life there, for the inhabitants cut off his head and threw it over the wall to Joab (2 Sam. xx. 1-22).

3. A Gadite dwelling in Gilead in Bashan (1 Chron. v. 13, 16).

She'bah. See SHIBAH.

She'bam. See SIBMAH.

Sheb-a-ni'ah [perhaps, Jehovah hath dealt tenderly]

1. A Levite who was a trumpeter in David's time (1 Chron. xv. 24).

2. A father's house among the priests in the generation after the exile (Neh. xii. 14); see SHECANIAH 3. Its representative set his seal to the covenant (x. 4).

3. A Levite who assisted at the feast of tabernacles in Ezra's time (Neh. ix. 4, 5), and in behalf of his house sealed the covenant (x. 10).

4. Another Levite who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 12).

Sheb'a-rim [fractures, breaches, ruins; perhaps, quarries].

A locality near Ai (Josh. vii. 5). Site unknown.

She'bat, in A. V. Sebat, and 1 Mac. xvi. 14, A. V. Sabat, R. V. Sebat.

The eleventh month of the year (Zech. i. 7); see YEAR.

She'ber [breaking, fracture].

A son of Caleb, by his concubine Maacah (1 Chron. ii. 48).

Sheb'na, in R. V. twice Shebnaah (2 Kin. xviii. 18, 26) [tenderness].

The steward of the king's house under Hezekiah (Is. xxii. 15), a man of great influence, apparently a foreigner, and fond of display (16, 18). As was customary among the wealthy, he built himself a sepulcher in his lifetime (16). Isaiah rebuked him, calling him the shame of his lord's house; and predicted his fall and his retirement from Judah, and the elevation of Eliakim to his place (17-25). Probably later, in 701 B. C., Eliakim held the position of house steward, while Shebna was only Hezekiah's scribe or secretary (2 Kin. xviii. 18, 26, 37; xix. 2).

Sheb'u-el [captive of God].

1. A son of Gershom, and a grandson of Moses (1 Chron. xxiii. 16; xxvi. 24). Called in xxiv. 20 Shubael, a name which has the same meaning.

2. A son of Heman, in David's time (1 Chron. xxv. 4). Called in verse 20 Shubael.

Shec-a-ni'ah, in A. V. Shechaniah except 1 Chron. xxiv. 11; 2 Chron. xxxi. 15 [Jehovah hath dwelt].

1. A descendant of Aaron. His family had grown to a father's house in the time of David, and became the tenth of the twenty-four courses into which David divided the priests (1 Chron. xxiv. 1, 6, 11).

2. A Levite in king Hezekiah's reign (2 Chron. xxxi. 15).

3. A chief of the priests, who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh. xii. 3, 7). In the next generation a father's house probably bore his name, although it is written Shebaniah (ver. 14); see remarks under BETH for the misreading of caph as beth. See SHEBANIAH 2.

4. Founder of a family, presumably a descendant of David, but not in the line of succession to the throne (1 Chron. iii. 21, 22), for he is loosely registered, his kinship with Zerubbabel not being given. Perhaps his was the family of which the representative returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra viii. 3). The name of this representative has probably fallen out of the Hebrew text between Shecaniah and the words "of the sons of Parosh." The parallel passage, 1 Esdr. viii. 29, R. V., has: "Of the sons of David, Attus the son of Sechenias." This agrees indeed with the fact that Hattush was a grandson of Shecaniah (1 Chron. iii. 22), but it is not supported by either the Septuagint or Hebrew of Ezra viii. 3.

5. A son of Jahaziel and descendant of Zattu, who returned from Babylon with Ezra (Ezra viii. 5, Septuagint; 1 Esdr. viii. 32).

6. A son of Jehiel, one of the sons of Elam. He confessed the guilt of himself and his brethren who had married foreign wives, and proposed to Ezra that they should put them away (Ezra x. 2, 3).

7. Father of Shemaiah, the keeper of the east gate in Nehemiah's time, and probably a Levite (Neh. iii. 29), and not the man of Judah (1 Chron. iii. 22).

8. Father-in-law of Tobiah, the Ammonite. He was the son of Arah (Neh. vi. 18).

She'chem, in A. V. once Sichem (Gen. xii. 6), twice Sychem (Acts vii. 16), Greek forms [shoulder].

1. A town among the hills of Ephraim (Josh. xx. 7). Abraham camped near by (Gen. xii. 6). He found the Canaanite in the land, but was taught that this land was intended by the promise and that the country should belong to his descendants; and he forthwith erected an altar and worshiped God (7). Jacob found the tribe of Hamor, a Hivite people, occupying the place. He bought of them a parcel of ground, where Joseph's body was eventually buried (xxxiii. 18, 19: Josh. xxiv. 32; in Acts vii. 16 oddly confounded by Stephen with Abraham's purchase of Machpelah). Simeon and Levi massacred its male inhabitants, and the sons of Jacob plundered the town, on account of the injury done to their sister Dinah (Gen. xxxiv. 25, 27; xlviii. 22). Joseph's brothers for a time fed their flocks at Shechem (xxxvii. 12, 13). The boundary between the tribes of Ephraim and Manasse passed near it (Josh. xvii. 7). It was made one of the cities of refuge and a Levitical city (xx. 7; xxi. 21). Joshua summoned the tribes thither to hear his farewell address (xxiv. 1). In the time of the judges, a temple of Baal-berith was maintained in the town (Judg. viii. 33). Gideon's concubine resided there; and her son, Abimelech, was a native of Shechem, and for a time was assisted in his political designs by the men of Shechem (ix. 1, 3, 6), but they finally turned against him and he destroyed the city (23, 45). The Israelites met Rehoboam there, to sue for reforms; and when their request was refused, the ten tribes made Jeroboam king (1 Kin. xii. 1-19; 2 Chron. x. 1-19). Jeroboam strengthened the place (cp. 1 Chron. vii. 28), making it for the time his capital (1 Kin. xii. 25). Shechem is mentioned in Ps. lx. 6 and cviii. 7. It continued in existence after the destruction of Jerusalem (Jer. xli. 5); and became the chief city of the Samaritans (Ecclus. i. 26, Antiq. xi. 8, 6). It was captured by John Hyrcanus (xin. 9, 1). It has been frequently identified with the N. T. Sychar, but the two, although adjacent to each other, are believed to be different places. The Greeks termed it Neapolis or the New City (War iv. 8. 1), a name that, unlike most of those which they bestowed on old Hebrew cities, took root and still exists in the form Nablus or Nabulus. Shechem, or Nablus, is about 31½ miles north of Jerusalem and 5½ southeast of Samaria. It lies in the upland valley, bounded by mount Ebal on the north, and mount Gerizim on the south, and, to a considerable extent, rises along the northern slope of the latter hill, so that its perpendicular cliffs are in close proximity to part of the city. The streets are narrow and vaulted over, besides which in rainy weather some of them become the beds of streams. Eighty springs of water are said to exist in or around the city; the fertility of the district is, therefore, exceptionally great. These are used to make channels through the gardens, then, uniting, to turn a mill. The gardens and orchards are one mass of trees, flowers, and fruits, including mulberries, oranges, pomegranates, etc. The mass of the inhabitants are Mohammedans, then follow a few hundred Greek Christians, a small Jewish population, and about 150 Samaritans, the last named religionists living most of them together in the northwestern part of the city. Jacob's well is about 2 miles east-southeast, and the reputed tomb of Joseph about 2 east, of Shechem.

2. The son of Hamor, the Hivite, who was prince of Shechem (Gen. xxxiv. 1-31).

3. A son of Gilead, and the founder of a tribal family (Num. xxvi. 31; Josh. xvii. 2).

Shechem and Mount Gerizim from the Northeast

4 A Manassite, a son of Shemudah (1 Chron. vii 19)

Shed'e-ur [emission, light].

Father of Elizur, the Reubenite chief in the wilderness (Num. i. 5; ii 10).

Sheep.

Sheep were early domesticated (Gen. iv. 2), and constituted valuable property. They were herded by the Hebrew patriarchs (Gen. xii. 16), and by their descendants when sojourning in Egypt, and later when settled in Palestine (Ex. x. 9; xii. 32, 38; 1 Chron. xxvii. 31); and they continued to be kept down to the latest times (Luke ii. 8). The wilderness of Judæa and the south country, and especially the plateau of Moab, were pasture lands (Num. xxxii. 1; Judg. v. 16; 1 Sam. xvi. 11; xxv. 2); and so were neighboring countries, as Mesopotamia (Gen. xxix. 2), the land of Uz and of the Hagarenes (Job i. 3; 1 Chron. v. 20, 21), Midian (Ex. ii. 16), Kedar and the Nabathæan country (Is. lx. 7; Ezek. xxvii. 21; cp. 1 Sam. xv. 7, 9). In these regions the sheep, owing to the heat and dryness of the climate, require water daily (Gen. xxix. 8, 9, Ex. ii 16-19). The sheep was a clean animal and used for food; its flesh was eaten (1 Sam. xiv. 32, xxv 18; 2 Sam. xvii. 29; 1 Kin. iv. 23), and the rich milk of the ewes was drunk (Deut. xxxii 14; Is. vii. 21, 22; 1 Cor. ix 7). The skin served as rude clothing (Heb. xi 37; cp. Zech. xiii 4, Mat. vii. 15), and it was sometimes converted into leather (Ex. xxvi. 14). From the wool, cloth was woven (Lev. xiii. 47, 48; Job xxxi. 20; Prov. xxvii. 26; Ezek. xxxiv. 3); hence wool was a valuable commodity, and was rendered as tribute (2 Kin. iii. 4; Is. xvi. 1). Sheep shearing was made a time of feasting and frolic (Gen. xxxviii. 12; 1 Sam. xxv 4, 11, 36; 2 Sam. xiii. 23). The horns of rams served as flasks and trumpets (Josh. vi 4; 1 Sam. xvi. 1). As the sheep was a clean animal, it was used in sacrifice by the Hebrews and other peoples (Ex. xx. 24; John ii 14; Num. xxii. 40). An animal of the flock might be taken for a burnt offering (Lev. i. 10), a sin offering of the common people (iv. 32), a guilt and a trespass offering (v. 15; vi. 6), and a peace offering (xxii. 21); see LAMB, RAM. The sheep was known for its affection (2 Sam. xii. 3), docility (John x. 3, 4), meekness and submissiveness (Is. lvi. 7; Jer. xi. 19), helplessness when left to itself (Mic. v. 8; Mat. x. 16), and its need of guidance (Num. xxvii. 17; Ezek. xxxiv. 5; Mat. ix. 36; xxvi. 31).

Broad-tailed Sheep of Syria

The sheep of Palestine and the adjacent regions are usually white (Ps. cxlvii. 16; Is. i. 18, Ezek. xxvii. 18), but occasionally they are black or brown, or piebald, either white and tawny or white and black (Gen. xxx. 32). Two breeds of sheep are found in Palestine. In the northern districts a short-wooled variety is raised, of which both the rams and ewes are horned. But the broad-tailed sheep (Ovis laticaudata) is more general. It has been bred since early ages in Arabia and Palestine (Herod. ii. 113, cp. Ex. xxix. 22; Lev. iii. 9, vii. 3, viii. 25). The tails which are offered for sale in the markets ordinarily weigh ten or fifteen pounds; but when the sheep is well fattened, the tail grows to an enormous size. The Arabs regard it as a delicacy, frying it in slices.

Sheep'fold and Sheep'cote.

An inclosure for sheep (Jer. xxiii. 3; Ezek. xxxiv. 14), whither the flock was ordinarily driven for the night. Many were permanent pens, surrounded by a stone wall (cp. Num. xxxii. 16) and entered by a gate (John x. 1). The wall was often surmounted with branches of thorny shrubs. The sheep lay in the yard under the open sky; but doubtless there were in former days, as there are now, low, flat buildings on the sheltered side of the area, in which the flocks were shut up on cold nights. It was common for several flocks to pass the night in one fold under the care of an under-shepherd, who guarded the door. The shepherds came in the morning, and were admitted by the under-shepherd. Each shepherd knew the sheep of his own flock, and was known by them (John x. 3, 4). Less substantial inclosures were hastily formed of tangled thorn branches for temporary use on pastures remote from home, and caves and other natural shelters were also taken advantage of for protecting the sheep at night, the shepherds camping with their flocks. On ranges exposed to the raids of robbers or hostile tribes, towers were erected, about which the flocks and herds were pastured and at night folded (2 Kin. xvii. 9; 2 Chron. xxvi. 10, Mic. iv. 8).

Sheep Gate. See JERUSALEM II. 3

Sheep Mar'ket, in R. V. Sheep Gate See JERUSALEM II. 3

She'e-rah, in A. V. She'rah [consanguinity, a female relative]

A daughter of Ephraim, or perhaps of Beriah. She or rather her descendants built upper and nether Beth-horon and Uzzensheerah (1 Chron. vii. 24). She may have married Becher and given rise to the tribal family of the Becherites.

She-ha-ri'ah [Jehovah hath broken forth as the dawn]

A Benjamite, son of Jeroham (1 Chron. viii. 26).

Syrian Sheepfold.

Shek'el [weight].

A weight used for metals (Gen. xxiv. 22,

1 Sam. xvii. 5, 7; see WEIGHTS. At an early period this quantity of silver, uncoined, was a recognized standard in financial transactions (Gen. xxiii. 15, 16). Half a shekel was to be given by each man as a ransom for his life when a census was taken (Exod xxx 14, 15). The value of the shekel was about 65 cents; see WEIGHTS. In 141-140 B C the fourth year of Simon Maccabeus' priestly rule, Antiochus VII., not yet king of Syria, but having authority, allowed him to coin money in his own name, and silver shekels and half shekels commencing from about that period exist. See MONEY.

She-ki'nah. See THEOPHANY

She'lah, I., in A V of Genesis Salah, of N. T. Sala, in imitation of the Greek form [a missile, a shoot a sprout]

1. The son of Arphaxad (Gen x 24, xi 12-15, 1 Chron i 18)

2. A pool at Jerusalem, near the king's garden, erroneously translated in the A. V. Siloah (Neh iii 15). Probably the same as Siloam (q. v)

She'lah, II. [prayer]

The third son of Judah by a Canaanite woman. He was the founder of a tribal family (Gen xxxviii 2, 5, 11, 14, 26; Num. xxvi 20).

Shel-e-mi'ah [Jehovah recompenses]

1. A doorkeeper of the sanctuary in David's time (1 Chron xxvi 14). See MESHELEMAH

2. Son of Cush (Jer xxxvi 14)

3. Son of Abdeel (Jer xxxvi 26)

4. Son of Hanamah (Jer xxxviii 13).

5. Father of Jucal (Jer xxxviii 1)

6, 7. Two men, descendants of Bani, each of whom was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x 39, 41)

8. Father of that Hanamah who assisted to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (Neh iii 30)

9. A priest whom Nehemiah appointed one of three treasurers of the tithes, which they were commissioned to distribute among the Levites (Neh xiii 13).

She'leph [extraction]

A Semitic people descended through Joktan (Gen x 26, 1 Chron. i 20), and doubtless dwelling in southern Arabia. The name is a common one in Yemen.

She'lesh [triad].

An Asherite, son of Helem (1 Chron vii. 35).

Shel'o-mi [peaceful].

Father of Ahihud, who was prince of Asher in the latter part of the wilderness wanderings (Num. xxxiv. 27).

Shel'o-mith [peaceful].

1. A Danite, a daughter of Dibri, and mother of the Israelite who was put to death in the wilderness for blasphemy (Lev. xxiv. 11).

2. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar (1 Chron. xxiii. 18). Called Shelomoth in xxiv. 22.

3. A descendant of Moses through Eliezer. He and his brethren were appointed by David over the dedicated treasures (1 Chron. xxvi. 25, 26, in R. V., following the Hebrew text, Shelomoth; cp xxiii 15-17).

4. A Gershonite Levite, son of Shimei (1 Chron xxiii. 9, in R. V. Shelomoth).

5. A son or daughter of Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 20)

6. Son of Josiphiah (Ezra viii 10). The Hebrew text is faulty. The Septuagint shows that he was a member of the family of Bani: "Of the sons of Bani, Shelomoth, the son of Josiphiah"

7. A daughter of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii. 19).

Shel'o-moth. See SHELOMITH

She-lu'mi-el [pacified, or a friend is God].

The prince of the tribe of Simeon early in the wilderness wanderings (Num. i. 6; ii. 12; vii. 36, 41, x 19)

Shem, in A. V. of N. T. Sem [name].

One of the two elder sons of Noah (Gen. x. 1, 21, cp ix. 24), and probably the first-born (v 32). For explanation of xi 10, see CHRONOLOGY, section relating to the period from the creation to Abraham. With his descendants, he is mentioned last in the catalogue of Gen. x in accordance with the author's custom of disposing of subordinate genealogies before presenting the main line of the people of God. He was born about the five hundredth year of Noah's life (see NOAH). At the time of the deluge he was married, but had no children (Gen vii 1; 1 Pet iii 20). After that catastrophe, he acted with filial respect to his father when the latter committed his great sin. Shem, in consequence, received a blessing, the wording of which implied that God would bless Shem and that the worship of the true God should continue in his family (Gen ix. 23, 27). He was progenitor of the people who inhabited or perhaps in some cases held in subjection Elam, Asshur, Arphaxad, Lud, and Aram (x. 21, 22).

She'ma [rumor, fame].

1. A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh xv. 26); cp SHEBA 2

2. A son of Hebron, belonging to the tribe of Judah (1 Chron ii 43, 44); see MARESHAH 2.

3. A Reubenite, a son of Joel (1 Chron. v 8, cp. 4).

4. A Benjamite, head of a father's house in Aijalon (1 Chron. viii. 13). Called in verse 21 Shimei, in A. V. Shimhi.

5. One of the men, probably priests, who assisted Ezra at the public reading of the law (Neh viii. 4).

She-ma'ah [rumor, fame].

A Benjamite of Gibeah, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii 3).

She-ma'iah [Jehovah hath heard].

1. A Simeonite (1 Chron. iv. 37)

2. A Reubenite, a son of Joel (1 Chron v. 4).

3. A Levite, chief of the sons of Elizaphan, who to the number of two hundred took part in the ceremonies attendant on the removal of the ark from the house of Obed-edom to mount Zion (1 Chron. xv 8-11).

4. A Levite, a son of Nethanel. He was a scribe in the time of David, and noted down the twenty-four divisions then made of the priests (1 Chron xxiv. 6).

5. Eldest son of Obed-edom (1 Chron. xxvi 4). He was the father of various valiant sons who, with him, were doorkeepers of the tabernacle (6-8).

6. A prophet in the reign of Rehoboam, who forbade the king to attempt the conquest of the revolted ten tribes (1 Kin xii 22-21, 2 Chron. xi 2-4). Five years later, when Shishak invaded the land, he declared that the invasion was permitted as a punishment for sin. Thereupon the princes humbled themselves, and the affliction was made lighter (xii 5-8). Shemaiah wrote a history of Rehoboam's reign (15).

7. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach the people (2 Chron xvii 8).

8. A Levite, descendant of Jeduthun. He helped to cleanse the temple in Hezekiah's reign (2 Chron xxix 14, 15). He is, perhaps, the Levite mentioned in 1 Chron ix 16, and he may be the person called Shammua in Neh xi 17.

9. A Levite in Hezekiah's reign who, with others, had to distribute the firstlings, tithes and gifts to the Levites in the cities (2 Chron. xxxi. 15).

10. A chief Levite in Josiah's reign who, with others, was liberal in his donations of animals for the the passover services (2 Chron xxxv. 9).

11. Father of Urijah, of Kirjath-jearim, who was put to death by king Jehoikim for the true prophecies he had uttered (Jer xxvi. 20-23).

12. Father of Delaiah, the latter being a prince in the reign of Jehoikim (Jer. xxxvi. 12).

13. A Nehelamite, a false prophet among the exiles in Babylonia, who prophesied a speedy return from captivity. He wrote to the people of Jerusalem and the priest who had oversight of the temple, and complained that Jeremiah remained unpunished, who declared that the exile would be long. When Jeremiah heard the complaint, he foretold that Shemaiah should leave no posterity and not live to see the return (Jer. xxix. 24-32).

14. A chief of the priests who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 6, 7). In the next generation a father's house bore this name (ver. 18).

15. A son of Adonikam, and one of the chief men who accompanied Ezra from the land of the captivity to Canaan (Ezra viii. 13).

16. A chief man whom Ezra sent with others to Iddo to obtain Levites who were lacking in the party leaving the land of the captivity for Canaan (Ezra viii. 16).

17 and 18. Two men, one descended from the priest Harim, and the other from the layman Harim, each of whom was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 21, 31).

19. A son of Shecaniah (1 Chron. iii. 22); see SHECANIAH 4.

20. Keeper of the east gate, and probably a Levite. He repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem in Nehemiah's time (Neh. iii. 29); see SHECANIAH 7.

21. A Levite, descended from Bunni. He was the head man among those who had oversight of the business of the house of God in Nehemiah's time (Neh. xi. 15).

22. A false prophet, son of Delaiah, son of Melchiel. He was hired by Tobiah and Sanballat to frighten Nehemiah into going with him into the temple and shutting the doors to avoid assassination (Neh. vi. 10-13). In carrying out his plan, he shut himself in his house and pretended to fear for his life.

23. A priest who, doubtless in behalf of a father's house, sealed the covenant in the days of Nehemiah (Neh. x. 8).

24. A prince of Judah who took part in the ceremonies at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 34).

25. A Levite of the lineage of Asaph (Neh. xii. 35).

26. One of the company of Levite musicians at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 36).

27. A priest who blew a trumpet on the same occasion (Neh. xii. 42).

Shem-a-ri'ah, in A V once Shamariah (2 Chron. xi. 19) [Jehovah hath kept].

1. A Benjamite who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 5).

2. A son of Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 19).

3 and 4. A son of Harim and a son of Bani, each of whom was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 32, 41).

Shem-e'ber [meaning unknown]. In Septuagint the form is Sumobor.

The king of Zebouim, defeated, with the other kings ruling over the cities of the plain, by Chedorlaomer and his confederates (Gen. xiv. 2, 8, 10).

She'med, in A V. Shamed, the pausal form [destruction]. These forms of the name are derived from the Vulgate; but the present Hebrew text and the Septuagint, codex Vaticanus, have Shamer.

A Benjamite, descended from Shaharaim through Elpaal. He was a rebuilder of Ono and Lod, with their dependent villages (1 Chron. viii. 12).

She'mer, in A V. of Chronicles Shamer, the pausal form [the lees, or crust of wine].

1. The man from whom Omri purchased the hill on which to build Samaria (1 Kin. xvi. 24).

2 A Merarite Levite, the son of Mahli (1 Chron. vi 46).

3. An Asherite (1 Chron. vii. 34). The same as the Shomer of verse 32.

She-mi'da, in A. V. once Shemidah (1 Chron vii 19) [fame of wisdom].

A son of Gilead, and founder of a tribal family (Num. xxvi 32; Josh xvii. 2).

Shem'1-nith [eighth].

A musical term (1 Chron. xv 21; and Ps. vi. and xii., titles). Stainer reviews three opinions which have been given regarding it (1) The pitch of an octave; (2) the name of a scale or tune; and (3) the number of strings on the instrument used. Perhaps, in contrast with alamoth, it means an octave below (Gesenius, Delitzsch).

She-mir'a-moth [lofty name].

1 A Levite and singer in the reign of David (1 Chron xv 18, 20)

2. A Levite, one of those employed by Jehoshaphat to teach the people (2 Chron. xvii 8)

She-mit'ic See SEMITIC

Shem'u-el [name of God] The same Hebrew name as that commonly rendered Samuel

1. A son of Amnihad He was appointed as the representative for the tribe of Simeon on the commission to divide Canaan (Num. xxxiv 20)

2 A man of Issachar, family of Tola, and head of a father's house (1 Chron vii. 2).

3 The prophet Samuel (1 Chron. vi. 33, A V.).

Shen [a tooth, a jagged rock]

A spot a little on one side of the place where Samuel set up the stone which he called Ebenezer (1 Sam vii 12) The text is suspicious The Greek and Syriac versions indicate Jeshanah. See JESHANAH.

She naz'zar, in A V. Shenazar [apparently O moongod, protect].

A son or descendant of Jeconiah (1 Chron. iii 18)

She'nir. See SENIR.

She'ol. See HELL.

She'pham.

A place on the northeastern border of Canaan, near Riblah (Num. xxxiv. 10, 11). Site unknown.

Sheph-a-ti'ah, in A V. once erroneously shephathiah (1 Chron. ix. 8) [Jehovah hath judged]

1. A Haruphite, one of the Benjamites who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii 5)

2. A son born to David at Hebron by one of his wives, Abital (2 Sam. iii 4; 1 Chron. iii. 3)

3. Son of Maacah and head of the Simeonite tribe in David's reign (1 Chron. xxvii. 16).

4 The father of a Benjamite who dwelt at Jerusalem (1 Chron ix 8).

5. A son of king Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xxi. 2).

6 A prince, son of Mattan. He was one of those who advised Zedekiah to put the prophet Jeremiah to death, as his unfavorable prophecies were discouraging the defenders of Jerusalem during its siege by Nebuchadnezzar's army (Jer xxxviii 1).

7 Founder of a family, 372 members of which returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii 4; Neh vii 9), and eighty-one more with Ezra (Ezra viii 8)

8 A man of Judah, family of Perez He evidently lived before the exile (Neh xi. 4).

9. A man whose descendants, classified with Solomon's servants, came from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii 57; Neh. vii 59).

Sheph'e-lah [low land]

A well known name in the geography of Palestine, used, however, in the English versions only in 1 Mac xii 38, A V., and then in the form Sephela See LOWLAND.

She'pher, in A V Shapher [beauty, elegance].

A mountain constituting an encampment of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. xxxiii. 23, 24). Situation unknown.

Shep'herd.

One whose occupation it is to take care of a flock of sheep Abel was a keeper of sheep (Gen iv 2) The occupation of the patriarchs from Abraham to Jacob and his sons was pastoral (Gen 1-6). There were nomad shepherds who owned flocks and herds, dwelt in tents, and moved from place to place to find pasture for their cattle and afford them protection, like Jabal, Abraham, and the Rechabites (iv 20 xiii 2, 3, 18 with xx 1; Jer xxxv 6-10) There were also wealthy sheep owners who dwelt in towns while their flocks were driven from pasture to pasture by their servants (1 Sam xxv 2, 3, 7, 15, 16; cp Gen xxxvii 12-17) Then there was the settled shepherd, who led the flock from the permanent fold to the pasture in the morning, and in the evening brought it home again (John x. 1-4), see SHEEPFOLD The care of the flock was often committed to a son (Gen xxxvii 2; 1 Sam xvi 11, 19), or a daughter (Gen xxix 9; Ex. ii 16, 17), or a hired servant (Gen xxv 32; Zech xi. 12; John x 12) The shepherd was ordinarily responsible to the owner for any loss of sheep (Gen xxxi. 39). The Mosaic law relieved him of responsibility if he could prove that the loss was not due to his neglect (Ex. xxii. 10-13)

The shepherd went to the fold in the morning, where several flocks were lying, and called. His own sheep knew his voice and followed him. The sheep which belonged to other owners or were under the care of other keepers paid no attention to the strange voice (John x. 2-5). The shepherd led his own flock to pasture, spent the day with them there, and sometimes the night also (Gen. xxxi. 40; Song i. 7; Luke ii. 8); defended them from wild beasts and robbers (1 Sam. xvii. 34, 35; Is. xxxi. 4); kept the restless sheep from trespassing on cultivated ground, searched for the strayed sheep, and brought them back (Ezek. xxxiv. 12; Luke xv. 4); and tenderly cared for the delicate and the weak (Is. xl. 11; Ezek. xxxiv. 4, 16; Zech. xi. 9). The sheep which kept near the shepherd had each a name and answered to it, and were the recipients of many little kindnesses. Such is still the case in the Orient. Where the pastures are dried up or covered with snow, as in the late autumn and winter, the shepherd must provide food for the flock. He cuts down branches from the trees of the forest, and the sheep and goats feed upon the green leaves and tender twigs.

The shepherd carried a garment in which to wrap himself in inclement weather, a pouch for food, and some defensive weapon (1 Sam. xvii. 40; Jer. xlii. 12). A long rod, doubtless generally in ancient times as now with a crook at the upper end, was used to manage the flock, keep it together, guide it, defend it, and chastise the disobedient (1's xxiii. 4; Mic. vii. 14; Zech. xi. 7). The shepherd was aided by dogs (Job xxx. 1); not intelligent, faithful dogs, but lazy, mean brutes, which loitered behind the flock, but were of service; they gave warning of danger by their bark.

Jehovah was the Shepherd of Israel, and especially of the faithful section of the people (Gen. xlix. 24).

Christ is the good Shepherd, entering into the sheepfold by the door, calling out his own sheep by name, and so possessing their confidence and affection that they follow him, while they refuse to follow any other. He satisfactorily met the test of supreme devotion to his flock and to his duty by laying down his life for the sheep (John x. 1-18).

All who had responsible positions in the theocracy, prophets, priests, and kings, were looked on as pastors of the Israelitish people. They were under-shepherds, aiding Jehovah, and their unfaithfulness was frequently pointed out (Is. lvi. 11). And in the Christian church, the elders or bishops are pastors or shepherds, under Christ, the chief Shepherd, appointed to tend the flock of God (1 Pet. v. 1-4).

She'phi and She'pho [smoothness].

A son or tribe of Shobal, descended from Seir, the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 23); for the two forms, cp. VAU.

She-phu'pham and Shephuphan [perhaps, horned sand snake]; see ADDEE I.

A son or remoter descendant of Benjamin, and founder of a tribal family (Num. xxvi. 39; in A. V. Shupham). In the same verse his name appears as Shupham (in Shupham-ites). He is also called Muphim (Gen. xlvii. 21) and Shuphim (1 Chron. vii. 12, 15). The letters m and s or sh were very much alike in ancient Hebrew. He was perhaps known also as Shephuphan (1 Chron. viii. 5). In this passage Shephuphan is probably listed as a descendant of Bela, although it is not impossible that the enumeration of Bela's sons closes with Gera and that Shephuphan is registered as a son of Benjamin. In vii. 12 Shuphim is catalogued among the sons of Benjamin, but it is not clear whether he is enrolled as a son in the strict sense or as descended from Benjamin's son Bela through Ir or Iri (7). In the latter case he was born after the descent of Jacob's family into Egypt, but is enumerated with those who went down into Egypt, because he founded a tribal family. See EGYPT III. 1

She'rah. See SHEERAH

Sher-e-bi'ah [Jehovah hath made to tremble]

1. A Levite, head of a family, who came from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 8). The representative of the family sealed the covenant (x. 12). It was a family of singers (xii. 24).

2. Head of a family of Levites who returned with Ezra from Babylon (Ezra viii. 18). He was perhaps the representative of a part of the aforementioned family which had remained behind when the exiles returned with Zerubbabel, and as representative he officially bore the family name. He is probably intended in ver. 24, although the present text describes him as a priest, and was one of the men to whose custody during the journey Ezra committed the gifts for the temple.

3. One of the Levites who assisted Ezra, reading the law to the people, and giving the sense, so that the listeners might understand what they heard (Neh. viii. 7). He took part in the public confession of sin after the feast of tabernacles (ix. 4).

She'resh [perhaps, root or sprout].

A man of Manasseh, family of Machir (1 Chron. vii. 16).

She-re'zer. See SHAREZER.

She'shach.

According to ancient tradition, a cypher for Babel (Jer. xxv. 26, R. V., margin; li. 41), constructed on the system known as Ath-bash. The letters of the alphabet were numbered both in their regular order of sequence and in the reverse order; and when the cypher of a name was desired, its consonants were replaced by those which have the same numbers in the reverse enumeration. B is the second letter of the Hebrew alphabet and s or sh is the second from the end, l is the twelfth letter from the beginning and k is the twelfth from the end; hence the cypher for Babel was Sheshach. Possibly, however, there is no cypher, and Sheshach is the name of a quarter of the city, perhaps Shish-ku (Lauth, Delitzsch).

She'shai [whitish].

A son or family of Anak, resident at Hebron, and driven thence by Caleb (Num. xiii 32, cp 33; Josh. xv. 14).

She'shan.

A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (1 Chron ii 31). He had no sons, but only daughters, one of whom he gave in marriage to an Egyptian slave (34, 35). See AHLAI.

Shesh-baz'zar.

A prince of Judah, whom Cyrus made governor, to whom he restored the sacred vessels which had been carried to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, and who returned to Jerusalem and laid the foundation of the temple (Ezra i 8, 11; v 14, 16). Sheshbazzar is evidently the Babylonian name of Zerubabel, as Belteshazzar was that of Daniel.

Sheth, I. [compensation]

A son of Adam (1 Chron i 1). See SETH.

Sheth, II. [tumult].

A designation of the Moabites as makers of war and tumult (Num. xxiv 17, A V).

She'thar-boz'e-nai, in A V. Shethar-boz'nai.

A Persian official who with others attempted to prevent the returned Jewish exiles from rebuilding the temple (Ezra v 3, 6; vi 6).

She'va [vanity].

1 A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Caleb. He was the ancestor of the inhabitants of Machbena and Gibe'a (1 Chron ii. 49).

2 A scribe in David's reign (2 Sam. xx. 25). See SHAVSHA.

Shew'bread. See SHOWBREAD.

Shi'bah, in A V Shebah [seven, an oath]. Feminine form of Sheba.

A well at Beer-sheba which Isaac's servants redigged, and which Isaac named Shihah on account of the covenant he had just made with Abimelech (Gen. xxvi. 33).

Shib'bo-leth [an ear of grain, or a river or stream].

The local dialect of the Ephraimites was characterized by the absence of the palatal sibilant sh at the beginning of a word and the use of the lingual sibilant s in its stead. When Jephthah, at the head of the Gileadites, had vanquished the Ephraimites and seized the fords of the Jordan, many of the defeated tribe came to the river, desiring to pass. On being asked if they were Ephraimites, and denying the fact, they were required to pronounce the word Shibboleth, and if they called it Sibboleth, they were slain without further ceremony (Judg. xii. 5, 6). The word has entered the English language, and is used to mean a test word or the watchword or pet phrase of a party or sect.

Shib'mah. See SEBMAH.

Shic'ron. See SHIKERON.

Shield. See ARMOR.

Shig-ga'lon, and plural Shiglonoth [wandering, irregular].

A musical term (Ps vii title; Hab. iii. 1). Probably a dithyrambic ode, erratic, wild, enthusiastic.

Shi'hon. See SHION.

Shi'hor, in A V Si'hor, except 1 Chron. xiii 5 [to the Hebrew ear, black, turbid].

The river Nile (Is. xxiii 3; Jer. ii. 18, see R V. margin). Its eastern or Pelusiatic branch was on the boundary of Egypt toward Canaan (Josh. xiii 3, 1 Chron xiii 5); see RIVER OF EGYPT 1. The R V, however, and many commentators regard the Shi'hor in the last two passages as a title of the brook of Egypt, the wady el-'Arish (Josh. xiii 3, R V. margin). According to Brugsch, the name belonged in the first instance to a canal, Shi-hur, on the eastern boundary of Egypt, parallel to the course of the Pelusiatic branch.

Shi-hor-lib'nath [turbid stream of Lib-nath].

A small river at the southwestern corner of Asher (Josh. xix. 26) and apparently near Carmel. It is now commonly believed to be the Zerka, 6 miles south of Dor, a town of Asher.

Shik'ke-ron, in A V. Shicron [drunkenness].

A town on the northern border of the tribe of Judah (Josh. xv. 11). Site unknown.

Shil'hi [one armed with a dart].

Father of Azubah, Jehoshaphat's mother (1 Kin. xxii. 42).

Shil'him [missile weapons, sprouts].

A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv 32); see SHARUHEN.

Shil'lem [retribution].

A son of Naphtali, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. xlii 24; Num. xxvi 49). Called Shallum, a synonymous and more common name, in 1 Chron. vii. 13.

Shil'ling. See PENNY.

Shi-lo'ah [a sending of waters, an aqueduct], see SILOAM.

Shi'loh [tranquillity, rest].

A town north of Bethel, south of Lebonah, and on the east side of the highway connecting Bethel with Shechem (Judg. xxi 19), and hence within the territory of Ephraim. There the Israelites under Joshua set up the tabernacle (Josh. xviii. 1), and divided by lot the, as yet, unappropriated parts of Canaan (8-10; xix. 51; xxii 9). When the western tribes were convened to call the tribes east of the Jordan to account for their building of an altar, it was at Shiloh that the gathering took place (12). In the times of the judges there was there an annual feast of Jehovah.

(Judg. xxi. 19; 1 Sam. i. 3), at which the Benjamites on one occasion obtained wives by capture (Judg. xxi. 16-23). The tabernacle, with the ark, was still there in the time of Eli and during the early years of Samuel (Judg. xviii. 31; 1 Sam. i. 9, 24; ii. 14, 22; iii. 3, 21; iv. 3, 4; xiv. 3). The capture of the ark was understood to mean that God had forsaken Shiloh (Ps. lxxviii. 60; Jer. vii. 12, 14; xxvi. 6, 9). The covenant made at Sinai, of which the ark and the ritual were the outward sign and privilege, was suspended. When the ark was returned by the Philistines it was not taken again to Shiloh (1 Sam. vi. 21; vii. 1, 2; 2 Sam. vi. 2, 11, 17), but the work of reviving true religion, preparatory to the restoration of covenant privileges, was begun by Samuel. Ahijah the prophet, who told Jeroboam of his approaching greatness, lived at Shiloh, and it was thither that the king's consort repaired to inquire about the issue of their sick child's malady (1 Kin. xiv. 2, 4). It continued to be inhabited at least as late as the time of Jeremiah (Jer. xl. 5). Shiloh has been successfully identified by Robinson as Seilûn, about 10 miles north-northeast of Bethel. The ruins are in a valley surrounded by hills. In the sides of the narrow valley are many tombs. A fine spring of water is in the vicinity.

There are three main interpretations of Shiloh in the difficult passage Gen. xlix. 10, each of which receives recognition in R. V. 1. Shiloh is a proper name, which designates the Messiah and refers to the peacefulness of his disposition and his reign. 2. Shiloh, place of tranquility, is the town in central Palestine where the tabernacle was placed immediately after the conquest of Canaan by Joshua (Josh. xviii. 1). 3. Shiloh is not a proper name, nor is it a simple word. It is a compound, composed of the relative pronoun she, the preposition l, and the pronominal suffix of the third person masculine oh. The same form of the suffix occurs twice in the following verse. This phrase has been interpreted as meaning "that which is his," "whose it is," or "his own one." The second of these three meanings would happily correspond to Ezek. xxi. 27, but is not grammatically allowable; and the first regarded as objective, "he shall come to that which is his," is grammatically difficult, for an objective relative clause with indefinite antecedent is preceded by a preposition or the sign of the accusative. This conception of the word as a phrase is old, having been entertained by the translators of the ancient versions, namely, Septuagint, Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan, Syriac, and Jerome.

On the first interpretation and commonly on the third the Messiah is expressly referred to. In the second the reference is to the covenant blessing, which the prophets of a later age discerned to belong in its fullness to Messianic times. Reuben had forfeited his birthright by misconduct (Gen. xlix. 4; xxxv.

22), Simeon and Levi had incurred their father's just censure (xlix. 5-7; xxxiv. 30), and Judah was consequently assigned the place of the firstborn, and became the representative of the tribe and the peculiar possessor of the blessing covenanted to Abraham and his seed (xlix. 8). The promise of victory to the woman's seed (iii. 15), the blessing of God's favor centered in Simeon (ix. 26, 27), the further centralization of the covenant blessing in the family of Abraham (xvii.), belonged henceforth preeminently to Judah, the possessor of the birthright. By him, according to the first and third interpretations, the prerogative shall be held until one who is his, one of his tribe, the man of peace comes, to whom shall be the obedience of the peoples, and in whom the covenant blessing shall be still further centered. This interpretation, with many modifications of detail, according as the scepter is thought of restrictively as the emblem of royalty or is regarded as the symbol of leadership in general, is represented in the text of the English versions. And it is argued that this essentially must be the true interpretation, because the town of Shiloh does not fulfill the historical conditions, for neither is there any reason why Jacob, apart from special revelation, should think of Shiloh as the future place of worship, nor did Judah occupy pre-eminence among the tribes before the tabernacle was pitched in Shiloh, save somewhat in numbers and in being permitted to lead the van, while the people were marching to Canaan, and to pitch their tents in front of the tabernacle. The leadership was at first in the hands of Moses, of the tribe of Levi, which excited the jealousy of the princes of Reuben, and after Moses' death, and until the tabernacle was pitched at Shiloh, the authority was exercised by Joshua, of the tribe of Ephraim.

But it is more natural to regard Shiloh in this passage as the name of the town, for it is such everywhere else, and on this interpretation the words of Jacob are at once intelligible. This view is commonly entertained by those who deny that Jacob uttered the words, and who affirm that the address is a prophecy after the event. But the address is not the utterance of a late prophet, commenting on the past history of the twelve tribes and putting his reflections in the mouth of their common ancestor Jacob, for the descriptions do not fit the actual state of things at any period of the national history; see, for example, ver. 13 and ZEBULI N. Believers in the genuineness of the address hold that the town of Shiloh is meant, and they are able fairly to explain how Jacob came to use the name, and how Moses the Levite and Joshua the Ephraimite could lead the people while yet the scepter was acknowledged as belonging to Judah. The argument of Delitzsch may be amplified. Shiloh doubtless existed in the days of the patriarchs; and Jacob, who looked for the ultimate return of his people to Canaan (Gen xv. 13-16; xvi. 3, 4; xlviii. 21), employs this name, place of tranquillity, as an omen of the future, playing upon it as Esau played upon the name Jacob and Micah upon the names of the towns of Judah. It made no difference that God raised up men from other tribes to meet special emergencies, the birthright and its accompanying privileges belonged to Judah. It was accorded to him by the position assigned him at the head of the marching host and in camp in front of the tabernacle. It was accredited to him by God's multiplication of his descendants, so that his tribe was much larger than any single tribe during the forty years in the wilderness. It was confirmed by the lot falling first to his tribe when the conquered land was distributed at Gilgal. The actual coming to the town of Shiloh was not contemplated as necessary by Jacob. The fulfillment of his words was more literal than his expectation. He had merely the peaceable possession of the promised land in view. The erection of the tabernacle at Shiloh, a town which Joshua may have been led to choose by having knowledge of Jacob's words, marked the first stage in the realization of the promise. A new period had been reached in Israel's history. The conquest was completed, the inheritance was theirs, possession had begun, rest had been won. Judah, the possessor of the birthright, had come to a place of tranquillity in Canaan, having obtained the obedience of the peoples, and being now ready to occupy and enjoy his conquered possession (xix. 10-12). The words do not mean that when he should come to Shiloh the scepter should depart. They are to be understood as the similar language in Is xlii. 4: "He shall not fail nor be discouraged, till he have set judgment in the earth." This does not mean that the servant will then fail and lose courage. So Jacob meant that the privilege conferred by the birthright, which centered in the Abrahamic covenant, should not be transferred until Judah had obtained the promised blessing, the possession of Canaan, when he would enter upon its enjoyment. A new period opens to him. He was still accorded by God the first position among the tribes, being called to go up first against the Canaanites still in the allotted land. He was called to go up first against the Benjamites in the war against that tribe to punish national sin. And the first and only deliverer of all Israel during the period of the judges proper sprang from Judah (Judg. iii. 7-11). Saul, a Benjamite, was raised up like the judges to deliver Israel (1 Sam. ix. 16; x. 6), and might have retained the throne in his family (xiii. 13, 14; xv. 23, 26, 28), but he lost the opportunity through sin, as Reuben had lost the birthright, and the permanent royal line was taken from Judah. The obedience of the Canaanites was but the foretaste, and the possession of the land and enjoyment of its fertility were but a type, of the Messianic triumphs and peace involved in the covenanted mercies. As time went on, the fullness of meaning was revealed. The prophets dwelt with delight on the truth that in the latter days all nations shall flow unto the mountain of the Lord's house, the law shall go forth from Zion and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem, and he shall judge between the nations and reprove many peoples; and they shall beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks, nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. But they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree, and none shall make them afraid; for the mouth of the Lord of hosts hath spoken it (Is. ii. 2-4; Mic. iv. 1-5; Joel iii. 9-21).

Shi-lo'ni [a Shilonite].

According to the A V., a man of the tribe of Judah (Neh. xi. 5). But the word is preceded by the definite article in the Hebrew text, and hence is not a proper name. The R V. correctly translates it the Shilonite, and Shiloni, as a man, disappears. See SHILONITE 2.

Shi'lo-nite.

1 A native or inhabitant of Shiloh (1 Kin. xi. 29).

2 A member of the tribal family of Shelah (Neh. xi. 5, in A V. Shiloni).

Shil'shah [triad].

An Asherite, son of Zophah (1 Chron. vii. 37).

Shim'e-a, once Shimeah (2 Sam. xiii. 3): the two modes of spelling correctly representing the Hebrew text, where, except in the case noted, the Aramaic form is employed [something heard, fame].

1 A Levite, family of Merari, house of Mahl (1 Chron. vi. 30).

2 A Levite, family of Gershon (1 Chron. vi. 39, 44).

3 A brother of king David (2 Sam. xiii. 3; 1 Chron. xx. 7). In A. V. of 1 Chron. ii. 13 he is incorrectly called Shimma, the Hebrew having Shimea. In 1 Sam. xvi. 9; xvii. 13 his name appears as Shammah. Has one letter dropped out of the Hebrew text, or is Shimea, the later and nobler name, changed from "desolation" to "fame" after the nation's deliverance from the Philistines? Especially is this latter conjecture probable, if Shammah was a memorial name, like Ichabod.

4 A son of David; see SHAMMUA 2.

5. Another Shimeah, whose name in Hebrew is spelled differently from the foregoing (1 Chron. viii. 32); see SHIMEAM.

Shim'e-am.

A Benjamite, a son of Mikloth, resident in Jerusalem (1 Chron. ix. 38). In viii. 32 he is called Shimeah, a synonymous name. This name differs in its third radicle from the familiar name Shimea or Shimeah.

Shim'e-ath [rumor].

An Ammonitess, mother of one of king Joash's assassins (2 Kin. xii 21).

Shim'e-ath-ites.

A Kenite family of scribes, descended through a certain Shimeah from the founder of the house of Rechab and resident at Jabez (1 Chron. ii 55).

Shim'e-i, in A. V. once Shimi (Ex. vi 17), once Shimhi (1 Chron. viii 21) [famous].

1. A son of Gershon, and a grandson of Levi. He founded a subdivision of the tribal family of Gershon (Ex. vi 17, Num. iii. 18, 21; 1 Chron. xxiii 7, 10; Zech. xii 13).

2. A Levite, family of Merari, house of Mahli (1 Chron. vi. 29).

3. A Simeonite, probably of the family of Shaul. He had sixteen sons and six daughters (1 Chron. iv 24-27).

4. A Levite, son of Jahath, of the family of Gershom (1 Chron. vi. 42).

5. A Benjamite, head of a father's house in Aijalon (1 Chron. viii 21, in A. V. Shimhi). Called Shema in ver. 13.

6. A Levite, family of Gershon, and head of one of the subdivisions of Ladan, which latter was apparently a division of the house of Libni (1 Chron. xxiii 9).

7. A Levite, head of the tenth course of singers in David's reign, and evidently a son of Jeduthun, for his name is needed to make out the six spoken of in ver. 3 (1 Chron. xxv. 17).

8. A Ramathite, who was over David's vineyards (1 Chron. xxvii. 27).

9. A Benjamite, the son of Gera. He was of Saul's family, which had lost the throne. When he saw David, with his attendants, descending the eastern slope of the mount of Olives, while Absalom was in possession of Jerusalem, he thought it safe to insult the fallen potentate, which he did in gross language. He was forgiven by David, but was afterwards put to death by Solomon for disobeying a command of the king (1 Kin. ii. 44-46).

10. An adherent of David and Solomon during Adonijah's usurpation (1 Kin. i. 8). He was probably the son of Elah, who became Solomon's purveyor in the territory of Benjamin (iv. 18).

11. A Reubenite (1 Chron. v. 4).

12. A Levite, a son of Heman, who helped to purify the temple in Hezekiah's reign (2 Chron. xxix. 14-16). He may be identical with the following.

13. A Levite, brother of Conaniah, in Hezekiah's reign. He was one of those who looked after the tithes (2 Chron. xxxi. 12).

14. A Benjamite, son of Kish and an ancestor of Mordecai (Esth. ii. 5).

15. A man belonging to the royal family of Judah, and a brother of Zerubbabel (1 Chron. iii. 19).

16, 17, 18. Three men, one a Levite, one a son of Hashum, and one a son of Bani, each of whom was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 23, 33, 38).

Shim'e-ites. See SHIMEI 1.

Shim'e-on [a hearkening, an answering (of prayer)].

A son of Harim, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 31).

Shim'hi. See SHIMEI 5.

Shim'i. See SHIMEI 1.

Shim'ma. See SHIMEA 3.

Shi'mon.

A man who had his registry with the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 20).

Shim'rath [watching, guarding].

A Benjamite, son of Shimei of Aijalon (1 Chron. viii. 21).

Shim'ri, in A. V. once Simri (1 Chron. xxvi 10) [watchful].

1. A Simeonite, son of Shemaiah (1 Chron. iv. 37).

2. Father of one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi. 45).

3. A Merarite Levite, a son of Hosah (1 Chron. xxvi 10).

4. A Levite, who lived in the reign of Hezekiah. He was a son of Elizaphan of the family of Kohath, house of Uzziel (2 Chron. xxix 13).

Shim'rith [vigilant].

A Moabitess, mother of one of king Joash's assassins (2 Chron. xxiv. 26). Called in 2 Kin. xii 21 Shomer.

Shim'ron, in A. V. once Shimrom (1 Chron. vii 1), an error not in the original edition of 1611 [watching, a guard].

1. A son of Issachar, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. xlii 13; Num. xxvi. 24).

2. A border town of Zebulun (Josh. xi 1; xix. 15). Not identified. Semûnieh, 5 miles west of Nazareth, has been conjectured among other places.

Shim-ron-me'ron.

A Canaanite town, whose king was vanquished and slain by Joshua (Josh. xii. 20). Probably the full name of Shimron.

Shim'shai [sunny].

A scribe, one of those who complained to Artaxerxes Longimanus that the Jews were rebuilding the temple (Ezra iv. 8).

Shin.

The twenty-first letter of the Hebrew alphabet. English S comes from the same source, and with sh represents it in Anglicized Hebrew names; as in Simeon, Shimea, Ishmael. It heads the twenty-first section of Ps. cxix., in which section each verse of the original begins with this letter.

Shi'nab.

The king of Admah, who was defeated by Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiv. 2, 8, 10).

Shi'nar.

A country in which the cities of Babel, Erech, Accad, and Calneh were situated (Gen. x 10; xi. 2; Dan. i. 2). Hence, in Hebrew usage, Shinar comprehended the alluvial plain of Babylonia. The same region, perhaps, was known to Semites of Mesopotamia as Shanhar, as appears from an inscription of Tell el-Amarna. In the days of Abraham, Amraphel was king of the whole or a large part of it (Gen. xiv 1, 9). Some of the Jews were to be carried thither as captives (Is. xi. 11; Zech. v. 11).

Shi'on, in A. V. Shithon [destruction, ruin]

A town of Issachar (Josh. xiv 19). The site is perhaps at 'Ayûn esh-Sha'in, 3 miles west-northwest of mount Tabor.

Ship.

Little boats were used by dwellers on the upper Euphrates for descending the river to Babylon (Herod. i 194). They were circular in form. The ribs were made of willow, over which hides were stretched as a covering. They were steered by two men who stood upright, each with a spar which they thrust alternately. The largest vessels carried 5000 talents. On the Nile boats built of acacia wood were used (ii. 96).

Boats were doubtless used on the sea of Galilee in O. T. times, but they are not mentioned. In the Roman period the sea was alive with small fishing vessels (Luke v 2; John vi. 22, 23; War. ii 21, 8, iii. 10, 9, Life 33). They were propelled by oars, but some, at least, had both oars and sails (Mark i 38 with Luke viii 23), they carried an anchor and a pilot (Life 33).

The Israelites were not a seafaring people, although shipbuilding was far advanced among the Egyptians and doubtless among the Phœnicians before the exodus, and the Hebrews had the spectacle of ships on the Mediterranean before their eyes during the whole period of their national history. Solomon conducted commercial enterprises, and Jehoshaphat attempted to imitate him; but these were transient efforts and were more or less dependent upon Phœnician sailors. The rafts of cedar and fir destined for Solomon's temple were floated to Joppa by Tyrians (1 Kin. v 9, 2 Chron. ii 16), and the timber for the second temple was likewise brought by sea to Joppa by Phœnicians (Ezra iii 7). The crew of the vessel in which Jonah sailed from Joppa was also composed of foreigners (Jonah i. 5). In the Roman period, piratical expeditions by Jews are reported (Antiq. xiv 3, 2; War. iii 9, 2 and 3).

Both merchant vessels and war ships were used on the Mediterranean (Num. xxiv. 24; Dan. xi. 30; Jonah i. 3; 1 Mac. xi. 1). In war, vessels were employed for transporting troops (xv. 3, 4; 2 Mac. xiv. 1) and for fighting at sea (1 Mac. viii 23, 32; Antiq. ix. 14, 2; cp. War. iii. 10, 1). Some of these sea-going vessels were propelled by sails alone; others by both sails and oars. A gallant merchantman of Tyre was built of planks and calked (Ezek. xxvii 5, 9); had masts, linen sails, and tackling (7; Is. xxxiii 23), benches of boxwood, and oaken oars (Ezek. xxvii 6, R. V). It was manned by sailors and guided by a pilot (8, 27). When luxuriously furnished, the sails were embroidered and a rich awning was spread (7). Such vessels made the voyage to Tarshish (Jonah i. 3, 5, 6, 13), and even navigated the Atlantic Ocean from Spain to England; see TIN. The ship of Alexandria, in which Paul was conveyed from Myra to Malta, was large enough to accommodate a crew and passengers numbering 276 persons, besides a cargo of wheat (Acts xxvii 37, 38). The vessel in which Josephus was wrecked had 600 persons on board (Life 3). The Alexandrian wheatship, described by Lucian as driven into the port of Athens by rough weather, was 120 cubits, or 180 feet, in length, doubtless including the projection at each end, and 45 feet in breadth. Its size attracted attention. Its measurement is supposed to have been about 1200 or 1300 tons. The exceptionally large war galley of Ptolemy Philopator measured, according to Athenæus, 420 feet in length and 57 feet in breadth. Paul's ship was in charge of a master and the owner (Acts xxvii. 11), and was managed by a crew (30). It was built of planks (44), carried a foresail, which could be raised and lowered (40, R. V.), and by implication a foremast and a mainmast, and was steered by rudders, doubtless two (40). Four anchors were stowed at the stern and several forward (29, 30), and a small boat was towed behind, which could be raised by ropes to the deck or davits (16, 17, 30, 32). Soundings were taken (28). It was customary for ships to have an eye painted or carved on each side of the stem. Paul's vessel was unable to face the gale, literally to keep the eye to the wind (15).

A Ship of Paul's Time
Dehneated at Pompeii.

A ship of Paul's time, depicted at Pompeii, shows a foremast inclined like a bowsprit, but intended to carry a square sail, and one large mast with one square sail fitted to a yard of great length. The yard was composed of two spars spliced together, and was placed with its center against the mast. The sail was strengthened by ropes sewed across it vertically and horizontally; and if torn, the rent was confined to the square in which it occurred. The sail was furled by being drawn up to the yard. The deck was protected by a rail. The stern post, and in many vessels the stem post also, rose in a curve. It was customary, as in this ship, for the stern post at least to terminate in the head of a water fowl. The sign of the ship (Acts xxviii. 11) was painted or carved on each side of the prow. The vessel was steered by two broad oars or paddles, one on each quarter and acting through a port hole. The anchors were similar to those in modern use, except that they had no flukes. To prevent the starting of the planks in a storm, cables or chains, called helps or undergirders (xxvii 17), were passed around the vessel at right angles to its length and made tight.

Shi'phi [abounding, abundant]

A Simeonite, son of Allon (1 Chron iv 37).

Shiph'mite.

A native or inhabitant of probably Siphmoth (1 Chron. xxvii. 27)

Shiph'rah [splendor, beauty].

One of the Hebrew midwives in Egypt who declined to kill the male babes (Ex. 1. 15).

Shiph'tan [judicial]

An Ephraimite, father of Kemuel (Num. xxxiv 24).

Shi'sha. See SHAVSHA.

Shi'shak. See PHARAOH 3.

Shit'rai.

A Sharonite, who looked after David's herds on the plain of Sharon (1 Chron. xxvii. 29).

Shit'tah Tree and Shittim Wood.

A tree (Is. xli. 19). The R. V. renders the word by acacia tree or wood. It grew in the Jordan valley, from the sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea (see BETH-SHITTAH and SHITTIM) It was plentiful in the wilderness of Sinai, and its timber was largely used in the tabernacle, for the woodwork of the ark, the altars and their staves, the table, the boards, bars, and pillars (Ex xxv. 5, 10, 13, 23; xxvi 15, 26, 32; xxvii. 1, 6; xxx 1, 5). The wood was used in Egypt in boat building (Herod. ii. 96), and Josephus speaks of its strength and durability (Antiq. iii 6, 5). The Arabic name sant is the same word as the Hebrew shittah, and denotes the acacia. There are several species Acacia seyal and tortilis are found in the valleys about the Dead Sea and southward, and Acacia nilotica grows in the southern part of the peninsula of Sinai and in Egypt. Other species are found in various parts of Palestine. The genuine acacias are generally small trees, growing from 15 to 25 feet high, thorny, with bipinnate leaves, and pods with several seeds. The wood is hard and close-grained. Certain species yield the gum Arabic of commerce

Shittah (Acacia seyal)

Shit'tim [acacias].

1 An important encampment of the Israelites in the plains of Moab, east of Jordan, opposite Jericho (Num xxii 1 with xxv 1). The camp had been removed from Pisgah on the mountains of Abarim and pitched at Shittim after the conquest of Sihon and Og (xxi 20; xxii. 1; xxxiii 47, 48). It was located on a table-land, the topmost of the three terraces which at this point form the valley of the Jordan, and among the long groves of acacia trees. It extended from Beth-jeshimoth even unto Abel-shittim (xxxiii. 49, cp xxvii 28), a distance of 3 miles and more. It was arranged in an orderly manner, the Israelites dwelling according to their tribes (xxiv. 2, 5, 6); see CAMP. The sojourn at Shittim was eventful. While the Israelites were encamped there, Balaam attempted to curse them (xxii-xxiv), the people committed sin with the daughters of Moab and Midian at Baal-peor, and were plagued in consequence (xxv.), the second census was taken (xxvi.), occasion arose for enacting laws regarding the inheritance of daughters (xxvii. 1-11), Joshua was publicly proclaimed the successor to Moses (12-23), daily offerings and vows were further regulated (xxviii.-xxx.), war was waged with the five Midianite tribes of the neighborhood on account of the deliberate attempt which they had recently made to seduce the Israelites into licentious idolatry at Baal-peor (xxx1), Reuben and Gad, at their own request, received inheritance east of the Jordan (xxxii), an itinerary of the journey from Egypt to the Jordan was drawn up by Moses (xxxiii). Measures were also taken for the occupation of Canaan. in view of recent events, the expulsion of the Canaanites and the destruction of their altars and idols were urgently commanded anew, the boundaries of the land were defined, and a commission was appointed to superintend the allotment of territory to the tribes, and it was ordered that cities be assigned to the Levites, and that six cities of refuge be designated for the unintentional murderer (xxxiii 50-xxxv). The matter of the inheritance of daughters was further regulated (xxxvi). Then Moses delivered his farewell address (see DEUTERONOMY), Joshua received a solemn charge, and Moses ascended Nebo and died. After the death of Moses, Joshua sent forth two spies from Shittim to examine and report on the defenses of Jericho (Josh ii). Then camp was broken at Shittim, and the people crossed the Jordan (iii).

2 A valley, dry and comparatively unfruitful, where only the acacia or shittah tree grows (Joel ii 18). If a particular valley is in the prophet's mind, it is the Arabah about the Dead Sea (cp Ezek xlvii. 1-12). The prophet names it from the encampment of the Israelites at Shittim, and he selects it as a type because the waters of its sea were practically lifeless, and its southern portion consisted of barren rocks and cliffs of salt. After Jehovah has judged all nations, the kingdom of God shall flourish and the kingdoms of the world become waste (Joel ii 9-21). The mountains of Judah shall drop down new wine, its hills flow with milk, its wadies be brooks of water, and from the house of the Lord shall go forth waters that shall make glad the valley of acacias. In other words, the desert shall blossom as the rose, spiritual life shall proceed from the Lord God and shall supply the needs of his kingdom (cp. Rev. xxi 1, 2).

Shi'za [vehement love]

A Reubenite, father of one of David's heroes (1 Chron. xi. 42).

Sho'a.

A country and its inhabitants, mentioned in connection with the Babylonians, Chaldeans, and Assyrians (Ezek. xxiii 23); and doubtless the Shutu who are mentioned by the Babylonians and Assyrians as occupying a hilly country with steppes, adjacent to Babylonia on the northeast, and between the Tigris river and the mountains of Elam and Media (Delitzsch, Paradies, 334).

Sho'bab [restored, rescued].

1. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Caleb. His mother was Azubah (1 Chron. ii. 18).

2 A son of David, born to him at Jerusalem (2 Sam v. 14).

Sho'bach [one who pours out].

Commander-in-chief under Hadarezer, king of Zobah (2 Sam x. 16). Called in 1 Chron. xix 16, 18, Shophach. The difference is doubtless due to a scribe's confusion of beth and pe, but even so the names are strictly synonymous.

Sho'bai [one who leads captive]

A Levite, founder of a family of doorkeepers, members of which returned with Zerubabel from captivity (Ezra ii 42)

Sho'bal [flowing, a stream, a twig, a traveler]

1 A tribe of Horites (Gen xxxvi. 20), consisting of several families (23), and ruled by a chieftain (29)

2 A son of Hur, a man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Caleb. He was ancestor of the inhabitants of Kirjath-jearim (1 Chron ii 50: iv 1, 2, 4)

Sho'bek [one who forsakes]

One of the Jewish chiefs who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant (Neh x 24).

Sho'bi [one who leads captive]

Son of a resident in Rabbah of the Ammonites named Nahash (2 Sam xvii 27) Shobi brought food and other necessities to David at Mahanaim

Sho'cho, Shochob, Shoco. See Soco

Shoe.

Hebrew shoes were, as a rule, simply sandals affixed to the foot by straps known as latchets; see CLOTHING. Shoes were not worn in the sitting room or at the table (cp. Luke vii 38); and in well-appointed houses a servant stood ready to unloose the latchet and remove the shoe of the guest (cp. Mark i. 7). Shoes were also removed when one was about to tread holy ground (Ex. iii. 5; Josh. v. 15); and the absence of shoes in the description of the priest's garments is supposed to indicate that the priests performed their duties in the temple barefoot. To be without shoes and stript of superfluous raiment might betoken the captive's plight (Is. xx. 2), and was a customary sign of mourning (2 Sam. xv. 30); while to wear shoes in time of sorrow, and attire the head, was a concealment of grief (Ezek. xxiv. 17, 23). In the olden time in Israel, in matters of redemption and exchange, a man drew off his shoe and gave it to him with whom he had concluded the agreement, as confirmation of the transaction (Ruth iv. 7, 8); and the shoe of the man who refused to take his deceased brother's wife was loosed, with other insult (Deut. xxv. 9, 10). To cast the shoe upon a place symbolized the act of taking possession or, possibly, of treating it as a slave upon whom as a task the master flings his shoes in order that they may be carried or cleaned (Ps. lx. 8).

Sandals

Sho'ham [a beryl or onyx].

A Levite, son of Jaaziah (1 Chron. xxiv. 27).

Sho'mer [keeper, watchman].

1. An Asherite, son of Heber (1 Chron. vii. 32). See SHEMER.

2. A Moabitess, mother of one of king Joash's assassins (2 Kin. xii. 21). See SHIM-RITH.

Sho'phach. See SHOBACH.

Sho'phan. See ATROTH-SHOPHAN.

Sho-shan'nim [lilies].

A word occurring in the titles of Psalms xlv and lxix. Three opinions exist as to its meaning: symbolical of the contents of the psalm, a musical instrument resembling a lily, a familiar melody. It doubtless indicates a popular air. This appears from the combinations Shoshannim Eduth, "Lilies a testimony" (Ps. lxxx. title), and Shushan Eduth, "Lily a testimony" (Ps. lx. title).

Show'bread.

Literally "bread of the presence." It consisted of twelve loaves of bread, laid in two rows and displayed on a table in the holy place before the Lord continually. The bread was changed every Sabbath, and the old loaves were eaten by the priests in the holy place (Ex. xxv. 30; Lev. xxiv. 5-9; 1 Sam. xxi. 6; Mat. xii. 4). The bread was also known as the continual bread (Num. iv. 7, where the name showbread is also used); and continual pile or arrangement (2 Chron. ii. 4, translated showbread) or the bread of the pile or arrangement (1 Chron. ix. 32, translated showbread), because arranged in rows or columns (Lev. xxiv. 6). Josephus says the bread was unleavened (Antiq. iii. 6, 6). Each loaf contained two-tenths of an ephah of fine flour, such as was used for honored guests and for the king's table (Gen. xviii. 6; 1 Kin. iv. 22), and was employed in various offerings (Lev. ii. 1; v. 11; etc.). The twelve loaves represented the twelve tribes of Israel (Lev. xxiv. 7 with Ex. xxviii. 10-12; also Ex. xxiv. 4; xxviii. 21). These twelve loaves set in the presence of Jehovah probably signified the constant communion of his people with him in those things which his bounty provided and they enjoyed in his presence and used in his service. The Kohathites had charge of the showbread (1 Chron. ix. 32).

The table of showbread was made of acacia wood overlaid with gold. It was bordered by a golden crown, and had a ring at each corner for the rods by which it was carried. It measured 2 cubits long, 1 broad, and 1½ high (Ex. xxv. 23-29; for its transportation, see Num. iv. 7, 8). It stood in the holy place, by the northern wall, that is, to the right of one entering the tabernacle (Ex. xl. 22). In Solomon's temple there were ten tables for showbread, corresponding to the ten candlesticks, although like the candlesticks apparently only one was in use at a time (1 Chron. xxviii. 16; 2 Chron. iv. 8, 19; xiii. 11; Antiq. viii. 3, 7); hence only one is mentioned in 1 Kin. vii. 48; 2 Chron. xxix. 18. The table which belonged to the second temple was carried off by Antiochus Euphanes, but a new one was provided by Judas Maccabæus (1 Mac. i. 22; iv. 49). Titus carried it to Rome (War vii. 5, 5).

Shu'a, in A. V. twice Shuah (Gen. xxxviii. 2, 12) [wealth].

1. A Canaanite, whose daughter became Judah's wife or concubine, and the mother of his sons, Er, Onan, and Shelah (Gen. xxxviii. 2, 12; 1 Chron. ii. 3).

2. An Asherite, a daughter of Heber (1 Chron. vii. 32).

Shu'ah [depression].

A son of Abraham, by Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2), that is, an Arab tribe descended from them, doubtless the Shuhites who dwelt near the land of Uz (Job ii. 11). Their land is plausibly identified with a district of the same name, in Assyrian Suhu, on the west of the Euphrates, near the mouth of the Belich and Khabour.

For others whose name is rendered Shuah in A. V., see SHUA and SHUHAH.

Shu'al [a fox or jackal].

1. An Asherite, son of Zophah (1 Chron. vii. 36).

2. A district near Ophrah, to the north of Michmash (1 Sam. xiii. 17). Exact situation unknown.

Shu'ba-el. See SHEBUEL.

Shu'hah, in A. V. Shuah [depression, a small pit].

A man of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 11).

Shu'ham [depression or, perhaps, a pit-man].

The son of Dan, and founder of the tribal family (Num. xxvi. 42). Called in Gen. xlv. 23 Hushim.

Shu'hite. See SHUAH.

Showbread Table of Herod's Temple
From the Arch of Titus

Shu'lam-mite, in A V Shulammite.

A young woman mentioned in the Song of Solomon (vi 13). In all probability the name is derived from that of the town of Shunem. The Septuagint translates it by Sounamitis, i. e. Shunammite, and the town of Shunem was known in the time of Eusebius as Shulem, and to-day bears the name Sôlam. The form Shulammite may have been preferred to Shunammite because of its assonance with Solomon, in Hebrew Sh'lomoh.

Shu'math-ites [from shumah, garlic]

One of the leading families in Kirjath-jearim (1 Chron ii. 53).

Shu'nam-mite.

A native or inhabitant of Shunem. Abishag was one (1 Kin i 3, 15). So was the woman whose son Elisha raised from the dead (cp 2 Kin. iv. 8)

Shu'nem [possibly, two resting places].

A town of Issachar (Josh xix. 18), opposite mount Gilboa (1 Sam. xxviii. 4). The Philistines encamped there before the battle with Saul. The site is at Sôlam, on the western slope of a hill $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles north by east of Jezreel, 5 north of the western end of mount Gilboa, and about 16 miles from Carmel, whither the Shunammite woman went to find Elisha (2 Kin. iv 25).

Shu'ni [possibly, calm, quiet].

A son of Gad, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. xlii. 16; Num. xxvi. 15).

Shu'pham. See SHEPHUPHAM.

Shup'pim.

1. A Benjaminite (1 Chron. vii 12, 15); see SHEPHUPHAM.

2. A Levite, who served as a doorkeeper at the sanctuary (1 Chron xxvi 16). The Hebrew text is doubtless corrupt. Perhaps the name crept in from the preceding verse, which ends with a word very like Shuppim.

Shur [wall, fortification]

1. A locality in the wilderness, south of Palestine, or more exactly south of Beer-lahai-roi, and east of Egypt (Gen xvi 7; xxv 18). It has not been identified, but was doubtless connected with the frontier fortresses of Egypt. It gave name to the wilderness through which the Israelites marched for three days immediately after crossing the Red Sea (Ex. xv. 22). This waste was also sometimes called the wilderness of Etham (Num xxxiii. 8).

Shu'shan [to the Hebrews the name would suggest lily].

A city and royal residence in the Persian empire (Neh i 1. Esth. i. 2), in the province of Elam, on the river Ulai (Dan. viii. 2). It was also a royal treasure city (Herod. v. 49). The place referred to in these passages is Susa. Ashurbanipal captured the city about 660 B. C., and later it became subject to the Babylonian kings. The royal family to which Cyrus, who conquered Babylon, belonged ruled over Ansan, which appears to have been a district of eastern Elam. When Cyrus, by his military achievements, established the Persian empire, Susa was elevated to the rank of a capital of the empire, sharing this distinction with Ecbatana and Babylon. When Alexander the Great entered Susa, in 331 B. C., it had in it immense treasures, of which he took possession. In 315 B. C. it was captured and plundered anew by Antigonus. After this it began to decline, but was still defensible when the Saracens conquered Persia. The site of the city is at Sus, in latitude 32° 10' north, longitude 48° 26' east, between the river Eulæus (the Roman name for Daniel's Ulai) and the Shahpur, and about 100 miles from the Persian Gulf. The chief ruins are found within an area of about 6000 feet long by 4500 broad, the circumference being about 3 miles, but if scattered remains be taken in, the 3 miles may become 6 or 7. They consist of a series of mounds, in one of which the explorers laid bare the ruins of a palace, doubtless that begun by Darius, and in which Xerxes held his court. It seems to have been there that Esther's Ahasuerus held his feasts and his banquets (Esth. i. 2, 3, 9, 11, 18, etc.).

Shu'shan-chites, in A. V. Susanchites [from Elamite Susnak, Susian].

Natives or inhabitants of the Persian Susa, the Shushan of the O. T. Shushanchites were brought, with others, to central Palestine to supply the place of the ten tribes carried into captivity (Ezra iv. 9).

Shu'shan E'duth. See SHOSHANNIM

Shu'the-lah.

1. A son of Ephraim, and founder of a tribal family (Num. xxvi. 35, 36; 1 Chron. vii. 20).

2. Another descendant of Ephraim in the same line (1 Chron. vii. 21)

Si'a-ha and Sia [assembly].

A family of Zerubim, members of which returned with Nehemiah from the captivity (Ezra ii. 44; Neh. vii. 47).

Sib'be-cai, in A. V. twice Sibbechai (2 Sam. xxi. 18; 1 Chron. xx. 4) [perhaps, entangling].

A Hushathite, one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi. 29). He won renown by slaying the Philistine Saph, one of the sons of the giant (2 Sam. xxi. 18). He commanded the division of the army for the eighth month (1 Chron. xxvii. 11). He is called in 2 Sam. xliii. 27 Mebunnai (q. v.).

Sib'bo-leth. See SHIBBOLETH.

Sib'mah, in A. V. once Shibmah (Num. xxxii. 38) [coolness].

A town assigned to Reuben (Num. xxxii. 38; Josh. xiii. 19), but which afterwards reverted to Moab. It was celebrated for its vines (Is. xvi. 8, 9; Jer. xlviii. 32). The masculine form of the name is Sebam (Num.

xxxii. 3; in A. V. Shebam). According to Jerome, it was situated scarcely half a mile from Heshbon. Not identified. Conder suggests Sûmia, 3 miles west by north of Heshbon.

Sib'ra-im [perhaps, hope].

An unidentified place on Ezekiel's northern boundary of Canaan (Ezek. xlvii. 16).

Sic'cuth.

A word occurring in Amos v. 26, E. R. V.; but in A. R. V. and A. V. translated tabernacle (cp. the word Succoth). Regarded as a proper name, it corresponds to Sakkut, a designation given by the Babylonians to the planet Saturn. Another designation which they had for the planet was Kaiman, or in modified pronunciation Kaiwanu (cp. Chuin, Amos v. 26, A. V. and E. R. V.).

Si'chem. See SHECHEM

Si'cy-on

A Dorian town in the Peloponnesus (Herod. viii. 43), on the gulf of Corinth, 10 miles northwest of the city of Corinth. The old town at the harbor was abandoned in 303 B. C., and the populace removed to the new town, about 2 miles inland, which occupied a strong natural position. The city became a member of the Achaean league in 251 B. C. Half a century later it began to show friendliness to the Romans, and continued to do so during the fifty years that followed; and in 146 B. C., on the destruction of Corinth by the Roman general, Mummius, it was rewarded with a large portion of the conquered territory and with the management of the Isthmian games. It held this distinction for a century, until Corinth was founded again and made a Roman colony. The Roman senate addressed the letter to Sicyon mentioned in 1 Mac. xv. 23, about 139 B. C.

Sid'dim [plains].

A valley, full of bitumen pits, in the region of the Salt or Dead Sea. There Chedorlaomer defeated the king of Sodom and his allies (Gen. xiv. 3, 8, 10).

Sid'e.

A maritime town of eastern Pamphylia in Asia Minor. It maintained close commercial relations with Aradus in Phœnicia, gave the title Sidetes to Antiochus VII., who was brought up in the town, and was one of the places to which the Roman senate sent letters in favor of the Jews (1 Mac. xv. 23).

Sid'on and Zidon; in A. V. usually, in R. V. always, Zidon in O. T.; in A. V. and R. V. always Sidon in N. T. [a fishery].

An ancient city of the Canaanites (Gen. x. 15), on the seacoast, 22 miles north of Tyre. It was subject to Egypt in the 15th century B. C. Its importance is attested by Homer, who often mentions Sidon, but never Tyre, and who uses Sidon and Sidonian as synonymous with Phœnicia and Phœnician. It was the northern limit of the Canaanites, in the narrow sense (Gen. x. 19). Its territory was near Zebulun (xlix. 13) and the boundary of Asher reached it (Josh. xix. 28, where and in xi 8 it is called Great Zidon). The tribe of Asher, however, failed to expel the Canaanite inhabitants (Judg i 31). In the period of the judges the Zidonians oppressed the Israelites (x. 12), and the latter people are accused of worshipping the gods of Zidon (6). Of these gods, Baal, symbolizing the sun, was doubtless the chief (1 Kin xvi 31); the principal object of worship, however, was Ashtoreth, a goddess of fertility (xi 5, 33; 2 Kin xxiii 13). Ethbaal, a king of Zidon, was the father of Jezebel (1 Kin xvi. 31). Isaiah predicted that it would be visited with judgment which would make its inhabitants pass to Kittim, that is, Cyprus (Is xxiii. 12). It was for a time subject to the neighboring

B. C it opened its gates to Alexander the Great. From his successors it passed, in 64 B C, to the Romans. People from Sidon came to Galilee to attend on the preaching of Jesus and witness his miracles (Mark iii. 8; Luke vi 17, etc.). He once visited the region, and probably the city (Mat. xv 21; Mark vii 24, 31). Herod Agrippa II. was highly displeased with the people of Tyre and Sidon, but they made peace with him "because their country was fed from the king's country" (Acts xii 20). Paul touched at the port (xxvii 3). Since N. T. times Sidon has seen many vicissitudes. The modern city, called Saida, lies on the northwestern slope of a small promontory jutting out into the sea. The ancient harbor was formed by a ridge of rocks parallel to the shore. It city of Tyre (Antiq ix 14, 2). In 701 B C, it submitted to Sennacherib, king of Assyria. In 678 B C it was destroyed by Esarhaddon. Jeremiah predicted its subjugation by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon (Jer. xxvii 3, 6). Ezekiel denounced judgment against it because it had been "a pricking brier to the house of Israel" (Ezek. xxviii 21, 22). Joel charges the Zidonians and others with having helped to plunder Jerusalem, carrying off silver and gold, and selling its inhabitants for slaves (Joel iii. 4-6). About 526 B. C Zidon submitted to Cambyzes, son of Cyrus, king of Persia. The Zidonians sold cedar timber to the Jews for the temple which Zerubbabel was building (Ezra iii. 7). It revolted against Artaxerxes Ochus, king of Persia, in 351 B. C., but was retaken and destroyed. To get rid of the Persians, in 333 was partly filled up with stones and earth by Fakhr ed-Din, the ruler of the Druses, in the seventeenth century. There is a wall protecting the land side of the city. The highest ground, which is crowned by the citadel, is on the southern side. The city is enveloped in gardens and orchards, but has not much commerce; that having been largely diverted from it to Beirut. Its population has been estimated at 5000 to 10,000. It has in and around it a few broken granite columns; and various sarcophagi, including the celebrated one of Esmunazar, were brought from tombs in its vicinity.

Si'hon [sweeping out, a brush].

A king of the Amorites, whose capital was Heshbon. He drove the Moabites from the country between Heshbon and the Arnon and took possession of it (Num xxi 26-30). Five Midianite tribes were his vassals (Josh. xiii. 21). When the Israelites arrived in the wilderness on the southeast of the Arnon, Moses sent messengers to him to ask permission to cross his territory (Num. xxi. 21, 22; Deut. ii. 26). He refused. Thereupon the Israelites entered his domains under the necessity of fighting their way to the Jordan. Sihon gathered his army together at Jahaz and opposed the invaders, but he was defeated and his kingdom was taken possession of by the Israelites (Num xxi. 21-32; Ps cxxxv. 11). The country thus seized was included between the Jordan, the Jabbok, and the Arnon (Num. xxi. 24, 32; Deut ii 36; Judg. xi. 22). The camp of Israel was pitched at Pisgah, a secure position on the mountains of Abarim, nearly in the center of the conquered district, preparatory to the campaign against Bashan (Num xxi 20; cp xxii 1; xxxiii. 47). Sihon's kingdom was afterwards assigned to the tribes of Reuben and Gad, who desired it because it afforded good pasturage (Num xxxii 1-4, 33-38).

Si'las, or uncontracted Silvanus [sylvan].

A distinguished member of the apostolic church at Jerusalem. He was sent with Paul to communicate the decision of the council held at that city to the Christians at Antioch (Acts xv 22, 27, 32). When Paul declined to take John Mark with him on the second missionary journey, and parted with Barnabas, he chose Silas as his companion (40), and the two were imprisoned together at Philippi (xvi 19, 25, 29). Silas was with Paul during the riot at Thessalonica (xvii. 4), and was sent away with him to Berea, remaining there with Timothy after the apostle had been obliged to depart (14). The two were, however, soon directed to follow Paul to Athens (15). They started to join him, but do not seem to have come up with him till after his arrival at Corinth (xviii 5). In this city Silas was an esteemed coworker of Paul's (2 Cor. i 19). The same individual who in The Acts is familiarly named Silas is unvaryingly called by his full name Silvanus in the epistles. He was associated with Paul and Timothy in sending the two letters to the Thessalonians (1 Thes. i. 1; 2 Thes. i. 1). He is probably the Silvanus who carried to its destination the First Epistle of Peter (1 Pet. v. 12).

Silk.

A fine, soft thread produced by various species of caterpillars, and a fabric woven from the thread. Silk reached the markets of the west shortly after the conquest of Alexander the Great. It was known to the Greeks as serikon, pertaining to the Sers, a people of India from whom it was obtained. It was a choice article of merchandise (Rev. xviii 12), fit for the clothing of Roman emperors (War vii 5, 4). As late as the reign of the emperor Aurelian, A. D. 270-275, unmixed silk goods were sold for their weight in gold. The fine raiment referred to in Ezek. xvi. 10, 13 by the term mesa was probably silk, as the rabbinical interpreters understood and as it is rendered in the E. V. Ezekiel doubtless saw the stuff in Babylonia. A rich cloth is meant by d'meshek (Amos iii 12), which is commonly regarded as damask (in E. V. rendered silken cushions).

Si'l'a [twig, basket]. The meaning "way, street," assigned by Thenius, is obtained by altering the Hebrew text.

An unknown place near Millo (2 Kin. xii. 20).

Si-lo'ah, an erroneous transliteration of Shelah in A. V. of Neh. iii. 15. See SILOAM.

Si-lo'am [sent; specially, a sending of water through an aqueduct].

A pool at Jerusalem (John ix 7); probably identical with Shiloah, the waters of which go softly (Is. viii. 6), and the pool of Shelah, which was by the king's garden (Neh. iii 15). Josephus says that it was situated at the extremity of the valley of cheesemongers, near a bend of the old wall beneath Ophlas, i. e. Ophel (War v 4, 1 and 2). The name is preserved in the Birket Silwān, which occupies the general site of the ancient pool. It is a rectangular reservoir, 58 feet long, 18 broad, and 19 deep, built of masonry, the western side of which has considerably broken down. The fountain is a small upper basin excavated in the rock. It is really the termination of the tunnel which was cut to conduct the water from the fountain of the Virgin. From the lower reservoir, the water flows in a small rill across the road and irrigates gardens in the Kidron valley.

In 1880 an inscription of six lines was discovered on the walls of this tunnel by a youth who had entered from the Siloam end. It proved to be written in pure Hebrew, and is supposed to date from the time of Ahaz or Hezekiah. A portion of the first three lines has been destroyed by the wearing away of the rock, and occasionally a letter cannot be made out with certainty. Still the sense is plain. It describes how the workmen, who had excavated toward each other from the two ends of the tunnel, met. It is as follows, as nearly as possible. "[Behold] the piercing through! And this was the manner of the piercing through. While yet [the miners were lifting up] the pick one toward another, and while there were yet three cubits to be [cut through, there was heard] the voice of each calling to the other; for there was a fissure (?) in the rock on the right hand. . . . And on the day of the piercing through, the miners smote the one so as to meet the other, pick against pick. And the water flowed from the source to the pool, 1200 cubits; and 100 cubits was the height of the rock over the head of the miners."

The tower in Siloam which fell (Luke xii. 4) was probably one on the Ophel ridge, near Siloam. It was not in the neighboring village of Silwán, for this place dates from the Middle Ages.

Sil'ver.

A precious metal. Its ore was mined from the earth (Job xxvii. 1) and melted in a furnace, by which process the dross was separated from the richer metal (Ps xii. 6, Prov xvi. 3; xxv. 4, Ezek. xxii. 22). It was obtained in Arabia (2 Chron ix. 14; cp. 1 Kin x. 22, 27) and Tarshish (Jer x. 9; Ezek xxvii. 12), Spain being a large producer (1 Mac. viii. 3). It was used as a medium of exchange from remotest antiquity (Gen xxii. 16; xxxvii. 23). The amount required was weighed out (Job xxvii. 15; Is. xli. 6), for silver was not coined until late, among the Jews not until long after the exile (1 Mac. xv. 6), see MONEY. Personal ornaments (Gen xxiv. 53; Ex. iii. 22; Song i. 11), crowns (Zech. vi. 11), musical instruments, as trumpets (Num. x. 2), and household utensils of the wealthy, like Joseph's drinking cup (Gen. xlv. 2) were made of silver. Large quantities of the metal were used in the tabernacle and temple for sockets (Ex. xxvi. 19), hooks, chapters and fillets of the pillars (xxvii. 10; xxxviii. 19), platters and bowls (Num. vii. 13; 1 Chron. xxvii. 17, Ezra i. 9, 10), cups (2 Kin. xii. 13), candlesticks, and tables (1 Chron. xviii. 15, 16). Idols and models of idol shrines were constructed of silver (Ps. cxv. 4; Acts xix. 24).

Sim'e-on, in R. V. of N. T. Symeon, in imitation of a Greek form, when the persons are not mentioned in O. T. (Luke iii. 30; Acts xiii. 1; xv. 14) [hearing].

1 The second-born son of Jacob by Leah (Gen. xxix. 33). In conjunction with his brother Levi, he massacred the Hivite inhabitants of Shechem on account of the injury done by one of their number to Dinah (Gen. xxxiv. 24-31); see DINAH. When one of Jacob's sons was to be kept a prisoner in Egypt as security for return of the rest, Joseph took Simeon and bound him (xlii. 24). The prediction of Simeon's future by the dying Jacob returns to the subject of the massacre, and threatens Simeon as well as Levi that they will be scattered in Israel (xlix. 5-7).

2 The tribe of which Simeon, the son of Jacob, was the progenitor. He had six sons: Jemuel or Nemuel, Jamin, Ohad, Jachin or Jarib, Zohar or Zerah, and Shaul. With the exception of Ohad, all these founded tribal families (Gen. xlv. 10; Num. xxvi. 12-14; 1 Chron. iv. 24). The prince of the tribe in the early times of the wilderness wanderings was Shelumiel, son of Zurishaddai (Num. i. 6; ii. 12, vii. 36, 41; x. 19), and at a later period Shemuel, son of Ammihud (xxxiv. 20). At the first census in the wilderness the tribe numbered 59,300 fighting men (i. 23; ii. 13), at the second 22,200 (xxvi. 12-14). Shaphat, son of Hori, was the spy from the tribe (xiii. 5). Moses, before his departure, blessed the tribes, but omitted to mention Simeon explicitly (Deut. xxxiii). This omission is probably due to the artificial construction of the poem. Moses wanted twelve for the number of the tribes. He formed two groups, departing from the order of birth, and placing the children of Jacob's two wives in the first group and those of the two maids in the second.

Leah 3	Leah's maid 1
Rachel 3	Rachel's maid 2
Leah 2	Leah's maid 1

The first group contains eight, Simeon being omitted, and the second group contains just half as many. The first group is subdivided into three minor groups, beginning with three of the elder children of Leah and closing with Leah's youngest two, and having Rachel's three in the center. The second group is made to correspond to this arrangement. It begins with Leah's firstborn by her maid and closes with her second son by the same maid, and the two sons of Rachel by her maid are placed between. The blessings pronounced upon these tribes are framed within a benediction upon all Israel (2-5, 25-29). The tribe of Simeon could best be omitted from the particular enumeration, because it was to be scattered in Israel (Gen. xlix. 5-7). The same punishment also awaited Levi, but recent deeds had partly atoned for the past and given the tribe of Levi a position of honor among the people of God. After Moses' death the tribe of Simeon was not assigned a self-contained territory, but was granted possession in the midst of Judah. The Simeonites, however, although not explicitly mentioned, were not excluded from the blessing invoked on the tribes. They were included in the general benediction upon Israel as a whole, with which the poem opens and closes. The tribe of Simeon was one of those who stood at the foot of mount Gerizim to pronounce blessings (Deut. xxvii. 12).

When the land of Canaan was distributed by lot, the second lot taken at Shiloh came forth for the tribe of Simeon, and land was assigned them in the extreme south of Canaan, in the midst of the inheritance of the children of Judah (Josh. xix. 1, 2, 9), and the two tribes made common cause against the Canaanites (Judg. i. 1, 3, 17). Among the Simeonite cities were Beer-sheba, Ziklag, and Hormah (Josh. xix. 2-9), in the southern part of Judah. In the reign of Hezekiah the Simeonites smote the people of Ham and the Meunim who dwelt in the valley of Gedor, 500 of them also slaughtered the Amalekites of mount Seir, in both cases occupying the territory of the vanquished tribes (1 Chron. iv. 24-43). It is believed that ultimately a great part of the tribe disappeared, but it was recognized by Ezekiel in his prophecies of the future Canaan (Ezek. xlviii. 24, 25, 33), and in the apocalyptic vision there were sealed 12,000 Simeonites (Rev. vii. 7).

3. An ancestor of Christ, who lived after David but before Zerubbabel (Luke iii. 30).

4. A priest of the family of Joarib, and an ancestor of the Maccabees (1 Mac. ii. 1).

5. A righteous and devout man, to whom it had been revealed by the Holy Spirit that he should not see death till he had seen the Lord's Christ. Coming into the temple when Joseph and Mary had just brought in the infant Jesus, Simeon recognized him as the promised Messiah, expressed his willingness now to depart in peace, and made a prophetic address to Mary with respect both to her and her child (Luke ii. 25-35).

6. Simon Peter (Acts xv. 14); see PETER.

7. A Christian prophet or teacher at Antioch. He was surnamed Niger, black, and may perhaps have been of African race (Acts xiii. 1).

Si'mon [hearing] Simon and Symeon imitate Greek modes of representing the Hebrew name Shim'on, Simeon.

1. Second son of the priest Mattathias. He was called Thassi, which may perhaps mean director or guide (1 Mac. ii. 3, in Syriac Tharsi). With his brothers he sympathized with his father in the revolt against the religious intolerance of the Syrians (14). Regarding him as the wisest of the sons, his father, when about to die, appointed him the adviser of the family, but gave the military authority to Judas, a younger brother (65, 66). He held a military command under Judas, and led a detachment of troops to the aid of the Jews in Galilee (v. 17, 20-23). After the death of Judas Jonathan was chosen leader. He made Simon commandant of the entire coast (xi. 59; xii. 33, 34). When Jonathan was seized and held prisoner by Tryphon, the conduct of the war devolved on Simon, as the last remaining brother of the Maccabee family (xiii. 1-9). He at once completed the fortifications of Jerusalem, and secured possession of Joppa (10, 11).

When Tryphon invaded Judæa, Simon dogged his army (20), and when Tryphon withdrew from the country, Simon rebuilt and provisioned the strongholds of Judæa (33). He also allied himself with Tryphon's rival, Demetrius II., and obtained from him the recognition of the independence of Judæa, 142 B. C. (34-42). Thereupon he besieged and captured Gezer (43-48, in A. V. Gaza). In the spring of 141 he reduced the Syrian citadel at Jerusalem (49-52). A season of peace followed, during which Simon devoted his energies to internal administration and the encouragement of commerce and agriculture (xiv. 4-15). He embellished the family tomb at Modin, in which he had placed the remains of his brother Jonathan (xiii. 25-30). The Spartans and Romans renewed the league with him (xiv. 16-24; xv. 15-24). He was acknowledged by the Jews as high priest and captain and leader (xiii. 42, xiv. 41, 42, 47; xv. 1, 2), and in 140 B. C. authorized to wear the purple (xiv. 43, 44). Antiochus Sidetes, when on the eve of coming to Syria to help defend the cause of the absent Demetrius against Tryphon, made concessions to Simon, and gave him authority to coin money (xv. 6), but afterwards became estranged from him, and demanded the surrender of Joppa, Gezer, and the citadel at Jerusalem (26-31). Simon refused, and war ensued, 138-7 B. C., but the Syrians were worsted. In the early spring of 135 B. C., while on a tour of visitation to the cities of his dominion, he was treacherously murdered in the castle of Dok, near Jericho, by his son-in-law (xvi. 14-16).

2. Father of Judas Iscariot (John vi. 71). He too bore the designation Iscariot (ibid. and xiii. 26, R. V.).

3. Simon Peter (Mat. x. 2); see PETER.

4. Simon the Zealot, one of the twelve apostles (Luke vi. 15; Acts i. 13), see CANANÆAN.

5. One of the Lord's brethren (Mat. xii. 55; Mark vi. 3); see BROTHERN OF THE LORD.

6. A Pharisee, at whose house our Lord once ate, on which occasion a woman, who was a sinner, anointed his feet (Luke vii. 36-50).

7. A householder in Bethany. He had been a leper, and not improbably had been cured by Christ. When our Lord was at meat in his house Mary, the sister of Lazarus, anointed his feet with precious ointment (Mat. xxvi. 6-13; Mark xiv. 3-9; John xii. 1-8). Martha served, and Lazarus was one of those who ate. The presence of the brother and two sisters, and the active part taken by the sisters, as well as the fact that Simon's house was in the town of Lazarus and his sisters, makes it evident that Simon was a relative or intimate friend of theirs. But there is no reason to believe that he was their father or the husband of Mary. He may have been the husband of Martha; see MARTHA.

8. The Cyrenian who was compelled to bear the cross of Christ. He was the father of Alexander and Rufus (Mat xxvii 32).

9. A sorcerer (now popularly called Simon Magus, i. e., Simon the magician) who so amazed the people of Samaria with his arts that they said: "This man is that power of God which is called Great." He was apparently converted through the instrumentality of Philip the evangelist, by whom he was baptized. Having subsequently offered to buy with money the privilege of conferring the Holy Ghost on anyone he wished by the imposition of hands, he was sternly rebuked by Peter, who declared that his heart was not right with God, and that he was still in the gall of bitterness and in the bond of iniquity. He took the reproof meekly, and begged the apostle to pray for him that none of the evils threatened might be allowed to befall him (Acts viii. 9-24). He was afraid, but there is no evidence that he was penitent. Ecclesiastical tradition makes Simon recommence his sorceries, and become the persistent antagonist of the apostle Peter, following him about from place to place and seeking encounters with him, but only to be signally defeated. He is said to have helped to originate gnosticism. Contradictory accounts are given as to the manner of his death.

10. A tanner at Joppa, in whose house Peter lodged (Acts ix. 43; x. 6, 17, 32).

Sim'ri. See SHIMRI.

Sin, I.

"Any want of conformity unto, or transgression of any law of God, given as a rule to the reasonable creature" (Rom. iiii. 23; 1 John iii. 4; Gal iii. 10-12). A sin of omission is the neglect to do what the law of God commands; a sin of commission is the doing of anything which it forbids. See EVIL.

Sin, II.

1. A wilderness through which the Israelites passed on their way from Elim and the Red Sea to Rephidim and mount Sinai (Ex. xvi. 1; xvii 1; Num. xxxiii. 11, 12). The identification is disputed. The choice lies between Debbet er-Ramleh or plain of sand, in the interior of the peninsula at the foot of Jebel et-Tih, and the desert plain el-Markhah on the coast. If the latter, the Israelites on leaving it probably continued to journey along the coast and turned inland through the wady Feiran.

2. A city and stronghold of Egypt (Ezek xxx. 15, 16). The Septuagint read Sais, which, however, was never an important fortress. The Vulgate renders it Pelusium, which was "the key of Egypt," strongly fortified, and necessary to be captured before an army could enter Egypt from the northeast. The name Sin suggests Sun, the Greek Syene and modern Assuan, at the first cataract; and the order of enumeration of Egyptian cities, from south to north (16-18) lends confirmation to this identification.

Si'nai, in A. V. of N T twice Sina (Acts vii 30, 38) [perhaps, pertaining to Sin, the moon-god].

A mountain, called also Horeb, at which the Israelites, traveling by way of Marah, Elmh, and the Red Sea, arrived in the third month after their departure from Egypt (Ex. xix 1). It was distant from Kadesh-barnea eleven days' journey by way of mount Seir (Deut 1 2). A wilderness, sufficiently large for the camp of Israel, lay at its foot (Ex. xix. 2); so close that the mountain could be touched (12), and yet its upper part was visible from the camp (16, 18, 20). From this mountain the law of the ten commandments was given, and at its base the covenant was ratified which made the Israelites a nation with Jehovah as king (xx. 1-xxiv. 8). All the legislation contained in Ex. xx to Num. x. was enacted on or at the foot of mount Sinai, according to repeated statement (Ex. xxiv. 12; xxxi. 18; xxxiv. 2; Lev. 1. 1; xvi. 1; xxv. 1; xxvi. 46; xxvii 34; Num. 1. 1; ix 1). The only later visit to the mount recorded in Scripture is that of Elijah when he was threatened by Jezebel (1 Kin. xix. 8).

Prof. Sayce would locate mount Sinai on the frontiers of mount Seir, but it is almost universally agreed that Sinai is to be looked for in the mountains in the interior of the Sinaitic peninsula. Tradition in favor of mount Serbál, on the wady Feiran, is traceable as far back as the time of Eusebius, for Jebel Mûsa only to that of Justinian. But neither tradition is regarded as weighty. Serbál is the more imposing of the two. It is a solitary, majestic mountain, 6712 feet high, visible from a great distance. But at its foot is no wilderness which could be called the wilderness of Sinai. Jebel Mûsa is part of a short ridge of granite formation, extending about 2 miles from northwest to southeast. The ridge has two peaks: Râs es-Sufsâfeh, or peak of willows, at the northern end with an altitude of 6540 feet; and Jebel Mûsa, the traditional Sinai, at the southern end rising to a height of about 7363 feet. A plateau at the head of the wady es-Saddad and almost due east of Jebel Mûsa has been regarded by some scholars, including Tischendorf, as the site of the encampment of the Israelites, but its area is too limited to accommodate any considerable host. The base of Râs es-Sufsâfeh toward the northwest consists of a precipitous cliff. At the bottom of the cliff lies the plain of er-Râhah, about one square mile in extent, and with the adjacent wadies esh-Sheikh and ed-Deir, entirely suitable for a camping ground. The biblical description makes it scarcely necessary, if not idle, to inquire whether the law was given from Jebel Mûsa or Râs es-Sufsâfeh, and whether one peak or the other was known as the mount of God in distinction from the rest of the clump.

The monastery of St Catharine, a convent of Greek monks, is situated on the eastern slope of the mountain, at the foot of Jebel Mûsa, in the wady ed-Deir, 5014 feet above sea level. Surrounded by massive granite walls, it is as it were a fortress. Its foundation is ascribed to the emperor Justinian in A. D. 527, who is said to have built it around a tower erected long before by Helena, mother of Constantine; but this ascription is probably due to confusion with the fact, attested by his private secretary, that Justinian built a castle in 530 for the protection of the monks who dwelt in the region. The monastery is named after St. Catharine, who was tortured on the wheel and beheaded in Alexandria in A. D. 307, and whose body is said by the monks to have been carried by angels from Alexandria to the lofty summit

Formerly between 300 and 400 monks lived within the convent walls; but the number at present does not exceed 40. In the garden are fig, orange, olive, almond, apple, and apricot trees, grape vines, and a few lofty cypresses. The library is exceedingly valuable. It contains many manuscripts, predominantly Greek and Arabic, but also many others, including some written in Syriac and Ethiopic. Here, in 1844 and 1859, Tischen-

Si'nim, Land of.

A country cited to illustrate the promise | have been mentioned; the land of Sinim is not to be sought there, but in the south or east. Wherever the prophet was when he uttered these words, his words exclude the Sinim of Phœnicia (Gen. x. 17), for they were not a remote people. Besides this, they were an unimportant tribe. For the same reason, the people of Syene or Pelusium, or other Egyptian town (however the name Sin in Ezek. xxx. 15, 16 is understood) are excluded. They were almost in the heart of the inhabited world, separated from the remote bounds of the earth by Ethiopia and Libya at least. Moreover, the inhabitants of none of these towns constituted a distinct nation; nor could the land of Sinim on the Nile be spoken of, as it is by Isaiah, unless it meant Egypt, and none of these towns was important enough to be employed in a designation for all Egypt. The chief theories are: 1. The expression was chosen as a designation of the lands south of Palestine, because in that direction lay the town of Sin (Pelusium), the wilderness of Sin (Ex. xvi. 1), and mount Sinai. But this region was too near at hand to denote the remotest countries. Sheba and Cush, which are used to denote the utmost parts of the earth toward the south, lay far beyond. 2. The Sinim were the Shinas, who have dwelt from ancient times at the foot of the Hindu Kush mountains. 3. The most prevalent view is that the Chinese are meant. The prophet does not assert that Israelites were already living in China (if his words be restricted to a return of the exiles). They may have been; for the presence of Israelites in China is attested as early as the third century B. C., and it is not known how much earlier they emigrated. But the people were scattered far and wide, and yet wider dispersion was in prospect (Is. xi. 11). They should be recovered from the farthest bounds of earth where they are found. Does it seem strange that the name of the Chinese should be known in western Asia? It is historically certain from the Chinese records that Chinese merchants visited foreign lands as early as the twelfth century B. C., and that foreign merchants entered China as early as the tenth century. It is probable that direct commercial relations existed between China and India, and hence indirectly at least with the countries farther west. Porcelain ware with Chinese characters written upon it has been discovered at Thebes in Egypt. M. Pauthier reports the Chinese tradition to the effect that in 2353 B. C. an envoy arrived from a far country bringing as a present a divine tortoise one thousand years old, bearing on its back an inscription, written in strange characters like tadpoles, briefly recounting the world's history since creation. A second embassy of the people of the long-trailing robes arrived in 1110 B. C., and it took them a whole year to return to their own country from Siam by the seacoast. The characters resembling tadpoles suggest the Assyrian and Babylonian cuneiform script; and long-trailing robes, which were not worn in the hot countries south of China, would agree with the theory that the ambassadors were Babylonians or Assyrians.

Si'nite.

A Canaanite tribe, mentioned between the Arkite and the Arvadite (Gen. x. 17). A place named Sin not far from Arka was known to Jerome, and Strabo mentions a fortress called Sinna on mount Lebanon.

Sin Offer-ing. See OFFERINGS.

Si'on [elevated].

A name for mount Hermon (Deut. iv. 48). For mount Sion at Jerusalem, a different word in Hebrew, see ZION.

Siph'moth.

A place visited by David during his wanderings, to which he sent part of the spoils of Ziklag (1 Sam. xxx. 28; cp. 1 Chron. xxvii. 27). Site unknown. A variant Hebrew pronunciation, preferred by Baer, is Shiphmoth.

Sip'pal. See SAPH.

Si'rah [recession or effervescence].

A well or cistern from which Abner was recalled to Hebron by Joab that he might be murdered (2 Sam. iii. 26). According to Josephus, it was distant 20 stades from Hebron (Antiq. vii. 1. 5). It is probably 'Ain Sârah, $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles northwest of Hebron.

Sir'i-on [cuirass, coat of mail].

The name given by the Sidonians to mount Hermon (Deut. iii. 9; Ps. xxix. 6).

Sis'a-mai. See SISMAI.

Sis'e-ra [battle array].

Commander of the army of Jabin. Jabin, king of the Canaanites and oppressor of Israel, reigned at Hazor. Sisera dwelt at Harosheth of the gentiles. He became a chief figure in a brief war. Barak urged by Deborah, began a struggle for freedom, and defeated the Canaanite army, led by Sisera, on the banks of the Kishon. Sisera fled, and sought the hospitality of Heber the Kenite, between whom and Jabin there was peace. Heber's wife met him and invited him in, but afterwards murdered him with a tent pin while he slept (Judg. iv. v.; Ps. lxxxiii. 9); see Jael. It is probable that those Nethinim who were known as the children of Sisera were descended from captives taken at this time (Ezra ii. 53; Neh. vii. 55); see NETHINIM.

Sis'mai, in A. V. Sisamai.

A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 40).

Sis'trum.

A musical instrument (2 Sam. vi. 5, R. V. margin), consisting of several metallic rods in an oval metallic frame. The rods were either loosely inserted or loose rings were hung on them, so that the instrument would jingle when shaken.

Sith'ri, in A. V. Zithri [a hiding place is (Jehovah)].

A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Uzziel (Ex. vi. 22). Zithri in A. V. of ver 21 is a modern misprint of Zichri (q. v.). The error has been corrected in some recent editions.

Sit'nah [accusation, enmity (cp Satan)]

A well dug by Isaac in the Philistine country, not far from Gerar; but the inhabitants of the district disputed his right to it (Gen. xxvi. 21). Palmer and Drake in 1870 found a small valley called wady Shut-net er-Ruheibeh. The first portion of the name corresponds to Sitnah, and Ruheibeh to Rehoboth, which was in the immediate vicinity of Sitnah (22).

Si'van.

The third month of the Babylonian and Jewish year (Esth viii 9), extending from the new moon of May to that of June. See YEAR

Slave.

Slavery existed in remote antiquity. Slaves were acquired: 1. By capture, especially in war (Num. xxxi 9; 2 Kin. v. 2; War iii 4, 1; vi. 9, 2). 2. By purchase from slave owners (Gen. xvii 27; xxxvii. 28, 36; Ezek. xxvii. 13; Joel iii 6, 8). 3. By birth from slaves owned (Gen. xvii. 12). 4. In payment of debt, thieves unable to make restitution and, though contrary to the spirit of the Mosaic law, a debtor or his children being sold as slaves (Ex. xxii. 3; 2 Kin. iv. 1; Neh. v 5, 8; Amos ii 6; Mat. xviii 25). 5. Among the Hebrews there was also the voluntary sale of one's self or one's daughter on account of poverty (Ex. xxi. 2, 7; Lev. xxv 39, 47), and reduction to slavery on account of theft, as already mentioned.

The price of a slave varied of course according to circumstances. It was reckoned in Hebrew judicial cases as averaging 30 shekels (Ex. xxi 32). The Jewish slaves in Alexandria in the third century B. C. brought about the same, 120 drachmas (Antiq. xii. 2, 3). Joseph at seventeen years of age was purchased for 20 shekels (Gen. xxxvii. 28).

Among the Hebrews the legal status of a Hebrew slave was very different from that of the slave who was not an Israelite. The Hebrew slave had manumission after six years of service, if he chose; might not be harshly treated, nor sent away empty on his release; and, if owned by a foreign sojourner in Israel, had the privilege of redemption at a price legally regulated, the moment he could secure the necessary money (Ex. xxi. 2-6; Lev. xxv. 43, 47-55; Jer. xxxiv. 8-16). The rights of the Hebrew maid were the subject of further special legislation (Ex. xxi. 7-11). All Hebrew slaves, both those who had elected to remain with their masters when the seventh year had come and those who had not served six years, were released at the year of jubile (Lev. xxv. 40). This provision was necessitated when the law regarding the restoration of every man's inheritance at the jubile was enacted. The return of the slave to his inheritance was involved, whether he chose to go back to his master's family afterwards or not. The slave also who was not an Israelite fared well among the Hebrews. The Mosaic law recognized that he possessed rights. He might be whipped or beaten, but not maimed or killed (Ex. xxi 20, 21, 26, 27; Lev. xxiv. 17, 22). In case a captive slave girl was taken to wife, she acquired new rights (Deut. xxi. 10-14). All these non-Hebrew slaves were regarded as members of the commonwealth of Israel (Gen. xvii 10-14), and they were equal before God, participating in the religious festivals and sacrifices (Ex. xii. 44; Lev. xxii 11; Deut. xii. 12, 18; xvi. 11, 14), and enjoying the rest of the Sabbath day (Ex. xx. 10; xxiii. 12). Another humane feature of the Mosaic law made Canaan an asylum for slaves who escaped to it from a foreign country. They were not to be surrendered, but were allowed to dwell in the land wherever they chose (Deut. xxiii 15, 16). It also forbade, on pain of death, the stealing of men and the selling or holding of them (Ex. xxi 16; Deut. xxiv. 7); and there is no evidence that slave markets ever existed in Israel. The Mosaic law contrasts most favorably with the laws of contemporary heathen nations in its humanity toward slaves. The intercourse between master and slave was often cordial (Gen. xxiv.; Ruth ii 4). The slave was regarded as entitled to justice (Job xxxi 13-15); he sometimes inherited the property of his master (Gen. xv. 2, 3), and was sometimes admitted into the family as son-in-law (1 Chron. ii. 34, 35).

Christianity avoided a sudden reversal of established usages (1 Cor. vii. 21), urged the slave to obey his master (Eph. vi 5-8; Col. iii 22-25; 1 Tim. vi 1, 2; 1 Pet. ii 18-21), and sent the runaway slave voluntarily back to his Christian master (Philem 10-16). But it also promulgated principles which improved the condition of slaves in the Roman empire. It recognized the equality of slave and master in God's sight (1 Cor. vii 21, 22; Gal. iii. 28; Col. iii. 11). It exhorted the master to treat his slaves considerately, reminding him that they had rights which God will maintain (Eph. vi. 9; Col. iv. 1).

Slime. See BITUMEN.

Sling.

A simple weapon usually consisting of a piece of leather, with two strings attached to its opposite sides and a stone inserted. It was whirled once or twice round the head and one string let go, whereby the stone was projected with great force. On the field of battle the stones were either carried in a bag by the slinger, or piled at his feet (1 Sam. xvii. 40).

It seems to have been used in warfare by practically all the peoples of antiquity; by the Egyptians, Syrians (1 Mac. vi. 51; ix. 11), Assyrians, Persians (Anab iii. 3, 18), and in the far west by Sicilians (Herod vii. 158) and mercenaries in the Roman army. Among the Hebrews the Benjamites in the times of the judges and in the reign of Saul were noted for their skill in its use, being able to sling stones with the left hand (Judg. xx. 16, 1 Chron. xii. 2) David slew Goliath tools and weapons, a blacksmith (1 Sam. xiii. 19; Is. xlv. 12; liv. 16), like Tubal-cain (Gen. iv. 22); or one who refines and shapes the precious metals, a goldsmith (Is. xl. 19).

Assyrian Slinger

Egyptian Smith at his Furnace.

The blacksmith used a charcoal furnace, bellows, tongs, anvil, and hammer (Ecclus xxxviii. 28). See BELLOWS.

Smyr'na [myrrh].

A city of great antiquity on the western coast of Asia Minor. It was possessed by the Æolian Greeks, and finally the Ionian Greeks admitted it into their confederacy. The Lydian king, Alyattes, destroyed it, and it lay waste for some 200 years, till the plan of rebuilding it was formed by Alexander with a stone from a sling (1 Sam. xvii. 48-50). Slingers served in the armies of Jehoram, Jehoshaphat, and Uzziah (2 Kin. iii. 25; 2 Chron. xxvi. 14), and were effective as late as the war with the Romans (War ii. 17, 5; iv. 1, 3).

Smyrna

Smith.

An artificer who forges iron and brass into the Great, and executed by his immediate successors, on a new site near by. It then became a large and flourishing commercial center, retaining its importance under the Romans. It became a part of the province of Asia, organized after 133 B. C. Its church was the second of the seven addressed by John in the book of Revelation. It escapes all censure, but it is exhorted to remain constant in the midst of persecution (Rev i 11; ii. 8-11) Its bishop Polycarp suffered martyrdom by fire, near the stadion, probably in A D 169 In A D 178 Smyrna was destroyed by an earthquake, but was speedily rebuilt Lying as it does at the extremity of a fine bay, in the track of trade, it is admirably adapted for commerce, and even under Turkish rule remains a highly flourishing city, the largest and most important in Asia Minor.

Snail.

1 The rendering of the Hebrew Homet, one prostrate on the ground (Lev. xi 30, in R V sand lizard)

2 The rendering of the Hebrew Shabb'ul, moist, slimy one (Ps lvm 8), a genuine snail, especially of the shell-less family (Lamææ).

Snow.

Snow occurs in the hilly country of Palestine, as at Sepphorns in Galilee Nazareth, Jerusalem, Hebron (1 Mac xii 22, War i 16, 2, iv. 8, 3) It may be expected in January or February, although the winter often passes without it It sometimes falls to the depth of a foot, but seldom lies longer than a day On mount Lebanon it is found lingering on the heights, and in the ravines late in the summer, and it crowns the summit of Hermon the year round It is frequently referred to in Scripture as the standard of whiteness and the emblem of purity (Ps li 7, Is i 18, Lam iv 7, Mat. xxviii 3) It is poetically described as stored by God in his treasury (Job xxxviii. 22), commanded by him to fall (xxxviii. 6; Ps. cxlvii 16), and descending like wool or birds or a swarm of locusts (ibid; Eccl. xlii 17) Its value as a source of moisture to the ground was recognized (Is. lv 10) Men took advantage of it in summer to cool their beverages (cp Prov xxv 13) Clean snow would yield pure water for washing purposes (Job ix 30)

So.

King of Egypt whose aid against Assyria Hoshea king of Israel endeavored to secure about 724 B C (2 Kin. xvii 4) As the Hebrew consonants may be pronounced Seve', he is commonly identified, and doubtless correctly, with Sib'e, tartan of Egypt, who in 720 B C in alliance with Hanun king of Gaza, met Sargon king of Assyria in battle at Raphia on the Mediterranean, about 20 miles south of Gaza The allies were routed, Sib'e fled, Hanun was captured, and presently Pharaoh paid tribute to Assyria. It is doubtful whether Sib'e was Shabako, king of Egypt Etymology is against the identification At this time at least he was tartan rather than Pharaoh.

Soap.

Not the composition familiar in modern domestic use. The Hebrew words bor and borith, that which cleanses, denote an alkali.

It was used for washing the person (Job ix. 30, R. V. margin, lye), for washing clothes (Jer ii. 22; Mal iii 2), and as a flux in smelting ores (Is i 25, R V. margin, lye). The Greek translators regarded it as a plant or obtained from a plant, for they represented it by the Greek word poa, grass, grass-like plant. The root of the soapwort (Saponaria officinalis) is largely used in Palestine for washing linens, because it does not cause them to shrink. The employment of the alkali for smelting purposes indicates that it was in the form of ashes It was doubtless obtained from such plants as the glasswort (Salicornia frutescens) and the saltwort (Salsola kali), which are to this day reduced to ashes for the soda which they yield So'co and Socoh, according to the alternate Hebrew orthography; in A V. variously spelled Socoh, Socho, Sochoh, Shocho, Shochoh, Shoco [thorn, hedge of thorns].

1 A town in the Shephelah or lowland of Judah (Josh xv 35) It stood on the hilly border of the valley of Elah, in a strong position isolated from the rest of the ridge The Philistines pitched between it and Azekah just before Goliath stood forth as their champion (1 Sam xvii 1). It was rebuilt or refortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron xi 7). It was captured, with the dependent villages, in the reign of Ahaz (xxviii 18) Robinson successfully identified it with the ruins of Shuweikeh, 13 miles west by south of Bethlehem The modern name perpetuates the ancient one

2 A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh xv 48) Its site is found at another Shuweikeh, 10 miles south-southwest of Hebron

It is doubtful which of the two towns is referred to in 1 Kin. iv 10 and 1 Chron iv 18.

So'di [a familiar acquaintance]

Father of the spy from the tribe of Zebulun (Num. xiii 10)

Sod'om, in A. V. of N T once Sodoma (Rom. ix 29)

One of the five cities in the plain of the Jordan (Gen. xiii. 10) When Lot separated from Abraham, he chose it for his residence, though even then the place was notorious for its wickedness (11, 12). It was plundered by Chedorlaomer (xiv 11), but the goods and captives were recovered by Abraham and restored (21-24). Subsequently it and at least three other cities of the plain were destroyed by God on account of their wickedness God probably effected his purpose by causing an eruption of burning asphalt and sulphur. Lot and his two daughters were spared (xix 1-29; Deut. xxix. 23; Is. i. 9, 10, in 9, xiii 19; Jer. xlix. 18; l 40; Lam. iv. 6; Ezek. xvi 46-56; Amos iv. 11; Zeph. ii. 9; Mat. x. 15; xi. 24; Luke x. 12; xvii. 29; Rom. ix. 29; 2 Pet. ii. 6; Jude 7). In the Apocalypse the great city of sin is spiritually called Sodom and Egypt (Rev. xi. 8).

The exact site of Sodom is unknown. Two substantial arguments are advanced for the northern end. 1. From a point near Bethel, Abraham and Lot could see all the plain of Jordan (Gen. xiii. 3 with 10). Care must be exercised, however, in interpreting the word all. 2. Chedorlaomer, coming from the south, had smitten the Amorites of Hazezon-tamar, i. e., En-gedi, before he was opposed by the king of Sodom and his allies (xiv. 7, 8), a fact which seems to indicate that the meeting took place between En-gedi and the northern end of the sea. On the other hand, there are three weighty arguments for the southern end. 1. Asphalt is found in large quantities at the southern end of the sea only (cp. Gen. xiv. 10). 2. Assuming that the sea covers the site (cp. xiv. 3), the cities might have been situated at the southern end, where the water of the bay has a depth of from 2 to 20 feet, but could not have been in the northern part, where the sea is from 600 to 1000 feet deep. And geologically considered, only the southern end of the sea can be of origin at all recent. 3. Zoar, one of the cities (xiii. 10), lay at the southern end of the sea (War iv. 8, 4).

For the vine of Sodom, see VINE OF SODOM.

Sod'om-ite.

A person guilty of sodomy, the unnatural vice of Sodom (Gen. xix. 5). The word is employed in the E. V. to render the Hebrew Kadesh, one consecrated, a man dedicated to impure heathen worship (Deut. xxiii. 17; in Job xxxvi. 14, unclean). A woman thus dedicated practiced uncleanness as a priestess in the service of Ashtoreth or Asherah in Canaan, of Ishtar in Babylonia (Gen. xxxviii. 21, 22; Deut. xxiii. 17; Hos. iv. 14; in every case rendered harlot). Sodomy was forbidden by the Mosaic law (Deut. xxiii. 17); but sodomites were found in Judah during the reign of Rehoboam (1 Kin. xiv. 24); Asa and Jehoshaphat cut them off (xv. 12; xxii. 46); but others arose in their room, and Josiah, to rid the land of them, broke down their houses (2 Kin. xxiii. 7).

So'journ-er, in A. V. and sometimes in R. V. Stranger. See STRANGER.

Sol'o-mon [peaceable]

David's youngest son, at least by Bathsheba (2 Sam. xii. 24; 1 Chron. iii. 5; and cp. Antiq. vii. 14, 2). He was born at Jerusalem. David named him Solomon, peaceable, in anticipation of the peace and quietness of his reign in contrast with his own stormy life (1 Chron. xxii. 9); but through the prophet Nathan he was divinely honored with the name Jedidiah, beloved of Jehovah (2 Sam. xii. 25). When David was old and feeble, Adonijah, one of his sons born at Hebron, and next to the eldest now that Amnon and Absalom were dead, planned to rule independently of his father's sanction; but the design was thwarted by the prophet Nathan with the aid of Zadok the priest and Benaiah the military commander, supported by David's bodyguard. Solomon was proclaimed king (1 Kin. i. 5-40), and the party of Adonijah at once collapsed. David soon afterwards died, and Solomon began his sole reign about the year 970 B. C., being at the time probably about twenty years old. Obedient to the dying charge of his father, he dealt out justice to Abiathar and Shimei; and when Adonijah began anew to plot against the king, he put him to death and ordered the execution of Joab likewise, who was implicated in the conspiracy (ii. 1-46). The young king soon brought as his queen to Jerusalem Pharaoh's daughter (iii. 1). At that time the worship at the sanctuary, which had been broken up when the Lord forsook Shiloh, was still interrupted. The tabernacle was at Gibeon and the ark at Jerusalem. The people worshiped at high places. Solomon went to Gibeon to sacrifice. There God appeared to him in a dream by night and bade him ask for anything he chose. He asked for an understanding heart, that he might be able justly to judge the people of God, for it was part of a king's duty in those days to administer justice. His request was granted, as he soon afterwards showed by the skillful manner in which he disentangled truth from falsehood when he decided between the two women, each of whom claimed the living babe as her own (1 Kin. iii. 2-28, 2 Chron. i. 3-12). Twenty or more years later the Lord appeared to him again, conditionally promised to continue the throne in Solomon's own line, and gave him solemn warning (1 Kin. ix. 1-10; 2 Chron. vii. 12-22).

His father had subdued the neighboring nations. Against Hamath only is it recorded that Solomon went to war. He was obliged to control that city in order to secure the northeastern portion of his dominions. Hadad the Edomite and Rezon of Damascus were hostile to Solomon, but the Hebrew monarch probably gave himself but little concern about them. He fortified Hazor at the crossing of the upper Jordan, and built a tower in Lebanon, in order to hold Damascus in check; and saw to it that the road by Edom to Ezion-geber was open and safe. Otherwise Solomon's relations with neighboring kings were friendly, and he was able to devote himself to the organization of his kingdom and to the arts of peace.

David had amassed a great store of precious metals for the construction of a magnificent temple to Jehovah. Solomon took up the work, and with Tyrian help finished it in seven years (1 Kin. v, vi; 2 Chron. ii.). Then, after furniture had been made for it, it was dedicated (1 Kin. vii. 13-viii. 64; 2 Chron. ii.-vii.). Next, the monarch erected a palace for himself, which took thirteen years in building (1 Kin. vii. 1-12); see PALACE. He also laid out gardens and vineyards in various parts of the country, as at Etam, perhaps, and at Baal-hamon (ix. 19,

R. V. ; 2 Chron. viii. 6, R. V. ; Ecc. ii. 5, 6; Song viii. 11)

Solomon showed sagacity in government. He surrounded himself with eminent officials, among whom the son of the high priest held the first place (1 Kin. iv. 2-6). He maintained the army at full strength. For administrative purposes, he divided the kingdom into twelve districts, entirely independent of the old tribal lines (7-19). Nor did he fail to take a prominent part in the religion of the state. He led the nation in prayer at the dedication of the temple, and invoked the divine blessing upon the assembled multitude.

Commerce flourished in his kingdom, and brought wealth (1 Kin. x. 14-21, 2 Chron. ix. 13, 14, 21, 27); and voyages were successfully made to Ophir, and traffic was conducted with India (1 Kin. x. 22, 23; 2 Chron. ix. 10-22). For the protection and fostering of trade, he built store cities, among others Palmyra, in the desert midway between Damascus and the Euphrates (1 Kin. ix. 18, 19).

Solomon was interested in literary pursuits. He was a naturalist, and wrote treatises on plants, from the cedar that groweth on Lebanon to the hyssop that springeth out of the wall. He spoke also of beasts, and of fowls, and of creeping things, and of fishes (1 Kin. iv. 33). He collected and composed many proverbs, some of which constitute part of the O. T. see PROVERBS. Two psalms (lxxii and cxxvii) are attributed to him by their titles. See also ECCLESIASTES and SONG OF SONGS.

The splendor of his court, the magnificence of his table, and his pomp when on excursions corresponded to his wealth and political power (1 Kin. x. 4, 5, 21; Song iii. 7-11). People came from all parts to hear his wisdom (1 Kin. iv. 34; x. 23-25). The report of his wisdom was carried even to southern Arabia, and the queen of Sheba journeyed to Jerusalem to test it and to see his magnificence (1-13).

Solomon erred in two respects. He established a harem, which included from first to last about one thousand members. Doubtless not a few of these were hostages, princesses given him as pledges of political amity. Now many of these women were foreigners by birth and idolatrous in their religion, and he allowed himself to be persuaded by them to erect idol shrines (1 Kin. xi. 1-8). For this apostasy Solomon was punished. The kingdom in its great extent and power was taken from the dynasty, and only a fragment of it left to the family (9-13). The example of Solomon's disloyalty to Jehovah had direct influence in producing this penal result. Also influential to this end was the announcement by the prophet Ahijah to Jeroboam that God would rend ten tribes from Solomon and give them to him (28-39). Jeroboam became a recognized opponent of the king; but not until Solomon's son Rehoboam ascended the throne did Jeroboam secure a kingdom. A second, a less obvious, yet an important error was Solomon's luxury, which imposed a burden on his overtaxed subjects, shook their loyalty to the throne, and sowed the seeds of future rebellion. See REHOBAM.

Solomon reigned forty years (1 Kin. xi. 42; 2 Chron. ix. 30, 31), dying about 931 B. C. The events of his life and reign were recorded in the Book of the Acts of Solomon (1 Kin. xi. 41), the History of Nathan the Prophet, the Prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite, the Visions of Iddo the Seer (2 Chron. ix. 29).

Sol'o-mon's Porch.

A splendid colonnade, reputed to have been built by Solomon, on the east side of the temple area, on an artificial embankment built up from the valley of the Kidron (Antiq. xx. 9, 7, War v. 5, 1). It is once mentioned that Christ walked in it (John x. 23); and the apostles were not infrequently there (Acts iii. 11; v. 12).

Sol'o-mon's Serv'ants.

Certain persons whose descendants were associated with the Nethimim, 390 or 392 of the two classes combined returning with Zerubbabel from the captivity (Ezra ii. 55-58; Neh. vii. 57-60). Some of their names have a foreign aspect. They seem to have been the descendants of those Canaanites of various tribes from whom Solomon exacted bond service for the sake of the temple and other magnificent buildings (1 Kin. v. 13-18; ix. 21). See NETHINIM.

Sol'o-mon, Wis'dom of. See APOCRYPHA

Son.

1. A male child, an immediate male descendant (Gen. xxvii. 1). Other prominent significations are:

2. A remoter male descendant. For instance, Jehu, son of Nimshi, was really Nimshi's grandson, for he was the son of Jehoshaphat, the son of Nimshi (cp. 2 Kin. ix. 20 with 2). The Israelites were known as sons or children of Israel or Jacob centuries after the death of the patriarch (Mal. iii. 6; Luke i. 16).

3. A person received into filial relation by adoption or marriage (Ex. ii. 10; cp. Esth. ii. 7), or as member of a tribe by adoption or marriage into the tribe (Gen. xvii. 9-14); and probably a people as incorporated with another people by conquest.

4. A kindly form of address used by an elderly man to a younger friend (1 Sam. iii. 6, 16; iv. 16; 2 Sam. xviii. 22; cp. Josh. vii. 19).

5. Member of a guild or profession, as son of the apothecaries (Neh. iii. 8, in R. V. one), sons of the singers (xii. 28). Worshiper of a god, as the sons of Chemosh (Num. xxi. 29).

6. Inhabitant of a city or country, as sons of Zion (Lam. iv 2), sons of Bethlehem (Ezra ii 21, in E. V. children), sons of the province (1, in E. V. children), sons of Javan (Gen. x 4).

7. Possessor of a quality, as son of Belial or worthlessness (1 Sam xxv 17), son of strength, i. e., a valiant man (xiv. 52), son of peace (Luke x. 6).

Son of God.

A title of the Messiah (Ps i 7; John i 49; cp. 2 Sam. vii. 14); in its deepest sense expressive of the mysterious relation existing between the eternal Father and the eternal Son. In the Revised Version of the New Testament the designation Son of God is used about forty-five times, in about forty-four unequivocally denoting our Lord (Mat. iv. 3, 6; xvi. 16; xxvi 63, xxvii 43; Mark i 1), and in the remaining one characterizing Adam (Luke iii. 38). In John ii. 18 Christ is called the only begotten Son of God. Two reasons are suggested for the appellation: his eternal generation (Heb vii 3), and his miraculous birth by the operation of the Holy Ghost (Luke i. 35). As son of God, Christ is God with all the infinite perfections of the divine essence (John i. 1-14; x 30-38; Phil ii 6), and is equal with God (John v. 17-25). He is subordinate in mode of subsistence and operation; that is, he is of the Father, is sent by the Father, and the Father operates through him (John iii 16, 17; viii 42; Gal. iv. 4, Heb i 2). Accordingly, the word son is not a term of office, but of nature. He has the same nature, a fact which includes equality with God.

The claim was put forth by our Lord (Luke xxii 70; John x. 36; xi 4; xix. 7), and urged by the apostles (Acts ix 20; Gal. ii. 20, etc.; 1 John ii. 8; v 5, 10, 13, 20), and it was for maintaining it that he was condemned by the sanhedrin on a charge of blasphemy (Mat. xxvi 63-66; Mark xiv. 61-64); but the justice of his claim had been acknowledged on the occasion of his baptism by the descent upon him of the Holy Ghost, accompanied by an audible utterance from his heavenly Father (Mat. iii. 16, 17; Mark i. 10, 11; Luke iii 22; John i. 32-34). It was similarly acknowledged at the transfiguration (Mat. xvii. 5; Mark ix 7; Luke ix. 35; 2 Pet. i. 17). It was sustained by his character and by his works (John i. 14; x. 36-38; Heb. i. 3). And he was declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness by the resurrection of the dead (Rom. i. 4), and by his ascension (Heb. i. 3).

In one passage of the O. T. the expression Son of God appears (Dan. iii. 25, A. V.), but the R. V. alters this to a son of the gods. The speaker was a Babylonian heathen.

For the title sons of God applied to men, see SONS OF GOD.

Son of Man.

A person possessed of humanity in distinction from divinity and the brute nature; a human being, with the emphasis on human (Num. xxiii. 19; Job xxv. 6; Ps viii 4; Is. li. 12); see SON 7. When Daniel fell afrighted on his face before the heavenly messenger, Gabriel addressed him as son of man (Dan viii 17). When Ezekiel had seen the vision of Jehovah and fallen upon his face, a voice said: "Son of man, stand upon thy feet" (Ezek. ii. 1), and thenceforth the prophet is constantly addressed as son of man. It was foretold (Dan vii 13, 14, R. V.) that the hostile worldly power, represented by beasts, shall succumb before the Ancient of days, and one like to a son of man, coming with the clouds of heaven, shall receive dominion and a kingdom, that all the peoples, nations, and languages shall serve him, his dominion is an everlasting dominion which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed. This figure seen in vision, a human being in contrast with the beasts that typified the kingdoms of the world, symbolized the saints of God in their corporate aspect, to whom universal and everlasting dominion shall be given (14 with 27).

The title was adopted by our Lord, evidently with reference to Dan vii 13, 14, 27 (cp. Mat. xxiv. 30; Mark xiv. 62). He is recorded in the gospels as having applied it to himself seventy-eight times. It is also used of him by Stephen (Acts vii 56); see also Heb ii 6; and Rev. i. 13; xiv. 14, R. V. margin. Christ did not choose the title to assert that he had a fellow-feeling for man and was a brother to all men; nor did he employ it to denote that he was a mere man and not divine, for he constantly claimed divine attributes (Luke v 24). He chose a title which, by reason of its several possible interpretations, until fully defined by Jesus himself, could not be used against him by his foes. By it—1. He identified himself with that human being in Daniel's vision who receives a universal and everlasting dominion (Dan. vii. 14; cp. Mat. xvi 28; xxviii 18). 2. He identified himself with the saints of the Most High, regarded collectively as a people, which the human figure in the vision symbolized; making himself their embodiment and their representative before God (Dan. vii. 13, 27; cp. Mat. xxv. 31, 40; Mark x. 45 "a ransom for many"; Luke xii 8, 9). 3. He assumed for himself the sufferings and the glory that should follow which were predicted for that human kingdom in its efforts to establish itself and overcome the world (Dan vii. 21, 22, 25; cp. Mat. xvii. 22, 23; Mark x. 45; Luke ix. 26; xviii 31-33). 4. He implies that he comes with the clouds of heaven to receive the kingdom (Dan. vii 13; cp. Mat. xxiv. 30; xxvi. 64). 5. He emphasized the human and humane in contrast with the brutal and bestial (Dan. vii. 4-9, 13; cp. Mat. xxv. 31 with 35 and 36; Mark x. 45 "minister, and to give his life"; Luke xix. 10).

Son of man and Son of God are united in the same person. "Who do men say that the Son of man is? . . . Simon Peter answered and said, Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God. And Jesus answered and said unto him, Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-Jonah: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven" (Mat. xvi. 13, 16, 17). "The high priest said unto him, I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou be the Christ, the Son of God. Jesus saith unto him, Thou hast said: nevertheless I say unto you, Henceforth ye shall see the Son of man sitting at the right hand of power, and coming on the clouds of heaven" (xxvi. 63, 64).

Song.

A poetical composition, generally brief, capable of being set to music and sung, whether or not it was intended for singing or was ever actually sung (Ex. xv. 1-18; Deut. xxxi. 30-xxxii. 44). It was often sung to the accompaniment of music (Ex. xv. 20, 21; Is. xxxviii. 20). It might be secular or religious (Gen. xxxi. 27; Num. xxi. 17, 18; and Ps. xcii. title, cxxxvii. 3, 4); in praise of men or of God (1 Sam. xviii. 6, 7; Ps. xxviii. 7); the expression of light-heartedness or deep emotion, the utterance of innocent mirth or the outcome of a bacchanalian revel (Ps. lxxix. 12).

Song of Songs, The.

The last of the five poetical books of the O. T. in our present English Bible. This arrangement is derived from the Septuagint. In the Hebrew Scriptures the Song stands between Job and Ruth, in the third section of the canon, and is one of the five smaller rolls which formed a group by themselves because they had come to be read on the five great anniversaries. The Song was read on the eighth day of the passover festival, the book being allegorically interpreted with reference to the history of the exodus. The Song of Solomon is more fully called The Song of Songs, which is Solomon's (i. 1). The reduplication of the word song was not intended to denote that it is a collection of many songs, nor that it is the chief one of the many songs of Solomon; but it has superlative force, like servant of servants, holy of holies, Lord of lords, heaven of heavens, vanity of vanities (Gen. ix. 25; Ex. xxvi. 33; Deut. x. 17, 1 Kin. viii. 27; Ecc. i. 2), and intimates that the production is a song of the highest character. In the Vulgate the title is literally translated Canticum Canticum, from which the name Canticles is derived.

Several speakers take part in the dialogue. The distinction between them is quite clear in the Hebrew original, because the grammatical forms indicate gender. The R. V.

marks change of speaker by space between the verses or sections. How many prominent personages are there in the poem? Are there two, besides the daughters of Jerusalem, who resemble the chorus in a Greek play; or are there three, either actually speaking or introduced in the remarks of the Shulammitic maid? According to the latter view in its general form, the three chief speakers are a country maid, her rustic lover, and Solomon. The maid is betrothed to her country swain; but she is noticed by Solomon and his companions during some journey to the north (vi. 10-13), brought to Jerusalem, and there, surrounded by the women of the palace, wooed by the king in the hope of gaining her affections. But the maid resists all enticements. When Solomon praises her, she responds by praising her rustic lover. She longs for him by day, and dreams of him by night. She sustains her devotion to him by recalling his speeches. She is true to him and to her vows. At length the parted lovers are reunited (viii. 5-7), and she is praised by her brothers for resisting all allurements. Throughout Solomon appears in an unfavorable light. He attempts to persuade the maid to forsake her proper allegiance (vii. 1-9), and he commits greater sin. The poem, according to this view, celebrates a pure affection, which holds out against the temptations of a court, and is strong enough to resist the seductive arts of a king.

This interpretation, which is known as the shepherd hypothesis, seeks support in expressions of the Shulammitic, which are cited as passionate exclamations to her distant lover (i. 4, 7, ii. 16). But everything is much simpler in these passages themselves and throughout the poem, if the Shulammitic's avowals of love are in all cases referred to king Solomon himself. The simple country maid has no adequate conception of royal life and occupations. She thinks of the king, the shepherd of the people (cp. Jer. xxiii. 4), under the figure of a rustic shepherd of her native hills, and she addresses him in language borrowed from the shepherd life familiar to her. And everywhere she naturally draws imagery from the pastoral and horticultural mountain life to which she was accustomed.

Instead of regarding the Shulammitic as a country girl, some interpreters, especially in England, see in her the daughter of Pharaoh whom Solomon married. She is a stranger, dark of complexion, and a prince's daughter (i. 5; vii. 1). The blackness of skin, however, was due to sunburn (i. 6), and the title of prince's daughter probably does not indicate her birth, which was apparently lowly (ibid.; ii. 9), but her present high rank to which she has been raised (cp. vi. 12; 1 Sam. ii. 8), daughter meaning female or woman in general (cp. Song vi. 9; 1 Sam. i. 16), and the phrase signifying "O noble woman."

The Song has been regarded as a drama.

Few, however, have imagined that it was designed for presentation on the stage. It has been thought to consist of four acts (Ewald at first, Friedrich), or of five acts containing from thirteen to fifteen scenes (Ewald, Bottcher, and others), or of six acts with two scenes each (Delitzsch, Hahn). Bossuet discovered seven acts, each filling a day, concluding with the Sabbath, inasmuch as the bridegroom on this day does not, as usual, go forth to his rural employments. His several days are: i. 1-ii 6, ii. 7-17; iii 1-v 1, v. 2-vi. 9; vi. 10-vii 11; vii 12-viii 3, viii 4-14. Delitzsch's scheme is as follows. Act 1. Mutual passion of the lovers (i. 2-ii 7), concluding with, "I adjure you, O daughters of Jerusalem." The scene is laid in the palace of Solomon. Scene 1. Dialogue between the Shulammite maid and the court ladies, daughters of Jerusalem, at a meal (i. 2-8). Scene 2. Enter Solomon: dialogue between him and the maiden, who is not yet his bride (9-ii. 7). Act 2. Mutual seeking and finding (ii. 8-iii. 5), concluding with "I adjure you." The scene is the Shulammite's country home. Scene 1. She relates a rapturous meeting with Solomon (ii. 8-17). Scene 2. She relates a dream, in which she thought she had lost her beloved, but found him again (iii 1-5). Act 3. Bringing the betrothed to the capital and the marriage (iii. 6-v 1), with the introduction, "Who is this?" and the conclusion, "Eat, O friends; drunk, yea, drunk abundantly, O beloved." Scene 1. Procession to the palace (iii. 6-11). Scene 2. Dialogue between Solomon and his betrothed in the wedding chamber (iv. 1-16). The wedding must be supposed to follow; and then v 1, Solomon's morning greeting to his bride, and afterwards his exhortation to the guests. Act 4. Love disdained, but regained (v. 2-vi. 9). Scene 1. Shadows fall on the married life. The Shulammite dreams of seeking her beloved, but finding him not (v. 2-vi. 3). Scene 2. She has found her beloved again (vi. 4-9). Act 5. The Shulammite the beautiful, but humble princess (vi. 10-viii. 4), with the introduction, "Who is she?" and the conclusion, "I adjure you." Scene 1. In the royal gardens; dialogue between the Shulammite and the daughters of Jerusalem (vi. 10-vii. 6). Scene 2. In the palace; Solomon and the Shulammite alone (vii 7-viii. 4). Act 6. The confirmation of love's bond in the Shulammite's old home (viii 5-14), beginning "Who is this?" Scene 1. Solomon and his bride appear in the presence of her kinsfolk (5-7). Scene 2. The Shulammite in her paternal home; dialogue between her and her brothers and the king (8-14).

But the opinion that the Song is a drama, although widely entertained in modern times and unobjectionable in itself, has not failed to meet with decided and well-founded opposition. The Song does not naturally conform to the rules of dramatic unity. A regular plot is not yielded by the poem itself. A consecutive narrative can only be made out by supplying connecting links of which the poem knows nothing. Indeed, the several parts have been made to tell very different continuous tales, according as interpreters have supplied this or that connecting link. The Song as it stands is a continuous composition, with the love of Solomon and his bride for its one theme; but the several scenes are grouped rather than linked, and the transitions are abrupt. The arrangement is not pleasing to the occidental mind, which loves order and logical sequence, but the structure of the poem is in entire harmony with oriental methods of literary composition.

Three leading methods of interpretation have been adopted, and all still find advocates: the allegorical, the literal, and the typical methods. The Jews, who have always greatly prized the Song of Songs, have generally regarded it as a spiritual allegory. Its sole intention was to teach God's love for ancient Israel. He is the Lover, and it the being beloved. The allegorical interpretation was introduced into the Christian church by Origen, a great allegorizer, early in the third century, but it underwent a modification. Christ became the Lover, and his church or the individual soul the beloved one. The details of this scheme may be learned from the headings of the several chapters in the A. V. On the literal interpretation the poem is an historical tale, a true story of Solomon's love for the Shulammite. The typical interpretation, to a certain extent, harmonizes the other two. The pure, spontaneous, mutual love of a great king and an humble maid was seen to exemplify the mutual affection between Jehovah and his people, and the story was told, not merely because it was beautiful, but chiefly because it was typical of this great religious truth. The Song of Songs is thus analogous to Messianic psalms, which are based on the personal experiences or official position of David or Solomon, and exhibit truths regarding the great king. The comparison of the mutual love between the church and its divine head to that of a bride and a bridegroom frequently occurs in the N. T. (Eph. v. 25-33; Rev. xix. 7-9; xxi. 9, etc.).

Regarding the date and authorship of the Song, it will be perceived at once that the shepherd theory disposes of the possibility that the poem proceeded from the pen of Solomon. The king had his faults, but there is no reason to believe that he was a monster of iniquity such as the poem, when interpreted on the shepherd hypothesis, depicts him. The shepherd hypothesis requires the assumption of another and a later author than Solomon. Turning to the marks of authorship and date found in the poem, the title first engages attention: "The Song of songs, which is Solomon's" (i. 1). The words are ambiguous, according to the Hebrew idiom; they may mean either that Solomon was the author of the Song (cp. Hab. iii. 1, Hebrew), or that the Song is about Solomon (cp. Is. v. 1, Hebrew). The ambiguity is admitted, but the probabilities unquestionably favor the belief that the title attributes the poem to Solomon. The mind of the author as revealed in the Song admirably comports with all that is known of Solomon. The figurative language in the speeches of the king not merely reflects nature, but mirrors the gardens of exotics of which Solomon was fond. Extensive knowledge of all realms of nature, such as he possessed who spoke of trees, from the cedar even unto the hyssop, and of beasts, fowl, creeping things, and fishes, is exhibited throughout the poem. And a minute and accurate picture of the time of Solomon is presented. Aramaisms are urged as indicating a later date than Solomon. But the orthography, apart from three words, is not Aramaic, and the syntactic peculiarity of the poem is confined to the use of a relative pronoun which occurs among other places in the song of Deborah and the history of Elisha, both of which are confessedly ancient Hebrew compositions, the former antedating the reign of Solomon by several centuries. Ewald and Hitzig believed that the poem was produced in the best period of the Hebrew language, and at a time of great national prosperity. They attributed it to a poet who lived in the generation after Solomon. The three Aramaic forms, netar, keep (i. 6, viii. 11, 12), broth, fir (i. 17), sthav, winter (ii. 11), are regarded by these critics as an idiom in the dialect of northern Palestine, and they accordingly attribute the song to a poet of the northern kingdom. But, assuming that these words were characteristic of the north, Solomon himself in addressing the Shulammitte maid, who was probably from Shunem, and in quoting her speeches, may have adopted these words in order to give to his poem the northern flavor. It is affirmed that pardes, orchard, park (iv. 13), and 'appuryon, palanquin (iii. 9, R. V.; in Sanscrit paryāyā; others, Greek phorēon) are of Aryan origin, and accordingly betray the post-exilic date of the poem. But even if they are of Aryan origin, why should it be thought strange that a king who sent his ships to distant Ophir, traded with India, and brought to Palestine Indian goods and objects with Aryan names, such as apes, peacocks, algum wood, should also import the palanquin and retain its native name, and give the oriental designation to the gardens which he filled with oriental plants?

Sons of God.

Worshippers and beneficiaries of God; see SON 3. Such was its common Semitic meaning in early times. There is abundant reason to believe that this is its signification in the celebrated passage where it first appears in the Bible. "It came to pass, when men began to multiply on the face of the ground, and daughters were born unto them, that the sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair; and they took them wives of all that they chose" (Gen. vi. 1, 2). Three interpretations have been proposed. The sons of God are: 1. The great and noble of the earth, and the daughters of men are women of inferior rank (Samaritan version; Greek translation of Symmachus; Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan). 2. Angels, who left their first estate and took wives from among the children of men (Book of Enoch, Philo, Josephus, Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, Tertullian). 3. Pious men, worshippers of God, who were especially represented by the descendants of Seth. They were attracted by the beauty of women who did not belong to the godly line, married with them, and became secularized (Julius Africanus, Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria, Augustine, Jerome). The first interpretation has no longer any advocates. In favor of the second, it is asserted that the term denotes angels everywhere else in the O. T. (Job i. 6; ii. 1; xxxviii. 7, cp. a similar expression Ps. xxix. 1, lxxxix. 6; R. V. margin; but not Dan. iii. 25); that the designation describes angels according to their nature, whereas the ordinary word for angels, mal'akim, messengers, refers to their official employment, and that this interpretation is confirmed by Jude 6 and 2 Pet. ii. 4. But that the term relates to the nature of angels lacks proof, it is quite as natural that it should describe angels as worshippers of God. As to the passages in Jude and Peter, to cite them is begging the question, since exegetes point out other references, as Is. xxiv. 21-23; moreover in Jude the word "these" in verse 7 and elsewhere does not refer to angels that kept not their own principality (verse 6, R. V.), but to certain ungodly men (verse 4). And unless the title be restricted to the special form which it has in the passage under discussion, it is not true that the term denotes angels in all other places where it occurs in the O. T. The worshippers of the heathen deity Chemosh are called the people of Chemosh, and his sons and daughters (Num. xxi. 29; Jer. xlviii. 46). When the men of Judah, professed worshippers of Jehovah, took heathen women to wife, Judah was said to have married the daughter of a strange god (Mal. ii. 11). Moses was directed to say to Pharaoh: "Thus saith the LORD, Israel is my son. . . . Let my son go" (Ex. iv. 22, 23). Other passages are: "Ye are the children [or sons] of the LORD your God" (Deut. xiv. 1). "They have dealt corruptly with him [Jehovah], they are not his children [or sons]." "Is not he [Jehovah] thy father?" "The LORD saw it, and abhorred them, because of the provocation of his sons and his daughters" (xxxii. 5, 6, 19). "Ye are the sons of the living God" (Hos. i. 10). "When Israel was a child . . . I . . .

called my son out of Egypt" (xi 1) "Bring my sons from far, and my daughters from the end of the earth; every one that is called by my name, and whom I have created for my glory" (Is. xlii. 6, 7). The pious are the generation of God's children (Ps. lxxiii. 15), and Ephraim is his dear son (Jer. xxxi. 20). Taking a broader survey, and examining Semitic literature other than Hebrew, one observes the same fact. Many a Babylonian styled himself the son of the god whom he worshiped and upon whom he relied for protection and care.

Furthermore, the opinion that the title in Gen. vi 2 means angels is not the earliest view, so far as the records go. The earliest attested interpretation, that of the Samaritan version, regarded the sons of God as men; and later when the angelic theory arose, it was the opinion of a particular school among the Jews, while the more influential party in religious matters still taught that the sons of God were men.

The theory that angels are meant contradicts the doctrine of Scripture concerning angels. Its writers nowhere countenance the idea that an angel could or would enter into marriage with a human being. They invariably represent the passions of angels, fallen and unfallen, as spiritual, not carnal. The notion is quite foreign to Scripture that woman's beauty could arouse animal love in an angel.

The interpretation that the sons of God in Gen. vi 2 were pious people, the worshipers of the true God, more especially that they were the godly descendants of Adam through Seth, whose genealogy is given in Gen. v, is not only in accordance with Semitic, and particularly biblical, usage of the designation, as already shown, but it is consistent with the context. The sons of God are contrasted with the daughters of men, that is, of other men. So Jeremiah says, "God did set signs in Israel and among men," and the English version supplies the word other before men, in order to bring out the sense (Jer. xxxii. 20). Likewise the psalmist says that the wicked "are not in trouble as men; neither are they plagued like men," and again the English version supplies the word other (Ps. lxxiii. 5). After the same manner Gen. vi. 1, 2 may be read: "When mankind began to multiply on the face of the ground, and daughters were born unto them, the sons of God saw the daughters of other men that they were fair; and they took them wives of all that they chose." The meaning of the writer is that when men began to increase in number, the worshipers of God so far degenerated that in choosing wives for themselves they neglected character, and esteemed beauty of face and form above piety. The offspring of these marriages were perhaps stalwart and violent (4). Mixture of race in marriage often produces physical strength in the descendants, and lack of religion in the parents is apt to be reproduced in the children. The intermarriage of the sons of God and the daughters of men was offensive in the sight of God. Sentence was pronounced against the wrongdoers (3). The penalty is not denounced on angels, who were not only implicated, but were the chief sinners, if the sons of God were angels. The punishment is pronounced against man only. Man, not angels, had offended.

Sons of God everywhere in Scripture, from the earliest to the latest times, means the worshipers and beneficiaries of God, both among mortal and immortal beings. But the content of this idea did not remain the same through the ages. It became larger with increasing knowledge of the riches of God. It enlarged, for example, at the time when the Israelites were delivered from Egypt. God said: "I have seen the affliction of my people" (Ex. iii 7), and again: "Say unto Pharaoh, Israel is my son, my firstborn; who is as dear to me," so the following words imply, "as Pharaoh's firstborn is to him" (iv. 22 with 23); and again: "I will take you to me for a people, and I will be to you a God" (vi 7). Heretofore the title had emphasized a filial relation of men to God, their dependence upon him for protection and care, and their duty of reverence and obedience. Now God formally accepts the obligations which implicitly devolve on him. The content of the title was further enlarged through the teaching of Jesus Christ. He took truths already known, shed light on them, and connected them with this designation. He exhibited the fact that God is an actual father and that his people are actual children of God. They are such by the new birth (John iii 3, 5, 6, 8; cp. Rev. xi 11), begotten of God (John i 12, 13; v. 21; and so Eph. ii 5; Jas. i 18; 1 Pet. i 23), made partakers of the divine nature through the mediation of the indwelling Spirit (John vi 48-51; xv 4, 5, and so 1 John iii 9), and possessing a like character with God, resembling him in holiness, love, and elevation above the illusions of earth (1 John iii. 9, iv. 7; v. 4), although falling far short of the divine character in this life (i. 8, 10). They have been adopted as sons (Gal. iv 5), are taught by the Spirit to say Abba, Father (6; Rom. viii 15), and are led by the Spirit (14).

Sons of the Pro'phets. See PROPHETIC ASSOCIATIONS.

Sooth-say-er [sayer of truth].

A diviner (Josh. xii. 22, with Num. xxii. 7), one who prognosticates future events (Jer. xxvii. 9, R. V., in Hebrew 'on'um'). As rendering of the Aramaic Gazrin, it denotes one who professed to be able to interpret dreams (Dan. iv. 7) and explain dark sentences (9; v. 11, 12), and to whom men in desperation resorted to obtain, if possible, the revelation of secrets (ii. 27).

Sop'a-ter [of good parentage].

A Christian of Berea, and one of Paul's companions from Greece as far as the province of Asia, when the apostle was returning from his third missionary journey (Acts xx. 4). He was son of Pyrrhus (R V.).

Soph'e-reth, in R V. of Ezra Rassophereth, with the Hebrew article [secretariate].

The name, probably denoting an office, belonging to a certain class of Solomon's servants. Members of it returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii 55, Neh. vii 57).

Sor'cer-er.

One who practices sorcery, uses potions that derive a supposed efficacy from magical spells, and professes to possess supernatural power or knowledge, gained in any manner, especially through the connivance of evil spirits (Ex vii 11; Antiq xvii 4, 1; Life 31). Sorcerers were found in Egypt (Ex. vii 11), Assyria (Nah iii 4), Babylonia (Is xlvii. 9; Dan ii 2), and other heathen lands (Deut xviii 10); but were strictly forbidden in Israel (Ex. xxii 18; Deut xviii. 10), and warning was uttered against their deception (Jer xxvii 9), and their punishment was foretold (Mic v 12; Mal iii 5; Rev xxi 8). The Hebrew and Greek words for sorcerer and sorcery are sometimes rendered witch and witchcraft in the English versions. Simon, called Magus or magician, and Bar-jesus were prominent sorcerers in apostolic history (Acts viii 9, 11; xiii 6, 8). A sorceress, and likewise the sorcerer and the practitioner of other forms of the black art, were not to be permitted to live (Ex xxii 18; Lev xx 27; Deut xviii 10-12). God's own attitude toward such persons and those who consulted them was also one of destruction (Lev xx 6, 23; Deut xviii 12; Wisd xii 4-6).

So'rek [a choice vine]

A valley in which Delilah lived (Judg xvi 4). It is doubtless the wady es-Surâr, which commences about 13 miles west, slightly south, of Jerusalem, and pursues a tortuous course in a northwesterly direction toward the Mediterranean Sea. It is traversed by a stream which falls into the sea about 8½ miles south of Joppa. The name Sûrik is still borne by a run north of the valley, 2 miles from Zorah, Samson's birthplace.

So-sip'a-ter [saviour of a father].

A Christian who joined with Paul in sending salutations (Rom xvi 21).

Sos'the-nes [of sound strength].

A ruler of the Jewish synagogue at Corinth when Paul was there. In the outbreak which Paul's preaching excited, the crowd seized Sosthenes and beat him before the judgment seat of Gallio (Acts xviii 17, R. V.). Perhaps he became a Christian, for one Sosthenes is associated with Paul as a brother Christian in the address to the Corinthians (1 Cor. i 1).

So'tai [deviator].

One of the class known as Solomon's servants. He founded a family, members of which returned with Zerubbabel from captivity (Ezra ii. 55; Neh. vii. 57).

Soul.

In ordinary English usage, a spirit is an immaterial, incorporeal being, which may or may not be associated with a body, as "God is a Spirit," "My spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour" (John iv 24; Luke i 47); a soul is a spirit that is or at least has been embodied, as the souls of them that had been slain (Rev vi. 9); and a ghost is a disembodied spirit.

Theologians entertain two main views as to the soul, and consequently as to the nature of man and irrational animals. One is embraced under the doctrine of trichotomy. Trichotomists differ considerably among themselves: but according to the doctrine, in its general outlines, man consists of three parts or essential elements, body, soul, and spirit (1 Thes v 23). The body is the material part of man's constitution. The soul, in Hebrew nephesh, in Greek psuchê, is the principle of animal life: man possesses it in common with the brutes; to it belong understanding, emotion, and sensibility, and it ceases to exist at death. The spirit, in Hebrew ruah, in Greek pneuma, is the mind, the principle of man's rational and immortal life, the possessor of reason, will, and conscience. God created man by enlivening inorganic matter formed into a body, and then creating a rational spirit and infusing it (Gen ii. 7), and at death the dust or body returns to the earth as it was, and the spirit returns unto God who gave it (Ecc xii 7). The soul of life, in Hebrew nephesh hayyah, in the instance of the animal (Gen. i. 21, 24) is only the animal soul, which is physical and material in its nature, and perishes with the body of which it is the vital principle; but the soul of life in the instance of man (ii 7) is a higher principle, the rational soul, which was inbreathed by the Creator and made in his image. Usually the biblical writers do not distinguish the psuchê or animal soul, which is the lower side of the human soul, from the pneuma or rational soul, the higher side, since they constitute one soul, psuchê, in distinction from the body, and they are sometimes designated in their unity by pneuma, and sometimes by psuchê. Commonly the sacred writers speak of man as constituted of body and soul, or body and spirit, and not of body, soul, and spirit; but in 1 Cor. xv. 44, as in 1 Thes v. 23 and Heb. iv. 12, Paul requires the distinction between the animal and the rational soul for the purposes of his discussion, and he accordingly makes it.

According to dichotomy, on the other hand, there are only two essential elements in the constitution of man: the body formed from the dust of the earth, and the soul or principle of life (Gen. ii 7). The soul is the principle of the whole life of whatever subject is spoken of, whether man or beast. It is the principle of all life, physical, intellectual, moral, religious. There is not one substance, the soul, which feels and remembers, and another substance, the spirit, that acts as conscience and the knowledge of God. The soul of the brute is the living principle of the brute: it is conscious of the impressions which are made by external objects on the organs of sense belonging to the body; it is endowed with that measure of intelligence which experience shows the lower animals to possess, but it is irrational and mortal. Brutes perish because God does not will that the living principle in them should continue. The soul of man is the same in kind with that of the brute, but it differs in being of a higher order: in addition to the attributes of sensibility, memory, and instinct, it has the higher powers which pertain to the intellectual, moral, and religious life, and it has continued existence after the death of the body, not because of its inherent nature, but because God wills to preserve it. It is argued from the usage of words in Scripture in defense of this dualism that 1 Soul of life, nephesh hayyah, means simply animate existence, a being in which there is a living soul, and there is no authority to make it mean one thing in the case of a brute and quite another thing in the case of a man. 2 The Bible does not ascribe to beasts a psuchē only, and both a psuchē and pneuma to man. The living principle in brutes is called spirit, uah, as well as soul, nephesh, psuchē. "Who knoweth the spirit of man whether it goeth upward, and the spirit of the beast whether it goeth downward to the earth?" (Ecc. iii 1; cp. 19, R V margin; Gen. vii. 15). 3. No distinction is observed in the use of the words soul and spirit. The souls of them that were slain for the word of God are in heaven (Rev. vi 9; xx 4), and likewise the spirits of just men made perfect (Heb. xii. 3).

Trichotomists quote 1 Thes. v. 23 "The God of peace himself sanctify you wholly, and may your spirit and soul and body be preserved entire, without blame at the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (cp. Heb. iv. 12), as evidence that Paul distinguishes the animal soul from the rational spirit. But dichotomists reply that Paul's language is quite analogous to that employed in the command, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength" (Mark xii. 30; cp. Luke i. 46, 47). The intention in the demand for love, and in the prayer for preservation, is simply to lay stress on the whole man, and the description is accordingly plethoric. As heart, soul, strength, and mind are not so many essential elements in man's constitution, so there is no proof that body, soul, and spirit are. The main passage relied upon to support the trichotomist position is 1 Cor. xv. 44: "It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body. If there is a natural body, there is also a spiritual body." Trichotomists interpret the sōma psuchikon or natural body as one marked by the qualities of the psuchē or animal soul; namely, by physical appetites and passions, such as hunger, thirst, and sexual appetite. These are founded in "flesh and blood," or that material substance of which the present human body is composed. The resurrection, or spiritual body, on the other hand, will be marked by the qualities of the pneuma or rational soul. It will not be composed of flesh and blood, but of a substance which is more like the rational than the animal soul. There is, however, another interpretation, not only in harmony with the doctrine of the dual constitution of man, but in accord with the general usage of the words psuchikos and pneumatikos, natural and spiritual. The resurrection body of the redeemed will not be marked by the qualities of ordinary animal life, right and proper though that life is, but the resurrection body will be opposed to everything carnal, and will be characterized by the qualities which belong to the Spirit-led man. This appears from a study of the words. In established usage among the Greeks psuchē was the common word for the vital principle; which, however, might be thought of as a disembodied soul, the immortal part of man, and the organ of thought and judgment (Herod. ii 123; v 124; Plato, Tim. x, i e., v 30^b), hence psuchikos referred primarily to the ordinary animal life, and is so used by Paul, James, and Jude (1 Cor. ii 14; Jas. iii 15; Jude 19). Pneumatikos, on the other hand, almost exclusively has reference in Scripture to the Pneuma agion, the Holy Spirit. It is opposed to carnal and fleshly, to human nature deprived of the Spirit of God; it refers to possession and control by the Holy Spirit as contrasted with the domination of the flesh (1 Cor. iii 1); it denotes what is effected by the Spirit and pertains to the Spirit (Rom. i. 11; 1 Cor. ii. 13, xii. 1). Hence a spiritual body, contrasted with a natural body, is a body not only free from fleshly lusts, but elevated above the physical passions and appetites which are natural to man (Mat. xxii 30), in vital union with the Spirit of God, and marked by the qualities which characterize the Spirit-led man.

Sow'er and Sow'ing.

Sowing began with the rain of October; see YEAR. The seed was required to be ceremonially clean (Lev. xi. 37, 38). The sower held the vessel containing the seed in the left hand, and scattered the seed with his right; see illustration, article Plow. When the soil was favorable, he seems sometimes to have cast in front of the plow, which then served the purpose of a harrow to cover the seed. Wheat was best sown, it was thought, in rows (Is xxviii 25, R V). The sowing of mixed seed was forbidden (Lev. xix. 19; Deut. xxii. 9), as being contrary to nature as established by the Creator; but the planting of several kinds of seeds in different sections of the same field was permitted.

Spain.

The well-known country in the southwestern portion of Europe. Its mines yielded gold and silver (1 Mac. viii 3). Paul desired to visit it (Rom. xv. 24, 28), and probably carried out his intention, for Clement of Rome, writing from Italy about A. D. 96, says that Paul "reached the bounds of the west," and the Muratorian fragment, written about A. D. 170, states explicitly that he went to Spain. This visit must have taken place after Paul's imprisonment at Rome which is recorded in The Acts. See TARSHISH.

Spar'row.

The rendering of the Hebrew Sippor, chirper, in Ps lxxxiv 3; ci 7; and R. V. of Prov xxvi. 2. The word is more frequently translated bird; in fact, it is often employed as a general term for bird or fowl (Ps viii. 8, cxlviii 10; Ezek xiii 23). It may be a bird of prey (Jer xii 9; Ezek. xxxix. 17), such as the raven and crow, which are passerine birds, although they feed on carrion, or it may be a bird ceremonially clean, and large enough to be eaten as food (Lev. xiv 4; Neh v. 18). It may live in the mountains or in the town (Ps xi. 1; lxxxiv. 3), and may build its nest in trees or on the ground or about human habitations (Deut xxii 6; Ps lxxxiv 3). The term includes doves and pigeons (Gen xv 9, 10), and the etymology indicates that in the first instance it designates chirping birds, like the sparrow and the finch.

In the N. T. sparrow is the rendering of the Greek Strouthion, which denotes any small bird, especially one of the sparrow kind. It was sold and eaten (Mat. x 29; Luke xii 6, 7).

The house sparrow (Passer domesticus), familiarly known as the English sparrow, is found through Europe, northern Africa, and western Asia, and is common in the coast towns of Palestine. Two species of southern Europe, closely allied to it, the Italian sparrow (Passer italiae) and the marsh sparrow (Passer hispaniolensis), also occur, the latter chiefly in the Jordan valley, where it breeds in vast numbers in the thorn trees. The tree sparrow (Passer montanus) is a near relative of the house sparrow, and perhaps in Palestine should not be separated from it; but the sparrows which frequent the sacred precincts on the temple hill and are common on the mount of Olives have sometimes been spoken of by writers of authority as tree sparrows. Another sparrow (Passer moabiticus) is found in the vicinity of the Dead Sea, but is rare. The rock or foolish sparrow (Petronia stulla) is common on the central ridge of Palestine. It never resorts to inhabited dwellings. Thomson says that a sparrow which has lost its mate is often seen sitting alone on the housetop, lamenting its fate (cp Ps cii. 7). Tristram is inclined to see in this passage a reference to the blue thrush (Monticola cyaneus), a solitary bird which perches on the housetop, uttering meanwhile a monotonous and plaintive note.

Spar'tans.

Inhabitants of the celebrated city of Sparta in Greece. It was known also as Lacedæmon. Jonathan Maccabæus refers to an ancient friendship which existed between the Spartans and the Jews in the days of king Arius and the high priest Onias, about 300 B. C. (1 Mac. xii 7, 19-23; in A. V. Lacedæmonians); and he sent letters to them, when he sent an embassy to Rome, to renew the friendship with them (2, 5). Jonathan did not live to hear their answer, but Simon received cordial letters from them (xiv. 16, 20-23).

Spear.

The spear, called in Hebrew h^anith, consisted of a metallic head on a shaft (1 Sam. xiii. 19; xvi 7; Is ii 4). It could be carried in the hand, stuck in the ground when not wanted, and though used for thrusting, could be hurled (1 Sam. xviii. 10, in A. V. javelin; xxvi 7, 8; 2 Sam. ii 23; John xix 34).

A long spear, the Arab rumh, was used (Judg v 8; 1 Chron xii 8, 24; Neh iv 13; Jer xlvii. 4). It was called romah by the Hebrews, and was used for thrusting (Num. xxv 7, 8, R. V.), not for throwing. In R. V., it is once rendered lance (1 Kin. xviii. 28), in A. V. of 1611 lancer, later corrupted into lancet.

Spear'men.

The rendering of the Greek Dezitolabos or, as in the Alexandrian manuscript, Dezrobolos in Acts xxiii. 23, a body of troops distinguished from the legionary soldiers and the cavalry. In the only other passage where the word occurs, which is late, they are distinguished from archers and targeteers. Evidently they were light-armed soldiers who carried a weapon in the right hand.

Spelt.

The revised rendering of the Hebrew Kussemeth (Ex ix. 32 and Is xxviii. 25, in A. V. rye; Ezek. iv. 9, in A. V. fitches). Spelt is an inferior kind of wheat, the chaff of which slightly adheres to the grain. It was sown in Egypt, springing up after the barley (Ex. ix. 32). The Egyptians made their bread of it (Hered. ii 36, 77). Rye is a northern plant, and is not grown in Egypt and Palestine.

Spice.

1. The rendering of the Hebrew Bosem and its plural B'samm, which are used generically for fragrant stuff, spice, spicery (Ex. xxv. 6 with xxx. 23, 24; 1 Kin. x. 10, Song iv. 10, 14). Spice is a vegetable substance possessing aromatic and pungent qualities (Song iv. 16). The chief spices were myrrh, cinnamon, calamus, and cassia or costus (Ex. xxx. 23, 24). Southern Arabia was the great, but not exclusive, producer of them (1 Kin. x. 2; Ezek. xxvii. 22). Bosem in Song v. 13; vi. 2, and basam in v. 1, are probably applied specifically to balsam or balm of Gilead (R. V. margin).

2. N'ko'th (Gen. xxxvii. 25; xliii. 11) is probably a specific term for tragacanth or storax (R. V. margin). A form of this word is perhaps used in 2 Kin. xx. 13; Is. xxxix. 2 for spices in general.

3. Samm, fragrant odors, were aromatic substances used in the preparation of incense (Ex. xxx. 7). Three are specified: stacte or opobalsamum, onycha, and galbanum (34).

4. The rendering of the Greek Arōma, a generic term (Mark xvi. 1), including myrrh and aloes (John xix. 40).

Spice Mer'chant.

The rendering of the Hebrew Rokel in 1 Kin. x. 15. It means simply, as the R. V. makes it, a merchant; and A. V. renders it so elsewhere, e. g. Ezek. xxvii. 13.

Sp'ider

An animal of the class Arachnida, called in Hebrew 'akkabish. It weaves a web (Job viii. 14; Is. lix. 5). The number of species in Palestine amounts to 600 or 700. In A. V. spider is the rendering of the Hebrew S'mamith, poisonous thing (Prov. xxx. 28, in R. V. lizard).

Spike'nard.

A fragrant plant, in Hebrew nerd (Song iv. 13, 14), from which an aromatic ointment was made, called nardos in Greek (Mark xiv. 3). It is believed to be Nardostachys jatamansi, a plant of the Valerian family, with fragrant roots, growing in the Himalaya Mountains at an elevation of 11,000 to 17,000 feet. It was used by the Hindus as a medicine and perfume from remote antiquity, and was early an article of commerce. The long distance which it had to be brought to Palestine rendered it on its arrival very precious. The alabaster cruse of it, which was poured over the head of Jesus, was worth 300 denarii (Mark xiv. 3, 5). According to Pliny, the ointment varied in price from 25 to 300 and even 400 denarii a pound, according to the quality (Hist. Nat. xii. 26; xiii. 2, 4). In Mark xiv. 3; John xii. 3 (see R. V. margin), the spikenard is described by the Greek adjective prutikos, a variant of pistos, genuine, or of pistos, liquid. Some interpreters, however, think that the adjective denotes the place where this variety was obtained.

Spikenard (Nardostachys jatamansi)

Spin'ning.

Spinning was the work of the women (Ex. xxxv. 25). The wheel was unknown, and spinning was done by hand. Distaff and spindle were used (Prov. xxxi. 19). The flax or wool was wound on the distaff, which was held under the arm or stuck upright in the ground, and the thread was drawn out by hand. To the end of this thread the spindle, with a circular rim to steady it when revolving, was attached and by rotating it the spinner twisted the thread. See illustration, article WEAVING.

Spir'it. See SOUL and HOLY GHOST.

Spring. See FOUNTAIN.

Sta'chys [an ear of grain].

A Christian at Rome to whom the apostle Paul sent a salutation (Rom. xvi. 9).

Stac'te.

The rendering of the Hebrew Nataph, a drop. It denotes a sweet spice, which was used for incense (Ex. xxx. 34; cp. Eccles. xxiv. 15). The Septuagint interprets nataph by staktē, which likewise signifies a drop or exudation, and was employed for the oil which trickles from fresh myrrh or cinnamon. It is believed, however, that nataph is the gum of the storax tree, or else opobalsamum (R. V. margin).

The storax (Styrax officinalis) is a resinous shrub or small tree, from 10 to 20 feet high, with flowers resembling those of the orange in color, size, and fragrance, and mostly growing in spikes of four or five. The tree is very showy when in bloom. It is native in Asia Minor and Syria, and abounds in Stacte (Styrax officinalis)

Galilee. The officinal storax is the inspissated juice of the bark; it is used medicinally as an expectorant, and also in perfumery. The liquid storax of commerce is the product of an entirely different plant.

Opobalsamum (R V margin) is a resinous juice, also called balm and balm of Gilead (q v).

Star.

The number of the stars and their grouping in constellations early attracted man's attention (Gen. xxii 17; Is xiii 10). Orion, Pleiades, the Bear, the zodiac were pointed out (Job ix 9; xxxviii 31, 32), planets were known and named (2 Kin xxiii 5 see BABYLONIA, CHIUN, LUCIFER), perhaps meteors or comets are referred to (Jude 13), the position of certain stars served as dates (Antiq xiii 8, 2), and in Egypt the successive rising of thirty-six constellations marked off an equal number of ten-day periods in the year; see WEEK. The stars were recognized in Israel as the handiwork of God (Gen. i 16; Ps vii 3), and as under his control (Is xiii 10; Jer. xxxi. 35).

But among the heathen and the degenerate Israelites the stars became objects of worship (Deut iv 19, 2 Kin xvii 16); altars were reared, and incense was burnt to them (xxi 5, xxiii 5). They were believed to exercise influence, not only in the ordinary economy of nature (cp Job xxxviii 31, A V.), but also over the affairs of men. This belief was widespread among the heathen. Deborah may perhaps be subsidizing a phrase of current speech, in which a reminiscence of heathen notions lingers, when she poetically describes the stars from their courses fighting against Sisera (Judg v. 20); but Bertheau is probably correct in understanding her to speak poetically of divine assistance (iv 15), as if heaven or, to use her own words, as if the stars, forsaking their usual orbits, had fought against Sisera (cp. Ps. xviii 9). A reference has also been seen in her words to a providential storm which discomfited the Canaanites, and ver 21 and Josephus (Antiq. v 5, 4) are cited in confirmation: but Josephus probably deduces this storm from the analogy of Josh x 10, 11 and 1 Sam vii. 10. The stars were also supposed by the heathen to portend coming events, and they were observed with a view to prognostication (Is. xlvii. 13). See ASTROLOGERS.

J D D

Several stars mentioned in the N. T. require particular notice:

1. The day-star (2 Pet i. 19) is probably a figurative description of the signs immediately preceding the second advent. Others understand it as the Spirit's illumination of the believer's heart.

2 The morning star (Rev ii 28) the bright, the morning star (xxii 16, R. V.) Both these phrases are probably designations of Christ as the herald to his people of the eternal day. See LUCIFER.

3 The star of the wise men; see MAGI. The usual view has been that this was a purely supernatural phenomenon, a starlike object which appeared to the Magi in their eastern sky, and suggested to them, perhaps through their acquaintance with the prophecy of Balaam (Num xxiv 17) or other predictions, that the king of the Jews was born, and which afterward reappeared, as they journeyed from Jerusalem to Bethlehem, and guided them on their way until it rested over the house in which Jesus was. Others, however, consider it a natural phenomenon providentially used to direct the Magi. In Dec., 1603, the astronomer Kepler noted a conjunction of Jupiter and Saturn, joined in March, 1604, by Mars, and in Oct., 1604, by a brilliant new star, which gradually faded and vanished in Feb., 1606. Kepler calculated that the planets were in conjunction in 7 and 6 B. C., and, supposing that the new or variable star had followed the conjunction then as it did in 1604, believed it to be the star of the Magi. Others have identified the Magi's star with the planetary conjunction itself, and the calculations of Kepler have been corrected by Ideler, Pritchard, and Encke, with the result that we know that in 7 B. C. there were three conjunctions of Jupiter and Saturn, in May, September, and December. Hence, it has been supposed that the Magi saw the heavenly spectacle in May; connected it, through their astrology and knowledge of Hebrew prophecy and expectation, with the birth of a Jewish king, and, when going from Jerusalem to Bethlehem in December, saw again the conjunction overhead. But the word star can hardly mean a conjunction, and this view would place Christ's birth earlier than other considerations warrant. If we can believe that Kepler's variable star followed the conjunction, as he supposed, it would answer the conditions better than the conjunction itself. It is on some accounts more probable that the event was a natural rather than a supernatural phenomenon. The Magi were doubtless astrologers, and would attach special ideas to the positions and variations of the stars. The star did not go before them to Judæa, but only, after its reappearance, did it seem to lead them from Jerusalem to Bethlehem. On the other hand, many think that Mat. ii. 9 cannot fairly be understood of anything but a supernatural phenomenon, nor can the astronomical calculations above described safely be held to have identified the star, even if it be regarded as a natural object. Steel.

A modified form of iron, resulting in elasticity and hardness. The earliest known and simplest method of reducing iron from its ore was capable of yielding steel. The Chalybes in Pontus were celebrated for hardening iron, and their name was used by the Greeks for steel. Steel seems to have been used in ancient Egypt. Comparison with Syriac pal'da', as well as the context, suggests that the Hebrew word paldah in Nah. ii. 3 means steel (R. V., in A. V. torches).

Where steel occurs in A. V., brass is correctly substituted in R. V.

Steph'a-nas [crowned].

A Christian convert at Corinth. His household was the first fruit of Paul's labors in the province of Achaia. The apostle himself baptized its members, and they set themselves to minister unto the saints. Stephanas also visited the apostle, bringing him aid, and was with him when the First Epistle to the Corinthians was penned (1 Cor. i. 16; xvi. 15, 17).

Ste'phen [a wreath or crown].

The first Christian martyr. He is first mentioned as first in the list of the seven men chosen by the Jerusalem Christians, at the suggestion of the apostles, to superintend the distribution of the church's alms (Acts vi. 5). Since the appointment of these seven men, usually regarded as the first deacons, arose from the complaints made by the Greek-speaking or Hellenistic Jewish Christians that their widows were neglected in the daily ministrations, and since Stephen is itself a Greek name, and since the subsequent persecution of Stephen arose among the Greek-speaking Jews of Jerusalem, it is probable that Stephen himself was a Hellenist, and perhaps had come from abroad. He was a notable man; full of faith and of the Holy Ghost (5), who, after his appointment, became more than ever conspicuous as a preacher and worker of miracles (8). His activity occasioned for the first time opposition to the church among the foreign Jews, who had synagogues in Jerusalem. The trouble originated particularly in the synagogue of the Libertines (or freedmen) and Cyrenians and Alexandrians, with whom united certain Jews from Cilicia and Asia (9). These charged Stephen with blaspheming Moses and God, and, more especially, with declaring that Jesus would destroy the temple and change the customs derived from Moses (11-14). Luke states that the witnesses produced against Stephen were suborned and false, as those against Christ had been; but Stephen must have said something which could be thus perverted. He was brought before the sanhedrin, and from his defense, reported in Acts vii. 2-53, we can understand his position. He first recited God's early choice and guidance of the patriarchs (2-22), apparently to bring out the fact that God from the beginning had been leading Israel to a definite goal; then, continuing the history, he showed that the Hebrews had repeatedly resisted God's purpose with them, both in the days of Moses and subsequently (23-43), and had failed to see the temporary and typical character of both tabernacle and temple (44-50). Then, suddenly stopping his argument he bitterly charged them with resisting, as their fathers had done, the Holy Ghost, with having slain the Christ as their fathers had slain the prophets, and with failing to keep in reality their own law (51-53). At this point the listeners gnashed upon him with their teeth and prepared to rush upon him. A vision was given him of the Son of man standing (as though to receive him) at the right hand of God; and, when he declared it, they seized him, cast him out of the city and stoned him. It was not lawful for them to put anyone to death without permission from the Romans, but the martyrdom was evidently the result of an uncontrollable outburst. The speech and death of Stephen mark the transition of Christianity from its earliest Jewish form to its extension among the gentiles. Peter preached Christianity as the fulfillment of prophecy, Stephen preached it as the goal of Hebrew history. Yet while Stephen declared that Christianity could not be limited by Judaism, he did not set forth like Paul afterwards, its gentle mission or its deliverance, by the doctrine of salvation by faith alone, from its Jewish environment. He marks, therefore, the transition from Jewish to gentile Christianity. Moreover the persecution which followed his martyrdom led to the dispersion of the disciples and so in fact to the carrying of the gospel to the Samaritans and then to the gentiles Stephen's personal character also was very beautiful. As a man he was "full of faith and of the Holy Ghost" (vi. 5); as a preacher, "full of faith and power" (8); before the council, his enemies "saw his face as it had been the face of an angel" (15); and his last words were: "Lord, lay not this sin to their charge" (vii. 60).

The inspiration of Stephen, so far as his recorded speech is concerned, is a disputed question. He is said (vii. 55) to have been "full of the Holy Ghost," but some of his historical statements are thought by many not to harmonize with the O T. Others hold that they can be harmonized, or at least might be if we knew all the facts. Either view can be adjusted to the doctrine of inspiration, since the phrase "full of the Holy Ghost" need not mean "inspired" in the technical sense (see Acts vi. 3; Eph. v. 18), and since the inspiration of Luke merely guarantees the correctness of his report of what Stephen said, not the correctness of Stephen's utterances themselves. Stocks.

An instrument of punishment, called in Hebrew sad, consisting of a wooden frame, hence called xulon in Greek, in which the feet were put and firmly held (Job xiii. 27, xxxiii. 11; Acts xvi. 24). The prisoner sat meanwhile. A special form of the apparatus, apparently, was called in Hebrew mahpeketh, turning, torsion, because the body was forced into an unnatural position (2 Chron. xvi. 10, R. V. margin; Jer. xx. 2). It included shackles or rather a collar; at least these could be used on the prisoner at the same time (xxix. 26, R. V.), so that his neck, arms, and legs could all be held fast together.

Sto'ics [Greek stokos, pertaining to the porch]

A sect of philosophers, one of two which Paul encountered at Athens (Acts xvii. 18). Their founder was Zeno of Citium in Cyprus, who must not be confounded with an earlier philosopher, Zeno of Elea, in Italy. The Cyprian Zeno was born, it is believed, between 357 and 352 B. C., and died between 263 and 259, having lived little short of a century. Removing from his native place to Athens, he taught for about fifty-eight years in a stoa, or porch, on the public market place. His doctrine was essentially pantheistic. The Stoics distinguished matter and force as the ultimate principles in the universe; and the force working everywhere they called reason, providence, God, and regarded it as conscious and thinking, yet dependent and impersonal, a breath or a fire which forms, permeates, and vivifies all things, and which in accordance with inexorable necessity calls beings and worlds into existence and destroys them again, so that at the end of a cosmical period the universe is resolved into fire in a general conflagration, and the evolution of the world begins again, and so on without end. The human soul is a spark or emanation of this conscious but impersonal deity. It survives the body, but lives only for a cosmical period, and is reabsorbed at last into the source from which it came. The Stoics classed themselves among the followers of Socrates, and resembled him in their theory of life. They rigidly severed the morally good from the agreeable. They declared that an act is good or evil in itself, and that pleasure should never be made the end of an action. The highest good is virtue. Virtue is a life conformed to nature, or the agreement of human conduct with the law of the universe, and of the human with the divine will; it is especially resignation in respect to fate. The cardinal virtues are practical wisdom as to what is good and evil, courage, prudence or self-restraint, and justice. Zeno encouraged his followers to hold their feelings in rigid control, so as to be as much as possible independent of all disturbing influences, whatever occurrences might take place. Stoicism made noble characters. It continued as a power for about 400 years, its most eminent professors being the slave Epictetus, the philosopher Seneca, and the emperor Marcus Aurelius.

Stom'a-cher.

A part of dress, once worn by women, covering the pit of the stomach and the breast, and often highly ornamented. It is the rendering adopted in Is. iii. 24 of the Hebrew Phthgil, applied to an article of female attire. The meaning of the Hebrew word is not definitely known. A R. V. renders it robe; Luther, wide mantle.

Stone.

Palestine is a stony country, and it was often necessary to clear a field of stones preparatory to its cultivation (Is. v. 2). An enemy's fields were marred by throwing stones on them, and his wells were choked with stones (2 Kin. iii. 19, 25).

Stones were put to various uses: 1. For moles, quays (War i. 21, 6), city walls (1 Kin. xv. 22, Neh. iv. 3), for dwellings (Lev. xiv. 45, Amos v. 11), palaces (1 Kin. vii. 1, 9), fortresses, temples (vi. 7); for the pavement of courtyards and for columns (Esth. i. 6), and in Herodian times at least for paving streets (see STREET), and for aqueducts, reservoirs, bridges; dykes about vineyards (Prov. xxiv. 30, 31); altars (Ex. xx. 25). In building altars the Israelites used unhewn stones, likewise for an ordinary dyke, and when heaps of stones were made to commemorate an event (Gen. xxxi. 46) or to mark the grave of a notorious offender (Josh. vii. 26; viii. 29; 2 Sam. xvi. 17), a custom still in vogue in Syria and Arabia, but not restricted to the graves of evildoers. But for some purposes the stones were sawn and hewn (1 Kin. vii. 9, 11); and, where suitable, stones of enormous size were used, as in the walls of the temple (10) and the mole at Cæsarea (War i. 21, 6).

2 Single stones were used to close the mouth of cisterns and wells, and the entrance of tombs (Gen. xxix 2; Mat xxvii 60; John xi 38), to mark boundaries (Deut. xix. 14), and probably as way marks (Jer xxxi. 21). In Roman times mile stones were erected along the chief public highways, as, for example, on the road between Tyre and Sidon and between Pella and Gerasa, where they are still to be seen. Stones were set up to commemorate persons and events (Gen. xxxi. 45, xxxv 14, 20, 2 Sam xviii 18), and were sometimes inscribed with a record of deeds (Herod. ii 106, see MOABITE STONE). Stones, both in their natural state and graven, served as idols (Lev xxvi. 1; Deut. xxix. 17; 2 Kin. xix 18, cp Is lviii 6). Certain small stones, called in Greek bartuloi and bartula, which were often, if not always, meteorites and held sacred because they fell from heaven, played a part in gentile superstition. They were said to move, talk, and guard from evil. The Greek name, if it had a Semitic origin, as there is scarcely reason to doubt, is akin to beth'el and may indicate that the stone was regarded as the abode of a supernatural power, spirit, or god. The name was not used by the Semites to designate the rude stone pillars which they set up at places of worship (Deut. xii 3; see HIGH PLACES). The Israelites sometimes consecrated a single stone as a memorial to God (Gen. xxviii. 18-22, xxxv. 14; 1 Sam. vii 12; Is xix. 19), and they might give a religious name to the place (Gen. xxviii. 19; xxxv. 7) or even to the stone (1 Sam. vii 12), just as they sometimes called an altar by God's name (Gen. xxxiii 20; Ex. xvii 15, cp Gen. xxxv 7), but in the recorded cases they did not regard deity or power as resident in the stone or altar and did not pay it divine honor. If they worshiped, they worshiped God apart from the memorial stone (Gen. xxxi 54, xxxv 1, 7; 1 Sam. vii 9).

3. Stones were hurled by slings and catapults (Judg. xx 16; 1 Sam. xvii. 40; 2 Chron. xxvi. 15; Wisd. v 22; 1 Mac. vi. 51), and were a means of putting criminals to death (see STONING). Flints were used for striking fire (2 Mac. x. 3), and were shaped into rude form to serve as knives (Josh. v 2). Weights for scales were often cut out of stone (Deut. xxv. 13; see WEIGHTS), and tablets of stone were employed for written documents (Ex. xxiv. 12). Vessels for holding water were hewn from stone (Ex. vii. 19; John ii. 6), tables also (Ezek. xl. 42). A rounded stone, of thirty pounds' weight or so, was rolled back and forth over grain to crush it to flour, or two stones were formed into a mill for grinding (Deut. xxiv. 6).

The white stone mentioned in Rev. ii. 17 has been variously interpreted. 1. One of the stone tablets, written with the name of a person, which were used in some methods of casting the lot. 2 The stone or bean, bearing the name of a candidate, which was cast at elections in Greece. 3 The pebble of acquittal used in Greek courts. 4 The ticket presented to the victor at the Olympic games. 5 The instructions which the Roman emperors caused to be thrown to victorious contestants in the arena. And best—6 A small stone, a common writing material, white to symbolize the heavenly character of the victorious believer, and marked with the name bestowed as sign and seal of his future glory.

Figuratively stone denotes hardness or insensibility (1 Sam. xxv 37; Ezek. xxxiv 26), firmness or strength (Job vi 12; xli 24). A living stone is a stone in its natural condition, sound and not disintegrating. The followers of Christ are living stones built into the spiritual temple, of which Christ himself is the chief corner stone (Eph. ii 20-22; 1 Pet. ii 4-8).

Stones, Pre'cious.

All the precious stones referred to in the canonical Scriptures, except three, are enumerated in R. V. of Ex. xxviii 17-20 and Rev. xxi 11, 19-21, text and margin. The three remaining ones are adamant (Ezek. iii. 9), and ligure and sardine (Ex. xxviii 19; Rev. iv 3, both A. V.), and of these at least two are merely other names for two of those already mentioned. The precious stones are adamant, agate, amber, amethyst, beryl, carbuncle, chalcidony, chrysolite, chrysoprase or chrysoprasus, crystal, diamond, emerald, jacinth or hyacinth, jasper, lapis lazuli, ligure, onyx, pearl, ruby, sapphire, sardius or sardine, sardonix, and topaz.

Ston'ing.

The ordinary mode of capital punishment prescribed by Hebrew law (Lev. xx 2); see PUNISHMENT. It was an ancient method; and it was not confined to the Hebrews, but was practiced by the Macedonians and Persians as well. The execution took place outside the city (Lev. xxiv 14, 1 Kin. xxi 10, 13; Acts vii 58). The witnesses placed their hands on the head of the criminal in token that the guilt rested on him (Lev. xxiv. 14). They laid aside any clothing that might impede them in their solemn duty (Acts vii. 58). In cases of idolatry, and apparently in other cases also, the witnesses hurled the first stones (Deut. xxi. 9; xvii 7; cp John viii. 7; Acts vii 58). The rabbins state that the culprit was stripped of all clothing except a cloth about the loins, and was thrown to the ground from a scaffold about 10 feet high by the first witness, the first stone was cast by the second witness, on the chest over the heart of the criminal, and if it failed to cause death, the bystanders completed the execution. Sometimes the body was afterwards suspended until sundown or burnt (Deut. xxi. 23; Josh. vii. 25; Antiq. iv. 8, 24), and according to late Jewish law was not buried in the family grave

Stool, in R V Birth'stool.

A chair of peculiar form, upon which the patient sat during parturition. It was denominated 'obnayim, double stones, by the Hebrews (Ex. i 16), on account of its likeness to the potter's wheel. It is called kursee el-wladeh by the modern Egyptians Stork.

A bird called in Hebrew h'sidah, affectionate, on account of its love for its young. It was ceremonially unclean (Lev. xi 19; Deut. xiv. 18), dwelt in fir trees (Ps. civ. 17), and was migratory (Jer. viii. 7). It is the Ciconia alba, a white heron-like bird, which spends its winter in central and southern Africa, but in spring visits continental Europe, Palestine, and northern Syria in large numbers. It is about 4 feet high, with long red bill and legs, white plumage, and glossy black wings. It feeds on frogs and small reptiles or, lacking these, on offal, and hence was ceremonially unclean. It is regarded as a sacred bird, and in most places is unmolested, so that it fearlessly visits the haunts of man. The black stork, Ciconia nigra, named from the color of its back and neck, is also found in Palestine, being common in the valley of the Dead Sea. It breeds in trees.

Stran'ger, in R. V. generally Sojourner.

A stranger in the Mosaic law, and in the O T generally, means one not of Israelitish descent dwelling with the Hebrews, as distinguished from a foreigner temporarily visiting the land (Ex. xx. 10, Lev. xvi. 29; xvii. 8; 2 Sam. i. 13; Ezek. xiv. 7). The stranger was not a full citizen, yet he had recognized rights and duties. He was under the protection of God, and the Israelites were charged to treat him kindly (Lev. xix. 33, 34; Deut. x. 18, 19). His rights were guarded by injunctions in the law (Ex. xxii. 21; xxiii. 9). When poor, he enjoyed the same privileges as the Hebrew poor (Deut. xxiv. 19, 20). The prohibitions that rested on an Israelite rested on him (Ex. xii. 19; xx. 10, Lev. xvi. 29; xvii. 10; xviii. 26; xx. 2; xxiv. 16; and xvii. 15, which was modified later by Deut. xiv. 21); but he was not obligated to all positive religious duties which devolved on the Israelite. He was exempt, if he chose to be and if he was a free man, from circumcision and participation in the passover (Ex. xii. 43-46). The Israelites were encouraged to invite him to the sacrificial meals (Deut. xvi. 11, 14). He was allowed to sacrifice to the Lord, he shared in the atonement made for the sin of the congregation on account of sin unwittingly committed, he had the privilege of a sin offering for aught done unwittingly by himself, and the city of refuge offered him asylum in case of need (Lev. xvii. 8; Num. xv. 14, 26, 29; xxxv. 15). In case he contracted uncleanness he was required to employ the rights of purification (Lev. xvii. 15; Num. xix. 10). If he accepted circumcision for his household, he was admitted to the passover (Ex. xii. 48, 49). The chief disability under which he labored was that in case he became a bondman, the year of jubile did not bring him release, he could be bought and made an inheritance for the purchaser's children (Lev. xxv. 45, 46).

Ammonites and Moabites formed an exceptional class among the strangers. They were not allowed membership in Israel even by circumcision (Deut. xxiii. 3), but the son of an Israelite and a Moabitess might be admitted (cp. Jesse and Rehoboam). With the idolatrous Canaanites who were in the land at the time of the conquest intermarriage was strictly forbidden (vii. 3), but the remnant which was left after the conquest eventually became to a large extent proselytes. In Solomon's reign the census revealed 153,600 strangers in the realm (2 Chron. ii. 17).

In the N T the word stranger does not have this technical significance, but denotes one who is unknown (John x. 5), an alien (Luke xvii. 16, 18), a sojourner away from home (xxiv. 18, A V; Acts ii. 10, A V), an Israelite dwelling in the Dispersion (1 Pet. i. 1, A V).

Straw.

Wheat and barley straw, ground and cut to small pieces in the process of threshing, and doubtless often mixed with beans or barley, was used by the ancient Hebrews as fodder for their cattle, camels, asses, and horses (Gen. xxiv. 25, 32; Judg. xix. 19; 1 Kin. iv. 28; Is. xi. 7). The Egyptians, in making bricks, mixed it with clay to render them more compact and prevent their cracking. When Pharaoh withheld the chopped straw, the Hebrew slaves were compelled to go forth into the field and gather stubble, or rather stalks, for themselves, and chop their own straw (Ex. v. 7, 12, 16). Straw was probably not used by the ancient Hebrews as a litter in the stall. In Palestine to-day dried dung serves for this purpose.

Stream. See RIVER

Street.

The streets of oriental towns were generally narrow, tortuous, and dirty (Antiq. xx. 5, 3; War. ii. 14, 9; 15, 5). They were seldom wide enough to permit two laden camels to pass each other; but some were sufficiently broad for chariots to be driven through them (Jer. xvii. 25; Nah. ii. 4). Great cities were sometimes adorned by a grand avenue or even by several, as Alexandria and Babylon. In Damascus the street called Straight was a magnificent thoroughfare, 100 feet broad and divided into three avenues by rows of columns. Many streets were flanked by blank walls, seldom pierced except by doors, the windows of the houses opening on interior courts. The streets devoted to stores were lined by salesrooms with open fronts; and bazaar streets, each surrendered to one kind of business, were features of the ancient city (Jer. xxxvii 21; War v. 8, 1). The intersections of the streets were centers of concourse and display (Prov. i. 21; Mat. vi 5; Luke xiii. 26). At the gates were broad, open places where business was transacted. There is no evidence that the streets were paved in ancient times. But Josephus affirms that Solomon paved the roads leading to Jerusalem with black stones (Antiq. viii. 7, 4); and at the time of the Herods pavements were laid (xvi. 5, 3; xx 9, 7), and efforts were in some instances made toward keeping the streets clean (xv. 9, 6).

Stripes. See SCOURGE.

Strong Drink.

Intoxicating liquor, in Hebrew shekar (1 Sam. i. 13-15; Prov. xx. 1; Is. xxxix 9). Wine and strong drink were forbidden to the priest, when about to enter the sanctuary (Lev. x. 9; cp Ezek. xlv. 21), and kings and princes were warned against its use, lest it lead to perversion of judgment (Prov. xxxi 4, 5), yet Isaiah was compelled to point to the sad spectacle of priests and prophets, even in Judah, scandalously failing in duty through wine and strong drink (Is. xxviii. 7). Wine, strong drink, vinegar, any liquor of grapes, and even fresh grapes were forbidden the Nazirite (Num. vi 3; cp. Judg. xiii. 4; Luke i 15); see NAZIRITE. Both wine and strong drink were allowed at the feast spread by the bringer of tithes (Deut. xiv 26). On the basis of the exhortation, "Give strong drink unto him that is ready to perish" (Prov. xxxi. 6), kind-hearted women of Jerusalem provided stupefying draughts for criminals condemned to death (Mishna; cp Mark xv. 23).

Stub'ble. See STRAW.

Su'ah [sweepings].

An Asherite, a son of Zophah (1 Chron. vi. 36).

Su'cath-ite, in A. V. Suchathite.

A native or an inhabitant of an unknown place called Sucah (1 Chron. ii. 55).

Suc'coth [booths or huts].

1. A place east of the Jordan (Judg. viii. 4, 5; and Jerome on Gen. xxxiii 17), at which Jacob, on his return from Mesopotamia, after crossing the Jabbok (Gen. xxxii. 22), built himself a house, with booths for his cattle, giving the spot from the latter circumstance the name of Succoth (Gen. xxxiii 17). He journeyed thence to Shechem (18). It was in the valley of the Jordan, near Zarethan (1 Kin. vii. 46; Ps. lx. 6; cviii. 7), and was assigned to the Gadites (Josh. xiii. 27). In the time of Gideon it was an important town, ruled by seventy-seven elders. They refused him assistance when he was pursuing Zebah and Zalmunna, and were in consequence punished by him when he returned a victor (Judg. viii. 5-16). The site must be sought near the ford of Damieh, on the road between es-Salt and Nablus. Tell Deir 'Alla scarcely marks the place, although the Talmud states that the latter name of Succoth was Dar'alah; for the tell is on the northern side of the Jabbok, and the narrative almost certainly indicates that Succoth was on the southern side.

2. The first camping ground of the Israelites after leaving Kameses (Ex. xii 37; xiii 20; Num. xxxiii. 5, 6). Succoth is probably the Hebrew modification of Thuku, the Egyptian name of the civil city surrounding the sacred buildings of Pithom (q. v.).

Suc-coth-be'noth.

An idol which the Babylonian colonists set up in Samaria (2 Kin. xvii. 30). The tutelary deity of Babylon was Marduk, and his consort was Zarpanitum, although numerous other deities were worshipped in the city. The historian Rawlinson, followed by Schrader, proposed to identify Succoth-benoth with Zarpanitum, the latter part of the two names being essentially the same. Friedrich Delitzsch has a more plausible theory. He regards Succoth-benoth as a Hebraization of the Assyrian words sakktu būnūti, supreme judge of the universe, and he considers it to have been in this instance a title of Marduk.

Su'cath-ite. See SUCATHITE.

Suk'ki-im, in A. V. Sukkims [to the Hebrew ear, people living in huts, nomads].

One of the peoples furnishing soldiers to the army of Shishak, king of Egypt, when he invaded Palestine. They were evidently an African race (2 Chron. xii 3).

Sun.

The luminary of the day, created by God (Gen. i 16; Ps. lxxiv. 16; cxxxvi. 8), preserved by God (Jer. xxxi. 35, Mat. v 45) and subject to God (Ps. civ. 19); influential in promoting vegetation (Deut. xxxiii. 14; Sam. xxi. 4), and also burning it with it heat (Jon. iv 8). It is spoken of as rising and setting; is poetically described as occupying a tent in the heavens, its rising in the morning with vigor and joy is likened to bridegroom coming forth from his chamber (Ps. xix. 4-6). Death in the meridian of one's days, and the sudden loss of prosperity are likened to the setting of the sun at midday (Jer. xv. 9; Amos viii. 9; Mic. iii 6). The sun was worshiped by the nations contemporary with the Hebrews, notably by the Phoenicians under the name of Baal, by the Assyrians under that of Shamash, and by the Egyptians under that of Ra; see ASSYRIAN, BAAL, EGYPT II. 6, ON. The Hebrews were warned against all such heathenism, but sun worship nevertheless found entrance among them. Altars were erected to all the hosts of heaven (2 Kin. xxi. 5), incense was burned to the sun and horses were dedicated to (xxiii 5, 11; cp. the Persian worship, Herod. i. 189; vii. 54), and kisses were thrown to it with the hand (Job xxxi 26, 27).

Joshua commanded the sun to stand still. The older commentators referred the words of Hab iii 11 to this event, but the Hebrew construction and the context are against it. Sun and moon withdraw into their habitation. Dread before the presence of the Lord seizes all nature, and reveals itself in the trembling of the mountains, in the raging of the sea, and in the withdrawal of their light by sun and moon (10, 11). The first reference to the astronomical lengthening of the day at Beth-horon is found in Ecclesiasticus, and its author evidently believed that the sun and moon were checked in their courses. "Did not the sun go back by his hand? And did not one day become as two" (Ecclus xlv. 4). Josephus also understood that the day was lengthened (Antiq. v. 1, 17). Unquestionably God could work this wonder, with all that it involved. The circumstances, however, scarcely afforded an adequate occasion for so stupendous a miracle. Another interpretation has much in its favor. It is certain that Josh. x 12^b and 13^a are poetry. Verses 12-15 in all probability form a paragraph by themselves (cp. the repetition, 15 and 43), and are quoted from the Book of Jashar, a collection of poems with introductory and perhaps concluding remarks in prose (see JASHAR; cp. Job with its prose introduction and conclusion; cp. the position of the quoting clause in Josh. x 13 and 2 Sam 1 18). Joshua's words are the impassioned utterance of a general inspiring his army on the field of battle. Desirous that Israel may have time completely to overthrow the foe, he apostrophizes sun and moon. In fervent, imperious words, he demands time "Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon, and thou, Moon, in the valley of Ajalon." God granted his wish. Before the light of day failed, the people had avenged themselves of their enemies. A hail-storm assisted the Israelites, and they drove the enemy to Azekah and Makkedah, and made a great slaughter. This event, it seems, was worked up poetically in the Book of Jashar, and must be interpreted as poetry, as one interprets the psalmist when telling of the gift of manna, he says: "He commanded the skies above, and opened the doors of heaven; and he rained down manna upon them to eat, and gave them of the corn of heaven" (Ps. lxxviii. 23, 24); or as one understands the poet who, after relating the passage of the Red Sea and the Jordan, adds: "The mountains skipped like rams, and the little hills like lambs" (cxiv. 6); or as one understands the prophet Habakkuk when he pictures Jehovah as a warrior and says: "Thou didst ride upon thine horses, upon thy chariots of salvation" (Hab. iii. 8).

For the recession of the sun's shadow on the dial of Ahaz, see DIAL.

Suph [sedge].

A locality (Deut. i. 1, R. V.), situation unknown. The A. V., following the Vulgate and the Septuagint, assumes that the Hebrew word for sea has fallen out of the text. On this assumption the text originally was yam suph, Red Sea, and the reference was to that part of the sea known as the gulf of Akaba.

Su'phah [a rotatory storm, cultivable soil in the midst of dry land].

Probably a proper name, denoting the region in which Vaheb was situated (Num. xxi. 14, R. V.). Tristram connects it with the Sufieh, the name of an oasis southeast of the Dead Sea, but the sibilants do not correspond.

Sup'per. See MEAL.

Sure'ty.

A person who makes himself liable for the obligations of another (Prov. xxii. 26, 27). A surety was sometimes offered for a service to be rendered (Gen. xlv. 32), and, when commercial transactions were common, a surety was often required to be found before credit was given. The formalities consisted in giving the hand, in the presence of witnesses, to the person to whom the debt was due, and promising to discharge the obligation in case the debtor defaulted (Prov. vi 1, 2, xvii 18). The folly of becoming surety, especially in behalf of a stranger, was proverbial (xi. 15; xvii 18; xx 16); but it was regarded as proper under circumstances and for a moderate amount, and as a neighborly act (Ecclus viii 13, xxxix 14, 20), yet its grave dangers and its liability to abuse by a dishonest client were recognized (xxix 16-18).

Su'san-chite. See SHUSHANCHITE.

Su-san'na [a lily]

One of the women who ministered to Jesus of their substance (Luke viii. 3).

Su'si [horseman]

Father of Gaddi, the spy from the tribe of Manasseh (Num. xiii 11).

Swad'dling Band.

A cloth in which infants were wrapped (Job xxxviii 9; Ezek. xvi 4; Luke ii. 7, 12). The babe was laid diagonally on a square piece of cloth and two corners were turned over its body, one over its feet, and one under its head. The whole was then fastened by bands wound around the outside.

Swal'low.

1 A bird, in biblical and talmudic Hebrew d'ror, shooting straight out or freedom. It frequented the sanctuary at Jerusalem, and nested there (Ps. lxxxiv 3), and it was found in company with other small birds, like the sparrow (ibid; Prov. xxvi. 2, R. V.). The barn swallow of Great Britain (Hirundo rustica) is abundant in Palestine from March to the approach of winter. Several other species also occur, but are less common.

2. The rendering in the R. V. of the Hebrew Sus or Sis, a bird with a chattering note

(Is. xxxviii. 14), and migratory (Jer. viii. 7). Swallow is the rendering adopted by the Septuagint, Vulgate, and Syriac versions, but the A. V., following the rabbins, translates it crane. Tristram believes that the swift is intended. He says that the common swift (Cypselus apus) is called sis in the vernacular Arabic. It visits Palestine in immense numbers in its migrations, remaining from April to November, and building in the interval. Two other species of the genus occur in Palestine, the white-bellied swift (Cypselus melba) and the white-rumped swift (Cypselus affinis).

3. The rendering in A. V. of the Hebrew 'Agur (Is. xxxviii. 14; Jer. viii. 7) The R. V. in both passages renders it crane.

Swan.

The rendering of the Hebrew Tinshemeth, breathing, inflation, a name applied to an unclean bird (Lev. xi. 18; Deut. xiv. 16; text of A. V., margin of R. V.). The R. V. text makes it the horned owl. The same name belonged to a reptile classed with the lizards (Lev. xi. 30, in R. V. chameleon, in A. V. mole). Tristram thinks that the bird was probably either the purple gallinule (Porphyrio porphyrio) or the glossy ibis (Ibis falcinellus).

Swear'ing. See OATH.

Sweat.

It is a common occurrence for perspiration to break out suddenly over the body when the individual is under the influence of strong mental excitement. Well-authenticated cases have been recorded in which this perspiration has been colored with blood. The phenomenon is recognized in medical science, and is called diapedesis, or the oozing of the blood corpuscles through the walls of the blood vessels without rupture. During Christ's agony in Gethsemane his sweat became as it were great drops of blood falling down upon the ground (Luke xxii. 44).

Swine.

The swine was a ceremonially unclean animal (Lev. xi. 7; Deut. xiv. 8). It is dirty, does not refuse to eat offal and carrion, and the use of its flesh for food in hot countries is supposed to produce cutaneous diseases. It was not raised by the Arabs (Pliny, Hist. Nat. viii. 78), and was regarded as unclean by Phœnicians, Ethiopians, and Egyptians. In Egypt, however, a pig was sacrificed and eaten on the annual festival of the moon-god and Osiris (Bacchus); nevertheless, a man who accidentally touched a pig at once washed, a swineherd was not allowed to enter a temple, and was compelled to find a wife among the people of his own occupation, as no other man would give a daughter to him in marriage (Herod. ii. 47; con. Apion. ii. 14). To the Jews swine's flesh was abominable (Is. lxv. 4), the pig was the emblem of filth and coarseness (Prov. xi. 22; Mat. vii. 6; 2 Pet. ii. 22), and to feed swine was the lowest and most despicable occupation to which a Jew could be reduced (Luke xv. 15). Yet pork found entrance to the idolatrous feasts of degenerate Hebrews (Is. lxv. 4; lxvi. 17). In the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes the command to a Jew to offer or to taste swine's flesh was used as a means of determining whether he was loyal to the religion of his fathers or was willing to accept the worship favored by his conquerors (1 Mac. i. 47, 50; 2 Mac. vi. 18, 21; vii. 1, 7). But many Jews affected Grecian manners, and John Hyrcanus some years later found it advisable to issue an edict that no one should keep swine. In the time of Christ one large herd of swine at least was pastured in the Decapolis (Mark v. 11-13), a region colonized by Greeks, among whom the swine was highly esteemed as an article of food. There is no reason to suppose that Jews owned either these swine or those in the far country fed by the prodigal son (Luke xv. 13). See BOAR.

Sword.

A weapon with which an adversary was cut by being struck or was thrust through (1 Sam. xvii. 51; xxxi. 4; 2 Sam. ii. 16; Mat. xxvi. 51). It had hilt and blade (Judg. iii. 22), was carried in a sheath (1 Sam. xvii. 51; Jer. xlvii. 6), and girded on the loins (Ex. xxxii. 27; 2 Sam. xx. 8), usually at the left side (Judg. iii. 16 with 15, 21). The hilt was often highly ornamented, at least among the Egyptians and Assyrians. The blade was commonly made of iron (Is. ii. 4), perhaps also of bronze, as not seldom in Egypt. It was straight or slightly curved, long or short (Judg. iii. 16, a cubit long), single or double edged (ibid.; Ps. cxlix. 6).

In the Roman period a short, slightly curved dagger was worn under the clothing by the Jewish sicarii, or assassins (Antiq. xx. 8, 10, War. ii. 13, 3). Roman infantry wore the sword on the left side and the dagger on the right, but the cavalry wore the sword on the right (iii. 5, 5). This, however, was not an invariable rule.

Syc'a-mine Tree.

The mulberry tree, called in Greek sukammos (Luke xxi. 6). The black mulberry (Morus nigra), a tree 20 or 30 feet high, is the species commonly cultivated for its leaves and fruit. The silk worm feeds on the leaves. The fruit is dark red or black, with an uneven surface. The tree has been planted extensively in Palestine.

Sy'char.

A town of Samaria, in the vicinity of the land given by Jacob to his son Joseph, near Jacob's well (John iv. 5; cp. Gen. xlviii. 22). Formerly it was supposed to be a Greek corruption of Shechem, or a nickname for the city after it became the abode of the Samaritans, either from Hebrew sheker, falsehood, or shakkor, drunkard; but it is now believed by many to be the village of 'Askar, on the eastern declivity of mount Ebal, a little north of Jacob's well.

Sy'chem. See SHECHEM.

Syc'o-more.

A fig tree, called in Hebrew shikmah, in Greek sukomoreu. It was abundant in the lowland of Judah (1 Kin x 27; 1 Chron. xxvii. 28; 2 Chron i. 15, ix. 27), grew in the Jordan valley (Luke xix 4), and was cultivated in Egypt (Ps lxxviii. 47). Its timber was much used, although less durable than cedar (Is ix. 10). The tree is the Ficus sycomorus, a fig tree, 25 to 50 feet high and 60 feet broad, with persistent, heart-shaped leaves downy beneath. It is often planted by the wayside on account of its grateful shade (cp Luke xix. 4). The fruit grows in clusters on twigs which spring directly from the trunk and larger branches, but cannot be eaten until it has been punctured and the insect that infests it has been allowed to escape (cp Amos vii. 14).

The sycamore must not be confounded with our sycamore (Platanus occidentalis), which is not mentioned in the Bible Syn'a-gogue [in Greek an assembly, a synagogue].

A Jewish place of worship. The building served also for local law court and school. Previous to the captivity, worship of the highest kind could be performed only at the temple at Jerusalem. Of course, the Scriptures could be publicly read elsewhere (Jer. xxxvi. 6, 10, 12-15), and the people could resort to the prophets anywhere for religious instruction (2 Kin. iv. 38). Worship at Jerusalem was impossible when the people were in captivity in Babylon, and it seems to have been then and there that synagogues first arose. They were designed to be places, not of sacrifice, but of scriptural instruction and prayer. The English word synagogue occurs only once in the O. T. (Ps. lxxiv 8). The margin of R. V. has "places of assembly" instead of synagogues, and the Septuagint renders by a word which means a feast, a festival, a holiday. It is not, therefore, certain that there is any reference to a synagogue in the O. T. In the first century they were found wherever Jews dwelt. Even small communities of Jews in the lesser cities outside of Palestine had their synagogues, as in Salamis in Cyprus (Acts xiii. 5), Antioch of Pisidia (14), Iconium (xiv 1), Berea (xvii. 10). In large cities synagogues were often numerous, as in Jerusalem (vi. 9) and Alexandria. These religious communities maintained an existence separate from the state, and managed their own religious and civil affairs, subordinate, of course, to the law of the land (Antiq. xix. 5, 3). A board of elders managed the affairs of the synagogue and of the religious community which it represented (Luke vii 3-5). The special officers, who directed the worship, maintained order and looked after the temporalities, were: 1. The ruler of the synagogue (Acts xviii 8). In some synagogues several rulers were in office (xiii 15; Mark v. 22). The ruler presided at the service; appointed or permitted suitable members to pray, read the Scriptures, and exhort (Acts xiii 15); and was responsible for the proprieties (Luke xiii 14). The services were not conducted by permanent officers set apart for the duty, but by private members who had shown qualifications for it. Thus Jesus read the Scriptures in the synagogue at Nazareth (iv. 16), and he often taught in the synagogues (Mat. iv 23). Paul and Barnabas were called on by the rulers of the synagogue at Antioch of Pisidia for words of exhortation (Acts xiii 15). 2. One or more attendants for the humbler and menial duties. They brought the Scriptures to the reader and replaced the roll in its depository (Luke iv. 20), and they inflicted the corporal punishment to which the authorities sentenced a member. 3. Dispensers of alms (cp. Mat. vi. 2). 4. Wealthy men of leisure, if possible ten or more, who represented the congregation at every service. The congregation assembled every Sabbath for worship (Acts xv. 21), and on the second and fifth days of the week to hear a portion of the law read. The men and the women sat apart. At the Sabbath service prayer was offered by a member of the congregation. It consisted chiefly in reading Deut. vi. 4-9; xi. 13-21; Num. xv. 37-41; and offering some or all of the eighteen prayers and benedictions. The people were accustomed to stand during this prayer (Mat. vi. 5; Mark xi. 25), and united in saying Amen at its close. A lesson from the law was read (Acts xv. 21) by several members, each taking a short paragraph in turn. This reading was prefaced and concluded by thanksgiving. Then came a lesson from the prophets, read by the person who had opened the service with prayer. The reading was followed by an exposition and an exhortation given by the reader or some other person (Luke iv. 16-22; Acts xiii. 15). The service was concluded by a benediction, which was pronounced by a priest, if one were present, and the congregation said, Amen. The synagogue was called by the Jews in their own language assembly house. Ruins of these buildings still exist in Galilee at Tell Hum, which is perhaps the site of Capernaum, at Irbid, Kefr Bir'im, Nebartein, and some other places. These were rectangular structures. All lay north and south, and had a large middle portal and two smaller side doors on the southern side. The interior was divided into five aisles by four rows of columns, and the two northern corners were formed by double-engaged columns. At Tell Hum there are Corinthian capitals; at Irbid a mixture of Corinthian and Ionic. The faces of the lintels over the gateways have as a frequent ornament the representation of a scroll of vine leaves with bunches of grapes. At Nebartein there is a figure of the seven-branched candlestick, with an inscription; at Kefr Bir'im what is intended apparently for the paschal lamb; while at Tell Hum, there are both the lamb and the pot of manna. The assembly room was provided with a reading desk, a chest or closet for the Scriptures, and seats for at least the elders and richer members (Mat. xxiii. 6; Jas. i. 2, 3). The more honorable seats were near the place where the Scriptures were kept. The congregation was divided; the men on one side, the women on the other. Punishment ordered by the authorities of the synagogue was inflicted in the building, possibly in some chamber (Mat. x. 17; Acts xxii. 19).

The great synagogue denotes a council, said to have been organized by Nehemiah about 410 B. C. It consisted of 120 members (Megilloth, 17, 18). Ezra was its president. To this body the prophets transmitted the law of Moses (Pirke aboth i. 1). Simon the Just, who died about 275 B. C., was one of the last of its members (ibid.). It was succeeded by the sanhedrin (x. 1). Its special work was to reorganize religious worship among the returned captives and gather together the canonical books. Such is the Jewish tradition. The existence of the great synagogue has been doubted, since there is no mention of any such body in the Apocrypha, in Josephus, or in Philo. Nor does the name appear anywhere in Scripture. But the tradition is not to be wholly rejected. The great synagogue was probably a council of scribes for the decision of theological questions; contained from first to last, during an existence of a little more than a century and a half, about 120 prominent members, and numbered among them all the leading scribes from Ezra to Simon the Just.

Syn'ty-che [fortunate].

A woman in the Philippian church whom Paul exhorted (Phil. iv. 2).

Syr'a-cuse.

A celebrated city on the east coast of Sicily, founded about 735 B. C. by a colony of Corinthians and Dorians, led by Archias of Corinth. It greatly flourished. About 413 B. C. its inhabitants defeated and destroyed an Athenian fleet of 200 vessels. In 212 B. C. it was taken by the Romans. Paul saw it on his voyage to Rome (Acts xxviii. 12). It was taken by the Saracens in A. D. 878. It still exists, but is now much reduced in size.

Syr'i-a.

A country along the eastern coast of the Mediterranean and extending far inland. It comprehended most of the regions known in O. T. times as Canaan and Aram. The name is sometimes used as a translation of Aram; but inaccurately, being much too broad a term. The word Syria is an abbreviated form of Assyria, and became current after the conquests of Alexander the Great. Syria formed the most important province, both commercially and from a military point of view, of the kingdom of the Seleucide, whose capital was at Babylon. It soon became apparent that western Asia required a government of its own, more in the Greek spirit than was the system suitable for the far east. For this purpose Antioch was founded as a royal city about 300 B. C. (cp 1 Mac. ii 37 and 31, 32). The kingdom of the Seleucidæ was gradually reduced by the encroachment of its foes, until at the close of the second century B. C. only Syria was left. With the Roman conquest in 64 B. C. the kingdom was erected into the province of Syria, with a Roman governor resident in Antioch. The name Syria was limited to this province, which included the country west of the Euphrates from the Taurus mountains to the borders of Egypt. From the time of Augustus it was governed by a consular legate of the emperor. In A D 70 Judæa was separated from Syria and made a distinct province under an imperial legate.

Ta'a-nach, in A V once Tanach (Josh. xxi 25).

A Canaanite city, mentioned about 1600 B C in connection with the advance of Thothmes III. against Megiddo. Its king was defeated and slain by Joshua (Josh xii 21). It lay within the limits of Issachar, but was nominally possessed by the Manassites (Josh. xvii 11; 1 Chron. vii. 29). Residence in it was assigned to the Kohathite Levites (Josh xxi 25). The Manassites failed to expel the Canaanite inhabitants, but ultimately rendered them tributary (Judg i 27). The great battle between Barak and Sisera was fought near Taanach (v. 19). The place was important in Solomon's reign (1 Kin. iv. 12). The mound Ta'annak, the site of the ancient city, is situated among the low hills on the southern edge of the plain of Jezreel, 5 miles to the southeast of ancient Megiddo.

Ta-a-nath-shi'loh [approach to Shiloh].

A town on the border between Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh. xvi. 6). It is the ruin Ta'na, 7 miles southeast by east of Shechem.

Tab'ba-oth [rings].

A family of Nethinim, represented in Zerubbabel's colony (Ezra ii. 43, Neh vii. 46).

Tab'bath.

A place near Abel-meholah (Judg. vii. 22). Site unknown.

Ta-be'al, in R V Tabeel [probably, good-not; a scornful modification of Tabeel (q. v.)].

A man whose son the allied kings, Rezin of Damascus and Pekah of Israel, attempted to place on the throne of David as their puppet king of Judah (Is. vii. 6).

Ta'be-el [Aramaic, God is good]

1 Probably the original pronunciation of Tabeal (q v).

2. A Persian petty governor, probably of Syrian descent, one of those who complained to Artaxerxes Longimanus that the wall of Jerusalem was being rebuilt (Ezra iv. 7).

Tab'e-rah [burning]

A place where the Israelites murmured, and the fire of the Lord burnt among them in the uttermost part of the camp (Num xi 1-3, Deut. ix 22). The burning abated at the intercession of Moses. The event perhaps occurred at no formal encampment, or only in the uttermost part of the camp at Kibroth-hattaavah (Num xi. 1, 35).

Ta'ber-ing.

Striking frequently, as on a tabor, tabret, tamborine, or timbrel (Nah ii. 7).

Tab'er-na-cle [a tent]

1 A provisional tent where the Lord met his people (Ex xxxiii. 7-10); see TENT OF MEETING.

2 The movable sanctuary in the form of a tent which God directed Moses at Sinai to make, that God might dwell as king among his people (Ex. xxv. 8, 9). Hence it was called "the dwelling" (9; xxvi 1, margin of R. V.), and, as the place where Jehovah met his people, "the tent of meeting" (xl. 34, 35, in R V.), and as the depository of the tables of the law or testimony, "the tent of the testimony" (xxxviii. 21; cp xxv. 21, 22; Num. ix 15). It was also known by the general designation house of Jehovah (Ex xxxiv. 26; Josh. vi. 24). The materials for its construction were largely obtained in the vicinity: the acacia wood of the wilderness, hair and skins of the flocks, skin of the tachash, a porpoise or similar brute, from the Red Sea. Gold, silver, brass, and linen, or perhaps muslin, were liberally furnished by the people, who gave their ornaments for the work (Ex. xxxv. 21-29). The lavish expenditure of precious metals for this temporary structure and its furniture was justified, since none of this wealth would be lost when the movable tent gave place to a permanent edifice. The sacred vessels might serve in a new sanctuary or be wrought into new forms, and the gold and silver that were used in construction and ornamentation were available in any future building.

The architectural specifications for the tabernacle are drawn up systematically, and begin with the ark, which was the central and essential feature of the appointed meeting-place between Jehovah and his people (Ex. xxv. 22). I The essential and permanent features: the ark, table of showbread, and candelabrum (Ex. xxv. 10-40), which were symbols of heavenly things (Heb. ix. 23). Their housing (Ex. xxvi. 1-37). The altar of burnt offerings (xxvii. 1-8). The court (9-19). Continual testimony to be borne by the maintenance of light from pure beaten oil (20, 21). No such specifications for the showbread were required. The ordination of xxv. 30 sufficed, since the finest flour was always used in offerings. II. The means of approach. A priesthood; authorized and appointed (xxviii. 1), garments (2-43), and consecration (xxix. 1-36). After mediating priests have been provided, atonement of the altar is specified (37) and the continual sacrifice (38-42). III. When the way of approach has been opened, the specifications advance to the altar of incense (xxx. 1-10), symbolical of the adoration of God by his people cleansed of sin. Only here is the altar of incense mentioned apart from the other furniture in a description of the tabernacle. It is ordered in its logical place in the worship of God by his people. Elsewhere it is named with the other furniture in the unvarying order of ark, table, candlestick, altar of incense, altar of burnt offering, as in the account of the manufacture of the furniture (xxxvii. 25-28), in the enumeration of the completed furniture (xxxix. 38), in the directions for the erection of the tabernacle (xl. 5), and in the record of its erection (26). IV. Provision for the needs of the service: the half shekel atonement money (Ex. xxx. 11-16), the laver (17-21), the holy anointing oil (22-33), and the incense (34-38).

The tabernacle formed a parallelogram, 30 cubits long by 10 broad, with the entrance at the eastern end. The rear end and the two sides were made of boards, 48 in number, 20 on each side and 8 in the rear, of which 2 formed the posts at the angles. Each plank was 10 cubits long by 1½ cubits broad, and was overlaid with gold. They were scarcely cut from the log in a single piece, but were probably framed of several pieces. They were set on end, and were held in place at the bottom by tenons sunk in sockets of silver, two to each plank, and they were bound together laterally by transverse bars of acacia wood, which were arranged five on a side externally and thrust through rings attached to each plank (xxvi. 15-30). The entire front was left as an entrance.

This portal consisted of a row of five pillars overlaid with gold, resting in sockets of brass, and supporting a curtain. The interior was divided into two apartments by four similar pillars sunk in sockets of silver and hung with a curtain (32, 37). These rooms were respectively the western,

Ground Plan of the Tabernacle called the holy of holies, measuring 10 cubits in every direction, and the sanctuary or holy place, which was 20 cubits long by 10 cubits in breadth and height (xxvi. 16 for height; 16, 18 for length; 16 with 22-24 for width; see Antiq. iii. 6, 4). The hangings were four: 1. The ceiling and apparently the walls were hung with a curtain of white twined linen, blue, purple, and scarlet, and figured with cherubim. This curtain was made in ten pieces, each 28 cubits by 4, sewed together in two sheets. These sheets were then looped together. One formed the ceiling and three sides of the holy of holies, and the other the ceiling and two sides of the sanctuary (1-6). 2. The main external covering was of goats' hair, and consisted of eleven narrow curtains, each 30 cubits by 4; that is, 2 cubits longer than the under curtain of linen (cp. 13). These strips were united into two great curtains, which were looped together. The smaller one, which was made of five strips, covered the top and three sides of the holy of holies; the larger one covered the top and sides of the sanctuary, and had one breadth depending over the portal in front (7-13). 3 Over this covering of goats' hair a double roof of red-dyed rams' skins and tachash (perhaps porpoise) skins was thrown (14). 4 Two veils were hung, one at the entrance to the sanctuary and the other in front of the holy of holies. Each was wrought of blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twisted linen; but on the inner veil, which separated the holy of holies, were figures of cherubim, in token of the presence and unapproachableness of Jehovah, while the outer veil, which was passed by the priests when they entered the sanctuary to minister, lacked symbols to prevent man's ingress (31-37).

The tabernacle stood in a courtyard, like itself rectangular in form, its longer sides, running east and west, being 100 cubits, and the shorter two, running north and south, 50. The court was inclosed by a fence, 5 cubits high, formed of pillars filleted with silver, resting in sockets of brass, placed 5 cubits apart, and hung with fine twisted linen. The entrance was at the east. It was 20 cubits wide and was closed by a curtain of blue, purple, scarlet, and fine twisted linen, hung on four pillars (Ex xxvii 9-18). The tabernacle was pitched in the western half of this area, the laver and the altar of burnt offering being erected in the open eastern half. The ark was the central feature. It stood in the holy of holies. In the sanctuary, immediately in front of the veil that separated it from the holy of holies, stood the altar of incense, which however belonged to the oracle (1 Kin vi. 22, R V.; Heb ix 3, 4). In this apartment also were the table of showbread on the right hand and the golden candlestick on the left. In the court stood the laver and the altar of burnt offering. For the description of these objects and their symbolism, see the several articles.

The tabernacle was dedicated on the first day of the second year after the departure of the Israelites from Egypt. A cloud rested on it by day and a pillar of fire by night during all the period of the wandering. When the people broke camp, the Levites took the structure to pieces and put it together again at the new camping ground (Ex xxvi; xxvii. 9-19; xxxv. 4-xxxvi 38; xl 1-38). During the conquest of Canaan the ark remained in the camp at Gilgal. After the settlement of the Israelites, Joshua set up the tabernacle at Shiloh, where it remained during the period of the judges (Josh xviii. 1). Apparently with the lapse of time chambers for the occupancy of the priests and for the storing of gifts came to cluster about it (1 Sam. iii. 3; cp the encampment of the Levites about it, Num iii. 23, 29, 35), and not unlikely the court was surrounded by a more substantial structure than hangings of linen. It was spoken of as a tent (2 Sam. vii 6), the tent of meeting (Josh xix 51; 1 Sam ii 22), Jehovah's dwelling (Josh xxii 19, 29, translated tabernacle), Jehovah's house (Judg. xix 18; 1 Sam i 7, 24; iii. 15), and as the abode of Israel's king Jehovah's residence or palace (1 Sam i. 9; iii 3, translated temple). By the capture of the ark by the Philistines, the tabernacle lost its glory and its value (Ps lxxviii. 60). In the reign of Saul it was at Nob (cp 1 Sam xxi 1 with Mark ii 26). During the greater part of David's reign, and in that of Solomon until the building of the temple, the tabernacle was at the high place of Gibeon (1 Chron xvi. 39; xxi 29). Afterwards Solomon laid it up in the temple (1 Kin viii 4, 2 Chron. v. 5), which was constructed on the same model, but in every part was of dimensions twice as great.

Tab'er-na-cles, Feast of.

The last of the three great annual festivals at which every man of Israel was required to appear before the Lord at the sanctuary, and the second of the harvest festivals (Deut xvi 16, 2 Chron viii 12, 13; cp 1 Kin ix 25, xii 32, 33; Zech xiv 16). It took its name from the custom of dwelling in booths during its celebration (Lev xxiii. 40-42), which, after the establishment of the sanctuary at Jerusalem, were erected in the open places of the city, on the roofs and in the courts of the houses, in the precincts of the temple (Neh viii 16), and in the open country outside the walls. It was the culminating festival of the year, and while preeminently and essentially agricultural, it combined an historical association, the reverse in this respect of the passover (Lev xxiii 39, 43). It was kept in the seventh month, which by reason of the number was sacred, at the close of the agricultural season, when all the products of the year from grain-field, oliveyard, and vineyard were garnered. Hence the name feast of ingathering, under which it was instituted (Ex. xxiii 16; xxxiv 22, Lev xxiii 39; Deut xvi. 13, 15). It began on the fifteenth day of the month, and was celebrated during seven days. The special burnt offering amounted to seventy bullocks, distributed on a decreasing scale over the week, together with two rams and fourteen lambs daily; and as a sin offering a he goat was daily sacrificed (Num. xxix. 12-34; cp Lev. xxiii. 36; Ezra iii. 4). The booths made of the boughs of trees suggested the vintage life; but they were also made a reminder of the march from Egypt through the wilderness (Lev xxiii 43; cp. Hos. xii. 9). Every seven years the law of Moses was publicly read, the year of reading coinciding with the year of release, when there was no occasion to celebrate an ingathered harvest (Deut. xxxi. 9-13). The festival occurred almost immediately after the day of atonement. The people, purged ceremonially from their sinfulness, could keep the feast with a glad souse of their fitness to commune with the bountiful God. The needy were remembered (Deut. xvi. 14). An eighth day of solemn assembly was added to the festival. It was distinct from the festival; he requirement to dwell in booths did not extend to it, and its offerings stood in no relation to those of the festival proper (Lev. xxiii. 36, 39; Num. xxix. 35-38; Antiq. iii. 10, 4). It was not intended to conclude the feast of tabernacles, but only to bring the annual cycle of festivals to a fitting close. Later, however, the festival was spoken of as continuing for eight days (2 Mac. x. 6; Antiq. iii. 10, 4). It is disputed whether the seventh or the eighth day was the great day referred to in John vii. 37. Splendid ceremonies were subsequently added to those prescribed in the law for the festival. At the time of the morning sacrifice the people took branches of palm, myrtle, and willow intertwined and fruit in their hands, repaired to the temple, and marched around the altar of burnt offering once daily and seven times on the seventh day, after the manner of compassing Jericho (Antiq. iii. 10, 4, xiii. 13, 5; 2 Mac. x. 6, 7). Another custom, possibly also in vogue in Christ's day, was that daily blew trumpets and Levites played on instruments and sang psalms, was poured out beside the altar, whence it was conducted by a sewer into the Kidron valley. It was also customary in the evening following the first day of the festival, and perhaps on the subsequent evenings, to illuminate the court of the women from two lofty stands, each supporting four immense lamps, which threw their light not only into the courts of the temple, but far and wide over the city. The wicks were made of the cast-off linen of the priests. Levites, stationed on the steps of the court, rendered instrumental music and sang psalms, and a dance was performed by prominent laymen and priests.

Jews who were unable to attend the celebration at Jerusalem on account of the distance of the city from their home, especially Jews dwelling in foreign countries, kept the festival at the synagogue of the town where they lived, but of course without the offering of sacrifices.

during the festival, at the time of the morning and evening oblation, a priest filled a golden vessel with water at the pool of Siloam and carried it to the temple, where it was received with trumpet blast and the words of Is. xii. 3: "With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation." It was mixed with the wine of the sacrifices and, while priests

Josh. xix. 22), situated inland among the mountains (Jer. xli. 18). It is a notable mountain (Ps. lxxxix. 12), though vastly inferior in size to Hermon. The forces of Issachar and Zebulun assembled there preparatory to fighting with Sisera (Judg. iv. 6, 12, 14). In 218 B. C., Antiochus the Great captured a town on its summit and fortified the place (Polybius v. 70, 6). Josephus encircled the top with a wall for defence (Life 37, War iv. 1, 8). Tabor, now called Jebel et-Tor, is a detached hill of limestone, rising 1843 feet above the level of the Mediterranean, in the northeastern part of the plain of Jezeeel, about 12 miles north of mount Gilboa, 5½ east by south of Nazareth, and 12 west by south of the southern curve of the lake of Gennesaret. From the west-northwest it looks like a truncated cone, and from the southwest the segment of a sphere. The sides are steep. The northern side is covered with thickets of oak and terebinth. The top is flat and elliptical. In the second century the opinion was current that Tabor was the scene of the transfiguration, and ecclesiastical buildings in commemoration were erected from time to time on the summit. The theory is beset by the difficulty that there was a town on the summit in the days of Christ.

2 A town of Zebulun, given to the Merarite Levites (1 Chron. vi. 77), perhaps the place on the border of Issachar (Josh. xix. 22). The latter is scarcely identical with the border town Chisloth-tabor (12), which rather corresponds with Chesulloth (18).

3. The oak or terebinth of Tabor (1 Sam. x. 3; not plain, as in A V), apparently in the territory of Benjamin.

Tab'ret.

A musical instrument (1 Sam. x. 5), a timbrel (q. v.).

Tab-rim'mon, in A V Tab'rim-on [Aramaic, Rimmon is good].

A son of Hezion, and father of Benhadad I, king of Syria (1 Kin. xv. 18).

Tache.

A catch for taking hold or holding together. It was used about the tabernacle for coupling curtains together (Ex. xxvi. 6, 11, in R V clasp).

Tach'mo-nite, in R. V. Tahchemonite.

A word found in 2 Sam. xxiii. 8. It is doubtless a corruption, in the Hebrew text itself, of "the Hachmonite," a copyist having mistaken Hebrew h for t. See HACHMONI.

Tad'mor [formed from tamar, a palm tree].

A town in the desert (2 Chron. viii. 4). It was fortified by Solomon, doubtless to control the caravan route across it. In the parallel passage (1 Kin. ix. 18, R. V.) it is called Tamar in the wilderness, and described as being not only in the desert, but also in the land. This latter phrase is probably broad enough to denote the extensive kingdom of Solomon (19; iv. 21, 24). The suggestion has been made that the town may be identical with Tamar at the southeastern corner of the promised boundaries of the land (Ezek. xlvii. 19; xlviii. 28), probably on the road from Hebron to Elath; see TAMAR 5. This identification is in itself suitable, and may include or correct Tadmor in 2 Chron.

viii. 4, which has been proposed in explanation of 1 Kin. ix. 18. But the text of Kings is suspicious for the phrase "in the land" is superfluous, since all the towns mentioned were in the land, and the text departs from the parallel enumeration in Chronicles in failing to locate in Hamath the store cities of Solomon. Perhaps the original text was "Tamar in the wilderness, in the land of Hamath all the store cities." Tadmor eventually became subject to the Romans, who Latinized the name into Palmyra (Antiq. viii. 6, 1). Between A. D. 251 and 273 it was at first partially, and then for a time totally, independent. The place still retains the name of Tadmûr. It is in an oasis about 140 miles east-northeast of Damascus, and about 120 from the Euphrates. It is now a ruin, stretching more than a mile and a half. It has long rows of Corinthian columns and a few of the Ionic order, with a number of tower-like tombs. The inscriptions found in the place have been chiefly Greek and Semitic.

Ta'han [perhaps, inclination].

A descendant of Ephraim, and founder of a tribal family (Num. xxvi. 35). His descent was probably through Telah, Rephah, and Beraiah to Ephraim (1 Chron. vii. 25).

Ta-hap'a-nes. See TAHPANHES

Ta'hash, in A V Tahash [porpoise or similar fishlike animal].

A son of Nahor by his concubine Reumah (Gen. xxii. 24).

Ta'hath [that which is beneath].

1 A station of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. xxxiii. 26, 27). Situation unknown.

2 A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar, and of the line of Korah and Abisaph (1 Chron. vi. 24, 37). From him two families branched, Uriel and Zephaniah.

3 An Ephraimite, son of Bered, family of Shuthelah (1 Chron. vii. 20).

4 A son of Eleadah, and a descendant of Tahath, son of Bered (1 Chron. vii. 20).

Tah-che'mo-nite. See TACHMONITE

Tah'pan-hes, and once Tehaphneher (Ezek. xxx. 18); in A. V. once also Tahapanes (Jer. ii. 16).

An Egyptian city (Ezek. xxx. 18), to which Jews fled to escape Babylonian vengeance after the murder of Gedaliah (Jer. xlii. 7-9). Jews seem to have become permanent residents there (xlv. 1; xlvii. 14). The Septuagint translators render the name Taphne o Taphnai, obviously the same as Daphne, a fortified city on the Pelusiac channel of the Nile (Herod. ii. 30, 107), probably marked by the ruins of Defenneh, 12 miles north of Pithom.

Tah'pe-nes.

A queen of Egypt in the time of Solomon (1 Kin. xi. 19, 20).

Tah're-a, and Tarea [perhaps, adroitness or cunning]

A descendant of king Saul through Jonathan (1 Chron. viii. 35; ix. 41).

Tah-tim-hod/shi.

A region visited by David's census takers in connection with Gilead, before they came to Dan-jaan and roundabout to Zidon (2 Sam. xxiv. 6). The name is elsewhere unknown, and perhaps stands for "the Hittites toward Kadesh;" see KADESH 2.

Tal'ent.

A weight used both for ordinary commodities and for the precious metals, but of different standard in the respective cases; see WEIGHTS. The value of the talent of gold was about $29,374 50; and that of silver about $1950. The talent of the Greco-Roman period was Attic, varying from $1180 to $960. From the parable of the talents, in which a master distributes talents among his servants, according to their several ability, to be put to profitable use (Mat. xxv. 14-30), the English figurative use of the word talents is probably derived in such expressions as that one uses his talents well.

Tal'i-tha cu'mi [Aramaic, maiden arise] (Mark v. 41)

Tal'mai [pertaining to furrows]

1. A son of Anak, and probably founder of a family of Anakim (Num. xiii 22), driven from Hebron by Caleb (Josh. xv. 14; Judg. i. 10)

2. A king of Geshur, whose daughter Maacah was one of David's wives, and Absalom's mother (2 Sam. iii 3; xiii. 37; 1 Chron iii 2).

Tal'mon [oppressed].

A porter, and the family which he founded (1 Chron. ix. 17; Neh. xi. 19; xii 25). Some of them returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 42; Neh. vii. 45), and performed the same service at the new temple.

Ta'mah. See TEMAH.

Ta'mar, in A. V. of N. T. Thamar [a palm tree, specially a date palm].

1 The wife of Er, son of Judah. When left a widow, she became the mother of Perez and Zerah by Judah (Gen. xxxvii. 6-26), and thus the ancestress of several tribal families (Num. xxvi. 20, 21).

2. Absalom's beautiful sister, ill-used by her half-brother Ammon (2 Sam. xiii 1-39; 1 Chron. iii. 9). Perhaps she became Uriel's wife and the mother of Maacah, Rehoboam's wife. See MAACAH 9.

3 A daughter of Absalom, named doubtless after his sister (2 Sam. xiv. 27).

4. A town in the desert (1 Kin. ix. 18). The Hebrew K'rî, or preferred reading, the A V., the margin of the R. V. and 2 Chron. viii. 4 have Tadmor; see TADMOR.

5 A place at the eastern end of the promised southern frontier of Palestine (Ezek. xlvii 19; xlviii 28) It would lie south of the Dead Sea; and perhaps is identical with the village Tamaiia, located by Eusebius on the road between Hebron and Elath.

Tam'a-risk Tree.

The tamarisk (Tamarix articulata) is called 'athî in Arabic, 'athla' in Aramaic; and accordingly the cognate Hebrew word 'eshel doubtless likewise denotes the tamarisk. Abraham planted one in Beer-sheba (Gen. xxi. 33, in A. V. grove), Saul dwelt beneath one in Ramah (1 Sam. xxi. 6; in A. V. a tree), and the bones of Saul and his sons were buried beneath one in Jabesh-gilead (xxx. 13, in

Tamarisk Tree

A. V. a tree). The chronicler states that the bones of the king and his sons were interred beneath the 'elah in Jabesh (1 Chron. x. 12; in E. V. oak, R. V. margin terebinth). He may, however, use the term 'elah in its broad signification of strong tree; see OAK. The tamarisk is a small tree, with durable wood, deciduous branches, and minute, scale-like, evergreen leaves. Nine species occur in Palestine. The most widely distributed is Tamarix pallasii, which attains a height of from 10 to 20 feet. The largest species is Tamarix articulata, from 15 to 30 feet. It is found along the western border of the desert of the wandering. Tamarix mannifera, from 10 to 15 feet in height, growing in ancient Moab, Edom, and the peninsula of Sinai, yields the substance popularly known as manna; see MANNA.

Tam'muz.

A deity of the Babylonians, called by them Dumu-zi or Du-zi, probably meaning son of life, from which the name Tammuz is derived. He was worshiped throughout Babylonia, and in Assyria, Phœnicia, and Palestine; and he gave name to the fourth month of the Semitic year; see YEAR. He was the husband of the goddess Ishtar, and king of the nether world. He was also god of the pasture, the patron of flocks and their keepers, and hence was himself entitled shepherd. He was represented as dying annually and returning to life with each recurring year. It was understood, by some at least, that he was slain by the sun-god Shamash. The story is confessedly a nature myth. However its details may be explained, it symbolizes more or less inclusively the annual withdrawal and invariable return of the sun, and the death and revival of vegetation. Ezekiel in vision saw the worship of Tammuz in favor among the Jews, and women sitting at the northern gate of the temple weeping for the god (Ezek viii 14). Cyril of Alexandria and Jerome identified him with the Phœnician Adonis. Though not proven, their conjecture has found much favor. Jerome says that the Syrians celebrated an annual solemnity to Adonis in June, when he was lamented by the women as dead, and afterwards his coming to life again was celebrated with songs. From other sources it appears that Byblos in Phœnicia was the headquarters of the Adonis worship. The annual feast in his honor was held at the neighboring temple of Aphrodite in mount Lebanon, and lasted seven days. It began with a commemoration of the disappearance of the god. Vessels filled with mold and containing stalks of wheat, barley, lettuce, and fennel, and called gardens of Adonis, were exposed to the heat of the sun. The withering of the plants symbolized the slaughter of the youth by the fire-god Mars. Then followed a search for Adonis by the women. At length his image was found in one of the gardens. The finding was celebrated by lewdness and song. The image was then coffined, and the wound made by the symbolical boar which slew the young god was shown on his body. The people sat on the ground around the bier with their clothes rent, and the women raised loud lamentation. Sacrifice was offered for the dead god, and the image was buried.

Ta'nach. See TAANACH.

Tan'hu-meth [consolation]

A Netophathite (2 Kin. xxv. 23; Jer. xl. 8).

Tan'ner.

A dresser of hides (Acts ix. 43), who removes the hair by means of lime or other agent, steeps the skins in an infusion of bark, especially of oak bark, in order to impregnate them with the acid juice of the plant and render them firm, pliable, and durable, and thus converts the hide into leather. At Joppa Peter lodged with a tanner (x. 6). See LEATHER.

Ta'phath [a drop]

A daughter of Solomon, and wife of Abinadab's son (1 Kin. iv. 11).

Ta'phon. See TEPHON.

Tap'pu-ah [apple or, perhaps, quince or apricot]

1. A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv. 34). Site unknown.

2. A town of Manasseh west of Shechem and on the boundary of Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 8, xvii. 7, 8).

3. A son of Hebron (1 Chron. ii. 43).

Ta'rah. See TERAH.

Tar'a-lah [staggering, reeling].

A city of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 27). Site unknown.

Ta're-a. See TAHREA.

Tares.

The rendering of the Greek Zizanon in Mat. xiii. 25-27, 29, 30; on R. V. margin darnel. The tare (Vicia sativa), a vetch, with pinnate leaves and purple-blue or red papilionaceous flowers, would be easily distinguished from the wheat. The Greek word zizanon corresponds to the Arabic zuwdn, which denotes Lolium, and to the talmudic zonin. The bearded darnel (Lolium temulentum) is a poisonous grass, almost undistinguishable from wheat while the two are only in blade, but which can be separated without difficulty when they come into ear (cp. ver. 29, 30).

Bearded Darnel

Tar'get. See ARMOR.

Tar'gum. See VERSIONS.

Tar'pel-ites.

The inhabitants of a place, presumably called Tarpel and situated near Babylonia or Elam (Ezra iv. 9).

Tar'shish, in A. V. four times Tharshish (1 Kin. x. 22; xxii. 48; 1 Chron. vii. 10)

1. A people descended from Javan (Gen. x. 4) and their country. As Jonah entered a ship at Joppa in order to flee thither, the route to it was evidently across the waters of the Mediterranean. It was a distant land (Is. lvi. 19). Tyre was the "daughter" of Tarshish (xxiii. 10), perhaps in the sense that the commerce with Tarshish was the making of Tyre. The imports from Tarshish were silver beaten into plates (Jer. x. 9), also iron, tin, and lead (Ezek. xxvii. 12). It is believed that Tarshish was Tartessus, in the south of Spain, near Gibraltar (Herod. iv. 152), and the country of the Turti or Turdiani, to which the town belonged. The mineral wealth of the region attracted the Phoenicians, who established a colony there and Semitized the name. Spain has long been noted for its mineral wealth

Tar'sus [not from Greek tarsos, a crate of wickerwork, any broad, flat surface]. The name was pronounced Tarzi by the Assyrians, and appears written on coins in Aramaic character as Trz.

The chief city of Cilicia, in the eastern part of Asia Minor. It was situated on both banks of the river Cydnus, about 12 miles from the sea. About 833 B. C. it is mentioned by Shalmaneser, king of Assyria. When the Romans formed the province of Cilicia in 64 B. C., they made Tarsus the residence of the governor. To compensate it for the sufferings it endured in its allegiance to the party of Caesar, Marc Antony granted it freedom and exemption from taxation. It was particularly celebrated for its schools, which almost rivaled those of Athens and Alexandria. It was the birthplace of the apostle Paul, and he revisited it at least once after his conversion (Acts ix. 11, 30; xi.

Tarsus

Ships of Tarshish were originally ships trading to and from Tarshish, but ultimately ships of first-rate magnitude to whatever place their voyages may have been made (Ps. xlviii. 7; Is. ii. 16; xxiii. 1, 14; lx. 9; Ezek. xxvii. 25). Such vessels, built by Jehoshaphat to go to Ophir, lay in the harbor at Ezion-geber on the Red Sea (1 Kin. xxii. 48). The term Tarshish ship is paraphrased as "ship going to Tarshish" (2 Chron. ix. 21, Hebrew text; cp 1 Kin. x. 22) and "ship to go to Tarshish" (2 Chron. xx. 36).

2. A Benjamite, son of Bilhan (1 Chron. vii. 10).

3. One of the seven highest princes of Persia (Esth. i. 14).

25; xxi. 39; xxii. 3). Though much decayed from its former grandeur, it still exists as a considerable town. There are few remnants of antiquity at the old site.

Tar'tak.

An idol set up by the Avvites in Samaria (2 Kin. xvii. 31).

Tar'tan.

The title of the commander-in-chief of the Assyrian army (2 Kin. xviii. 17; Is. xx. 1). The name was pronounced by the Assyrians both tartanu and turtanu.

Tat'te-nai, in A. V. Tatnai.

A Persian governor west of the river Euphrates. He opposed the building of the temple by the returned exiles (Ezra v. 3; vi. 6).

Tau, in A. R. V. Tav.

The twenty-second and last letter of the Hebrew alphabet, pronounced t or th according to position. English T comes from the same source, and with th represents it in anglicized Hebrew names; as Tamar, Nathan. It heads the twenty-second section of Ps cxix, in which section each verse of the original begins with this letter.

Scribes occasionally confused tau and he (q v).

Tax'es.

Under the judges the regular payments obligatory on the Israelites were for the worship of Jehovah. There was as yet no army and no royal court to support. But there was a tabernacle and a priesthood, and these were maintained by the tithes and other offerings, and by the land which was permanently placed at the disposal of the Levites.

After the establishment of the kingdom, revenue for its support was obtained from various sources: 1. Taxes in kind were levied by Solomon on the produce of the field and the flock (1 Kin iv 7-28; cp Amos vii 1). 2. Special gifts were brought to the king at the commencement of his reign (1 Sam x 27) or in time of war (xvi 20; xvii 18). 3. Tribute was rendered by subject peoples (2 Sam viii 6, 14; 1 Kin x 15; 2 Kin iii 4), and service was exacted of the Canaanites who dwelt in the midst of Israel (Judg i 28, 30, 1 Kin ix. 20, 21). When the Hebrews were subject to a foreign prince, they had to pay tribute to him in addition to taxes for the support of their own government. 4. Duties were paid by tradesmen and merchants (1 Kin x. 15). Without levying taxes in money or produce, and with little expense to himself, David attained the object of a standing army by dividing the men of military age into brigades of 24,000 men, and requiring each brigade in turn to hold itself in readiness during one month for instant service (1 Chron xxvii 1). Under Solomon the people were oppressed by taxation, and this grievous burden was an immediate cause of the disruption of the kingdom (1 Kin xii. 4). Exemption from taxation was a reward for service (1 Sam. xvii. 25; Antiq. xvii. 2, 1).

Under the Persian empire, by decree of Darius Hystaspis the satraps of each province paid a fixed sum into the royal treasury (Herod. iii. 89). The inhabitants had to provide for the maintenance of the governor's household also. This provision was called the bread of the governor, and so far as Judah was concerned included food and forty shekels daily in money (Neh. v. 14, 15). The revenue was derived from tribute, customs, and toll (Ezra iv. 13, 20). Priests, Levites, and Nethinim were exempted from these taxes in Judah (vii. 24); but the burdens pressed heavily on the great body of the people, who had the sanctuary likewise to support, and many were forced to mortgage their fields and vineyards to raise money for the tribute (Neh. v. 4; ix. 37).

Under the Egyptian and Syrian kings, instead of a fixed amount being levied by the crown on the people, the privilege of collecting the taxes of a district was put up at auction and sold to the highest responsible bidder. The party who promised the most revenue from a province was authorized to collect it and was furnished with military power sufficient to enable him to enforce his demands (Antiq. xii. 4, 1-5). The Syrian kings imposed a poll tax and a duty on salt, exacted a sum of money in lieu of the annual present of a crown of gold, which it had become customary to demand, took one-third of the grain and one-half of the fruit, and in addition levied on the tithes and tolls paid into the temple at Jerusalem (1 Mac. x. 29-31; xi. 34, 35, xiii. 37, 39; Antiq. xii. 3, 3).

When the Romans under Pompey took Jerusalem in 63 B C, tribute was imposed on the Jews which in a short time amounted to more than 10,000 talents (Antiq. xiv. 4, 4, and 5). Julius Cæsar decreed that the tribute should not be farmed, that it should not be levied in a Sabbatic year, and that in the year following a Sabbatic year only one-fourth of the usual amount should be collected (10, 5 and 6). Herod the Great taxed the produce of the field (xv. 9, 1), and levied duties on commodities bought and sold (xvii. 8, 4). When Judæa was placed under procurators, the financial system of the empire was introduced. The revenues were farmed; see PUBLICAN. There were levied: 1. Tribute of the soil, paid either in kind or in money. 2. A poll tax (Mat xxii 17) and, under the same name, a tax on personal property. 3. Export and import duties, collected at seaports and at the gates of cities. In Jerusalem a house duty was paid by the inhabitants (Antiq. xix. 6, 3).

After the exile a temple tax of half a shekel was imposed on every Israelite who had reached the age of twenty years (Mat. xvii. 24). The collectors visited each town of Judæa annually at a fixed time, and in foreign countries places were designated where it might be paid. See TRIBUTE 2.

Tax'ing.

An enrollment, ordered by the Roman emperor Augustus, which in the providence of God brought Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem, and led to the fulfillment of the ancient prophecy that the Messiah should be born in that town (Mic. v. 2; Mat. ii. 5, 6; Luke ii. 1-20). A later enrollment led to tumults among the Jews (Acts v. 37). See QUIRINIUS.

Te'bah [slaughter (specially of cattle)].

A son of Nahor by Reumah, his concubine

(Gen. xxii. 24), and the tribe descended from him. The name is found in 2 Sam. viii. 8, according to the Septuagint and the Syriac version, and also in 1 Chron. xviii. 8 in the form Tibbath, and denotes a town of Aram-zobah.

Teb-a-lî'ah [Jehovah hath immersed, i. e., ceremonially purified].

A Merarite Levite, the third son of Hosah (1 Chron. xxvi. 11).

Te'beth.

The tenth month of the Semitic calendar (Esth. ii. 16). See YEAR.

Te-haph'ne-hes. See TAHFANHES.

Te-hin'nah [grace, supplications]

A man of Judah, descended from Chelub, and ancestor of the inhabitants of Ir-nahash (1 Chron. iv. 12).

Tell Tree.

The linden, a tree of the genus Tilia. The Hebrew word 'elah is once translated thus in A. V. (Is. vi. 13, in R. V. terebinth); see OAK 1 and TEREBINTH. The tell tree does not grow in Palestine.

Te'kel. See MENE.

Te-ko'a, in A. V. thrice Tekoah (2 Sam. xiv. 2, 4, 9), and so in R. V. of 1 Mac. ix. 33, where A. V. has Thecoe.

A town in Judah (1 Chron. ii. 24; iv. 5; Septuagint of Josh. xv. 60), in the wilderness toward En-gedi (2 Chron. xx. 20; cp. 2, 16). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 6). It was the home of the prophet Amos (Amos i. 1). In Nehemiah's time the common people of Tekoa helped to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem, while the nobles of the place showed indifference to the work (Neh. iii. 5, 27). The name still lingers as Tekû'a, a ruined village 5 miles south of Bethlehem. It is on a hill broad at the top, where are found the remains of the foundations of houses, often with beveled stones, the whole occupying an area of 4 or 5 acres. There is also a castle, but of more modern date.

Te-ko'ite.

A native or inhabitant of Tekoa (2 Sam. xxiii. 26).

Te-a'bîb [heap, or hill of ears of grain].

A place in Babylonia, near the river Chabar. Jewish exiles were located there (Ezek. iii. 15). Situation unknown.

Te'lah [fracture].

A descendant of Ephraim, probably through Beriah (1 Chron. vii. 25).

Te'a'im [little lambs].

A place where Saul assembled his army to war against the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv. 4; and xxvii. 8, Septuagint). It may be Telem of Josh. xv. 24; but the two names, as traditionally pronounced, have a different meaning.

Te-las'sar, in A. V. once Thelasar (2 Kin. xix. 12) [probably, hill of Ashhur, or the Assyrians].

A place inhabited by the children of Eden (2 Kin. xix. 12; Is. xxxvii. 12), and hence in western Mesopotamia, near Haran. Exact situation unknown.

Te'lem [perhaps, oppression].

1. A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 24). Site unknown. See TELAIM.

2. A porter, whom Ezra induced to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 24).

Tel-har'sha, in A. V. Tel-har'sa and Tel-har'e-sha [in Hebrew and Assyrian, mound of the artificer's work or of enchantment].

A place in Babylonia whence certain people who claimed to be Israelite exiles returned with Zerubbabel to Jerusalem (Ezra ii. 59; Neh. vii. 61). Situation unknown.

Tel-me'lah [hill of salt].

A place in Babylonia, whence certain people who claimed to be Israelite exiles came to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezra ii. 59; Neh. vii. 61). Situation unknown.

Te'ma.

A tribe of Ishmaelites and the district they inhabited (Gen. xxv. 15, Is. xxi. 14). Their caravans were well known (Job vi. 19). Tema is often identified with Taima in the Hauran, but it rather denotes the important people who dwelt in and about Taima, east of the Ælantic gulf of the Red Sea and midway between Damascus and Medina.

Te'mah, in A. V. Tamah and Thamah [perhaps, laughter].

Founder of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned with Zerubbabel from the captivity (Ezra ii. 53; Neh. vii. 55).

Te'man [southern].

A tribe descended from Esau, and the district they inhabited (Gen. xxxvi. 11, 15, 34). The territory was in Edom (Jer. xlix. 20; Amos i. 12), apparently in the northern part (Ezek. xxv. 13). Its inhabitants were noted for their wisdom (Jer. xlix. 7).

Te'man-ite, in A. V. once Tem'a-ni (Gen. xxxvi. 34).

A member of the tribe of Teman (Gen. xxxvi. 34), or of Tema. It is not certain in which sense Elphaz, Job's friend, was a Temanite (Job ii. 11).

Tem'e-ni.

A son of Ashhur (1 Chron. iv. 5, 6).

Tem'ple [in Hebrew, large house, palace, as 1 Kin. i. 21; 2 Kin. xx. 18; Dan. i. 4; iv. 4].

A building dedicated to the worship of a deity (Joel iii. 5; Ezra v. 14 with i. 7; Acts xix. 27). In three passages it is applied to the tabernacle (1 Sam. i. 9; iii. 3; 2 Sam. xxii. 7; cp. Rev. xv. 5); but generally the reference is to some one of the temples successively erected to Jehovah at Jerusalem.

amassed by him (2 Sam. vii. 1; 1 Kin. v. 3-5; viii. 17; 1 Chron. xxii.; xxviii. 11-xxix. 9). He gathered 100,000 talents of gold and 1,000,000 talents of silver for the prospective structure and its furnishings (1 Chron. xxii. 14), and added from his own private fortune 3000 talents of gold and 7000 talents of silver, and the princes contributed 5000 talents of gold, 10,000 darics of gold, and 10,000 talents of silver (xxix. 4, 7), making a total of 108,000 talents of gold, 10,000 darics of gold, and 1,017,000 talents of silver. This sum is equivalent to nearly 4900 million dollars or, if it may be legitimately reckoned by the lighter system of weights, nearly 2450 million dollars. This latter amount is perhaps not incredible, in view of the booty which David brought home from his wars and received as tribute. Still the sum is very large, and it is well to admit the probability of the text being corrupt. This store of precious metals was placed at the disposal of Solomon for the use of the temple, but it was not all expended (1 Kin. vii. 51; 2 Chron. v. 1). Solomon began the work in the fourth year of his reign, and it was completed in seven years and six months (1 Kin. vi. 1, 38). The alliance with Hiram, king of Tyre, rendered it easy to obtain timber from Lebanon, and skilled Phœnician artificers. 30,000 Israelites were levied, and sent in detachments of 10,000 for a month to the Lebanon mountains (1 Kin. v. 13), and the remnant of the Canaanites was impressed to the number of 150,000 to serve as hewers of stone and carriers (1 Kin. v. 15, ix. 20, 21; 2 Chron. ii. 2, 17, 18). Overseers were appointed, apparently 550 chiefs and 3300 subordinates (1 Kin. v. 16; ix. 23), of whom 3600 were Canaanites and 250 Israelites (2 Chron. ii. 17; viii. 10). The building was erected on mount Moriah, at the spot where the threshing floor of Ornan, or Araunah, the Jebusite, had stood (2 Chron. iii. 1). Its general plan was that of the tabernacle, but the dimensions were double and the ornamentation was richer. The interior of the edifice measured 60 cubits in length, 20 in breadth, and 30 in height, in this last particular deviating from the proportions of the tabernacle (1 Kin. vi. 2). The walls were built of stone made ready at the quarry (7). The roof was constructed of beams and planks of cedar (9), the floor was laid with cypress, and the walls from the floor to the ceiling were lined with cedar (15; and 2 Chron. iii. 5, where the Greek translators read cedar, not fir). The whole interior was overlaid with gold (1 Kin. vi. 20, 22, 30; 2 Chron. iii. 7 et passim), and its walls were carved not only with cherubim, but also with palm trees and flowers.

The holy of holies was a cube. Each side measured 20 cubits (1 Kin. vi. 16, 20). The space, nearly 10 cubits high, between its ceiling and the roof was probably occupied by upper chambers, gold lined (1 Chron. xxviii. 11;

2 Chron. iii. 9). In the holy of holies itself was placed the ark (1 Kin. viii. 6), under the wings of two colossal cherubim of olive wood overlaid with gold. Each cherub was 10 cubits in height, and had wings 5 cubits long. With the tip of one wing it touched a side wall, and with the other wing it reached forward to the center of the room and touched the corresponding wing of its companion. The four wings thus extended across the width of the house, while the cherubim turned their faces toward the sanctuary (1 Kin. vi. 23-28, 2 Chron. iii. 13). Under their wings the ark was placed (1 Kin. viii. 6). The partition between the holy and the most holy place was of cedar boards, overlaid on both sides with gold, and it had two doors of olive wood, decorated with palm trees, flowers, and cherubim, and overlaid with gold; see LEAF. This was hung, toward the sanctuary, with chains of gold and a curtain patterned after that of the tabernacle (1 Kin. vi. 16, 21, 31, 32; 2 Chron. iii. 14; cp. Antiq. viii. 3, 3 and 7).

The holy place or sanctuary was 40 cubits long, 20 wide, and 30 high. Its walls were pierced by latticed windows; probably near the roof, above the top of the exterior building, and intended for ventilation and the escape of smoke (1 Kin. vi. 4). The altar of incense was made of cedar, instead of acacia, and overlaid with gold (20, 22; vii. 48). It belonged to the holy of holies (22, R. V.; Heb. ix. 3, 4), but stood in the holy place, doubtless because the priest, who might enter the holy of holies but once in the year, had occasion to offer incense daily. There were ten golden candlesticks instead of one, and likewise ten tables, although doubtless the showbread was displayed on but one; see CANDLESTICK and SHOWBREAD. The entrance to the sanctuary from the court had doors of cypress (vi. 33, 34).

Against the two exterior sides and the rear of the temple a three-story building was erected, containing chambers for officials and for storage (vi. 5-10). Before the front entrance a portico was built, 10 cubits wide, 20 long, and 120 or more probably 20 high (3; 2 Chron. iii. 4; cp. Septuagint; Syriac). By it stood the two brazen pillars, Boaz and Jachin, each 18 cubits high, and richly ornamented (1 Kin. vii. 15-22; 2 Chron. iii. 15-17).

The courts of the temple were two; the inner, upper court of the priests, and the great court (2 Kin. xxiii. 12; 2 Chron. iv. 9; Jer. xxxvi. 10). They were separated from one another, both by the difference of level and by a low wall, consisting of three courses of hewn stone and one course of cedar beams (1 Kin. vi. 36; vii. 12). In the court of the priests were a brazen altar for sacrifice (viii. 64; 2 Kin. xvi. 14; 2 Chron. xv. 8), in size nearly four times that used at the tabernacle (iv. 1); and a brazen sea and ten brazen lavers (1 Kin. vii. 23-39). The sea was for the priests to wash in; the lavers were for washing such things as belonged to the burnt offering (2 Chron. iv. 6); see ALTAR, SEA, LAYER. The great outer court was for Israel (cp. 1 Kin. viii. 14). It was paved (2 Chron. vii. 3); and it was surrounded by a wall, for gates are mentioned (iv. 9; cp. Ezek. xl. 5).

This temple was plundered and burned by the Babylonians when they captured Jerusalem in 587 B. C. (2 Kin. xxv. 8-17).

2. Zerubbabel's Temple.—Cyrus authorized the erection of a temple 60 cubits in breadth and height (Ezra vi. 3; Antiq. xi. 4, 6). The limits which Cyrus set may have been attained by the exterior of the new building; for Herod the Great, with 2 Chron. iii. 4 in mind, assigns 60 cubits to the height (xv. 11, 1). It was begun in the year 537 B. C., the second year after the return from captivity; and, after much opposition from the inhabitants of Samaria, was completed in the sixth year of Darius, 515 B. C. (Ezra iii. 8; vi. 15; con. Apion. i. 21). The dimensions of the several parts are not known. The plan of Solomon's temple was, however, followed; though the new building was projected on a scale of far less magnificence. In the construction of the house, cedar from Lebanon was used (Ezra iii. 7); and precious metals, which were provided, as in the wilderness, by the freewill offerings of the people (i. 6; ii. 68, 69). Many of the vessels used in the former temple were restored (i. 7-11). The interior walls were overlaid with gold; and the house was divided, as usual, into the holy of holies and the sanctuary, apparently separated from each other by at least a veil (1 Mac. i. 21, 22; iv. 48, 51). The holy of holies was empty, for the ark of the covenant had disappeared (Cicero, pro Flac. 28; Tacitus, Hist. v. 3). The sanctuary was furnished with an altar of incense, and, like the tabernacle, with only one candlestick and one table for showbread (1 Mac. i. 21, 22; iv. 49). Exterior chambers were attached to the building (Neh. x. 37-39; xii. 44; xiii. 4; 1 Mac. iv. 38); and the whole was surrounded with courts (Neh. viii. 16; xiii. 7; Antiq. xiv. 16, 2). A brazen sea (Ecclus. i. 3) and an altar for sacrifice were used (Ezra vii. 17). The altar was built of stones (1 Mac. iv. 44-47). The court of the priests was eventually separated from the outer court by a wooden railing (Antiq. xiii. 13, 5). The temple and its precincts were closed by doors and gates (Neh. vi. 10; 1 Mac. iv. 38).

3. Herod's temple superseded Zerubbabel's. It is fully described by Josephus, who was thoroughly familiar with the building (Antiq. xv. 11; War v. 5), and in the Mishna (Middoth). The materials were brought together before the old structure was taken down. Work was commenced in the eighteenth year of Herod's reign, 19 B. C. The main edifice was built by priests in a year and a half, and the cloisters were finished in eight years, either in 11 or 9 B. C.; but the work on the entire complex of courts and buildings was not completed until the procuratorship of Albinus, A. D. 62-64 (Antiq. xv. 11, 5 and 6; xx. 9, 7; cp. John ii. 20). The old area was enlarged to twice its former dimensions (War i. 21, 1). The temple proper stood upon the highest ground in the inclosure. It was built of great blocks of white stone. Its interior had the length and breadth of Solomon's temple; but a height of 40 cubits, exclusive of an upper chamber, instead of 30 cubits. It was divided into the holy of holies and the sanctuary on the customary lines. The holy of holies was empty. It was separated from the holy place by a veil (War v. 5, 5). The rending of this veil by an earthquake at the death of Christ signified that the way to the mercy seat is no longer closed to all save the mediating high priest, but is at all times open to the sincere worshiper (Mat. xxvii. 51; Heb. vi. 19; x. 20). The holy place contained, as usual, a golden altar for incense, a table for showbread, and a candlestick. It was entered from the east by a great doorway closed by golden doors, each 55 cubits high and 16 broad; hung with a veil of blue, purple, scarlet and fine linen; and encompassed on the outer or court side by a golden vine from which depended immense clusters of golden grapes. Against the two sides and rear of the temple, a three-story building, 40 cubits high, containing chambers, was constructed (cp. War vi. 4, 7), and in addition two wings, one containing winding stairs, sprang from the front corners. The building measured externally 100 cubits in length and 54 or, including the two wings at the front, 70 cubits in width. Over the holy place and the holy of holies was an attic, which had the same dimensions as the sacred apartments beneath. This attic, together with its floor and the roof, increased the height of the sacred edifice to over 90 cubits. A vestibule or porch ran along the entire front of the house, 100 cubits long and high and 20 broad. Its portal was 70 cubits high by 25 broad (or, according to the Mishna, 40 and 20), without doors, allowing the great doorway of the sanctuary to be seen from without. Above this porch Herod erected the celebrated golden eagle (Antiq. xvii. 6, 2 and 3; War i. 33, 2 and 3). Twelve steps descended from the vestibule to the court of the priests. This court surrounded the sacred edifice. It contained the altar for burnt offerings, of which the height was 15 cubits, and the base a square measuring 50 cubits to the side. According to the Mishna, it was built of unhewn stones; and contracted from a base 32 cubits square to a top 24 cubits square. It was reached by an inclined plane. A brazen sea or laver was also in use (Mishna). This court was encompassed by a wall or coping, about a cubit in height. All around the court of the priests lay, as of old, the great court, now double. It was inclosed by a wall, whose top was 25 cubits higher than the pavement. Against the inner side of this wall storage chambers were built (War vi. 5, 2), and in front of these, that is, on the temple side, ran a covered colonnade. This court was divided into two parts by a gate in the center of the partition wall and by a descent of fifteen steps. Only Israelites might enter this court, and women might not advance farther. These three courts and the temple were embraced in the chel, or sacred inclosure. The inclosing barrier was wall. The western portion, that encompassing the court of the priests, was the court of Israel. Only the men of Israel were allowed within it. The court of the women was the eastern and lower portion. It was reached from the court of the men through a great triple: the wall of the courts of Israel and the women, which has been already mentioned, and which was very thick, like the walls of a fortress (cp. War vi. 4, 1); a terrace, of which the top was level and 10 cubits broad; and at the foot of the terrace a wall

3 cubits in height, surmounted by pillars, on which were inscriptions forbidding all persons save those of the commonwealth of Israel, from entering the inclosure "Let no gentile," so ran the Greek inscription, "enter inside of the barrier and the fence around the sanctuary. Anyone trespassing will bring death upon himself as a penalty." This triple wall of partition (Eph. ii. 14) was pierced by nine gates. These tower-like structures were sheathed with gold and silver. Four were on the northern, and four on the southern side. Of these, one on each side led into the court of the women and three into that of Israel. The ninth was the great eastern gate, the only one on that side, probably the gate Beautiful (Acts iii. 2, 10). The forming three aisles. Each column was a monolith of white stone, 25 cubits high. The roof was ceiled with cedar, curiously carved and carefully polished. The other colonnades consisted of two rows of columns. That along the eastern side of the court was regarded as a remnant of the first temple, and was called Solomon's porch (John x. 23; Acts iii. 11; Antiq. xx. 9, 7; War v. 5, 1). It was this court which was so far abused that money changers were allowed to set up their tables and traders were permitted to expose cattle for sale there (Mat. xxi. 12; John ii. 14). Finally the sacred area was surrounded by massive walls. The western wall was pierced by four gates: the two more northerly ones led to the suburbs; the third difference of level between the vestibule of the temple within the inclosure and the court of the gentiles without appears to have been about 15 cubits. From the vestibule to the court of the priests were 12 steps; from the court of Israel to that of the women 15; thence to the terrace 5, and thence to the court of the gentiles 14. This court of the gentiles occupied the remainder of the temple yard and completely surrounded the sacred inclosure. It was foursquare (War vi. 5, 4), and measured fully 6 stades, or three-quarters of a mile, in circuit (War v. 5, 2). It was paved throughout. At the northwestern corner stood the castle of Antonia (q. v.). Except perhaps at that point, it was bordered on all sides by magnificent, covered colonnades or cloisters (Antiq. xvii. 10, 2; cp. War vi. 3, 2). Those on the south were the finest. They contained 162 columns, arranged in four rows, crossed the Tyropæon valley at a point now marked by Wilson's arch; and the fourth, still farther south, opened into the valley, and was reached by steps from the temple yard (Antiq. xv. 11, 5). In the southern wall were two gates, known by the name of Huldah. In the eastern wall was the Shushan gate. One is mentioned in the northern wall (War vi. 4, 1).

During the siege of Jerusalem by the Romans in A. D. 70, the Jews themselves, who were using the temple yard as a fortress, set fire to the outer cloisters; but the temple itself was fired by a Roman soldier contrary to the orders of Titus, and all that was combustible was destroyed (War vi. 3, 1; 4, 5; cp. 5, 1; 9, 2). Afterwards the conquerors threw down the walls (vii. 1, 1). On its site the emperor Hadrian dedicated a temple to Jupiter Capitolinus in A. D. 136 or earlier.

In A. D. 363 the emperor Julian, in order to defeat the prophecy of Christ (Mat xxiv 1, 2), undertook to rebuild the temple, but his plans were frustrated by flames which burst from the foundation. The Dome of the Rock, generally called the Mosque of Omar, now occupies the place where the old temples stood. Warren between February, 1867, and April, 1870, sunk shafts in the rubbish, in some places 100 and in one place 125 feet deep, which now covers portions of mount Moriah. The corner stones of the foundations, which still remain, are 14 to 15 feet long, and from the free citation of the words by Moses in Deut v 6-21. The principal difference is that the law of the Sabbath is enforced, in the original law, by reference to God's resting on the seventh day from the work of creation; whereas when Moses cites the law in his public address, he omits this fundamental basis of the command and urges the deliverance from Egypt as the reason why Israel should remember the day. Another difference, and one upon which undue stress has been laid, is that when Moses repeats the tenth commandment, he uses the word 3½ to 4½ feet high. Some of those at the south-east angle have on them Phœnician characters, coming down at least from Herod's, and perhaps from Solomon's time. The walls surrounding the temple area were found to have been 1000 feet long, and the platform on which the holy place stood to have been supported by a buttress 200 feet high from the valley beneath. Finally, one of the actual inscriptions has been recovered which forbade any foreigner to enter the second court.

Ten Com-mand'ments.

The fundamental law of the Hebrew state; see THEOCRACY. The Hebrews called them the ten words (R V margin of Ex xxxiv. 28, Deut. iv 13; x. 4). They were spoken by God at Sinai, and written by him on tables of stone. They appear in two forms: the original form, contained in Ex. xx., and covet in one clause only and employs desire instead of covet in reference to a neighbor's house, field, etc (R V). These differences are not contradictions, and they are fully explained by the character of Deuteronomy. See DEUTERONOMY, SABBATH.

The ten commandments are not individually numbered in the Bible. Later Jews regarded the words "I am the Lord thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage" (Ex xx 2) as the first commandment. These words, however, are not in the form of a command. They constitute the preface to the ten laws which follow. Omitting the preface, there are two methods of enumeration: 1. According to the received teaching of the Roman Catholic and Lutheran churches, based on Augustine, the first table contains three commandments and the second table seven. Augustine adopted this classification because it exhibits the symbolical numbers three, seven, ten, and represents a real difference in the nature of the commands, the first three being duties toward God and the last seven duties toward man. The first division included the command to remember the Sabbath, and to make out three commands in this table, Augustine joined into one the commands to have no other gods and to make no graven image, and to secure seven in the second table he divided the command against covetousness into two laws. He followed the text of Deuteronomy, and made the command not to covet a neighbor's wife the ninth commandment, and that against desiring a neighbor's property the tenth. The Roman Catholic church follows the text of Exodus, and makes the command not to covet a neighbor's house the ninth, and that against coveting a neighbor's wife, manservant, etc. the tenth. The great objections to this method of enumeration are that it makes no distinction between polytheism and idolatry, and introduces an arbitrary distinction regarding kinds of covetousness. 2. The division which numbers the command against polytheism as the first, that against idolatry as the second, and that against covetousness as the tenth. This division is the oldest that is known. It was recognized by Josephus (Antiq. iii. 5, 5), by Philo (de Dec. i.), and by Origen; and it was adopted by the Reformed churches at the Reformation. But there are two methods of distributing the ten between the two tables: (1) They are ordinarily grouped as four relating to man's duty toward God and six to his duty to his fellows. This division is simple enough, and it is ethically correct; but it lacks symmetry. (2) Five are assigned to each table (Antiq. iii. 5, 8). This arrangement preserves the grouping of laws into decads, subdivided into pentads, which characterizes much of the legislation. And from the Jewish point of view, doubtless, the division is ethically correct; for the first table includes duties of piety, which imply no corresponding rights, and the second table embraces duties of justice, which involve rights. The duty of honoring parents to the extent of maintaining them if need be, was regarded as absolute and unconditional (Mark vii. 10-13). It was a pious duty, a religious duty, and properly belonged to the first table. Paul is sometimes cited as lending countenance to this division, for when summing up the duties which are comprehended in the command to love one's neighbor as one's self, he enumerates the last commandments, and makes no mention of honoring parents (Rom. xii. 9). But Paul's enumeration is not intended to be complete. He omits the ninth commandment. Jesus placed the fifth commandment in the same group with the last five (Mark x. 19).

Tent.

1. A movable habitation; such as is used by nomads, shepherds, and soldiers (Gen. iv. 20; xxv. 27; Judg. viii. 11). The tent was frequently made of black cloth woven from goats' hair (Song i. 5), fastened with cords and stakes (Ex. xxxv. 18; Is. liv. 2). There were both round and tapering tents, and flat, oblong tents.

2. A habitation generally, a part of the dwellings being put for all, or one kind for another, according to circumstances (Gen. ix. 27; 1 Kin viii. 66, 2 Kin xiii. 5; Job viii. 22, R. V.; Ps lxxxiv. 10; Jer xxx. 18, Lam. ii. 4, R. V.; Zech. xii. 7, Mal. ii. 12, R. V.).

Tent of the Con-gre-ga'tion. See next article.

Tent of Meet'ing, in A. V. Tent or Tabernacle of the Congregation [tent where Jehovah meets his people].

1. A provisional tent where Jehovah met with his people (Ex. xxxiii. 7-11; xxxiv. 34, 35). After the golden calf was made, Jehovah refused to acknowledge Israel any longer as his people and to dwell in their midst. He was estranged and distant. Because of this fact and to symbolize it, Moses used to pitch the tent outside the camp (xxxiii. 7, R. V.), probably until God again promised to go in the midst of Israel (xxxiv. 9). What tent this was is uncertain. But a tent unquestionably formed the headquarters of the camp. It was the place of judicial proceedings, where Moses sat to judge the people (Ex. xviii. 13). And it was the high tribunal after the administration of justice had been organized (21-26). Naturally it was for the time being the depository of the book of the covenant (xx-xxiii.), which was at once a sacred volume of the statutes of God (xvii. 16) and the book containing the civil laws for the government of Israel. It was probably this tent (the Greek translators read "his tent") which Moses now pitched without the camp. He called it the tent of meeting (1) because it was the tribunal of justice, whither everyone went that sought the Lord (xxxiii. 7), for the matter in dispute or doubt was laid before God or, to use their phrase, the party sought Jehovah's face (2 Sam. xxi. 1, R. V.), inquired of God (Ex. xviii. 15), brought the cause to God (19: Num. xxvii. 5), came unto God or came before him (Ex. xxi. 6, xxii. 9, R. V.) stood before Jehovah (Deut. xix. 17); and (2) because it was a place of revelation there Jehovah met his people in their representative, when the pillar of cloud descended to the door of the tent (Ex. xxxiii. 9). It may have borne its appropriate name from the first: if not, Moses borrowed the name from the instructions which he received regarding the permanent tabernacle, since it represented the same truth (xxvii. 21). An altar may have stood near it (xxviii. 12), but the tent was not a national sanctuary, did not contain an ark or paraphernalia for worship, did not possess a priesthood. The tent was cared for by Moses' personal attendant (xxxiii. 11). The cloud descended upon this tent when Moses entered it to inquire of God, but the cloud abode on the permanent tabernacle and the glory of the Lord filled it, and Moses could not enter it (xl. 34, 35, 38).

Te'phon, in A. V. Taphon.

A town of Judaea fortified by Bacchides (1 Mac. ix. 50). Tephon is perhaps a modification of Tappuah, a name which was borne by several towns.

Te'rah, in A. V. twice Tarah, (Num. xxxiii. 27-28) once Thara (Luke. iii. 34) [probably, wild goat].

1. The son of Nahor, and the father of Abraham, another Nahor, and Haran. He was a resident at Ur of the Chaldees during the greater part of his life; serving other divinities than Jehovah (Josh. xxiv. 2), probably among the rest the moon-god, who had a celebrated temple at Ur. With Abraham and Lot, he removed to Haran, where he died, at the age of 205 (Gen. xi. 25-32).

2. A station of the Israelites in the wilderness (Num. xxxiii. 27, 28). The site is unknown.

Ter'a-phim.

Images, but not of a particular deity, which were used in the household and by private individuals, and which varied in size from such as were small enough to be easily carried in hasty flight and concealed in the furniture of a camel (Gen. xxxi. 19, 30, 34, R. V.) to one apparently large enough to represent a man (1 Sam. xix. 13, R. V.). They were probably regarded as bringers of good luck. They were consulted with respect to the advisability of proposed actions (Ezek. xxi. 21; Zech. x. 2, both R. V.). The word, like the usual word for God, is plural in form, but may be singular in signification (1 Sam. xix. 13). Teraphim were employed in Babylonia (Ezek. xxi. 21). Laban used them in Haran, and his daughter Rachel stole them and carried them with her to Canaan (Gen. xxxi. 19, 34). This was done without Jacob's knowledge (32). When he reached Shechem, he demanded the surrender of all the strange gods which members of his company had brought with them, and he removed them from his people (xxxv. 2-4). In the days of the judges Micah of mount Ephraim had a private sanctuary with priest, ephod, and teraphim (Judg. xvii. 5), and eventually a molten image and a graven image (4, xviii. 14). Through them probably the Lord was consulted (5, 6). All these idols the band of Danites carried off for their own use (17-20). Samuel the prophet classed teraphim with witchcraft and rebellion (1 Sam. xv. 23, R. V.); nevertheless, there was one in David's house, doubtless belonging to his wife (xix. 13, R. V.). Teraphim figured largely in the corrupt religion of the northern Israelites (Hos. iii. 4). The teraphim were condemned with other idols as abominations, and were destroyed by Josiah in his work of reformation (2 Kin. xxiii. 24, R. V.); but they still found favor with a part of the people after the exile (Zech. x. 2).

Terebinth.

Ter'e-binth.

The rendering of the Hebrew 'Elaḥ, a robust tree, on the R. V. margin with oak in the text. Twice, when it is associated with another word, which is rendered oak, it appears in the text of the R. V. (Is. vi 13; Hos. iv 13). 'Elah is probably the terebinth. The terebinth or turpentine tree (Pistacia terebinthus) is a small tree with pinnate leaves, inconspicuous flowers, with the sexes separated, and little roundish dark-purple fruit. It is a native of southern Europe, northern Africa, and western Asia, including Palestine. The turpentine is obtained by making incisions in the trunk. It merges into Pistacia palestina, which is also found in Palestine, and is but a variety of the species.

Te'resh [perhaps Persian, austere]

A chamberlain who kept a door in the palace of king Ahasuerus, and plotted the murder of his master and king, a crime for which he and an accomplice were executed (Esth. n. 21-23; v 1 2).

Ter'ti-us [third].

Paul's amanuensis, who wrote for him the Epistle to the Romans (Rom. xvi. 22).

Ter-tul'us [diminutive of Tertius].

A Roman advocate, employed by the Jewish authorities to prosecute Paul before the tribunal of Felix, the Roman procurator (Acts xxiv. 1-8). His rhetorical address is thoroughly in the style affected by Roman advocates of the time.

Tes'ta-ment.

The rendering of the Greek Diathēkē, a will, a covenant. A third meaning has no bearing on the present subject. In Heb. ix. 16, 17 diathēkē is clearly a will. But in viii. 6-10, 13 and ix. 1, 4 the meaning is evidently covenant, and the term is so translated in the text. The Old Covenant and the New Covenant would be more accurate designations of the two parts of the Bible than the Old Testament and the New Testament. See HEIR, NEW TESTAMENT, OLD TESTAMENT.

Teth.

The ninth letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Greek theta comes from the same source; but the Greek versions represent it in Hebrew names by tau, reserving theta for the aspirated Hebrew tau. In the English versions teth is represented by t. It stands at the beginning of the ninth section of Ps. cxix. in several versions, in which section each verse begins with that letter.

Te'trarch.

One who rules over the fourth part of a kingdom or province. Philip of Macedon divided Thessaly into four districts called tetrarchies. Eventually the word was used loosely for a petty subject prince, even though the land was not divided among four such rulers. The Romans adopted the term, and used it as a convenient title for a prince to whom they granted a small territory only, and whom they were unwilling to dignify with the authority and rank of a king. The N. T. names three of these pretty dignitaries: Herod, tetrarch of Galilee, Philip, tetrarch of Iturea and Trachonitis, and Lysanias, tetrarch of Abilene (Luke iii 1). In the case of the tetrarchs Herod Antipas and Philip the title was appropriate, even in its original sense, for Augustus gave one-half of the kingdom of Herod the Great to Archelaus, with the title of ethnarch, and divided the remainder into two tetrarchies, which he gave to them (Antiq. xvii 11, 4; War ii. 6, 3). A tetrarch was sometimes in courtesy called a king (Mat. xiv. 1 with 9; see also Mark vi. 14).

A place where dramatic performances are given. The theater, with its auditorium, orchestra, and stage, and capable of seating immense throngs (see EPHESUS), was admirably adapted for large public meetings and the transaction of public business, and in Greek cities was often put to that use (Acts xix 29, 31; Antiq. xix 8, 2).

The'bez [perhaps, brightness or splendor].

A town near Shechem, having in it a strong tower, in besieging which Abimelech was killed (Judg ix 50-55, 2 Sam. xi 21). It continues to exist in the large village of Túbás, 9½ miles northeast of Shechem, on the road to Beth-shean.

The-oc'ra-cy.

Josephus coined the word theocracy to describe the government instituted at Sinai. "Our legislator . . . ordered our government to be what I may call by a strained expression a theocracy, attributing the power and the authority to God" (con. Apion. ii. 17). Jehovah was the head of the nation, dwelling in its midst between the cherubim (Ex. xxv. 22). In him all the powers of the state, legislative, executive, judicial, were united. As legislator, he announced the fundamental law of the state in the hearing of the congregation. After that immediate presentation of himself to the nation, he exercised his governmental offices for the most part through men whom he raised up. Like all potentates, he delegated the judicial function for the most part to judges; only the most difficult matters were referred to Jehovah (Ex. xviii. 19); see URIM AND THUMMIM. His legislative function he exercised through Moses and through prophets (Deut. xviii. 15-19). Legislation was intermittent; the given body of laws was a sufficient rule, and seldom required modification or enlargement. The executive function was likewise exercised for many years intermittently through leaders, called judges, who were raised up from time to time, and who, accredited by the great deeds which were wrought by their hands, secured public confidence and became the acknowledged head in state affairs.

The theocratic government was proposed by God at Sinai on condition of obedience (Ex. xix. 4-9). The terms were accepted by the elders of the people (7, 8). The ten commandments, which formed the basis of the covenant, were proclaimed by Jehovah himself in such a manner that all the people could hear (xx. 1, 19, 22; Deut. iv. 12, 33, 36; v. 4, 22), in order that they might believe (Ex. xix. 9). At the people's request, the remaining laws, which are a practical application and interpretation of the ten commandments, were not spoken directly to them, but through Moses (xx. 18-21). Then the covenant was ratified. Moses wrote all the words of the Lord, erected an altar and twelve pillars, ordered a sacrifice, and sprinkled the altar with half the blood. He read the book of the covenant in the audience of the people, and, on their formal acceptance of it, sprinkled the remaining portion of the blood upon the people, saying: "Behold the blood of the covenant, which the Lord hath made with you concerning all these words." Finally the covenant meal of the contracting parties was eaten (xxiv. 3-11). Thus the theocracy was established.

This book of the covenant contains the constitution and earliest laws of Israel. The ten commandments formed the fundamental law of the state. In modern mode of thought and expression, they would be called the constitution; in Hebrew conception and as a matter of fact, they were a covenant between God and the nation. There was a treaty, not between several communities, but between the community and God. Being fundamental law, they were engraven on stone, and deposited in the ark; they were known as the covenant (Deut. iv. 13; ix. 9, 11; 1 Kin. viii. 9-21; see also Num. x. 33; Judg. xx. 27; 1 Sam. iv. 3); or the testimony (Ex. xxxi. 18; xxxii. 15, etc.). The laws which follow the ten commandments are by-laws or statutes. They are constitutional, involving no principle contrary to the organic law of the state; they are expository, being the application of the doctrines of the constitution to the affairs of daily life; they are temporary, liable to abrogation and amendment and numerical increase to meet the new conditions and peculiar needs of each age. They are presented in the form of a code; they are not a loose aggregation of statutes, but are disposed in orderly arrangement, mostly in groups of ten or half of ten, and are usually introduced by the word if: 1. Laws relating to the form of worship (xx. 23-26). 2. Laws to protect the rights of man. (a) To protect liberty (xxi. 2-11). (b) Concerning injury of person (12-36). (c) Concerning property rights (xxii. 1-17). 3. Laws to govern personal conduct (18-xxiii. 9). 4. Laws concerning sacred seasons and sacrifice (10-19). 5. The promise annexed (20-33). Regarding the antiquity, character, and codification of these laws, see AMRAPHEL and MOSES; and for the process of annulment and enactment during the ensuing forty years, see ZELO-PHEHAD and DEUTERONOMY.

At the institution of the theocratic government at Sinai, the idea before the people was simply that God was ruler and Moses his accredited representative through whom he exercised the legislative, judicial, and executive offices. Moses already had subordinate judges to assist him (Ex. xviii. 21-26); and at the end of the wilderness period, promise was made of future legislation, that is, the continued revelation of the will of God (Deut. xviii. 15-19). The expectation was also entertained by Moses that God would appoint leaders to succeed him, and that eventually, on account of the people's lack of faith, a king would be needed as earthly, visible representative of the executive power when the people should be settled in Palestine. Accordingly a general law of the king was framed (xvii. 14-20).

The stability of the state under theocratic form of government depended in the first instance and ultimately on the faithfulness of God to his election and his promises; but the success of the theocracy at any given period was conditioned by the attitude of the people toward God and toward the provisions of the covenant. Their obedience to God and reliance on him were requisite. The theocracy was based on the conception of Israel as a community, and it is well to note the weakness of the bond which at the first bound Israel into a community. The children of Israel were divided into twelve tribes, they were bound together by common blood and common language, by common misfortune and common need. They were held together in pursuit of a great end by the enthusiasm and expectation which one man had awakened, by the hope of freedom and a country, by the promise and evidence of God's protection. They were kept together by providence. All these unifying elements save the last were weak. They were bonds that might easily be, and constantly were, broken. This lack of communal strength was an obstacle to the theocracy, which even the establishment of the monarchy did not rectify.

Theophany.

A manifestation of God to man by actual appearance. It was not an immediate revelation of God the Father (John i. 18; 1 Tim vi 16); but a manifestation of Jehovah in the person of the angel of the Lord (Gen. xvi. 7), the angel of the presence or the Lord's presence (Ex. xxxii. 34; xxxiii. 14), the angel of the covenant (Mal. in 1), or Christ. A common classification is: 1. The O. T. theophany, an epiphany of the future Christ. 2. The incarnation of Christ, as the revelation of God in the flesh. 3. The second coming of Christ.

The O. T. theophanies were transient manifestations and permanent localization. They were temporary manifestations to the patriarchs, and became abiding in the shekinah. The theophanies which were granted to the patriarchs may have been unsubstantial manifestations, incorporeal and merely the appearance of the human form. Some interpreters, like Tertullian, believe that occasionally at least there was actual flesh, not putative flesh; real and solid human substance; just as Christ, who was God manifested in the flesh, had flesh and blood both before and after his resurrection, and could be seen and handled (Luke xxiv. 30-43; John xx. 27). If the angel of the Lord assumed an actual body, he did so miraculously, as Christ made the water wine; and it disappeared miraculously, as Christ who possessed a human body of flesh and blood vanished from men's sight. In the O. T. theophany the angel of the Lord ate actual food (Gen. xviii. 1-8). Does this prove that the angel had assumed an actual body? 1. Josephus interprets the eating as mere appearance (Antiq. i. 11, 2); so also Philo (Op. ii. 18) and the writer of Tobit (Tob. xii. 19). 2. Justin Martyr speaks of the angel as consuming food "as fire consumes" (Dial. c. Tryph. xxxiv.). The angel of the Lord who appeared to Manoah, touched the food, and it was burnt. "The thirsty earth absorbs water in one manner, the hot ray of the sun in another" (Augustine).

The transient manifestations gradually gave place to the permanent localization. The shekinah was the visible majesty of the divine presence, especially when dwelling between the cherubim in the tabernacle and temple in the midst of God's people Israel. It first appeared at the exodus. The Lord went before the Israelites in a pillar of cloud by day, and by night in a pillar of fire to give them light (Ex. xiii. 21, 22). A thick cloud rested upon mount Sinai, and the mountain was altogether on smoke, because the Lord descended upon mount Sinai in fire (xix. 16, 18). Later the glory of the Lord abode on mount Sinai, and the cloud covered it six days; and the seventh day he called unto Moses out of the midst of the cloud, and the appearance of the glory of the Lord was like devouring fire on the top of the mount in the eyes of the children of Israel (xxiv. 16, 17). When Moses entered the first tent of meeting the cloud descended and hovered at the door, and the Lord talked with Moses face to face (Ex.

xxxiii. 11; cp. Deut. v. 4). When the tabernacle was erected, the Lord took possession of it. The cloud, dark by day and luminous by night, covered the tent, and the glory of the Lord filled it (Ex. xl. 34, 35; Num. ix. 15, 16). When Moses appeared before the Lord in the tabernacle, he heard the voice of one speaking unto him from off the mercy seat (Num. vii. 89; cp. Ex. xxv. 22; Lev. xvi. 2). Probably the glory was not seen constantly, but gleamed forth occasionally from the cloud which concealed it (Ex. xvi. 7, 10; Lev. ix. 6, 23; Num. xiv. 10; xvi. 19, 42; xx. 6). From frequent references, it seems that God continued to manifest his presence between the cherubim on the ark. At length, when the temple of Solomon was dedicated, the cloud filled the house of the Lord, so that the priests could not stand to minister by reason of the cloud; for the glory of the Lord filled the house (1 Kin. viii. 10, 11).

The temporary manifestations had given place to the abiding presence in the tabernacle and Solomon's temple; and finally the Word became flesh and dwelt among men; and men beheld his glory, glory as of the only begotten from the Father (John i. 14). The latter glory of the house was greater than the former (Hag. ii. 9, R. V.). The divine presence dwelt in Christ's body as in the temple.

Thes-sa-lo'ni-ans, Epistles to the.

The First Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Thessalonians is the earliest of Paul's epistles. It was written by the apostle in conjunction with Silvanus (Silas) and Timothy, to the church at Thessalonica. Paul had founded this church on his second missionary journey, and had been driven from Thessalonica to Berea and from Berea to Athens by the persecuting Jews; see PAUL. The epistle contains allusions (1 Thes. ii.) to his life at Thessalonica. It also relates that, when at Athens, he had sent Timothy back to Thessalonica to encourage the Christians amid their persecutions (iii. 1-3) and that Timothy had recently brought him good news of their steadfastness. In Acts xviii. 5 we learn that Silas and Timothy rejoined the apostle at Corinth. Hence the epistle was written from that city, probably in the year A. D. 52. The allusions which the epistle contains to Paul's life in Thessalonica and to the distress felt by the Thessalonians over the death of their friends, as well as the elementary character of the instruction given, confirm this date. There appear to have been three special features in the condition of the Thessalonians which occasioned anxiety to the apostle, and led him to write this epistle: (1) a tendency to neglect their daily work, probably under the idea that the second advent would soon take place,—and with this was sometimes found a failure to preserve moral purity of life; (2) distress lest their Christian friends who died would fail to enjoy the glories of the kingdom which the returning Christ was to establish; (3) friction between the regular officers of the church and those who possessed miraculous endowments of the Spirit. Hence the analysis of the epistle: 1. A grateful statement of their Christian earnestness, their endurance of trial, and the influence they had already exerted over others (i.). 2. A reminder of the uprightness and industry with which he had lived among them, and of the enthusiasm with which they had received his preaching even in the face of persecution from the Jews (ii.). 3. A recital of the joy he had had in Timothy's good report of their condition (iii.). 4. Instruction on special points (iv. 1-v. 24): (a) Concerning purity in the relation of the sexes (iv. 3-8) (b) Concerning a life of mutual love and orderliness (9-12) (c) Concerning dead believers, declaring that at the advent they will rise first and be caught up with the living to meet the Lord in the air, and thus will not fail of their reward (13-18). (d) Concerning watchfulness and sobriety of life (v. 1-11) (e) Concerning respect for officers of the church, consideration for those in need, cultivation of spiritual gifts, and other duties of the Christian life (12-24). 5. Closing words (25-28).

The epistle strikingly illustrates the difficulties natural to a newly formed gentile church and the breadth and practical wisdom of the apostle's instructions.

The Second Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Thessalonians evidently followed the first after but a short period. It too, therefore, is to be assigned to A. D. 52, and was written from Corinth. We learn from it that the difficulties of the Thessalonians had become more serious, but were still of the same general character as those dealt with in the first epistle. Like the first, this was written by Paul in conjunction with Silvanus (Silas) and Timothy: it deals largely with the second advent and misconceptions about it; and refers again to the tendency of some to disorderly living (2 Thes. ii. 6-12). If, however, the first epistle treated of the relation of the advent to believers, the second treats of its relation to the wicked (i. 5-10). Further the apostle warns them not to suppose that "the day of the Lord is now present" (ii. 2, R. V.), and that the visible advent would therefore soon come; for, before that happens, there must be the apostasy (predicted by Christ, cp. Mat. xxiv. 9-12; and referred to by Paul in Acts xx. 29, 30; Rom. xvi. 17-20; 2 Cor. xi. 13-15; 1 Tim. iv. 1) and the revelation of the man of lawlessness (2 Thes. ii. 3, 4, R. V.; Dan. vii. 25; xi. 36; 1 John ii. 18; see ANTICHRIST), whom the Lord will destroy at his coming.

He had, when with them, told them of these things (ii. 5).

The epistle may be divided as follows: 1. Thanksgiving for their fidelity amid persecution, and assurance that persecution should only make stronger their faith in the vindication of the saints and in the punishment of the ungodly which will take place at the second advent (i.). 2. Warning against supposing that "the day of the Lord is now present," and description of the apostasy and rise of the man of lawlessness, which must precede the coming of the Lord (ii. 1-12). 3. Expression of his confidence in their election and fidelity (13-17). 4. Concluding exhortations,—that they pray for him, that they avoid those who are disorderly, that they be industrious and faithful, that they all subject themselves to the authority which he as an apostle exercised, etc. (iii.). From ii. 2 it appears that a forged letter of Paul's had been circulated; hence in ii. 17 he appends his signature. We thus see also that from the beginning the same authority was attached in the church to the apostle's letters as to his oral teaching. The statements concerning the apostasy and the man of lawlessness have been variously interpreted. We think it most probable that the apostasy was contemplated by Paul as arising within the church; the man of lawlessness as the culmination of the apostasy in a personal antichrist; and he of that which hindereth (ii. 7) as either the civil power or else, and with much probability, the Holy Spirit. G. T. P. (supplemented).

The First Epistle to the Thessalonians is included in the Old Latin version, is listed in the Muratorian fragment; is quoted by Irenæus, attributed by him to Paul, and designated the first letter to the Thessalonians; is quoted by Clement of Alexandria also and assigned to Paul, and is cited by Tertullian under the name of Thessalonians. Undoubted quotation from the Second Epistle is found earlier still, occurring in the writings of Polycarp about the beginning of the second century and possibly in the works of Justin Martyr.

Thes-sa-lo-ni'ca [conquest of Thessaly].

A city on the Thermaic Gulf, now called the gulf of Saloniki. The city was first called Therme, or Thierma, hot spring; but Cassander, one of the successors of Alexander the Great, made it his residence and renamed it Thessalonica, after his wife Thessalonike, a daughter of the conqueror of the Chersonesus and sister of the great Alexander. Under the Romans it was the capital of the second district out of four into which they had divided Macedonia. It was a military and commercial station on the Via Egnatia; and was made a free city in 42 B. C. Its civil magistrates were called politarchs, rulers of the city (Acts xvii. 6, Greek text; inscription on arch in Thessalonica); see RULER.

The Jews had a synagogue in the city. Paul preached there and made converts, who became the nucleus of a Christian church (Acts xvii 1-13; cp. Phil. iv. 16). To this church Paul sent two letters. Two of his co-workers, Aristarchus and Secundus, were men of Thessalonica (Acts xx. 4; xxvii. 2).

many and took many others alive, and secured Theudas, cut off his head, and carried it to Jerusalem (Antiq. xx. 5, 1).

The question is, Do Luke and Josephus refer to the same person? Some answer that they do, and say that either Luke or Josephus errs. Josephus scarcely is mistaken, for he

Saloniki

Thessalonica was taken by the Saracens in A. D. 904. After various vicissitudes, it was captured by the Turkish sultan Amurath II in 1430. It still exists as Saloniki, with a population of about 100,000 Mohammedans, Christians, and Jews.

Theu'das.

Gamaliel, in his speech before the sanhedrin, about A. D. 32, referred to Theudas, who gave himself out to be somebody, to whom a number of men, about 400, joined themselves, who was slain, and all, as many as obeyed him, were dispersed and came to nought, and after whom Judas of Galilee rose up in the days of the enrollment (Acts v. 36, 37). There can be no doubt that the Judas here spoken of was Judas the Gaulonite of Gamala, who, in the times of Quirinius, during the procuratorship of Coponius, raised an insurrection by opposing the enrollment (Antiq. xviii. 1, 1; War ii. 8, 1). Theudas accordingly arose sometime before A. D. 6. Now Josephus mentions a magician named Theudas, who, while Fadus was procurator of Judæa, A. D. 44-46, persuaded a great part of the people to follow him to the river Jordan, for he told them that he was a prophet, and that at his command the waters would divide and allow them a passage. But Fadus sent a troop of horse against him, who fell upon the people unexpectedly, slew gives details. But Luke has fully established his credibility as a historian, and it is a rash thing to accuse him of an error. Accordingly other interpreters believe that it is quite probable that two persons by the name of Theudas, at a distance of forty years or more from each other, laid themselves open to the just vengeance or justifiable suspicions of the Romans and were punished. It is not at all clear that Theudas the magician was an insurgent of the same class as Theudas whom Gamaliel cites. The one was an impostor, a pretended prophet, who, on the faith of the people in his supernatural powers, drew crowds of followers after him. The other made some sort of claim to greatness, gained a following of 400 men, and came to naught. Who then was Theudas to whom Gamaliel refers? He was probably one of the insurrectionary chiefs, who led belligerent bands in the closing year of Herod the Great. That year was remarkably turbulent. Josephus mentions three disturbers by name, and makes general allusion to others. Theudas was either 1. One of these unnamed insurrectionists, whom Gamaliel cites to show that a bad cause and its leaders come to grief. Theudas was a common name, and within a period of half a century, might be borne by two persons of some prominence and somewhat similar in their career. Analogously Josephus gives an account of four men named Simon, who followed each other within forty years, and of three named Judas, within ten years, who were all instigators of rebellion. Or 2 One of the three insurgents who are named by Josephus. Two are advocated as identical with Theudas. (1) Simon (Antiq. xvii. 10, 6; War ii. 4, 2), a slave of Herod, who attempted to make himself king when Herod died. He was noted as a disturber of the peace at this time and his name would be apt to occur to Gamahel; he was a man of lofty pretensions; he died a violent death; he appears to have had comparatively few adherents; he was a slave, and it was quite common among the Jews to assume a new name on changing occupation or mode of life. Gamahel speaks of him as Theudas, the name he had borne longest, and by which he was best known in Jerusalem and to the members of the sanhedrin, while Josephus calls him by the name Simon, which he had adopted when appearing as king of the Jews and by which he was naturally known to the Roman government and people. (2) The man called Matthias by Josephus (Antiq. xvii. 6, 2, War i. 33, 2). Matthias is a Greek form of the Hebrew Mattanyah, gift of God, and is equivalent to the Greek name Theudas, which, it is urged, is the same as Theodas, shortened from Theodōros, gift of God. Matthias was an eloquent teacher, who with another teacher headed a band in the days of king Herod, and destroyed the golden eagle set up by the king over the great gate of the temple. He was caught and burnt alive with some of his companions, and many of the rest were put to death by other means.

Thief.

In a broad sense, anyone who appropriates what is not his own, as the petty pilferer (John xii. 6), the robber or highwayman (Luke x. 30, R. V. robber), the burglar (Mat. vi. 20). The highwayman was often a rebel against Roman rule and a fomentor of strife, like Barabbas (Mark xv. 7), who was compelled by the exigencies of the case, as much as by the lust of plunder, to flee from the soldiers and adopt the wild, robber life. Under the Mosaic law a thief caught had to make restitution of twice the amount he had taken, and if he were unable, could be sold into temporary servitude till he had earned the requisite amount. If a thief entered a house and, coming into contact with the owner in the dark, was killed, the homicide was not to be charged with blood-guiltiness; but if the sun had risen, the householder was held to be guilty if he killed the intruder (Ex. xxii. 1-4). That the thieves on the cross were something far beyond petty pilferers is plain from the Greek term applied to them, the severity of their punishment (War ii. 13, 2), and the fact that one of them acknowledged the justice of the death penalty inflicted on him (Luke xxiii. 41); he must have been a robber at the least (Mat. xxvii. 38, R. V.), and quite possibly even a brigand. Both reviled Jesus on the cross (44), but subsequently one was touched with awe at the meekness and forgiving spirit of Jesus, and with the fear of God in his heart, the confession of the sinfulness of his past life, the acknowledgment that Jesus had done nothing amiss, and was the true King, and would reign in power after the death on the cross, turned to Jesus for acceptance after death (Luke xxiii. 39-43).

Thom'as [Greek, from Hebrew ta'om, a twin].

One of the twelve apostles (Mat. x. 3). He was also called Didymus, a Greek name, meaning, like Thomas, a twin. When the disciples were astonished that Jesus intended going again to Judaea, where a little before the Jews had threatened to stone him (John xi. 7, 8), Thomas, in devotion to Jesus, determined to share the peril, and said to his fellow-disciples: "Let us also go, that we may die with him" (16). When Jesus, in anticipation of his departure, spoke of going to prepare a place for them, and added that they knew whither he was going and the way, Thomas said: "Lord, we know not whither thou goest; and how can we know the way?" To which the reply commenced with the well-known words: "I am the way, the truth, and the life" (xiv. 1-6). Thomas was not at the first meeting at which the privilege was granted of seeing the risen Lord, and when he heard that Jesus had been present he said: "Except I shall see in his hands the print of the nails, and put my finger into the print of the nails, and thrust my hand into his side, I will not believe" (xx. 24, 25). This incident has given rise to his designation, "doubting Thomas." But God turned the doubt of Thomas to the good of others. "He doubted that we might not doubt" (Augustine), and eight days later Jesus gave him the evidence he required, and elicited from him the adoring exclamation: "My Lord and my God!" (26-29). He was on the sea of Galilee with six other disciples when Jesus hailed them from the beach and told them where to cast the net (xxi. 1-8); and was with the rest of the apostles in the upper room at Jerusalem after the ascension (Acts i. 13). Tradition makes Thomas afterwards labor in Parthia and Persia, dying in the latter country. At a later period India was named as the place where he had preached and suffered martyrdom, and a place near Madras is called St. Thomas' mount.

Thorns and This'tles.

In most passages where these words occur the terms are generic rather than specific. Thorny weeds, bushes, and small trees of various kinds are abundant in Palestine. Among them may be mentioned the thorny burnet (Poterium spinosum), which is burnt as fuel in lime kilns and ovens; the thorny caper (Capparis spinosa), seen everywhere hanging from rocks and walls; the Jamestown or jimson weed (Datura stramonium) by the roadside and in waste places; the artichoke (Cynara syriaca); and in the uplands the acanthus with its whitish flowers. The prickly pear (Opuntia ficus indica), a cactus with yellow flowers, is the characteristic hedge plant of modern Syria; but it was introduced from America and was unknown in ancient times. For hedge purposes there are also used the box thorn (Lycium europæum) and the bramble (Rubus discolor). Various hawthorns are found, Cratægus azarolus, C. monogyna, and east of the Jordan C. orientalis. Numerous thistles grow in the fields and waste places such as Cirsium acarna, with its leaves tipped with long, yellow spines; Carthamus lanatus, with yellow flowerets, C. glaucus, with purple, C. cæruleus, with blue, and C. tinctorius, with red flowerets, which are used as a red dye; Carduus pycnocephalus and argentalis; Echinops viscosus; the tall Notobasis syriaca, with pink flowers and powerful spines; cotton thistles (Onopordon illyricum and cynarocephalum), the milk thistle (Silybum marianum); sow thistles (Sonchus oleraceus and glaucescens); star thistles (Centaurea calcitrapa and verutum), the former with purple, the latter with yellow flowers. The cocklebur (Xanthium) is common, as is also teasel (Dipsacus sylvestris).

Several words rendered thorn or thistle appear to be used specifically: 1. Hebrew dardar, Greek tribolos, which grows in fields (Gen. iii. 18; Hos x. 8; Mat vii 16; all in E. V. thistle; and Heb. vi 8, in A. V. brier) is probably a species of Tribulus, perhaps T. terrestris, one of the plants called caltrop. It is common in the fields and by the roadside. The fruit is composed of bony cells armed with prickles on the back. It does not belong to the Compositæ, as do the thistles. 2, 3, and 4, see BRAMBLE, BRIER 5, 6, NETTLE 2.

The crown of thorns, which was plaited by the Roman soldiers and placed on the head of Jesus to torture and insult him (Mat. xxvii. 29), is generally believed to have been made of the Zizyphus spina Christi, a species of jujube or lotus tree, with soft, round, pliant branches, and with leaves resembling the ivy with which emperors and generals were wont to be crowned. See BRAMBLE.

The thorn in the flesh was some bodily pain or infirmity, sent as a messenger of Satan to buffet the apostle Paul and keep him humble amid all his spiritual triumphs (2 Cor. xii. 7). Its nature is unknown.

Thou'sand.

A division of the tribe (Num. xxxi. 5; Josh. xxii. 14); consisting nominally of a thousand persons, but through birth and death ever varying and doubtless falling far short of the standard number; used for military and judicial purposes (Ex. xviii. 21, 25; and Num. xxxi. 14; 1 Sam. viii. 12; xxii. 7; 2 Sam. xviii. 1); and practically, perhaps exactly, equivalent to the subdivision of the tribe which was technically known as a father's house (Num. i. 2, 4 with 16, R. V.; Judg. vi. 15, cp. R. V. margin; 1 Sam. x. 19 with 21).

Three Tav'erns.

A small station on the Appian Way, about a mile from Appii Forum, and 30 miles from Rome, where a number of Roman Christians met Paul on his way to Rome (Acts xxviii. 15).

Thresh'ing.

The process of separating grain from the straw. Small quantities of grain were beaten out with a stick or flail (Judg. vi. 11; Ruth ii. 7), and this was the customary method of hulling fitches and cummin (Is. xxviii. 27); but when much work was to be done, oxen and threshing floors were employed. The weather of Palestine permits the threshing floor to be under the open sky (Judg. vi. 37). It is generally common to the whole village, but may have a private owner (2 Sam. xxiv. 16). If possible, it is the surface of a flat rock on the top of a hill, exposed to any wind that blows. If such a natural floor is not available, an artificial floor is laid out by the roadside, and soon assumes a circular shape,

Threshing Floor.

about 50 feet in diameter, and becomes firm and hard under the trampling of the oxen. The sheaves are loosened and arranged in a circle on the floor; or, if the straw is to be preserved whole, the ears are cut from the stock and cast on the floor. Oxen, which to this day are unmuzzled except by the negligently (Deut. xxv. 4), are driven round and round to trample out the kernels; or else are made to drag a sled or cart, weighted by a heavy stone or the driver, to facilitate the operation. The sled is made of two heavy planks, curved upward at the front and fastened side by side. Sharp pieces of stone are fixed in holes bored in the bottom. The cart, at least as used in Egypt, consists of a frame containing three wooden rollers set with sharp iron knives. If there is any wind, the threshed grain is tossed high in the air with a shovel or a fork (Is. xxx. 24; Mat. iii. 12; Llad. xiii. 588), when the chaff is blown away and the clean grain falls to the ground; but if there is no wind, a large fan is plied by one man, while another tosses the grain with his shovel. The fan, however, is seldom used except to purge the floor of the refuse dust. Winnowing is done in the evening for the sake of the wind; and it is customary for the owner of the grain to spend the night at the floor during the time of threshing to prevent stealing (Ruth. iii. 2 seq.). The grain is finally passed through a sieve to cleanse it from dirt, after which it is ready for grinding (Amos ix. 9).

military leader, governor, or king (Gen. xli. 40; 1 Sam. i. 9; 2 Sam. iii. 10; Neh. iii. 7; Ps. cxxii. 5; Jer. i. 15; Mat. xix. 28). Royal thrones were often portable, like those of Ahab and Jehoshaphat (1 Kin. xxii. 10), and the one used by Sennacherib at Lachish; see SENNACHERIB. Solomon's throne was an elevated seat reached by six steps. Its frame was probably made of cedar. It was inlaid with ivory, and elsewhere overlaid with gold; the back of it was arched or rounded off; it was furnished with arms and was provided with a footstool. A lion stood at each side, ornamenting the arms, and on each end of each of the six steps (1 Kin. x. 18-20; 2 Chron. ix. 17-19). It resembled the thrones of the Assyrian and Egyptian monarchs, but with its dais was the most magnificent royal chair of the time.

The king, arrayed in his royal robes, regularly sat on his throne when granting audiences, receiving homage, administering justice, or promulgating commands (1 Kin. i. 19, vii. 7; xxii. 10; 2 Kin. xi. 19, Jon. iii. 6).

The throne symbolized supreme power and authority (Gen. xli. 40). It is constantly attributed to Jehovah.

Thum'mim. See URIM AND THUMMIM.

Thun'der.

The noise which follows a flash of lightning. It intensifies the awfulness of a terrific storm (Ex. ix. 23). Thunder is an unusual event during summer, which is the dry season in Palestine (Prov. xxvi. 1); and hence, when it occurred at that time of year after prayer for it, it was an evident answer and served as a sign (1 Sam. xii. 17). It was often called simply kol, voice, sound, noise; and was poetically described as the voice of Jehovah (Job xxxvii. 2-5; xl. 9, Ps. xxix. 3-9), who sends and directs the storm (Job xxviii. 26). It accompanied manifestations of God's presence when he came in dread majesty (Ex. xix. 16; Rev. iv. 5); it was an indication of divine power at work in nature (Ps. xxix. 3-9), and as thunder is a precursor of the destructive storm, it symbolized divine vengeance (1 Sam. ii. 10; 2 Sam. xxii. 14, 15; Ps. lxxvii. 18).

Thy-a-ti'ra.

A city of Asia Minor, in Lydia, near the boundary of Mysia. It was on the road from Pergamos to Sardis. It had already come into existence and been known as Pelopia and Euhippia when Seleucus Nicator about 280 B. C. colonized it with Greeks, giving it the name of Thyatira. Its inhabitants were famed for their skill in dyeing purple; and Lydia, the seller of purple at Philippi, came from Thyatira (Acts xvi. 14). It contained one of the seven churches in Asia (Rev. i. 11; ii. 18-24). Traces of its existence remain in fragments of columns built into the streets and edifices of its modern successor, Ak Hisar. Christians still live in the place.

Thy'ine Wood.

An article sold in the markets of the mystic Babylon (Rev. xviii. 12). It was the wood of Callitris quadrivalvis, a large tree of the cypress family. It is reddish-brown, hard, and fragrant; and was greatly prized by the

Thyine Wood

Romans for ornamental purposes. They ran it up to a high price. The resin which exudes from the tree is gum sandarac

Ti-be'ri-as.

A city on the sea of Galilee (John vi. 23), built by Herod the tetrarch, and named by him after the then reigning Roman emperor, Tiberius Cæsar (Antiq xviii 2, 3; War ii 9, 1). Tiberias was fortified by Josephus during the Jewish war (Life 8; War II. 20, 6). It opened its gates to Vespasian. A number of the inhabitants of Tarichee, a neighboring town, whom he had assured of their lives, were afterwards slain in cold blood in the race course of Tiberias (War iii 10, 1-10). After the destruction of Jerusalem and after the expulsion of the Jews from Judæa, consequent on the failure of Barcocheba's rebellion, Tiberias became the virtual metropolis of the Jewish nation, and coins of the city have been found, bearing the names of Tiberius, Clandius, Trajan, Adrian, and Antoninus Pius. The sanhedrin was transferred to Tiberias about the middle of the second century, and the city became the center of Jewish learning. A celebrated school was established in it, which produced the volume of Scripture tradition called the Mishna about A D 190 or 220, and its supplement, the Gemara, which was codified in the fourth century. The Masorah, or body of traditions which transmitted the details of the Hebrew text of the O. T. and preserved its pronunciation by means of vowel signs, originated in a great measure at Tiberias, see OLD TESTAMENT. The Jews regard Tiberias as one of their four sacred cities, Jerusalem, Hebron, and Safed being the others, in which prayer must be offered continually, or the world will instantly fall back into chaos. It still exists under the name of Tubariya, on the western shore of the sea of Galilee, 11½ miles from the entrance and Tiberias.

6 from the exit of the Jordan. At that place the steep mountain ridge does not closely approach the lake, but leaves on its margin a narrow strip of undulating land, at the northern part of which Tiberias stands. It extends about half a mile along the shore, and is defended on the land side by a wall, towers, and a castle. The houses are mostly of black basalt. On January 1, 1837, it suffered severely from an earthquake, but has since in a large measure been rebuilt. The Jewish quarter is near the lake.

The sea of Tiberias is more commonly called the sea of Gahlee (John vi 1; xxi 1)

Ti-be'ri-us Cæ'sar. See CÆSAR

Tib'hath [slaughter]

A town of Aram-zobah (1 Chron. xviii. 8). Site unknown. See BETAH and TEBAH.

Tib'ni.

A son of Ginath, and the unsuccessful competitor for the throne of Israel with Omri (1 Kin. xvi 21, 22).

Ti'dal.

King of Gomm and one of Chedorlaomer's confederates (Gen. xiv 1, 9, R. V.) He was Tudhul, king of Gutium, northeast of Babylonia

Tig-lath-pi-le'ser, in Chronicles Tiglath-pileser [Assyrian Tukulti-apli-Eshura, my strength is the god Ninib]

A king of Assyria, who reigned from 745 to 727 B. C. Tiglath-pileser is but another name for Pul, as appears from the fact that where Ptolemy's list of Babylonian kings gives Poros, and the so-called dynastic tablets of the Babylonians give Pulu, the Babylonian chronicle gives Tiglath-pileser. Probably Pul was his original name, and when he secured the throne he assumed the grander title of Tiglath-pileser, which had already been made famous by a great king of the past. There is reason to believe that he owed his elevation to the throne to the disturbances in Galah, which are recorded for the year 746 B. C. He seated himself upon the Assyrian throne on the thirteenth day of the second month and in the seventh month was marching against Babylonia. He first became known to the Israelites as Pul. During the years 743-740 his military headquarters were at Arpad in northern Syria, not far from the site of the later Antioch; but he found opportunity to send or lead expeditions and terrify the country within a radius of 100 miles or more. Among other places against which he came at that time or a little later was the land of Israel, but Menahem paid him tribute and the Assyrian confirmed the kingdom to Menahem and left the country (2 Kin. xv. 19, 20); see PEKAH. Tiglath-pileser records the names of kings who about 738 B. C. paid him tribute, and among others the name of Menahem of Samaria. During the next few years he was conducting war first in the far east, and then in the country north and northwest of Nineveh; but in 734 he was again in the west. The alliance of Pekah and Rezin against Abaz of Judah impelled Ahaz, contrary to the exhortation of the prophet Isaiah, to turn for help to a human potentate Tiglath-pileser was induced by large money (xvi 7, 8), and by the favorable opportunity afforded him of extending his authority, to side with Ahaz. He marched against Philistia, capturing cities on the Phœnician coast as he proceeded. He apparently records the seizure of towns in northern Israel; but whether he makes the record or not, it was during his advance south or as he returned north that he took Ijon, Abel-beth-maacah, Janoah, Kedesh, Hazor, Gilead, and Galilee, all the land of Naphtali, and carried them captive to Assyria (xv 29). He captured Gaza. Thus he punished the Philistines, who had taken advantage of Judah's straits to pillage (2 Chron. xxviii. 18). In the years 733 and 732 he was at Damascus, according to the Assyrian records. During the siege or immediately after the capture of the city, he ravaged sixteen districts of Damascus; leaving them, as he says, like ruins after a flood-storm. He slew Rezin king of Damascus. At this time God stirred up the spirit of Pul king of Assyria and (or rather, as it may equally well be translated, even) the spirit of Tiglath-pileser king of Assyria, and he earned them away, even the Reubenites and the Gadites, and the half tribe of Manasseh (1 Chron. v. 26). He reports his reception of tribute from many kings, among others from the kings of Ammon, Moab, and Edom, and from Jehoahaz of Judah. This statement agrees with the biblical record that king Ahaz went to Damascus to meet Tiglath-pileser (2 Kin. xvi. 10). In 730 B. C., according to biblical chronology, Hoshea revolted against Pekah. The revolt was instigated or assisted by Tiglath-pileser, who may have been in Nineveh at the time, for he says: "Pekah I slew and appointed Hoshea to rule over them." After the fall of Damascus in 733 or 732 Tiglath-pileser returned to Nineveh. During the remainder of his life he was much engaged in building operations; but he found time for war, and among other expeditions he conducted an army into Babylonia and made himself king of Babylon. He died in the tenth month, Tebeth, 727 B. C., after having occupied the throne for eighteen years and having raised the Assyrian empire to a power and glory unknown to it under any of his predecessors.

Ti'gris. See HIDEKEL.

Tik'vah [expectation].

1. The father of Shallum, the husband of Huldah the prophetess (2 Kin. xxii. 14). In 2 Chron. xxxiv. 22 the name appears as Tokhath, in A. V. Tikvath; but the Hebrew form is probably a corruption of Tikvah (cp. Lucian's Septuagint).

2 The father of a certain Jahaziah (Ezra x. 15).

Tik'vath. See preceding article.

Tile.

A slab or plate of baked clay. Tiles were the common writing material of Babylonia (Ezek iv. 1). The characters were impressed on the surface while it was yet soft, and the clay was then baked to render the writing indelible. Tiles were used in many countries as roofing material (Luke v. 19), but not, or not commonly, in Palestine. Probably either Luke, accustomed to the tiled roofs of Greek houses, uses the expression "through the tiles" for through the roof, without reference to the material of the roof in question, or else in this particular house there was an opening in the roof to permit the inmates to ascend from the room to the coolness of the outer air, but which during the winter was closed with a frame and bricked over.

Til-gath-pil-ne'ser. See TIGLATH-PILE-SER.

Ti'lon.

A son of Shimon, whose registry was with the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 20).

Ti-mæ'us [highly prized].

Father of the blind beggar of Jericho (Mark x. 46).

Tim'brel or Tab'ret.

An humble kind of drum, which has developed into our modern tambourine. By the Hebrews it was called toph, an instrument that is beaten. It was much used in domestic festivities, was often played by women to accompany song and beat time for dances, and was employed alone or in orchestra in the worship of God (Gen. xxxi. 27; Ex. xv. 20; Judg. xi. 34; 1 Sam. x. 5; xviii. 6; 1 Chron. xiii. 8; Job xxi. 12; Ps. lxxxii. 2; Is. v. 12).

Timbrel

Tim'na, in A. V. twice Timnah (Gen. xxxvi. 40; 1 Chron. i. 51), and so once in R. V., oddly enough (Gen. xxxvi. 40) [restraint, inaccessible].

1 Daughter of Seir and sister of Lotan. She became a concubine of Eliphaz, Esau's eldest son, and the mother of Amalek (Gen. xxxvi. 12, 22; 1 Chron. i. 39). In interpreting these statements, it must be remembered that terms of relationship are used in describing tribes as well as individuals.

2 A duke of Edom (Gen. xxxvi. 40; 1 Chron. i. 51).

Tim'nah, in A. V. eight times Timnath (Gen. xxxviii. 12-14; Judg. xiv. 1-5), once Thimnathah (Josh. xix. 43), and once Thamnatha (1 Mac. ix. 50) [an assigned portion].

1 A town on the border line of the territory assigned to Judah, and not far from Beth-shemesh (Josh. xv. 10). It was subsequently given over to the tribe of Dan (xix. 43). It was occupied by the Philistines in the days of Samson (Judg. xiv. 2), and was captured by them in the reign of Ahaz (2 Chron. xxviii. 18). Its site is at Tibnah, about 3 miles west by south of Beth-shemesh, 15½ west by south of Jerusalem, and 16 east of Ashdod.

2 A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv. 57), probably the place referred to in Gen. xxxviii. 12, 14; cp. 1. On the survey map it is placed at Tibna, 9 miles west by south of Bethlehem; but this site appears to be too remote from Maon, Carmel, and Ziph.

3 A town enumerated after Emmaus, Beth-horon, and Bethel, and before Pharathon (1 Mac. ix. 50). It was fortified by Bacchides. The data point to Thamna, chief city of a toparchy (War iii. 3, 5), which bordered on the toparchies of Gophna, Lydda, and Emmaus (ii. 20, 4), and lay between Antipatris and Lydda (iv. 8, 1). Its site is probably marked by the ruins Tibneh, 7½ miles west-northwest of Jufna (Gophna), on the old road from Antipatris by way of Gophna to Jerusalem. See TIMNATH-SERAH.

4 An improper spelling, found in both versions, of the name of Timna, daughter of Seir.

Tim'nath. See preceding article.

Tim-nath-he'res. See TIMNATH-SERAH.

Tim-nath-se'rah [superfluous or extra portion].

A village in the hill country of Ephraim, on the north side of the hill of Gaash. It was given to Joshua as an inheritance, and there he was buried (Josh. xix. 50, xxiv. 30). It is once written Timnath-heres, portion of the sun (Judg. ii. 9), but heres is probably serah accidentally written backwards. Conder locates it at Kefr Hâris, which might be an echo of Heres, and where Samaritan tradition locates the graves of Joshua and Caleb (it is rather 8½ miles south by west of this village, at Tibneh. See TIMNAH 3).

Tim'nite.

A native or inhabitant of Timnah (Judg. xv. 6).

Ti'mon [deeming worthy].

One of the seven men chosen to relieve the apostles from semisecular work in the primitive church (Acts vi. 5).

Ti-mo'the-us [worshipping God].

1. Leader of a large body of Ammonites, with whom Judas Maccabæus fought several battles (1 Mac. v 6, 40)

2 Paul's convert and fellow-worker. See TIMOTHY.

Tim'o-ty, in A. V. usually Timotheus [venerating or worshipping God].

The well-known companion and assistant of Paul. The terms which the apostle applies to him, "my beloved and faithful child in the Lord" (1 Cor. iv. 17, R. V.), "my true child in faith" (1 Tim. i. 2, R. V., etc.), seem to indicate not only the apostle's love for his youthful friend, but also that he had been the means of Timothy's conversion. At any rate it is clear (2 Tim. i. 5; iii. 11) that when on his first missionary journey Paul visited Lystra in Lycaonia Timothy's mother Eunice and grandmother Lois were led to Christ, and that Timothy was old enough to be instructed in the new faith which his mother had adopted. Though his mother was a Jewess, his father was a gentile (Acts xvi. 1). On the one hand, he had from a child been instructed in the O. T. (2 Tim. iii. 15); yet, on the other he had not been circumcised (Acts xvi. 3). But, whether converted through Paul, or afterwards through the instruction of his mother, Timothy soon became active in Christian work, so that when, a few years later, Paul on his second journey again visited Lystra he found the young man well reported of by the brethren both at Lystra and Iconium (xvi. 2). Already the voice of prophecy had indicated that Timothy was destined for special service (1 Tim. i. 18; iv. 14). Paul therefore determined to take him with him, and the young man was set apart to the work of an evangelist by the laying on of the hands both of Paul and of the presbytery (iv. 14; 2 Tim. i. 6). In order also not to offend the Jews, Timothy was circumcised; the apostle thus indicating his wish, where no principle was involved, to conciliate those among whom in nearly every place he would have to begin work. Thereafter Timothy's fortunes were united with Paul's. He evidently accompanied the apostle through Galatia, then to Troas and Philippi, and then to Thessalonica and Berea, for it is mentioned (Acts xvii. 14) that he and Silas remained in Berea when Paul went on to Athens. Paul sent word for them to follow him to Athens speedily (15); but from 1 Thes. iii. 1, 2 it appears that he sent Timothy back to Thessalonica, and that Silas and Timothy did not rejoin him until he had reached Corinth (Acts xviii. 5; 1 Thes. iii. 6). Timothy then remained with Paul in Corinth (1 Thes. i. 1; 2 Thes. i. 1) and probably, though his name is not mentioned, accompanied the apostle on his return voyage. We next hear of him during Paul's ministry in Ephesus. Paul informs us in 1 Cor. iv. 17 that, before writing that epistle, he had sent Timothy to Corinth to correct abuses there. Yet for some reason, as 1 Cor. xvi. 10 inmates, there was a possibility that Timothy might not reach Corinth, and in fact we do not know whether he did so or not. At any rate he seems to have returned to Ephesus, for shortly before Paul left that city Timothy and Erastus preceded him into Macedonia (Acts xix. 22), where Paul soon joined his young friend (2 Cor. i. 1). Together they went to Corinth (Rom. xvi. 21), and Timothy is mentioned as one of the company who escorted the apostle on his return from the third journey toward Jerusalem (Acts xx. 4). Whether Timothy went with the apostle to Jerusalem does not appear. No mention of him occurs during the imprisonment at Cæsarea or the voyage to Rome. But in the epistles written from Rome his name occurs (Phil. i. 1; ii. 19-22; Col. i. 1; Philem. 1). He had evidently followed the apostle to the capital, and was his devoted coworker. After the apostle's release, he seems to have more than ever intrusted important duties to Timothy. In 1 Tim. we find that he had been left in charge of the church at Ephesus. It was a post of responsibility and difficulty, especially for one who was still a young man (1 Tim. iv. 12). False teachers were to be combated, officials were to be appointed, church customs were to be organized or regulated. The position of Timothy appears to have been that of an apostolic deputy, and it is not surprising that Paul wrote to him a special epistle with regard to his task. To Timothy he also wrote his last epistle shortly before his death (2 Tim.). Almost alone, and with death impending, Paul desired ardently the presence of his "child" (iv. 9, 21), and to him he laid bare his whole heart. It is probable that Timothy reached Paul before the latter's death, but we do not know. The only further reference to him is Heb. xiii. 23. From it we learn that Timothy had suffered imprisonment, but had been set at liberty again. If that epistle was written by Paul, Timothy's imprisonment must have occurred during the period between Paul's release and his second arrest; see PAUL. If the epistle to the Hebrews was not by Paul, then we may believe that Timothy joined Paul and for a while shared his imprisonment. This, however, is mere conjecture. We know nothing certainly of Timothy's last years.

The First Epistle of Paul the Apostle to Timothy was written after the apostle's release from his first Roman imprisonment and resumption of missionary work (cp. above; also PAUL). Timothy had been left in charge of the church of Ephesus while Paul went into Macedonia (1 Tim. i. 3). Many suppose that the epistle was written from Macedonia, but that is by no means clear. It should probably be assigned to A. D. 64 or 65. It deals with the ecclesiastical difficulties which confronted Timothy, and gives him personal advice. It evinces the interest of the apostle in the practical working of the church and his personal interest in Timothy's own welfare and success. Its contents may be arranged as follows: 1. Instructions concerning the church (i-iii.); including warnings against false teachers (i.), instructions concerning worship (ii.), instructions concerning church officers, closing with a brief statement of the dignity of the church and the fundamental truths on which it rests (iii.). 2. Advice for Timothy's own guidance (iv.-vi.), with respect to the false doctrines and practical errors which he had to meet (iv.), and with respect to his treatment of various classes in the church (v. 1-vi 2), followed by concluding exhortations partly of a personal character and partly to reinforce the previous instructions (vi. 3-21).

The Second Epistle of Paul the Apostle to Timothy was written from Rome after the apostle had been arrested the second time, A. D. 67. It is the last product of his pen. He speaks of himself as a prisoner (2 Tim. i. 8, 16; ii. 9), charged with being an evildoer (ii. 9), and he expected soon to suffer martyrdom (iv. 6). Many of his friends had left him (i. 15; iv. 10, 12). Luke only, of his former friends, was with him (iv. 11), though other friends had gathered round him (21). He had already had one trial, at which he had not been condemned (16, 17), but he was still held on some other charge. In his loneliness and danger his heart turned to Timothy, and this letter was written partly to encourage Timothy in his work as an evangelist and partly to urge him to hasten to Rome and to perform some personal services for the apostle. It may be divided as follows: 1. After a brief introduction, expressive of his wish to see Timothy and his confidence in him (i. 1-5), he urges him to be courageous in spite of existing trials (6-12), and to be faithful to the truth he had received in spite of all opponents (13-18). 2. He charges Timothy to be strong; to secure the preservation of the truth; to be a good soldier; to bear in mind the imperishable foundation of fact and truth on which the gospel rests; to avoid false teaching; and to take heed to his own spiritual life (ii.). 3. He warns him that errors will increase, and bids him remember the example of steadfast endurance which Paul himself had shown him and the teaching of inspired Scripture in which he had been trained (iii.). 4. As his last direction, he bids him preach the word and make full proof of his ministry (iv. 1-5), solemnly adding that he, on the verge of death, rejoiced that he had been able to do the same (6-8). The epistle then closes with some personal directions (9-22).

The epistles to Timothy and Titus are called, from their contents, the Pastoral Epistles. Rationalistic critics refuse to believe that Paul wrote them, at least in their present form; but the external evidence that the church of the post-apostolic age received them as Pauline is abundant, and it is most natural that the closing years of the apostle's ministry should be occupied with the practical affairs of the churches. These epistles teach the same doctrines which are found in Paul's other writings, with only such an added emphasis on the practical aspects of Christian faith as the situation called for; and Paul would not be the large-minded man that we know he was if he had not dealt, as he does in these epistles, with the organization of the churches which he was so soon to leave. G. T. P.

Tin.

A metal, in Hebrew b'dul, separated, alloy. It was obtained from its ore by smelting; and was sometimes refuse from silver ore (Ezek. xxi. 20). It was in use in Palestine and neighboring countries before the exodus (Num. xxxi. 22), in Egypt as early as the sixth dynasty at least. Its principal use was in making bronze, which is an alloy of copper and tin. The Tyrians got their supply from Tarshish (Ezek. xxvii. 12). Tin was obtained in Spain, but the most of it came from islands in the western ocean (Phny, Hist. Nat. xxxiv. 47; Herod. iii. 115). There is little doubt that these islands were identical with England, thinly disguised, and that the mines of Britain were the chief source of supply to the ancient world, and that Phœnician mariners made direct voyages from Gades in Spain to Cornwall for the metal (Strabo iii. 175). Later it was transported across France to the mouth of the Rhone by a thirty days' journey (Diodorus Siculus v. 21, 22). The same word signifies the base metal existing in combination with silver in the ore (Is. i. 25), and is supposed to denote the slag which separates from the lead when silver is being smelted from the ore.

Tiph'sah [a passage].

1. A town at the extreme limit of Solomon's dominions, in the direction of the Euphrates (1 Kin. iv. 24). It is generally identified with Thapsacus, a large city on the Euphrates, near the modern Rakka, by a ford. The ford was used by the armies of Cyrus the Younger and Alexander the Great.

2. A place on the inhabitants of which Menahem inflicted barbarous cruelties (2 Kin. xv. 16). It is mentioned in connection with Tirzah, from which it would seem not to have been far distant. Conder identifies it with the ruined village Tafsah, 6½ miles southwest of Shechem.

Ti'ras.

A land and its inhabitants, who were a Japhetic people (Gen. x. 2). Ancient opinion identified it with Thrace (Antiq. i. 6, 1), from slight similarity of sound. The river Turas, the modern Dneister, and the Turitai, who dwelt on its banks (Herod. iv. 51), have also been suggested. The conditions are best met by the Tursenoi, an ancient Pelasgic people who occupied islands and coast lands of the Ægean Sea (Herod i. 57, 94), probably the piratical Turusho who invaded Syria and Egypt in the 13th century B. C. Tursēnos is the Ionic and old Attic form of Turēnos, Tyrrhenian.

Ti'rath-ites.

A family of scribes, Kenites from Tirah, dwelling at Jabez (1 Chron. ii. 55)

Tire.

The rendering of the Hebrew Pe'er, ornamental. It means an ornamental headdress (Ezek xxiv. 17, 23) Aaron in his priestly capacity wore one of fine linen (Ex xxxix. 28; in A. V. bonnet). Women used them (Is. iii. 20; in A. V. bonnet) The bridegroom decked himself with it (Is lxi. 10, in A. V. ornaments, R. V. garland).

Tir'ha-kah. See PHARAOH.

Tir'ha-nah.

A son of Caleb, the brother of Jerahmeel, by Maacah, his concubine (1 Chron. ii. 48).

Tir'i-a.

A son of Jehallelel (1 Chron. iv. 16).

Tir-sha'tha.

The Persian title of the governor of Judah under the Persians. It is borne by Zerubabel (Ezra ii. 63; Neh. vii. 65, 70), and Nehemiah (Neh. viii. 9; x. 1) In xii. 26 the latter ruler is called pehah or governor, to which Tirshatha, therefore, must have been practically equivalent.

Tir'zah [pleasantness, delightfulness].

1 The youngest among the five daughters of Zelophehad (Num. xxvi. 33, xxvii. 1; xxxvi. 11; Josh xvii. 3).

2 A town noted for beauty (Song vi. 4), which belonged originally to the Canaanites, but was captured by Joshua (Josh. xii. 24). Jeroboam I. took up his residence in Tirzah (1 Kin. xiv. 17), and it became the capital of the ten tribes (xv. 21, 33, xvi. 6, 8, 9, 15, 17) till Omri built Samaria (23, 24), after which it sank into a provincial but still important town (2 Kin. xv. 14, 16) Robinson, with much doubt, suggests as its site Tullūza, 6 miles east, very slightly south, of Samaria. Conder, with no hesitation, fixes it at Teiasir, with ancient ruins, 13 miles east-northeast of Samaria, on a table-land where the valleys begin to dip suddenly toward the Jordan.

Tish'bite.

A member of the family, or native of the town, called Tishbeh or something similar (1 Kin. xvii. 1). A family of the name is unknown. Towns only claim attention. One is mentioned by Tobit (i. 2), "Tishbe on the right [south] of Kydios of Naphtali," i. e., Kedesh of Naphtali (R. V.). Another is discerned by the Septuagint and Josephus in the text of 1 Kin. xvii. 1, lying east of the Jordan, in Gilead. The construct plural before Gilead in the Hebrew text, which is rendered sojourners in the E. V., the makers of the Septuagint regarded as a local name, and transferred it to their pages as a genitive.

plural, Thesbon or Thessebon, of Thesheb. Josephus prefixed the word city and added a singular termination to the name (Antiq. viii. 13, 2, Niese's text).

Tithe.

A tenth part of one's income consecrated to God. The separation of a certain proportion of the products of one's industry or of the spoils of war as tribute to their gods was practiced by various nations of antiquity. The Lydians offered a tithe of their booty (Herod i. 89). The Phœnicians and Carthaginians sent a tithe annually to the Tyrian Hercules. These tithes might be regular or occasional, voluntary or prescribed by law. The Egyptians were required to give a fifth part of their crops to Pharaoh (Gen. xlvii. 24). Before the days of Joseph and Pharaoh, Abraham, returning with spoil from his victory over the confederate kings, gave to Melchizedek, priest-king of Salem, a tenth part of all (xiv. 20) Jacob said that if God conferred on him certain specified benefits, he would surely give the tenth of it unto God (xxviii. 22). Under the Mosaic law the fruits of the ground and cattle were subject to tithing (Lev. xxvii. 30, 32) The tithe of grain and fruit need not be paid in kind. The owner might redeem it by purchasing it at one-fifth more than its market value (31) But the tithe of the herd and flock might not be redeemed. This tithe was separated by causing the cattle to pass under the rod, and every tenth animal was taken, whether it was defective or without blemish. The choice had been committed to God, and the beast might not be exchanged (32, 33) Grain was threshed before it was tithed, and the fruit of vineyard and oliveyard was converted into wine and oil before the tenth was taken (Num. xviii. 27). All the tithe of Israel, which they offered as a heave offering, was given unto the Levites (21, 24). It was given to them as an inheritance in return for the service which they rendered at the sanctuary (21), and as compensation for their lack of landed possessions. They paid a tithe of it to the priest (26, 27), and freely ate the rest anywhere (31). On the eve of entering Canaan, where many of the Israelites would obtain homes far from the sanctuary, it was necessary to insist that the people should bring all prescribed sacrifices and freewill offerings, and all tithes, to the sanctuary (Deut. xii. 5, 6, 11). They might not eat at home the tithe of their grain, wine, or oil, nor any offering, but before the Lord (17, 18). They must tithe all the increase of the field, and eat before the Lord the tithe of grain, wine, and oil, and the firstlings of flock and herd; but if the distance to the sanctuary was great, they might convert the offering into money, carry that to the sanctuary, and there buy what they chose for the eucharistic meal (xiv. 23-27). Every third year each man's tithe should be laid up in his town, and the Levite, the stranger, the widow, and the fatherless should go to the store and eat (28, 29). After tithing the tithe in this third year, which was distinguished as the year of tithing, and reminded the people that the tithe was to be kept in the town, it was put at the disposal of those for whom it was intended (xxvi. 12). There were two third-year tithings between Sabbatic years, when there was no tithe.

Inconsistencies between these laws do not exist, although interpreters often force them into contradiction. The Israelites took the tithe to the sanctuary both during the sojourn in the wilderness and after the settlement in the land (Num. xviii. 24; Deut. xii. 6). There a portion was eaten by the offerer and the Levites in a eucharistic feast, and the rest was given to the Levites. The law was slightly modified in anticipation of the settlement of Canaan, and the residence of Levites and producers in many cases far from the sanctuary. Every third year they should store the tithe in the town where they dwelt, dispense with the eucharistic meal, place all the tithe at the disposal of the Levites and other dependent persons, and make solemn protestation before the Lord to having done this (Deut. xxvi. 12-15). This asseveration before the Lord may have been made in the town, or at the sanctuary on occasion of attending one of the annual festivals. It is sometimes asserted that Deuteronomy is peculiar in two respects: it prescribes vegetable tithes only, and enjoins that they shall be eaten at the altar by the offerer and the Levites in company. If Deuteronomy does actually differ from the law of Leviticus and Numbers in these points, it is a modification of the law forty years after its first enactment and in view of new circumstances. In the later history, even when the Levitical legislation was in full force, the vegetable tithe alone is often mentioned (Neh. x. 37; xii. 44, xiii. 12). It was the more prominent, since agriculture and horticulture were the chief industries of the people. The tithe of the cattle is, however, referred to (2 Chron. xxxi. 6). It would be in itself natural, if the eucharistic feast did not already exist, for Moses to introduce it in connection with tithes and firstlings, in view of the fact that the offerer frequently came from a distance, and naturally required at least one meal at the sanctuary before returning. Still the omission of all mention of the feast in Leviticus and Numbers may be due to the feast's being regarded as a matter of course, a meal having been customary from time immemorial in connection with certain kinds of sacrifices and offerings; and the tithe on agricultural and horticultural products alone is mentioned in Deuteronomy, because among tithes it was with them only that a meal at the sanctuary was connected, and the legislation in question is treating of eucharistic meals.

Another interpretation of the tithing laws requires mention. Not a few scholars have believed that the setting apart of one-fifth for Pharaoh, to which the Israelites had been accustomed in Egypt, was perpetuated by the Mosaic law as tribute to Jehovah. This fifth was made up of two tithes. The first went to the Levites, the second was taken to the sanctuary and consumed there (Antiq. iv. 8, 8), but in the third year was given to the Levites in addition to their own tithe. Some interpreters have even thought of three tithes. They regard the tithing of the third year as additional to the two others. This interpretation is as old as Josephus at least (8, 22), but it is unnecessary, and was scarcely the original intention of the law. The law is satisfied by the theory of one tithing.

In times of religious declension the people neglected to pay tithes. Hezekiah found it necessary to call authoritatively for their payment (2 Chron. xxxi. 4-12), and the prophet Malachi was obliged to rebuke the people of his day for robbing God by withholding tithes and offerings (Mal. iii. 7-12). The response of the people to Hezekiah's appeal was so hearty that he had to prepare chambers in the temple precincts for storing the tithes (2 Chron. xxxi. 11). Whether he built additional quarters or cleared out old storehouses is not stated. The second temple was likewise provided with storehouses (Neh. xiii. 10-14; Mal. iii. 10), and Levites under the superintendence of a priest gathered the tithes into the towns and tithed them for the sanctuary (Neh. x. 37, 38). The payment of tithes continued (Ecclus. xxxv. 8; 1 Mac. iii. 49; Luke xi. 42; xviii. 12); but by the time of Christ changes had occurred. The tithe went to the priests (Antiq. xi. 5, 8, con. Apion i. 22, cp. Heb. vii. 5), and was collected by them (Life 12, 15). Later the ordinary priests suffered from the cupidity of the chief priests, who forcibly took possession of the tithes (Antiq. xx. 8, 8; 9, 2).

Tit'le, in A. V. of 1611 Title [late Latin titulus, in the sense of a mark made above a letter to distinguish it from another letter of similar form].

A point or small line used to distinguish one letter of the Hebrew alphabet from another, as ך from ם, or ך from ך; hence a minute requirement of the law (Mat. v. 18, in Greek kerava, little horn).

Ti'tus.

1. A godly man of Corinth who was surnamed Justus (Acts xviii. 7, R. V.); see Justus.

2. A trusted companion of Paul. He is not mentioned in The Acts, but is frequently referred to in Paul's epistles. He was born of gentile parents (Gal. ii. 3), and was one of the delegation from Antioch (Acts xv. 2) who accompanied Paul and Barnabas to Jerusalem at the time of the council (Gal. ii. 3). It is possible that he was a native of Antioch, and, since Paul calls him "my true child after a common faith" (Tit. f. 4, R. V.), he may have been converted through the instrumentality of the apostle. He was evidently also much younger than Paul. His presence at the council gave offense to the Judaizers, but the church refused to compel him to be circumcised, thus siding with Paul in his advocacy of the freedom of gentiles from the Mosaic law (Gal. ii 3-5). Titus next appears during and after Paul's residence in Ephesus. We learn from 2 Cor. ii. 13; vii. 6, 13; viii. 6, 16, xii. 18 that Titus had been sent to Corinth to correct certain abuses there which caused anxiety to the apostle. Some suppose that he was one of the brethren who carried the first epistle to the Corinthians (1 Cor. xvi. 12). It is more probable, however, that he and another (2 Cor. xii. 18) were dispatched after 1 Cor. had been sent, on account of later reports which the apostle had received. His task was a delicate one, and Paul awaited his return with much solicitude (2 Cor. ii. 13). When the apostle left Ephesus, he expected to meet Titus at Troas (12, 13), and, failing in this, went to Macedonia. There Titus rejoined him with good news (vii. 6, 13, 14), and was forthwith sent back to Corinth with our Second Epistle to the Corinthians (viii. 6, 18, 23). We do not read again of Titus until after Paul's release from his first Roman imprisonment, see PAUL. The Epistle to Titus informs us that he had been left in Crete to superintend the organization of the churches in that island. He seems to have been, like Timothy in Ephesus, an apostolic deputy. His mission, however, was but a temporary one, and he was told to rejoin the apostle in Nicopolis. The only remaining notice of him is in 2 Tim. iv. 10, where he is said to have gone to Dalmatia.

The Epistle of Paul to Titus was written after Paul's release from his first Roman imprisonment and resumption of missionary work. It may be assigned to A. D. 65 or 66. Titus had been left as superintendent of the churches in Crete, and the epistle, like the First Epistle to Timothy, was intended to direct him in the performance of his difficult task. It may be divided as follows: 1. Salutation, particularly describing the dignity of the apostolic message (i. 1-4). 2. Instructions concerning the character of those selected for bishops or elders, especially in view of the many false disciples whom Titus would be likely to meet and by whom he might be imposed upon (5-16). 3. Instructions which Titus should give to various classes in the church, all to the effect that Christians should be "zealous of good works" (ii.). 4. Directions concerning the duty of Christians to society, bidding them emulate the love of man which God has shown in Christ (iii. 1-8). 5. Warnings against false teaching and heretics (9-11). 6. Personal directions and closing exhortation and benediction (12-15). The leading thought of the epistle is the importance of good works in all those representing or professing Christianity. On the pastoral epistles see remarks at close of the article on TIMOTHY. G. T. P.

Ti'zite.

The designation of a certain Joha (1 Chron. xi. 45), probably derived from the place of which he was a native.

To'ah [perhaps, low]

A Kohathite Levite (1 Chron. vi. 34); see NAHATH.

Tob [good].

A region east of the Jordan, to which Jephthah fled when disowned by his brethren (Judg. xi. 3, 5). When Hanun, king of Ammon, gave David just offense, he drew soldiers from Tob, among other places (2 Sam. x. 6, R. V.), which indicates that it was beyond the borders of Israel. It was probably the district of Gilead known in Greek as the land of Tubias (1 Mac. v. 13; cp. 2 Mac. xii. 17). Exact situation is debatable.

Tob-ad-o-ni'jah [good is my Lord Jehovah].

One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. xvii. 8).

To-bi'ah [Jehovah is good].

1. Founder of a family, members of which, coming to Jerusalem after the captivity, failed to prove their descent (Ezra ii. 60; Neh. vii. 62).

2. An Ammonite servant who ridiculed the effort of the Jews to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. ii. 10; iv. 3, 7).

To'bie. See TUBIAS.

To-bi'jah [Jehovah is good].

1. One of the Levites sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Chron. xvii. 8).

2. A Jew, one of those of the captivity from whom the prophet Zechariah obtained gold and silver to make crowns to put on the head of Joshua, the high priest (Zech. vi. 10, 14).

To'bit. See APOCRYPHA.

To'chen [a weight, a measure].

A city belonging to the tribe of Simeon (1 Chron. iv. 32). Site unknown.

To-gar'mah.

A country of the far north (Ezek. xxxviii. 6), inhabited by a people descended from Japheth through Gomer (Gen. x. 3). They traded in horses and mules (Ezek. xxvii. 14). It is generally identified with Armenia. Friedrich Delitzsch, however, believes that the name appears in Til-garimmu, a city in the extreme east of Cappadocia, mentioned in the Assyrian inscriptions.

To'hu [perhaps, low].

A son of Zuph (1 Sam. i. 1); see NAHATH.

To'i and To'u [wandering, error].

A king of Hamath, probably a Hittite, who was at war with Hadadezer, king of Zobah, a Syrian. He sent to congratulate David on his victory over their common foe (2 Sam. viii. 9-12; 1 Chron. xviii. 9-11).

Tok'hath. See TIKVAH.

To'ia [worm, scarlet].

1. A son of Issachar, and founder of a tribal family (Gen. xlii. 13; Num. xxvi. 23, 1 Chron. vii. 1).

2. Son of Puah, of the tribe of Issachar, who judged Israel twenty-three years. He lived, died, and was buried at Shamir, on mount Ephraim (Judg. x. 1, 2).

To'lad. See ELTOLAD.

Tongue.

An organ of the body (Ex. xi. 7; Jas. iii. 6), situated in the mouth (Job xxix. 10), and much used in speaking (Is. xxxix. 3; lxxi. 24; Mark vii. 35).

A bar of gold (Josh. vii. 21, 24, literally tongue, but translated wedge). The Babylonians also spoke of tongues of gold, and a gold bar resembling a tongue has been found in the mound of ruined Gezer.

Figuratively, speech or language (Gen. x. 5; Acts ii. 8 with 11). The descendants of Noah inherited, and for a long time after the flood spoke, one language (Gen. xi. 1). Differences of speech were produced by divine judgment at Babel, which resulted in scattering the people who had gathered there abroad, to all parts of the known world (2-9); see BABEL. This event, which is known as the confusion of tongues, may have occurred among the Semites alone, after the rise of the family of Eber (x. 25). In process of time the descendants of Noah came to speak several distinct languages and many different dialects. The Japhetic peoples largely used the languages now classed as Indo-Germanic (x. 2-5), including the languages spoken in Media and Ionia (ver. 2). The Semitic peoples generally spoke various dialects of the Semitic group (21-31), embracing Assyrian, Aramaic (22), Arabic (26-29), and Hebrew; but the Elamites (22) used an agglutinative language, which is supposed to be akin to the Finnish. Many of the descendants of Ham also spoke Semitic; as, for example, Cush in Assyria (11), Arabia (6, 7), and Africa, and Canaan in Palestine and Phœnicia (15); but the old inhabitants of Mizraim (6, 13), better known as Egypt, used an agglutinative language, although many Egyptologists of the first rank believe in its descent from the same stock as the Semitic. It must be remembered that tribes which migrate to a new locality frequently adopt the language of the people among whom they have taken up their residence.

The gift of tongues was granted on the day of Pentecost which followed the feast of the passover at which Jesus suffered. The disciples being assembled together, suddenly there came from heaven a sound like that of a rushing, mighty wind, and visible tongues, having the appearance of fire, were distributed to each, and they were all filled with the Holy Spirit (Acts ii. 1-4). The church was qualified and symbolically commissioned by the Spirit to declare the gospel to all men. Two general theories exist as to the nature of this gift. 1. The gift of tongues was manifested in ecstatic or elevated praise of God (Acts x. 46), but which was unintelligible to man. The tongue was the organ of the Holy Spirit, and not of the person to whom the gift was given; and the words spoken were devotional and not for the instruction of the church. In defense of this view it is urged that: (1) Paul makes no mention of foreign languages having been introduced at Corinth, and if tongues were referred to in 1 Cor. xiv. only, the impression would never have been made that they denote foreign languages. (2) Paul teaches that the understanding was not engaged (1 Cor. xiv. 2). (3) The multitude could not understand them at Pentecost, and accused the speakers of being drunken. It was necessary for Peter to interpret to the multitude what had taken place (Acts ii. 13-17). Or if the disciples used foreign languages on the day of Pentecost, this was a temporary form in which the gift of tongues was manifested and did not appear again. 2. The gift of tongues was manifested in intelligible discourse in tongues before unknown. (1) Luke's language clearly implies this (Acts ii. 6-12). (2) Anybody could babble hysterically; only when the speakers used languages which they did not know before could the gift of tongues be recognized as miraculous. (3) The whole argument in 1 Cor. assumes that the gift was speech in a foreign language, Paul contrasting speech and prayer in a foreign language uninterpreted with speaking and praying so as to be understood (xii. 10, 30; xiv. 13-16, 27, 28). Christians who had the gift should use it for missionary purposes, and not exhibit their skill before their brethren, who did not understand what they said unless an interpreter were present.

Tongues were a sign that followed them that believed (Mark xvi. 17). They were a visible gift of the Holy Spirit bestowed in connection with the preaching of the apostles, or by the apostles through laying on of their hands (Acts x. 44-46; xix. 1-7; cp. viii. 14-24). They were a phenomenon of the apostolic age, and gradually disappeared afterwards. In the next century, perhaps fifty or sixty years after the death of the last apostle, Ireneus can still report that he had "heard many brethren who had prophetic gifts and spoke through the Spirit in all kinds of tongues" (adv. Haer. v. 6, 1).

In 1830 some people in Scotland, and in 1831 others in London, chiefly females of excitable temperament, believed that they had received the gift of tongues. They persuaded the Rev. Edward Irving to embrace their opinions, but failed to convince his brethren in the ministry. The movement led to the creation of the Catholic Apostolic Church.

To'paz

A precious stone, called by the Greeks topazon, and generally believed to be denoted by the Hebrew pit'dah. It was the second stone in the first row of the high priest's breastplate (Ex xxviii. 17; cp the Greek version and Antiq. iii. 7, 5). It was found in Ethiopia (Job xxviii. 19) and on an island in the Red Sea (Diodorus Siculus iii. 38; Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxxvii. 9), and was known at Tyre (Ezek xxviii. 13). It adorns the ninth foundation of the New Jerusalem (Rev xxi. 20). The topaz of the ancients was a yellow variety of corundum. The Romans seem to have transferred the name chrysolite to topaz, and called both chrysolite and precious stones resembling it topaz.

To'phel [perhaps, untempered mortar].

A place, perhaps once a station of the Israelites in the wilderness (Deut i. 1). Robinson and others have identified it with Tufileh, about 14 miles southeast of the southeastern curve of the Dead Sea. The consonants, however, are different, teth instead of tau, which raises a doubt as to the correctness of the identification.

To'pheth, in A. V. Tophet (except 2 Kin. xxiii. 10) [spitting out, abhorrence].

Certain high places built in the valley of the son of Hinnom, on which the people of Jerusalem in the times of Isaiah and Jeremiah were accustomed to burn their sons and their daughters in the fire (Jer vii. 31), as offerings to Molech (2 Kin. xxiii. 10). Apparently on the top of the high place there was a deep and large hole, in which much wood was piled, ignition being produced by a stream of brimstone (Is xxx. 33). Josiah defiled it (2 Kin. xxiii. 10), and Jeremiah prophesied that such a number of people should be killed there that the name Topheth should disappear, and the valley where it stood be called the valley of slaughter (Jer vii. 32, 33; xix. 6). A Topheth, apparently of the same type, was to be prepared for the king of Assyria (Is. xxx. 33). See HINNOM.

Torch.

A flambeau, giving a flaring light, and often portable (Judg. vii. 16, R. V.; Mat. xxv. 3, R. V. margin; John xviii. 3, R. V.; cp. the proper name Lappidoth); primitively, merely a piece of resinous wood, or a bunch or twist of absorbent material soaked in oil and borne on a rod or carried by some other form of holder or incased in a narrow, conical clay wrapping or vase.

Tor'mah [fraud].

A town in which Abimelech was once found (Judg. ix. 31, margin). More probably the word means craftily, as it is rendered in the R. V.; in which case the town of Tor-mah disappears.

Tor-ment'ors.

The jailers who were to keep the debtor safe and make his life miserable by chains, stocks, and doubtless other means of distress and torture until his debts were paid (Mat. xviii. 34). Torture was often applied to extort confessions (Acts xxii. 24; Antiq. xvi. 8, 4; 11, 6).

Tor'toise. See LIZARD.

To'u. See TOI.

Tow'er.

A lofty building, much higher than broad. A booth was sufficient to shelter the watchman placed to guard a vineyard (Is. i. 8); but a tower, being more permanent and ornamental, indicated the owner's interest in his vineyard and his expectation of many seasons of fruitfulness (v. 2; Mat. xxi. 33; Mark xii. 1). Stronger towers were built for defense. They were erected in the wilderness for the security of the shepherds and to keep marauders away (2 Kin. xvii. 9; 2 Chron. xxvi. 10). They formed part of the defenses of fortified cities (xiv. 7, Neh iii. 1). They were erected beside the city gates, at the corners of the walls, and at intervals in the intervening space (2 Chron. xxvi. 9); see illustrations, LACHISH, RAM. Watchmen were stationed on them (2 Kin. ix. 17), military engines for shooting arrows and stones were mounted on them (2 Chron. xxvi. 15), and the citizens found refuge in them when sore pressed by the enemy (Judg. ix. 51, 52; Ps lxi. 3). Within their massive walls the inmates were secure; their height allowed openings for light and air, out of reach of the adversary; and from their top missiles could be advantageously discharged at the foe.

Town Clerk.

An official with the title of grammateus or scribe (Acts xix. 35). Probably the duties of a grammateus originally were to record the laws and read them in public, but in course of time other functions were added to the office. Coins show that in the several cities of Asia Minor the town clerk presided in popular assemblies, and was the virtual, or in some cases the actual, head of the municipal government.

Trach-o-ni'tis [rough, stony].

A region which at the appearance of John the Baptist as a preacher constituted, with Ituræa, a tetrarchy, ruled over by Philip, the brother of Herod, the tetrarch of Galilee (Luke iii. 1). It lay behind Damascus (Strabo xvi. 2, 20), and comprehended the stretch of volcanic rocks now called el-Lejjah, and extended westward to Ulotha and Paneas, and southward to the borders of Batanea and Jebel Hauran (Antiq. xv. 10, 3; xvii. 2, 1 and 2; Ptolemy v. 15, 4).

Trag'a-canth.

A gum (Gen. xxxvii. 25; xliii. 11, R. V. margin), produced by several low, spiny shrubs of the genus Astragalus, especially from Astragalus gummifer. The plant is leguminous. Those from which gum is obtained are dwarf shrubs, protected by a dense mass of long thorns. The flowers are axillary; and in most species are yellow, but in some are white or purple. Under the heat of the sun the gum exudes from the trunk, branches, thorns, and leaves; and is collected in Palestine by passing over the shrub a cloth or bunch of threads to which the viscous exudation adheres. It is used to impart firmness to pills, to marble books, and to stiffen crapes and calicoes.

Trance.

A state in which the functions of the senses are suspended and the soul seems to be liberated from the body while it contemplates some extraordinary object; ecstasy. Peter on one occasion (Acts xi. 5), and Paul on another, fell into such a trance (xxii. 17). See VISIONS

Tres'pass Of'fer-ing. See OFFERINGS.

Tribe. See EGYPT III. 7

Trib'ute.

1. Money, goods, or service exacted by a nation or king from foreign subjects (Deut. xx. 11, R. V. margin taskwork; Judg. i. 28; Ezra iv. 13; Neh. v. 4; Esth. x. 1; Mat. xvii. 25). The Pharisees endeavored to put Jesus in a dilemma by asking him whether it was lawful to pay tribute to the Roman emperor (Mat. xxii. 17). If he answered in the affirmative, he would offend the people, since with them independence was a matter of religion and they paid the foreign tax with undisguised reluctance. The Pharisees expected him to declare that tribute to the Romans was unlawful, for they knew that he had publicly announced his claims to the throne of David; and an answer of this sort would justify a charge of rebellion against him. He replied by calling for a coin. The coinage of money is the prerogative of the ruler. Pointing to the image of the Roman emperor which it bore, he said: "Give to the ruler whom you acknowledge whatever belongs to him, and to God whatever belongs to God." Jesus recognized the distinction between the two spheres of duty.

2. The didrachma or half shekel paid for the expenses of the temple worship (Mat. xvii. 24, in R. V. half shekel). This payment was suggested at first by the half shekel which each male Israelite above twenty years of age paid as atonement money when he was numbered in the census (Ex. xxx. 11-16). In the time of Nehemiah the Israelites voluntarily assumed an annual payment of the third part of a shekel toward defraying the cost of the temple service (Neh. x. 32, 33). Later the third part of a shekel was changed to half a shekel, and was made an annual tax collected from every Jew of twenty years of age and upward throughout the world (Antiq.

xviii. 9, 1). The collector at Capernaum asked Peter whether his Master paid this half shekel, and Peter impulsively answered that he did (Mat. xvii. 24, 25). Jesus did indeed pay it; but it was incongruous for him to do so, and he drew Peter's attention to the matter. He pointed out to him that earthly kings exact tribute from aliens, not from their own children. Peter had recently confessed Jesus as the Son of God. It was for God's house and worship that this tax was levied, and it was scarcely proper for God's Son to be required to pay it. Such is the common interpretation of Christ's words on this occasion. After the fall of Jerusalem the Roman emperor Vespasian enjoined the Jews throughout the empire to bring to Jupiter Capitolinus in Rome the two drachmas which they had formerly paid to the temple (War vii. 6, 6).

Tro'as [the Troad, region around Troy]

A seaport (Acts xvi. 11) of Mysia, where Paul saw in vision a man of Macedonia inviting him to Europe (Acts xvi. 8-10; 2 Cor. ii. 12). The apostle tarried there a week while returning from his third journey (Acts xx. 6). On one occasion he left his cloak, books, and parchments there (2 Tim. iv. 13). It was founded by Antigonus, one of Alexander's successors, who called it Antigonia; but after his death his opponent Lysimachus, king of Thrace, altered its name to Alexandria, and Troas was added to distinguish it from Alexandria in Egypt. It was situated some distance south of Homer's Troy, which furnished the name Troas to the district. Its ruins, which are extensive, are now called Eski Stamboul.

Tro-gyl'li-um.

A town and a promontory on the western coast of Asia Minor, opposite the island of Samos. Paul tarried there on the return to Jerusalem from his third journey (Acts xx. 15; see R. V. margin). An anchorage at the place is called St. Paul's Port.

Troph'i-mus [nourishing].

A gentle Christian of Ephesus, who was with Paul for a time on his missionary travels, and whom he was falsely accused of having brought into the temple in defiance of the law (Acts xx. 4; xxi. 29). The last we hear of him is that he was left by the apostle at Miletus sick (2 Tim. iv. 20, in A. V. Miletum).

Trump'et.

1. A wind instrument, made of the horn of an animal or in imitation of it (Josh. vi. 5; cp. Dan. iii. 5, where keren, horn, is rendered cornet), and called in Hebrew shophar. The word is rendered cornet in four passages where the h'soserah is mentioned with it and rendered trumpet (1 Chron. xv. 28; 2 Chron. xv. 14; Ps. xcvi. 6; Hos. v. 8). Its sound was loud, and audible at a great distance (Ex. xix. 16, 19); and was well adapted to increase the noise of shouting (2 Sam. vi.

15; 2 Chron. xv. 14; Ps. xcvi. 6), but was ill-suited to be played with harps and pipes in an orchestra. It was used in war to assemcubit in length. The tube was narrow, somewhat thicker than a flute, and ended in the form of a bell, like common trumpets (An-

Assyrian and Egyptian Trumpets

ble the army (Judg. iii. 27; vi. 34; 1 Sam. xiii. 3), to sound the attack (Job xxxix. 24), to signal the cessation of the pursuit (2 Sam. ii. 28; xviii. 16), and to announce the disbanding of the army (xx. 1, 22). Watchmen blew it to sound the alarm (Jer. vi. 1, Amos iii. 6). Its blast proclaimed the accession of the king (2 Sam. xv. 10, 1 Kin. i. 34, 2 Kin. ix. 13), and the commencement of the year of jubile (Lev. xxv. 9). The first day of the seventh month was celebrated by solemn rest from ordinary labor, a holy convocation, and the offering of special burnt offerings (xxiii. 24, 25; Num. xxix. 1-6), because the day marked a recurring seventh portion of time. It was a day or memorial of blowing (1 Cor. xiv. 8), and will announce the second advent of Christ (Mat. xxiv. 31), and the resurrection of the dead (1 Cor. xv. 52). Seven trumpets were sounded to introduce as many apocalyptic visions (Rev. viii-xi. 19). By salpigx the h'sos'rah or sacred trumpet is meant in Eccles. i. 16; 1 Mac. iii. 54; and probably iv. 40; v. 33; xvi. 8.

3. Trumpet is expressed by the Greek word salpigx in N. T. It was used in war (1 Cor. xiv. 8), and will announce the second advent of Christ (Mat. xxiv. 31), and the resurrection of the dead (1 Cor. xv. 52). Seven trumpets were sounded to introduce as many apocalyptic visions (Rev. viii-xi. 19). By salpigx the h'sos'rah or sacred trumpet is meant in Eccles. i. 16; 1 Mac. iii. 54; and probably iv. 40; v. 33; xvi. 8.

Try-phæ'na, in A. V. Tryphena [delicate, dainty].

A woman at Rome to whom Paul sent his salutation, commending her for laboring in the Lord (Rom. xvi. 12).

Try'phon [luxurious].

A general of Alexander Balas (1 Mac. xi. 39). He was a native of Casiana near Apamea ing of trumpets, designed to bring the people into remembrance before the Lord (cp. Ex. xxviii. 12, 29; xxx. 16). The Jewish tradition is doubtless correct which states that the trumpet used was the shophar (cp. Lev. xxv. 9).

2. The invariable rendering of the Hebrew H'sos'rah. Two were made for use at the tabernacle (Num. x. 2); but the number was increased as time went on (2 Kin. xii. 13). One hundred and twenty were blown at the dedication of the temple (2 Chron. v. 12). Those used at the sanctuary were of silver (Num. x. 2). They were a little less than a in Syria, and originally bore the name of Diodotus (Strabo xvi. 2, 10). After the death of Balas and the recognition of Demetrius II., as king of Syria, 146 B. C., Tryphon set up Antiochus VI., the infant son of Alexander Balas, as a rival to Demetrius (xi. 39, 40), and with the help of the Jews was rapidly conquering the country. His treachery to Jonathan Maccabæus, however (xii. 39-50; xiii. 23), caused his Jewish allies to go over to the side of Demetrius. Tryphon meantime had murdered young Antiochus and declared himself king (xii. 31, 39). The capture of Demetrius by Arsaces, the Parthian king, left Tryphon to his own schemes for a while, but Demetrius' brother, Antiochus VII., opposed him and succeeded in besieging him, first in Dor on the Phœnician coast (xv. 10-14, 37), and afterwards in Apamea, where Tryphon lost his life in 138 B. C. (Antiq. xiii. 7, 2).

Try-pho'sa [delicate].

A woman at Rome whose name is coupled with that of Tryphæna in the list of those Romans to whom Paul sent his salutation. They may have been sisters or fellow-deaconesses. They are mentioned as laboring in the Lord (Rom. xvi. 12).

Tsa'dhe. See TZADE.

Tu'bal.

A tribe descended from Japheth (Gen. x. 2). It is mentioned with Javan (Is. lxi. 19) and with Meshech (Ezek. xxxii. 26) as trading in the Tyrian markets with slaves and vessels of brass (xxvii. 13). Gog was prince of Meshech and Tubal (xxxviii. 2, 3; xxxix. 1). The descendants of Tubal are the Tublâ of the Assyrian inscriptions and the Tibareni or Tibarenoi of the classical writers. For their country and history, see MESHECH.

Tu'bal-cain [possibly, production of forged work].

A son of the Cainite Lamech, by his wife Zillah. He was the forger of cutting instruments of brass and iron (Gen. iv. 22).

Tu'bi-as, in A. V. To'bis.

A district east of the Jordan (1 Mac. v. 13; cp. 2 Mac. xii. 17), probably the land of Tob; see TOB.

Tur'ban. See DIADEM.

Tur'tle and Tur'tle-dove.

A species of pigeon. It is gentle and harmless, fit emblem of a defenseless and innocent people (Ps. lxxiv. 19). It is migratory (Jer. viii. 7), and a herald of spring (Song ii. 12). Abraham sacrificed a turtle-dove and other victims when the Lord's covenant was made with him (Gen. xv. 9). Under the law it served as a burnt offering (Lev. i. 14) and for a sin offering; and two turtle-doves were prescribed for these two sacrifices in case a poor person was obliged to make a guilt offering, and for the purification of a woman after childbirth if she was poor, of a man or woman with an issue, and of a Nazirite (v. 7; xii. 6, 8; xv. 14, 29, 30; Num. vi. 10, 11). It was readily obtainable by the poor, for it abounds in Palestine and is easily trapped. Three species of turtle-dove are described by Tristram as occurring in Palestine. The most abundant is the common turtle-dove (Turtur vulgaris), which reaches Palestine from the south in countless numbers at the beginning of March, and departs again at the approach of winter. The second is the collared turtle-dove (Turtur risorius). It is a summer migrant, breeding in Palestine in trees and bushes. The third species, the palm turtle-dove (Turtur senegalensis), does not migrate, but remains permanently in the Dead Sea valley, which has a tropical climate.

Tu'tor. See SCHOOLMASTER.

Twin Brothers. See CASTOR and POLLUX.

Tych't-cus [fortuitous].

A Christian of the province of Asia who, with others, traveled on in advance of Paul from Macedonia to Troas, and awaited the apostle's arrival in that city (Acts xx. 4). He was a beloved brother and faithful minister in the Lord, and was sent by Paul to carry to their destination the Epistles to the Ephesians and Colossians (Eph. vi. 21; Col. iv. 7). Paul proposed also to send him as a messenger to Titus in Crete (Titus iii. 12). Afterwards he was dispatched to Ephesus (2 Tim. iv. 12).

Ty-ran'nus [an absolute sovereign, a tyrant].

A man at Ephesus who was either a teacher of philosophy or rhetoric, or else a Jewish scribe who gave instruction in the law. In his school Paul disputed with the view of making Christianity known after he no longer had access for the purpose to the Jewish synagogue (Acts xix. 9).

Tyre, in A. V. often Ty'rus [a rock].

An important city of Phœnicia. It was a place of great antiquity (Is. xxiii. 7; Antiq. viii. 3, 1); but it was founded or attained to importance after Sidon (Gen. x. 15; Is. xxiii. 12). The priests of Melkarth told Herodotus that it was founded 2300 years before his visit, which would make the city come into existence about 2750 B. C. (Herod. ii. 44). According to ancient testimony, Tyre originally stood on the mainland; but in course of time, for safety against besiegers, it was transferred to the neighboring rocky island which gave name to the locality. Ancient writers frequently allude to its situation in the sea (Ezek. xxvi. 17; xxvii. 32). The town on the mainland became known as Palætyrus or Old Tyre. Tyre was nearer to the Israelites than Sidon, and this fact, with the increasing greatness of Tyre over Sidon, established the constant order observed in speaking of the two cities, Tyre and Sidon. Tyre was subject to Egypt in the fifteenth century B. C. (Tell el-Amarna tablets). In the time of Joshua, it was a strong place (Josh. xix. 29). It lay on the border of Asher, but was not assigned to that or any other tribe (xix. 29; Judg. i 31, 32), nor do the Israelites appear to have possessed it at any period of their history. In the time of David it was regarded as a stronghold (2 Sam. xxiv 7). Hiram, king of Tyre, was friendly with David and Solomon, and aided them with materials for the erection by the former of his palace (v 11; 1 Kin. v. 1, 1 Chron. xiv 1) and by the latter of the temple and the other edifices which he built (1 Kin v 1; ix. 10-14; 2 Chron. ii 3, 11, cp Ps. xlv 12). Another Hiram, a brass founder, who cast pillars and other work for the temple, was of mixed Tyrian and Hebrew parentage (1 Kin vii 13, 14, 40, 45). The taste of the Tyrians was not for war, but for manufacture, commerce, money-making, sea voyages, and colonization. They produced purple dyes, metal work, and glass ware; and they trafficked even with remotest peoples (cp 1 Kin ix 28). Their merchants were princes, the honorable of the earth (Is xxiii 8). In the ninth century B. C. a colony from Tyre founded Carthage, which became a formidable rival to Rome. Still, though by taste a commercial people, they were often forced into war. Early in the ninth century they purchased immunity from Ashurnasipal, king of Assyria, and later were represented in the alliance, which included Ahab, formed to resist Ashurnasipal's son and successor Shalmaneser. But at length Tyre with others paid him tribute. About 724 B. C. Shalmaneser, king of Assyria, called the Fourth, after receiving the submission of old Tyre, laid siege to island Tyre, but he died in 722 without effecting its capture (Antiq. ix. 14, 2; cp. probably Is xxiii 1). It yielded to his successor Sargon. The friendliness of the Tyrians toward Israel had ceased by this time. The prophets denounced the Tyrians for delivering Israelites to the Edomites (Amos i 9), and despoiling them of goods and selling them as slaves to the Greeks (Joel iii. 5, 6). The city was not plundered, as were the neighboring towns by Sennacherib, but was besieged by Esarhaddon, and yielded on honorable terms to Ashurbanipal in 664 B. C. In the next century it enjoyed great commercial prosperity, and its merchants traded with all the countries of the known world (Ezek. xxvii). Jeremiah prophesied Tyre's subjection (Jer xxvii 1-11). The classic prophecy against Tyre, entering into more details, is that of Ezekiel (Ezek. xxvi-xxviii. 19, xxix. 18-20). These prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel refer largely to a siege of Tyre by Nebuchadnezzar, lasting thirteen years (con Apion i 21). It is not certainly known whether he actually captured any part of the two cities (cp Ezek xxix. 18-20); if he did, it was probably only the one on the shore (xxvi. 7-11 and perhaps 12), and the result did not compensate the besiegers for their toil. However, Tyre finally made terms and acknowledged Nebuchadnezzar's suzerainty (as indicated by the date of a contract tablet). In 332 B. C. Alexander the Great took the city on the island after a siege of seven months, having made his way to it by building a mole from the mainland across the narrow strait. But it soon recovered considerable prosperity (cp. Is xxiii 15-18). Our Lord once visited the coasts of Tyre and Sidon (Mat. xv. 21-31; Mark vii 24-31), and people from the region occasionally attended on his ministry (Mark iii 8, Luke vi 17). He pointed out that the responsibilities of those heathen cities were much less than those of the places around the sea of Galilee, which constantly heard his preaching and saw his miracles (Mat. xi. 21, 22, Luke x 13, 14). A Christian community existed there in the first century (Acts xxi 3-6). The scholar Origen, who died about A. D. 254, was buried in the Christian basilica. A larger and grander basilica was erected by bishop Paulinus, and at its consecration in 323 the church historian Eusebius, bishop of Caesarea, preached the sermon. In 638 the city was captured by the Mohammedans. The lives and property of the citizens were spared on the humiliating condition that no new churches be built, no bells be rung, no horses be ridden by Christians, no insults be offered to the Mohammedan religion. On the 27th of June, 1124, Tyre was taken by the crusaders. The German emperor Barbarossa, who was drowned on his crusade in 1190, was buried in their cathedral. They lost the city again in March, 1291, when it was reduced almost to a heap of stones. Since then it has nearly always been in Mohammedan hands. Quantities of its stones have been carried away to Beirut, Acre, and Joppa, for building purposes. The walls are in ruinous condition, and have in part disappeared or been covered with sand. Formerly there were two harbors; now only the old Sidonnan port is in use. It is on the northeast side of the island, the other, or the Egyptian port, has been filled with sand. Alexander's mole still remains; its breadth is nearly half a mile. Most of the ruins, including the cathedral, are of Crusading times. The fountains and reservoirs called Râs el-'Ain supplied the city with water by means of an aqueduct starting 15 or 20 feet above the level of the ground, so as to give a sufficient slope for its descent. Tyre was for a considerable period all but destitute of inhabitants. In the present century it has slightly revived, so that it may have at present about 6500 inhabitants. It is called es-Sûr, the old name in Arabic form. Its houses are chiefly on the eastern part of what was once the island, but the former island has been converted by Alexander's mole and accumulated sand into a promontory jutting out from the shore.

The ladder of Tyre is a high mountain on the coast of Syria, 100 stades or about 11 miles north of Ptolemais (War ii. 10, 2). This statement of distance and direction identifies it with a part or the whole of the massive, mountainous promontory, 7 miles in width, which thrusts itself into the sea and forms the natural boundary between Palestine and Phœnicia (1 Mac. xi. 59). At its southwestern angle Râs en-Nâkûrah, a bold headland, projects, leaving no beach between its base and the water, and forcing the coast road to ascend and cross it. This part of the great promontory is commonly identified with the Ladder. Some travelers, however, localize the Ladder at the northwestern angle, where Râs el-'Abyad, the white promontory, stands. In its precipitous cliffs the road is cut for about a mile, overhanging the sea and rising at points to the height of 200 feet above the water.

Tza'de, in A. V. Tzaddi, in A. R. V. Tsadhe.

The eighteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet. No letter in the English alphabet corresponds to it. In anglicizing Hebrew names, s, t, or z is used to represent it. It heads the eighteenth section of Ps. cxix., in which section each verse of the original begins with this letter.

U.

U'cal [I am strong].

One of two sons, pupils, or contemporaries, to whom Agur addressed his prophecy or proverbs (Prov. xxx. 1). This interpretation represents the traditional Hebrew punctuation, and derives support from ver. 4, where a person is addressed and asked to answer, if he knows. Another interpretation, which, however, neglects the punctuation, is given on the margin of the R. V.

U'el [will of God].

A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 34).

Uk'naz.

The marginal reading at 1 Chron. iv. 15, A. V.; but a Hebrew proper name would not begin as this word does. In the text it is properly regarded as two words, and the R. V. correctly renders it "and Kenaz."

U'lai.

A river on the banks of which Daniel was in vision when he saw the prophetic ram, the he goat, etc. (Dan. viii. 2, 16). The Ulai is undoubtedly the Euleus; identified both with the Kerkha, which washes the walls of Susa, that is Shushan, and the Karun, which flows considerably eastward of the city. The conflicting views have been reconciled by the apparently well-founded supposition that the Kerkha sent out a branch from a spot 20 miles northwest of Susa, which joined the Karun, so that the name Ulai might be applied to both rivers.

U'lam [front].

1. A Manassite (1 Chron. vii. 16. 17).

2. A son of Eshek, a Benjaminite descended from Saul through Jonathan (1 Chron. viii. 39, 40).

U'l'a [a yoke].

An Asherite (1 Chron. vii. 39), probably descended from Helem (35).

Um'mah [conjunction].

A town of Asher (Josh. xix. 30). Not identified. Thomson proposes 'Alma, about 5 miles from the shore at Râs en-Nâkûrah. Some considerations suggest that Akko may be the original text. Caph was not infrequently mistaken for mem, i. e. k for m; see BETH.

Un'cle.

The brother of one's father (2 Kin. xxiv. 17, Hebrew). The Hebrew word is dod, which is of broader meaning than uncle and denotes any kinsman on the father's side (Lev. x. 4; Amos vi. 10); as a cousin (Jer xxxii. 12 with 8, 9), or a member of the same tribe (Num. xxxvi. 11).

Un-clean' An'-mals.

A general distinction between clean and unclean meats was made by the nations of antiquity. Some animals were recognized as fit for food and sacrifice, while others were not. The distinction was based partly on the discovered unsuitableness or unwholesomeness of the flesh for food, partly on habits and prey, and partly on an inexplicable natural abhorrence to certain animals. Regard was paid in the Mosaic legislation to this customary attitude of the men of the age, and the distinction between clean and unclean meats was incorporated in the law. Other animals were added to the list of the unclean, out of special considerations involved in the religion of the Israelites. Unclean animals were classified as follows: 1. Beasts that do not both part the hoof entirely and chew the cud (Lev. xi. 3, 4), including all that go on four paws (27). The law accordingly allows only animals of the ox, sheep, and goat kind, and deer and gazelles (Dent. xiv. 4, 5). It excludes among other animals all carnivorous beasts. They eat blood or carrion, and were therefore intolerable to the Israelite. 2. Carnivorous birds, of which twenty or twenty-one are specially named (Lev. xi. 13-19; Dent xiv. 12-18). The enumeration included the bat, which was classed as a bird. They eat blood or carrion. 3. Winged insects which do not have in addition to the four legs two hind legs for leaping (Lev. xi. 20-23). All insects are excluded except the locust (grasshopper). 4. Whatever in the water had not both fins and scales (9, 10). This prohibition left for use the most wholesome varieties of fish found in the waters of Palestine. It excludes eels, and water animals which are not fish, such as crabs. Numa forbade the Romans to offer scaleless fish in sacrifice (Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxxii. 10); and the modern Egyptians are said to regard such fish as unwholesome. Some of these scaleless and finless creatures were snakelike, and recalled the first sin and its curse. 5. Small creeping things (Lev. xi. 29, 30); every creeping thing that goeth upon its belly or upon all fours, or has many feet (41, 42). Some were unwholesome. Others crept in the dust or through slime. Others still were snakelike. Not improbably there was a religious repugnance to creeping things in general, because their mode of locomotion was a reminder of the serpent and the curse on the tempter.

These animals were unclean under any circumstance. But the flesh of even clean animals might become unclean. The law forbade the eating of things offered in sacrifice to idols, things strangled or dead of themselves or killed by beast or bird of prey. Blood and fat of bird and beast were sacred to the Lord. None might eat of the blood, not even the stranger that sojourned in Israel (Lev. xvii. 10-14). The violator of the law respecting blood was cut off from his people (vii. 27; xvi. 10, 14). The offender against the laws regarding unclean animals was unclean until the evening (xi. 24, 40; xvii. 15). Animals that died of themselves might be sold to strangers and eaten by them (Deut. xiv. 21).

Un-clean'ness.

The law distinguished between clean and holy (Lev. x. 10); for example, animals are clean or unclean, not holy or unholy. Uncleanness, when not presumptuously incurred, was ceremonial, not moral defilement. It excluded man from the sanctuary (vii. 20, 21) and from fellowship with members of the commonwealth of Israel, but it did not interrupt spiritual communion with God in prayer. At the same time, the laws that defined uncleanness were in some cases enforced by the injunction, "Be ye holy, for I am holy" (xi. 44, 45). In keeping himself from the unclean, man had regard to the fact that he was set apart from a common to a sacred service, and that as a man of God he was holy unto the Lord and must be separate and touch no unclean thing. Furthermore, ceremonial uncleanness was typical of sin. Physical cleanliness also is different from ceremonial cleanness. The two were not synonymous, although the two conditions sometimes coincided. Comfort and the demands of society required bodily cleanliness on the part of the Hebrews. There were divers washings which had nothing to do with ceremonial purity. The laws of cleanliness which governed men in their intercourse with each other were instinctively observed by reverent persons in their approach to God, and found expression in commands and institutions (Ex. xix. 12, 14; xxx. 18-21; Josh. iii. 5). Ceremonial defilement, for which purification was provided, was incurred in a special manner and was restricted to certain acts and processes. It was acquired by—1. Contact with a human corpse (Num. xix. 11-22). This defilement was the gravest, for the effect of sin is revealed in strongest light in the death of man and the dissolution of the body. Uncleanness arising from this cause continued seven days, and was removed by the water of separation. Even the necessary handling of the ashes of the red heifer, which were used to cleanse from defilement by contact with the dead, rendered unclean (7-10); and contact with the unclean person rendered the clean person unclean until evening (22). 2. Leprosy in man, clothing, or building (Lev. xiii., xiv.). The leper was excluded from human society (xiii. 46), and for his cleansing he required special ablution and sacrifice. 3. Natural and morbid issues from the generative organs (xv.), including puerperal uncleanness (xii.). Generation and parturition were not sinful in themselves; they were ordained by the Creator (Gen. i. 27, 28). The bodily issues connected with them, however, in man or woman, whether voluntary or involuntary, defiled; man's affinity to the lower animals is apparent in reproduction, for right though it is, in heaven they neither marry nor are given in marriage; and probably the divine judgment pronounced on Eve for sin was remembered in connection with childbirth. 4. Eating the flesh of an unclean animal, or contact with its carcass or with that of a clean animal not slain for food and which had thus become subject to the corruption of death (Lev. xi). See UNCLEAN ANIMALS; PURIFICATION.

U'ni-corn.

Any one-horned animal, as the rhinoceros (Is xxxiv. 7, A. V. margin). The biblical animal, however, was two-horned (Deut. xxxiii. 17, where the word is singular, and not plural, as in A. V.). It was possessed of great strength (Num. xxiii. 22; xxiv. 8), but was too untamable to bend its neck to the yoke, or assist man in his agricultural labors (Job xxxix. 9-12). It was frisky in youth (Ps. xxix. 6). It was not the wild buffalo, for this beast is quite tamable. The R. V. margin (Num. xxiii. 22) renders it by ox-antelope, meaning the oryx (Antelope leucoryx); see ANTELOPE. This interpretation is supported by the analogy of the Hebrew r'em to the Arabic rtm, which is now used in Syria for the white and yellow gazelle; but the oryx is timid and in ancient Egypt was frequently tamed and used in the plow. There is every reason to believe that the Hebrew word signifies the wild ox (R. V.); for this animal is denoted by the corresponding Assyrian word rtmu. Admirable representations of it by Assyrian artists show it to be the aurochs (Bos primigenius). Tiglath-pileser about 1120 to 1100 B. C. hunted it in the land of the Hittites, at the foot of Lebanon. It is now extinct, and its name has been transferred in Syria to another animal; but its previous occurrence on and around Lebanon is independently proved by the fact that Tristram discovered its teeth in the bone caves of Lebanon. Julius Caesar, who met with it in Gaul, described it as the Bos urus (Bello Gallico vi. 28). Independently of its size, it is distinguished from its descendant, the common ox, by having a flatter forehead and large horns with double curvature.

Un'ni [oppressed, afflicted].

1. A Levite of the second degree in David's reign, who played the psaltery (1 Chron. xv. 18, 20). It is doubtful whether the word doorkeepers (18) is intended to include him.

2. A Levite in the time of Zerubbabel (Neh. xii. 9, A. V.); see UNNO.

Un'no, in A. V. Unni, which was substituted by the Hebrews in reading the text [oppressed, afflicted].

A Levite who was a contemporary of the high priest Jeshua (Neh. xii. 9).

U-phar'sin. See MENE.

U'phaz.

A place from which gold was brought (Jer. x 9; Dan. x 5) The same, apparently, as Ophir, though the difference in form has not been satisfactorily explained.

Ur, I. [perhaps, settlement].

A city of the Chaldees, the birthplace of Abraham (Gen. xi 28, 31, xv. 7; Neh. ix. 7). Its site is now generally held to have been at Mugheir or Um-mugheir, Bitumenod called Kaldu as early as at least the ninth century B. C.; and was a seat of the worship of the moon-god. Considerable ruins are still found on its site.

Ur, II.

Father of one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi 35). The transcriber perhaps made two heroes, Ur and Hephher, out of one whose name was Ahasbai or something similar (cp. 2 Sam. xxiii. 34).

Ur-ba'nus, in A. V. Ur'bane [urbane, polite].

A Christian to whom the apostle Paul sent his salutation (Rom. xvi. 9).

U'ri [fiery, or, perhaps, light of (Jehovah), being an abbreviation of Urijah].

1. Father of Bezalel, the craftsman (Ex. xxxi. 2).

2. Father of Solomon's taxgatherer Geber (1 Kin. iv. 19).

3. A porter whom Ezra induced to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x 24).

U-ri'ah, in A. V. of N. T. Urias [light of Jehovah] The Hebrew name is often rendered Urijah

1. A Hittite, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxii. 39; 1 Chron. xi. 41), whom the king arranged to have placed at an exposed point in a battle with the Ammonites and lose his life, to prevent his discovering an intrigue which his sovereign had been Mugheir, the Site of Ur of the Chaldees.

the Mother of Bitumen, in Lower Babylonia, on the western bank of the Euphrates. It is called on inscribed tablets Uru; was in a district which, according to inscriptions, was carrying on with the faithful soldier's wife (2 Sam. xi. 1-27; Mat. i. 6).

2. A priest, one of two witnesses to a tablet written by Isaiah (Is. viii. 2); see URIAH 1.

3. A prophet, the son of Shemaiah of Kirjath-jearim. He predicted that the kingdom of Judah was about to be temporarily destroyed, which so enraged king Jehoiakim that he sought to kill the prophet of evil Uriaah fled to Egypt, but was brought back and slain (Jer. xxvi 20-23; in A. V. Urijah).

4. A priest, father of a certain Meremoth (Ezra viii. 33). Called in Neh. iii. 4, 21 Urijah.

5. One of those, probably priests, who stood by Ezra while he addressed the people (Neh. viii. 4; in A. V. Urijah).

U'ri-el [light of God].

1. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar, descended through Korah, Abiasaph, and Tahath (1 Chron. vi. 24). He is probably a different person from Zephaniah (36), and belonged to the collateral line which sprang from Tahath. The head of the Kohathite family in David's reign bore this name (xv. 5, 11), and is conceivably the same person.

2. A man of Gibeah whose daughter Micaiah was Abijah's mother (2 Chron. xiii. 2).

U-ri'jah [light of Jehovah]

1. The high priest in Abaz' reign who was directed to make an altar like that which caught the king's fancy at Damascus (2 Kin. xvi. 10-16). He was probably one of the two witnesses to the enigmatical inscription written by Isaiah (Is. vii. 2, in E. V. Uriaah).

2. A prophet (Jer. xxvi. 20, A. V.) see URIAH 3

3. A priest (Neh. iii. 4, 21); see URIAH 4.

4. One who stood by Ezra while he addressed the people (Neh. viii. 4; in R. V. Uriaah); see URIAH 5.

U'rim and Thum'mim [lights and perfections] The order is once reversed (Deut. xxxiii. 8), and twice Urim alone is used (Num. xxvii. 21; 1 Sam. xxviii. 6).

One or more objects belonging to the ephod of the high priest, put in the breastplate of judgment so as to be on the high priest's heart when he went in before the Lord (Ex. xxviii. 30; Lev. viii. 8). The receptacle was probably a fold of the breastplate or the space underneath it. In connection with the Urim and Thummim, the high priest learned the will of God in doubtful cases. This method was not adopted for inquiring the divine will concerning private individuals or private matters, but was only employed in behalf of the nation; hence the required place for the Urim and Thummim was in the breastplate of judgment, which bore the names of the twelve tribes of Israel on twelve precious stones. With the Urim and Thummim, the will of Jehovah, the judge, concerning judicial matters, and the royal desire of Jehovah, the king, were learned (Num. xxvii. 21; cp. Josh. ix. 14; Judg. i. 1; xx. 18, 23, 27, 28; 1 Sam. x. 22; xiv. 36-42; xxii. 10, 13; xxiii. 9-12; xxviii. 6; xxx. 7, 8; 2 Sam. ii. 1; v. 19, 23, 24). The will of Jehovah was inquired with Urim and Thummim, not only in the sanctuary or where the ark was (Judg. xx. 27, 28; 1 Sam. xxii. 10), but in any place, provided the authorized priest with the ephod was present. The answer was usually quite simple, often a mere affirmation or denial, or a choice of one tribe or place out of several; but it was not always so (1 Sam. x. 22; 2 Sam. v. 23, 24). Occasionally, also, when sin had interrupted communion with God, no answer was granted (1 Sam. xiv. 37; xxviii. 6). There is no reference to the use of Urim and Thummim after the reign of David, and at the time of the return from exile there was no priest with Urim and Thummim (Ezra ii. 63; Neh. vii. 65); hence Josephus is probably wrong in saying that the virtue or use ceased 200 years before his time (Antiq. iii. 8, 9). The use of this method was a prerogative of the high priest alone, and, since he belonged to the tribe of Levi, the possession of the Urim and Thummim was a glory of that tribe (Deut. xxxiii. 8).

Different explanations of the Urim and Thummim have been offered. For example, an analogue has been sought in the badge of office which the Egyptian high priest, as supreme judge, is reported by classical writers to have worn, consisting of an emblem of truth suspended from his neck on a golden chain; but the Egyptian high priest carried this official token during the judicial proceedings only, and hanged it on the person in whose favor judgment was pronounced; and there is no evidence that it was ever used as a means for inquiring the divine will. Other interpreters have supposed that when to the high priest, clad in the ephod with the Urim and Thummim and offering prayer, an idea occurred, its divine origin and truth were confirmed by the unwonted gleaming of the gems in the breastplate. From this phenomenon was derived the name Urim, lights. It has been suggested that the answer was spelled out by the successive gleaming of the letters which composed the proper names on the stones; but to say nothing of the fact that the complete alphabet is not yielded by these names, and that in several of the recorded responses letters occur which are not found on the stones, the whole idea smacks of the feigned miracles of Greek and Roman priests, and is foreign to the methods and conceptions of the Hebrew ritual.

Only two theories are important. 1. The Urim and Thummim were one or more appendages of the ephod and detachable, and were used as the lot, cast like dice, and by their fall revealed the divine will. This is, indeed, a possible conception, but it lacks proof. Support is sought for it in the fact that the casting of the lot is twice referred to in close association with seeking revelation through Urim and Thummim (1 Sam. x. 19-22; xiv. 37-42). In the latter case, Saul prayed: "Give a perfect lot" (41, R. V. margin). The word thamim is used, which it is proposed to pronounce thummim, and thus make the Urim and Thummim to have been a kind of sacred lot. But in the two cases mentioned, the casting of lots was a distinct act from inquiring of the Lord, and was undertaken for a different purpose from that for which counsel was asked. 2. The Urim and Thummim gave no outward manifestation, but served as a symbol. The high priest arrayed himself in the ephod with Urim and Thummim, which betokened his authority to obtain light and truth, as the name indicates, in order that he might seek counsel of Jehovah in the divinely appointed manner. He laid the matter humbly before God in prayer; the answer dawned in his mind; he believed that the response was correct, because he had made his request in the manner of God's appointment, and because he had God's promise that he should receive light and truth. Faith in God was the evidence of things not seen. This interpretation of the use of the Urim and Thummim accords with the spirituality of the entire ritualism of the tabernacle. The answer was inward illumination, without any external sign, and finds its parallel in the revelations granted to the prophets.

U'su-ry.

Interest on loaned money, the word being used in its primary sense, without any imputation that the interest is extortionate in amount. See Loan.

U'thai [probably, helpful].

1. A man of Judah, family of Perez, and son of Ammihud. He was the head of the father's house to which he belonged, and dwelt at Jerusalem (1 Chron. ix. 4).

2. A descendant of Bigvai. He accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezra viii. 14).

Uz, in A. V. once Huz (Gen. xxii. 21).

A tribe of the Aramæans (Gen. x. 23), able to trace their descent partly from Nahor (xxii. 21), and connected by blood or political ties with Dishan the Horite (xxxvi. 28). Job resided in the land of Uz (Job i. 1), and was exposed to attack from the Sabæans and Chaldeans (15, 17). At the time of Jeremiah, Edomites dwelt in the land of Uz (Lam. iv. 21). Josephus regarded Uz as the founder of Trachonitis and Damascus (Antiq. i. 6, 4). Ptolemy locates the Ausitai in the desert west of the Euphrates. Uz, according to these data, was in the Syrian desert between the latitudes of Damascus and Edom.

U'zal.

Father of one who helped to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 25).

U'zal [possibly, travel or wandering].

A people of Arabia descended from Joktan (Gen. x. 27; 1 Chron. i. 21; Ezek. xxvii. 19, R. V. margin). The kindred name Azal was, according to Arabian tradition, the ancient name of Sana, the capital of Yemen, in Arabia.

Uz'za [strength]. The orthography is Aramaic.

1. A Benjamite, a son or a descendant of Ehud (1 Chron. vii. 7).

2. The founder of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from captivity (Ezra ii. 49; Neh. vii. 51).

3. A man known only as the original owner of a garden. This garden ultimately passed into the hands of Manasseh, king of Judah, and was within the precincts of his palace. Both Manasseh and his son Amon were buried in it (2 Kin. xxi. 18, 26; cp. 2 Chron. xxxiii. 20). The garden was apparently at or near Jerusalem, but the exact spot is undetermined.

4 and 5 Two men otherwise called Uzzah.

Uz'zah, and Uzza in 1 Chron. xiii. 7-11 and A. V. of vi. 29 [strength].

1. A son of Abinadab, of what tribe is unknown. When the ark had reached the threshing floor of Nacon, or Chidon, on its way to the city of David, the oxen stumbled, and Uzzah, putting forth his hand to support the sacred symbol, was struck dead. The place was therefore called Perez-uzzah, breach of Uzzah, or breaking out against Uzzah, and long retained the name (2 Sam. vi. 3-11; 1 Chron. xiii. 7-14).

2. A son of Merari (1 Chron. vi. 29).

Uz-zen-she'e-rah, in A. V. Uzzen-she-rah.

A village built by Sheerah, daughter of an Ephraimite named Ephraim (1 Chron. vii. 24). It is mentioned in connection with the two Beth-horons, and is considered to have been at Beit Sirā, 3 miles west by south of the nether Beth-horon, and 13 west by north of Jerusalem.

Uz'zi [my strength, or might of (Jehovah)].

1. A man of Issachar, family of Tola, and head of a father's house (1 Chron. vii. 2, 3).

2. A priest, son of Bukki, and father of Zerabiah, of the line of Eleazar (1 Chron. vi. 5, 6, 51). He was an ancestor of Ezra (Ezra vii. 4).

3. A Benjamite, family of Bela, and head of a father's house (1 Chron. vii. 7).

4. Another Benjamite, son of Michri, and father of Elah (1 Chron. ix. 8).

5. A Levite of the sons of Asaph. He was son of Bani, and overseer of the Levites at Jerusalem (Neh. xi. 22).

6. A priest, head of the house of Jedaiah in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. xii. 19).

7. A priest, one of those who assisted at the dedication of the rebuilt wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 42).

Uz-zi'a [probably, Aramaic spelling of 'Uzziyyah, might of Jehovah].

A man from the town of Ashtaroth, and one of David's mighty men (1 Chron. xi. 44).

Uz-zi'ah, in A. V. of N. T. Ozias [might of Jehovah].

1. A Kohathite Levite, the son of Shaul (1 Chron. vi. 24).

2. The father of a certain Jehonathan in David's time (1 Chron. xxvii. 25).

3. A king of Judah (2 Kin. xv 13, 30-34; 2 Chronicles and Isaiah, Hos i. 1; Amos i. 1; Zech. xiv. 5; Mat. i. 9); called Azariah in 2 Kin. xiv. 21; xv 1-8, 17-27; 1 Chron. iii. 12 (see AZARIAH). He succeeded his father Amaziah about 786 B. C. during the latter's lifetime, a few years after the crushing defeat was inflicted on Amaziah by the king of Israel. That he reigned during his father's lifetime is evident from the statement made in connection with the record of his reign, that he built Elath after the death of the king (2 Kin. xiv. 22). He was sixteen years old when he ascended the throne (21). After conducting the government for twenty-four years, it is recorded that "he reigned in the twenty-seventh year of Jeroboam" (xv. 1; the word "began" is not in the Hebrew text). This statement "is most easily explained," says Kleinert, "by the assumption that in this year the kingdom of Judah had regained the full sovereignty;" freeing itself from vassalage to Jeroboam, in which it had been held since the overthrow of Amaziah, the capture and dismantlement of Jerusalem, and the enforcement of hostages. Uzziah organized the army; and he improved the fortifications of Jerusalem, and the weapons and military engines of his troops. He gained important victories over the Philistines and Arabs razed the walls of Gath, Jalneh, and Ashdod, and received tribute from the Ammonites and other foes (2 Chron. xxvi 6-8). So strong did Judah become. Uzziah promoted agriculture by building towers in the desert and digging wells. Uzziah himself worshiped Jehovah, but did not take away the high places at which his people sacrificed to other gods. At length, elated by his prosperity, he entered the temple against priestly remonstrance, and attempted to offer incense, but was struck with leprosy, from which he never recovered. He had therefore to associate his son Jotham with him in the government. A notable earthquake occurred during his reign (Amos i. 1; Zech. xiv. 5), which took place near enough to his attempt to invade the priest's office to be connected with it in the popular memory (Antiq. ix. 10, 4). His reign extended to fifty-two years. He died about the year 735 B. C. (2 Kin. xv. 1-7; 2 Chron. xxvi. 1-23). Before his decease the prophets Isaiah, Hosea, and Amos had begun their public career (Is. i. 1; vi. 1; Hos. i. 1; Amos i. 1).

4. A priest, son of Harim. He was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 21).

5. A man of Judah, family of Perez (Neh. xi. 4).

Uz'ni-el [might of God].

1. A Levite, son of Kohath, and founder of a tribal family (Ex. vi. 18, 22; Num. iii.

19, 27, 30). He was a kinsman of Aaron on the father's side (Lev. x. 4). Amminadab, the chief of the Uzzielites, and 112 of his brethren, were organized by David for service when he brought up the ark to the city of David (1 Chron. xv. 10).

2. A Benjamite, family of Bela (1 Chron. vii. 7).

3. A Levite, instrumentalist in David's reign (1 Chron. xxv. 4). Called in verse 18 Azarel, see AZAREL 2.

4. A Levite, son of Jeduthun. He assisted king Hezekiah in his work of reformation (2 Chron. xxix. 14).

5. A Simeonite captain, one of those who, in Hezekiah's reign, led a successful expedition against the Amalekites of mount Seir (1 Chron. iv. 41-43).

6. A goldsmith, son of Harhaiah. He helped to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 8).

V.

Va'heb.

A place near the Arnon (Num. xxi. 14, 15, R. V.), otherwise unknown. See DI-ZAHAB.

Va-iz'a-tha, in A. V. Va-jex'a-tha [Persian, perhaps meaning strong as the wind].

A son of Haman (Esth. ix. 9).

Vale and Val'ley.

The vale or the valley, par excellence, is in A. V. the Shephelah or lowland (q. v.).

Va-ni'ah [perhaps, distress].

A son of Bani, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 36).

Vash'ni.

According to 1 Chron. vi. 28 (A. V. following the Hebrew text), the eldest son of Samuel, in which case he would be the same as Joel of verse 33, and of 1 Sam. viii. 2. But the text is corrupt. Joel has accidentally slipped out, the conjunction vau before Abiah has crept in, and vashni should be rendered "and the second" (R. V. following Syriac and 1 Sam. viii. 2).

Vash'ti.

The queen of the Persian sovereign Ahasuerus. For refusing to show herself to the king's guests at a feast celebrated in his third year, she was divorced and deposed (Esth. i. 3 and 9-11. 1). Vashti may be a title, old Persian rashiti, sweetest; or it may be connected with the name of an Elamite deity called Washti (see discussion, article ESTHER); or it may be the Hebrew reproduction of the Persian name which the Greeks pronounced Amestris. Amestris, daughter of Otanes, was the wife of Xerxes (Herod. vii. 61, 114). If she was Vashti, Vashti was ultimately restored to favor; for Amestris was the recognized wife of Xerxes about 479 B. C., at the end of his eighth or in his ninth regnal year (ix. 109).

Vav, in A. V. and E. R. V. Vau.

The sixth letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The English F. through the Greek digamma or fau, has the same origin. Where it is a consonant in Hebrew names, it appears as v in the anglicized form.

It stands at the head of the sixth section of Ps. cxix. in several versions, in which section each verse begins with this letter.

At several different periods in the development of the Hebrew alphabet it has had similarity with other letters. On the tomb of James, dating from the first century before Christ, vau and zain are scarcely distinguishable from one another, and jod differs only by a hook at the top and a slope; thus, in the order named, 1, 1, 1.

In the inscription on the synagogue at Kefr Bir'im the difference between vau and jod has disappeared.

Ve'dan.

A place with which Tyre traded (Ezek. xxvii 19, R V); possibly either Adm or Weddân, between Mecca and Medina. But the text may be corrupt. The A V has the rendering "Dan also," the first syllable being regarded as the Hebrew conjunction vau.

Vell, in A. V. often Vall. See CLOTHING, TABERNACLE, and TEMPLE, HEROD'S.

Ver-mil'ion.

A red pigment obtained by grinding the mineral cinnabar (Pliny, Hist. Nat. xxxiii. 38). It was called shashar in Hebrew, multos in Greek; and was used to paint walls, mural decorations, and idols (Jer. xxii. 14; Ezek. xxii. 14; Wisd. xiii. 14). Vermilion is a satisfactory translation of the word in these passages; but multos was of broader meaning and denoted any red, mineral, coloring matter; as red lead, or clay mingled with the oxide of iron and known as ochre. Rude Africans bedaubed the body with it (Herod. i. 191, 194), and certain tribes used it as war paint (vii. 69).

Ver'sions.

Translations of the Bible or of any portions of it into vernacular tongues, for the benefit of those who understand the original imperfectly or not at all.

Versions are immediate or mediate, according as they are made directly from the original text or through the medium of other translations. Four ancient immediate versions of the O. T. have come down to modern times: the Septuagint, the Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan ben Uzziel, the Syriac Peshito with a considerable portion of its predecessors, and the Latin Vulgate. They derive special value from the fact that they were made before the Hebrew text of the Masoretes was established.

The Samaritan Pentateuch is not a version; it is the Hebrew text written in Samaritan or old Hebrew characters, with various divergences from the Hebrew text of the Masorettes (see SAMARITAN PENTATEUCH); and the Samaritan version of the Pentateuch is a translation of this divergent text into the Samaritan dialect.

I Ancient Versions of the O. T., made for the use of Jews.

1 The Septuagint. The most celebrated Greek version of the Hebrew Scriptures and the oldest complete translation of them. It was called the Septuagint, commonly designated by LXX, after the seventy translators reputed to have been employed on it in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, 285-247 B. C. Aristobulus, a Jewish priest who lived in Alexandria during the reign of Ptolemy Philometor, 181-146 B. C., and who is mentioned in 2 Mac. i. 10, is quoted by Clement of Alexandria and Eusebius as stating that while portions relating to Hebrew history had been translated into Greek previously, the entire law was translated from the Hebrew in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus under the direction of Demetrius Phalereus. The same tradition, but considerably embellished, is contained in a letter purporting to have been written by Aristas to his brother. This letter is condemned by modern scholars as spurious. The same story as that told by Aristas is repeated with slight variations by Josephus, who may have had the letter before him. Josephus relates that Demetrius Phalereus, librarian to Ptolemy Philadelphus, who reigned alone from 283-247 B. C., wished to add to the 200,000 volumes in the library a copy of the Hebrew books of the law, and to have them translated into Greek, as they were unintelligible in the original. The king consented, and made application to Eleazar the high priest at Jerusalem for seventy-two aged and skillful interpreters, six from each tribe, to make the translation. They arrived in Alexandria, bringing the law written in golden letters on books of parchment. They were hospitably received, were assigned a quiet house on the island of Pharos in the harbor of Alexandria, and transcribed and interpreted the law in seventy-two days (Antiq. xii. 2, 1-13; con. Apion. ii. 4).

These ancient reports concerning the origin of the Septuagint have great value, although reliance cannot be placed on the details, and the statements regarding the scope of the work are difficult of interpretation. It is, however, commonly agreed that the Septuagint originated in Egypt, that the Pentateuch was translated into Greek in the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus, that the other books followed gradually, and that the entire work was completed by 150 B. C. Reference to a Greek version of the law, the prophets, and the other books is made by Jesus, son of Sirach, as early as 132 B. C. (Ecclus. prologue). It is possible that the work was revised in the Maccabean period. The version is the work of many translators, as differences in style and method show, and its quality is unequal in different parts; it is also much corrupted. The translation of the Pentateuch, except poetic portions (Gen xlix, Deut xxxii. xxxiii), is the best part of the work, and on the whole is well executed, although not literal. The translators of The Proverbs and Job were masters of a good Greek style, but were imperfectly acquainted with Hebrew and handled the original arbitrarily. The translation of The Proverbs is based on a Hebrew text that varied considerably from the present Masoretic text. The general sense of the Psalms is fairly well reproduced. Ecclesiastes is rendered with slavish literalness. The translation of the prophets is unequal in quality. That of Amos and Ezekiel is tolerably well done, but that of Isaiah is quite inferior. The version of Jeremiah was possibly made from a different form of the Hebrew text than the Masoretic. Of all the O. T. books, Daniel is the most poorly translated, so much so that the early Christians, since the time of Irenæus and Hippolytus, substituted for it the version of Theodotion.

Christ and his apostles used the Septuagint frequently. In quoting from the O. T. sometimes they cited the Septuagint verbatim, or with unimportant verbal changes, at others, they apparently themselves translated from the original Hebrew. There are about 350 quotations from the O. T. in the gospels, The Acts, and the epistles, and only about fifty materially differ from the Greek version. The Ethiopian eunuch whom Philip met was reading the Septuagint (Acts viii. 30-33).

Three main recensions of the Septuagint were made. One was issued about A. D. 236, and the others previous to A. D. 311. They were that of Origen in Palestine, of Lucian in Asia Minor and Constantinople, and of Hesychius in Egypt. The Vatican manuscript of the Septuagint is acknowledged to exhibit relatively the purest and most original text, and it probably descended from that upon which Origen based the text of the Septuagint given in the fifth column of his Hexapla; see I. 2. Lucian's recension has been edited in part by Lagarde and by Oesterley. Lucian was a presbyter of Antioch, and died a martyr's death at Nicomedia in A. D. 311 or 312. He issued a revised text of the Septuagint based on a comparison of the common Greek text with the Hebrew text, which proves to have been a good text, but different from that of the Masoretes. Hesychius was bishop of Egypt, and suffered martyrdom A. D. 310 or 311; his text has been lost; but a codex, known as Q, preserved in the Vatican library, and containing the Prophets, is believed to show it for these books.

2. Minor Greek Versions. After the destruction of Jerusalem in A. D. 70, the Septuagint lost favor among the Jews, partly because of the successful use made of it by the Christians in establishing the claims of Jesus, and partly because they discovered that its style lacked elegance. Accordingly three translations of the canonical books of the O. T. were made by Jews in the second century. 1. The translation by Aquila, a native of Pontus and a proselyte to Judaism. He lived in the time of the emperor Hadrian, and he undertook to make a literal version of the Hebrew Scriptures in order to counteract the use of the Septuagint made by the Christians in advancing their doctrines. It was so slavishly literal as often to be unintelligible to readers who did not know Hebrew as well as Greek. 2. The revision of the Septuagint by Theodotion, a Jewish proselyte of Ephesus according to Irenæus, and according to Eusebius an Ebionite, believing in the Messiahship, but not in the divinity of Christ. He lived before A. D. 160, for he is mentioned by Justin Martyr. In his revision of the Septuagint he made use both of Aquila's translation and of the Hebrew original. 3. The elegant, but periphrastic, translation by Symmachus, a Samaritan Ebionite.

Origen arranged the Hebrew text and four different versions in six parallel columns for purposes of comparison. In the first column he put the Hebrew text, in the second the Hebrew written in Greek letters, in the third the version of Aquila, in the fourth that of Symmachus, in the fifth the Septuagint, in the sixth the revision by Theodotion. From these six columns his work takes its name of Hexapla. In the column devoted to the Septuagint he marked with obeli words which were not in his Hebrew text. He emended the Greek text by supplying words lacking in it, but found in the Hebrew. These he indicated by asterisks. He conformed the spelling of proper names to the Hebrew. Origen prepared a smaller edition containing the last four columns only, and hence called the Tetrapla. These two works were deposited in the library founded by Origen's disciple, Pamphilus, at Caesarea in Palestine. They were consulted by Jerome in the fourth century, and were still in existence in the sixth century. It is thought that they were destroyed when the Mohammedans took the town in A. D. 638. Fragments of Origen's great work are preserved in quotations made by the fathers. The Septuagint column was separately published by Pamphilus and Eusebius; and it was translated into Syriac by Paul, bishop of Tella, in A. D. 617-18. Origen pursued an unfortunate method when he conformed the text of the Septuagint to the Hebrew text of his day: since the great desideratum of scholars is the Greek text as it left the translators' hands, for that text would throw light on the Hebrew text which they used. Moreover, the obeli and asterisks, which Origen used, were often neglected or carelessly employed by copyists, so that the additions which he made to the Septuagint and the portions of the Septuagint which he did not find in his Hebrew text cannot always be discovered.

3 The Targums. When the Jews returned from the Babylonian exile, the Hebrew of their forefathers ceased to be their ordinary speech, and Aramaic, misnamed Chaldee, took its place. It soon became necessary at the public reading of the Scriptures for the reader or his assistant to translate the passage orally that the people might understand. The custom of explaining obscure words and phrases at the public reading was in vogue in Ezra's time (Neh. viii 8). The event referred to has been cited as evidence that the words read were translated; but this is more than the statement warrants, and depends upon the answer to the question whether the Hebrews had adopted a foreign language during the exile. The oral targum—that is, interpretation or translation—which became necessary, was at first a simple paraphrase in Aramaic; but eventually it became elaborate, and in order to fix it as a translation and render it authoritative as an interpretation, it was reduced to writing. These written Targums are a valuable aid in determining the text as read in the early synagogues and in discovering the meaning which the Jews attached to difficult passages. The principal Targums are the Targum of Onkelos on the Pentateuch and the Targum of Jonathan ben Uzziel on the prophets. According to the Talmud, Onkelos was the friend of Gamaliel and a fellow-pupil of Paul, and therefore lived about A. D. 70. His Targum would then antedate the beginning of the second century; but it is generally regarded as a later production, perhaps as early as the second century. It is quite literal. The Targum of Jonathan ben Uzziel, on the other hand, is periphrastic; and it is of later date. The Targums on the Hagiographa date from the eleventh century.

II. Ancient Versions of a part or the whole of the Bible, and intended chiefly for Christians.

1. Syriac Versions

(1) The Old Syriac Version of the N. T. This is represented by the gospels discovered by Mrs. Lewis in the convent of St. Catherine on mount Sinai in 1892, and by the closely related fragments found by Cureton in a Syrian convent in the Nitrian desert in 1841-43.

(2) The Peshito. Peshito means simple or vulgate. The O. T. was made directly from the Hebrew, and in the first instance was probably prepared for the use of Jewish proselytes. It was made as early as the first century. The N. T. is a revision of the old Syriac in order to bring it into closer agreement with the Greek text and improve its diction and style. The Peshito seems to have been in circulation in the second century. By reason of its elegance it has often been called the queen of versions.

(3) The Philoxenian Version of the N. T. This is so called because it was translated in A. D. 508 by Philoxenus, bishop of Hierapolis, in Asia Minor.

(4) The Jerusalem or Palestinian Syriac Version of the N. T. is but little known as yet, but promises to be of critical value.

2. Latin Versions.

(1) The Old Latin or North African Version. By the end of the second century a Latin version of the Scriptures was in circulation in northern Africa. It was used by Tertullian, who died about A. D. 220, and by Cyprian and Augustine. The O. T. was not translated immediately from the Hebrew, but was based on the Greek version.

(2) The Itala or Italian Version. Augustine testifies that a translation of the N. T. was made by any one who had sufficient knowledge of Greek. The North African version of the O. and N. T. was provincial in its language and offensive to the ears of the Latin speaking Romans of the capital. In the fourth century, therefore, a recension of the text took place, which, from being made in Italy, was called the Itala.

(3) The Vulgate. The issue of the Itala was followed by other recensions, of which almost the only effect was to bring the text into confusion; till at length in A. D. 383 a Christian father, Jerome or Hieronymus, A. D. 329 or 331 to 420, the most learned scholar of his day and a man of moral earnestness and piety, was requested by Damasus, bishop of Rome, to undertake a revision of the Latin N. T. The gospels were compared with the original Greek, interpolations were removed, and gross errors were corrected. He also made two revisions of the old Latin version of the Psalms by comparing it with the Septuagint. These are known as the Roman and Gallican psalters, because introduced into Rome and Gaul respectively. Jerome then designed a revision of the entire O. T. In 387 he took up his residence in a monastery at Bethlehem. He began and completed a revision based on the hexaplar text of Origen; but ultimately he made a version immediately from the Hebrew, with constant reference to the Greek versions and with special respect for Symmachus. As a youth he had pursued the study of Hebrew, and after his removal to Bethlehem he resumed it with the aid of Jewish teachers. Samuel and Kings, prefaced by the famous Prologus galleatus giving an account of the Hebrew canon, were issued in 392, and the entire work was completed in 405. His own generation gave him abuse rather than gratitude for the very important service he had rendered it; and the eminent father, whose temper was none of the best, retorted by expressing the contempt which knowledge feels for blatant and aggressive ignorance. As the ages rolled forward, his work, which was done not for one generation, but for all succeeding time, was more and more appreciated. The Vulgate became the Bible of the whole western church in the Middle Ages, and notwithstanding vernacular translations, remains the Bible of the Roman Catholic church still. A recension of the text was made by Alcuin, at the instance of Charlemagne, about 802. The Latin Vulgate was the first book ever printed, having been issued from the press about 1455, soon after the invention of printing. On April 8, 1546, the Council of Trent made a decree which expressed the wish for a fresh revision. Scholars were dilatory about undertaking the duty, till a pontiff of iron will, Sixtus V., urged on the work and even took a personal part in its accomplishment. The revision was published in 1590. A different one came forth under the auspices of pope Clement VIII in 1592. It was an improvement on the Sixtine edition, but did not quite render it obsolete. Both editions are still in use. The Clementine text of the Vulgate of the O. T., with the various readings of the codex Amiatinus, has been edited by Heyse and Tischendorf, and the N. T. according to the codex Amiatinus by Tischendorf. It is from the Vulgate that a large part of the technical language used in theology is derived. For instance, sacrament, justification, and sanctification are simply the anglicized forms of sacramentum, justificatio, and sanctificatio, occurring in the Vulgate.

3. Coptic Versions of the N. T. They appear principally in two dialects, Memphitic and Thebaic. The Memphitic version is supposed to date from the close of the second century. It is for the most part faithful, and preserves the best text as current among the Alexandrian fathers, free from the corruptions that prevailed in the second century. The Thebaic version is believed to be slightly later in date, and it is less faithful to the original.

4. The Ethiopic Version of the Bible was made some time between the fourth and sixth centuries A. D.; it is the oldest monument as well as the foundation of the whole Ethiopic literature. Its translators were not learned men, nor entirely familiar with Greek, but the rendering is faithful and has preserved peculiarities. The O. T. portion was not translated immediately from the Hebrew, but was made from the Greek version, and is therefore valuable as an aid in determining the text of the Septuagint.

5. The Gothic Version was made in the latter half of the fourth century by Ulphilas, bishop of the West Goths. It embraced the whole Bible except the books of Samuel and Kings, which the bishop omitted, because he thought it would be dangerous to place them, with their warlike spirit and opposition to idolatry, in the hands of the Goths. Most of the N. T., but little of the O. T. in this version is extant. The translation is faithful and skillful.

6. The extant Arabic Versions are late, and of no critical importance.

III. English Versions.

1. Early English Versions. In Anglo-Saxon times portions of Scripture, especially the Psalms, the ten commandments, and portions of the gospels, were translated into the vernacular tongue. After the language had been modified by the Norman conquest, various portions of Scripture, especially the gospels, were rendered into the language of the nation. But no effort was made similarly to treat the Bible as a whole.

2. Wycliffe and Purvey's Bible. Of this there are two versions: the first apparently between 1382 and 1383, and the second about 1388. The first, which was robust and terse, but unpolished in language, was mainly Wycliffe's; the second, which was more refined, emanated chiefly from Purvey, for Wycliffe, who was born about A. D. 1324, had died on December 31, 1384. The best-known version is Purvey's. Here are specimens of both versions Gen. i. 1: "In the firste made God of nouȝt heuene and erthe." In the later version this reads: "In the bygynnyng God made of nouȝt heuene and erthe." In the older version John iii. 16 is: "Forsothe God so loued the world, that he gaf his oon bigetun sone, that ech man that bileueth in to him perische not, but haue euere lasting lyf"; but in the later version it is changed to "For God louede so the world, that he gaf his oon bigetun sone, that ech man that bileueth in him persche not, but haue euerlastyng lyf." Both versions were made from the Latin Vulgate. Wycliffe's version was the first rendering of the Scriptures into any form of modern English, and it helped to mold the language; it also exerted great influence on the national life; but it was circulated in manuscript copies only, and was not printed until 1848.

3. About 1526 there arrived from abroad a translation of the N. T. from the original Greek by the reformer William Tyndale, who had left his native England to escape persecution. It was published at Worms, and was made from the Greek of Erasmus, probably from the edition of 1519, although the edition of 1522 was consulted. Tyndale translated immediately from the Greek, using the German N. T. of Luther and the Vulgate as aids. His work excited great opposition from the leading dignitaries of the then dominant church, though many of the common people received it gladly. The book was pronounced full of pestilent errors, and was burnt at Paul's Cross. In 1530, and again in 1534, he published a translation of the Pentateuch, and in 1531 of the book of Jonah. They were made immediately from the original Hebrew, Luther and the Vulgate being used as aids. In 1534 a fresh edition of his N. T. was issued from Antwerp. There is evidence that he translated other portions of the O. T. besides those already mentioned, most probably to the end of Chronicles with several prophetic books; but he did not live to publish them. He was arrested on the 23d or 24th of May, 1535, at Antwerp, where he had permanently settled, and on the 6th of October, 1536, was first strangled and then burnt as a heretic. But his work remained. It fixed the English standard of Bible translation, and its diction and style still live in the English version and lend it literary charm and character.

4. Coverdale's Bible. This work was published in 1535, with no mention who the printer was nor from what city or town it issued. Probably Zurich is entitled to the honor, but possibly Frankfurt or Cologne. It was the first complete English Bible issued from the press. The N T and much of the O. T. are practically Tyndale's. Only the portion from Job to Malachi was translated independently by Miles Coverdale, and he used not the original Hebrew, but a Swiss-German Bible printed at Zurich in 1527-29. He describes the book as "translated out of Douche and Latyn in to Englishe." Coverdale's version of the Psalms, virtually unchanged, is still used by the church of England in its Book of Common Prayer.

5. Matthew's Bible. Thomas Matthew is believed to have been only a name assumed by John Rogers, successor to Tyndale as chaplain to the English merchants of the Steelyard at Antwerp, the first martyr in the persecution under Mary Tudor. In 1537 he printed an edition of the Bible, perhaps at Antwerp. It contains Tyndale's translations in their latest form. For books not translated by Tyndale, the text is taken from Coverdale's version. It had bold annotations, yet it was the first Bible licensed by public authority.

6. Taverner's Bible. This was published in the year 1539, and was designed to counteract the influence of Matthew's Bible, and especially of his daring explanatory notes.

7. The Great Bible, called also Cranmer's Bible. The first name was given it on account of its size, the page of type measuring $13\frac{1}{4}$ by $7\frac{1}{4}$ inches, and the second name came into use because Cranmer wrote the introduction to it. It was undertaken by Coverdale at Cromwell's suggestion, was produced mainly by the revision of the text of Matthew's Bible, and appeared in 1539-41. It was warmly welcomed, and seven editions of it ere long appeared.

8. The Geneva Bible. This revision was the work of three exiles, who had taken refuge in Geneva during the Marian persecution, Whittingham, Gilby, and Sampson. It was a revision of Tyndale, collated with the Great Bible. From the occurrence of the word breeches in Gen. iii., where the A. V. was subsequently to have aprons, it is sometimes called the Breeches Bible. The N. T. appeared in 1557, and the whole Bible in 1560. These two editions were the first English translations to use the division into verses. The translators availed themselves of the aids furnished by the best biblical scholarship of the age, and it is itself the most scholarly of the early English versions. It was a handy volume, being small quarto in size. It was well received among the common people, especially those of Puritan tendency, and for seventy-five years was the Bible in current use. It was provided with notes, which form a sound and helpful commentary along practical, expository, and doctrinal lines, and was the first Bible printed in Scotland.

9. The Bishops' Bible. The popularity of the Geneva Bible was not acceptable to the bishops, and in 1568 they issued one of their own. It borrowed from the Geneva version the division of the chapters into verses. In 1571 Convocation pronounced in its favor, and ordered copies to be placed in all the churches. It was founded chiefly on the Great Bible, though borrowing a few variations from the Geneva version.

10. The Rheims and Douay Bible. This is the Roman Catholic version of the Scriptures into English. It was made from the Vulgate, and published, the N. T. at Rheims in 1582, and the O. T. at Douay in 1609-10. It contains a highly controversial commentary. Its language and style smack more of Latin than English; but it gave currency to many words borrowed from the Latin, and not a few of them, such as impenitent, propitiation, remission, found a place in the A. V.

11. The Authorized Version. The proposal to make this version came, apparently on the spur of the moment, from Dr Reynolds, or Reynolds, president of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, during the discussion between the Anglicans and the Puritans at the Hampton Court Conference, on the 14th, 16th, and 18th of January, 1604. King James I., whose interest in theology is well known, was pleased by the proposal, and on the 10th of February, 1604, he ordered, among other things, "that a translation be made of the whole Bible, as consonant as can be to the original Hebrew and Greek; and thus to be set out and printed, without any marginal notes, and only to be used in all churches of England in time of divine service." The king appointed fifty-four translators, but only forty-seven took part in the work. They were formed into six companies, two of which met at Westminster, two at Oxford, and two at Cambridge. The work was issued in 1611, with a fulsome dedication to king James. It was not a new translation, but a scholarly revision of a good version. It has endeared itself to all English-speaking Christians, and is the translation now in common use.

12. The Revised Version. A revision of the A. V. became necessary because in the course of more than two centuries and a half through new manuscripts and careful study corruptions had been discovered in the text of the Greek Testament which had been used for the English version, and a superior text had been provided. Greek and Hebrew scholarship had also made great advances during the same period. In February, 1870, the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury planned, not a new translation, but a fresh revision of the time-honored version. Two companies were formed for the purpose, one for each Testament. That for the O. T. consisted of twenty-seven members; and that for the N. T. likewise of twenty-seven members at first, but for the greater part of the time of twenty-four. Two-thirds of these belonged to the church of England. Two companies of scholars in America co-operated, fourteen for the O. T. and thirteen for the N. T., representing the different Protestant churches. The work was begun on the 22d of June, 1870. The N. T. took ten and a half years, and was published in May, 1881. The revision of the O. T. was commenced on the 30th of June, 1870, and was completed in fourteen years, on June 20th, 1884. The American Revised Version is the Revised Version of 1881 and 1884 newly edited, the N. T. in the year 1900, and the O. T. in 1901. The American edition incorporates in the text the readings and renderings preferred by the two American committees, adds references to parallel and illustrative passages, provides a running headline to indicate the topics in the page, removes the verse numbers from the margin to the text, substitutes the name Jehovah for LORD and GOD, wherever it is found in the original, and increases the number of changes made for the sake of euphemism. The Revised is inferior to the Authorized Version in felicity of expression, and the sentences are less perfect in their rhythm and their cadence. But as a work of science it is a great improvement on the A. V. Especially in the poetic and prophetic portions of the O. T. and in the epistles of the N. T. has the true meaning been made clear. The orthography also of the proper names has been vastly improved.

Vine.

Any plant with a long, slender, prostrate or climbing stem, with tendrils, as a gourd (2 Kin. iv. 39). The word usually denotes the common or grape vine (Vitis vinifera). It is believed to be indigenous in western Asia south of the Caspian Sea (cp. Gen. ix. 20, 21). It was largely cultivated in Egypt (xl. 9-11; Ps. lxxviii. 47); and Egyptian sculptures of the Old Empire, before the time of Joseph, represent vineyards, vines laden with grapes, presses, and the manufacture of wine. The soil and climate of Palestine were favorable to the vine, and it was early cultivated in Canaan (Gen. xiv. 18). It is incidentally referred to as growing in the lowland of Philistia, at Jezreel, and in the plain of Gennesaret (Judg. xv. 5; 1 Kin. xxi. 1; War iii. 10, 8), and especially in the mountainous districts, as near Hebron, Shiloh, and Shechem

(Num. xiii. 23; Judg. ix. 27; xxi. 20; Jer. xxxi. 5). Especial mention is made of the vines of Eschol in the hill country of Judah (Num. xiii. 23), of Engedi in the valley of the Dead Sea (Song i. 14), of Heshbon, Elealeh, and Sibmah beyond Jordan (Is. xvi. 8-10; Jer. xlviii. 32), and of Lebanon (Hos. xiv. 7). There was great difference in value between the choicest, noble vines and the degenerate plant of a strange vine (Is. v. 2; Jer. ii. 21). Israel is compared to a vine

Vintage in Ancient Egypt

(Ps. lxxx. 8-16), and our Lord to the stem of a vine, and his true followers to the branches (John xv. 1-8).

The vineyard was frequently on a hill-side or peak (Is. v. 1; Joel iii. 18), which was terraced when necessary. It was surrounded by a hedge or a stone wall to keep out destructive animals (Num. xxii. 24; Ps. lxxx. 8-13; Prov. xxiv. 31; Song ii. 15; Is. v. 5). The ground was cleared of stones, the vines were planted, a booth or tower was erected for the watchman, a press was constructed, and a vat was hewn in the rock (Is. i. 8; v. 1-7; Mat. xxi. 33-41). Laborers were sometimes hired to work in it (xx. 1-16), for it was necessary to prune the vines, dig about them, and keep the ground free from weeds (Lev. xxv. 3; Prov. xxiv. 30, 31; Is. v. 6; John xv. 2). The vines were allowed to spread on the ground, the stock not being supported, only the fruit-bearing branches being slightly raised from the earth (Is. xvi. 8; Ezek. xvii. 6; Pliny, Hist. Nat. xvii. 35, 15). Other vines were doubtless trained to trees; and yet others were probably planted, as at present in Palestine, in rows, 8 to 10 feet apart, the stock being allowed to grow 6 or 8 feet high and then fastened to stout stakes and the branches trained from stock to stock.

The grapes ordinarily grown were red (Is. lxiii. 2; Rev. xiv. 19, 20); but at the present day a white variety is almost exclusively raised at Bethlehem and Hebron. The grapes began to ripen about August, in favored localities somewhat earlier. They were eaten both fresh and dried (Num. vi. 3; Deut. xxiii. 24). The dried grapes or raisins were preserved in clusters or pressed into cakes, and were esteemed as food (1 Sam. xxv. 18; 1 Chron. xvi. 3). The juice of grapes was expressed, and was drunk fresh and fermented: see WINE.

The vintage began in the middle of September and continued into October. It was a season of festivity. In the vineyards there were singing and joyful noise, and the treaders in the press kept time by shouting as they trod the grapes (Judg. ix. 27; Is. xvi. 10; Jer. xxv. 30; xlviii. 33).

Vine of Sod'om.

A plant growing near Sodom, and bearing clusters of bitter fruit (Deut. xxxii. 32). But the language may be figurative. Josephus describes fruits growing near the site of Sodom, which bear a color as if they are fit to be eaten; but contain ashes, and if plucked with the hands, dissolve into smoke and ashes (War iv. 8, 4; cp. Tacitus, Hist. v. 6). This fruit does not correspond to the grapes of gall and bitter clusters which apparently characterize the vine of Sodom. It is often assumed, however, that the plants are one, and the effort is made to identify it. Excluding plants which are common elsewhere in Palestine, the principal claimants are: 1. What the Arabs call the 'ushdr, an asclepiadaceous plant (Calotropis gigantea or procera), a native of Upper Egypt, Arabia, and India. It grows at En-gedi and other parts of the tropical Dead Sea valley, is a tree 10 or 15 feet high, and bears a fruit resembling an apple or orange, three or four of them in a cluster. They are pleasant to the eye and to the touch; but if pressed or struck they explode like a puff ball, leaving only fragments of the rind and a few fibers in the hand. A formidable objection to the identification is the difficulty of seeing how the term vine can be applied to a small, erect tree. 2. The colocynth (Citrullus colocynthus), a trailing plant. Its fruit is "fair to look upon; but when fully ripe, merely a quantity of dusty powder with the seeds inside its beautiful orange rind" (Tristram); see GOURD, WILD.

Vin'e-gar.

Wine or other strong drink turned sour by acetous fermentation (Num. vi. 3). If vinous fermentation was pushed too far, or if the wine was kept too long, it became vinegar. Vinegar is acid, setting the teeth on edge (Prov. x. 26), and hardening soap or neutralizing its alkali (xxv. 20). In itself it is unfit to drink (Ps. lxi. 21); but mingled with a little oil it is drunk by the common people in the East to quench thirst when fresh water is not obtainable; and it was used at meals in the heat of harvest, bread being dipped in it, as it brought grateful refreshment to the system (Ruth ii. 14). The vinegar used by Boaz' reapers is, however, regarded by many interpreters as sour, not soured, wine. The Roman soldiers when in camp drank a thin, sour wine called acetum, vinegar, both in its pure state and diluted with water. In the latter condition it was termed posca (Pliny, Hist. Nat. xix. 29). It was probably a drink of this sort which the Roman soldier offered to Jesus on the cross to quench his burning thirst (Mark xv. 36; John xix. 29, 30). This draught, which Jesus accepted, was different from the sour wine, previously offered and refused, which was mingled with a bitter substance or more definitely with myrrh, which is astringent (Mat. xxvii. 34; Mark xv. 23).

1. The rendering of the Hebrew 'Eph'eh, blowing, hissing; a venomous serpent referred to as inhabiting the south country (Job xx. 16; Is. xxx. 6; lix. 5). The species is not properly determined.

2. A poisonous reptile, in Greek echidna, incidentally mentioned as found on the island of Melita (Acts xxviii. 3) and familiar to the Jews (Mat. iii. 7); probably the common viper (Vipera communis or Pelias berus), which is common on the Mediterranean coast.

Vi'sions.

No sharp line of demarcation is discernible between visions and dreams (q. v.) The one shades into the other. The Bible recognizes—1. Vain visions (Job xx. 8; Is. xxix. 7). 2. Visions of the prophets. These were for the most part private; they were apprehended by the individual, not by his companions. A natural cause sometimes co-operated in producing the vision: the vision of the great sheet let down from heaven, which Peter saw, and the voice heard saying "Rise, Peter; kill and eat," stood in some relation to his bodily hunger, as the account in the book of The Acts clearly intimates (x. 9 seq.). Thus far the visions of the prophets have points in common with visions begotten of an abnormal mental condition, and to this extent are to be classed as mental phenomena. These facts are only additional proofs of what might be expected, namely, that God, in holding communication with men, works in accordance with the laws of man's mind. The visions of the prophets, however, form a unique class. With perhaps one exception (Num. xxiv. 4), they were granted to holy men only, men who were surrendered to God's service, men between whom and their divine sovereign there "had arisen an understanding." These visions, again, were clearly distinguished, by those who saw them, from ordinary visions and were recognized as proceeding from God. They were cautiously accepted by the church;

by law they were not received as genuine until their teaching and their credentials had been subjected to tests (Jer. xxiii. 16, 21, 22, 27; cp. Is. viii. 20; Deut. xviii 10 seq.). The visions recorded in the Bible stand alone, in the history of religions, for purity and righteousness. They were never vain; never meaningless vagaries or lying wonders. They always have a clearly discernible moral and didactic content. They were often predictive, upon which fulfillment has set the seal of truth. They belong to an age of revelation and came to men who in manifold manner proved themselves to be vehicles of revelation.

Because there were genuine visions, false prophets feigned visions. These men are denounced and their destruction is foretold (Jer. xiv 14; xxiii. 16; Ezek. xiii. 7 seq.).

Voph'si.

Father of Nahbi, the Naphtalite spy (Num. xiii 14).

Vow.

A voluntary obligation to God, generally assumed on condition of his bestowing certain specified blessings. Man has shown a tendency during sickness or any other affliction, or in time of anxiety or earnest desire, to make a vow to God to be fulfilled when the calamity is over or the desired object obtained (Gen. xxviii. 20-22; Num xxi 2; 1 Sam. i 11; 2 Sam. xv. 8). The vow sprang primarily from the consciousness of entire dependence on the will of God and of the obligation of thankfulness. Vows were taken by persons of every nation (Jonah i 16), and not by the Jews only. The earliest mention of a vow in Scripture, and a typical case, is that of Jacob at Bethel, who promised that if God would care for him and bring him again to his father's house, the place where he was should be a sanctuary and the tenth of his income should be the Lord's (Gen. xxviii. 18-22).

The Mosaic law did not prescribe vows, it only regulated them. Three kinds were the subject of legislation. Vows of devotion, of abstinence, and of devotion to destruction. 1. By the vow of devotion, any person or possession, not already set apart for sacred uses, or otherwise removed from the legal control of the devoter, might be devoted and turned over to the sanctuary; but anything thus devoted to the service of God was redeemable, except a sacrificial animal (Lev. xxvii. 1-27), usually at one-fifth more than its assessed value. Devoted land sold by the owner, without having been first redeemed, was retained by the buyer, but at the year of jubile did not return to the seller, but became the possession of the sanctuary (20, 21). Persons devoted to God served at the sanctuary (1 Sam. i 11, 24, 28), but were usually redeemed (2 Kin xii. 4), especially as the service of the Levites rendered such devotion as a rule useless. The price of redemption varied with age and sex. 2. The vow of abstinence involved a renunciation of some enjoyment, otherwise allowable, for the glory of God. It included such acts as fasting, in testimony of penitence, and such obligation as was assumed by the Nazirite. 3. It has been inferred from Ex. xxii. 20; Deut. xiii. 16, that only what was under judgment for idolatry could be devoted by a vow of destruction. Nothing devoted by such a vow was redeemable (Lev. xxvii. 28, 29).

General principles applying to vows were: 1. Vows were assumed voluntarily, but once made were regarded as compulsory (Num xxx. 2; Deut. xxiii. 21-23); only in exceptional cases as in those of Samson, Samuel, and John the Baptist, who had a special mission to fulfill, was the Nazirite vow prescribed. 2. A vow, especially a vow of abstinence, made by an unmarried daughter or a wife, was void if disallowed by the father or husband (Num xxx 3-16). 3. The produce of sinful traffic could not be devoted (Deut xxiii. 18); see DOG. 4. Vows must not be taken rashly. This principle was enforced by the example of Jephthah, and inculcated by proverb (Prov. xx. 25).

Vul'gate. See VERSIONS.

Vul'ture.

A bird of prey, which has the head naked or but thinly covered with feathers, and feeds largely or wholly on carrion. It is employed in the A. V. to render the Hebrew words 'Ayyah (Job xxviii. 7, elsewhere kite; in R. V. always falcon), Da'ah (Lev. xi. 14; in R. V. kite), and Dagyah (Deut. xiv. 13; Is xxxiv 17, in R. V. kite). In the R. V. it is used to translate Raham (Lev xi 18, in A. V. gier eagle); and frequently on the margin, where the text has eagle, to render the Hebrew Nesher, Greek Aetos.

The great vulture (Lev. xi. 13, R. V. margin) is the fulvous or tawny vulture, generally called the griffin (Gyps fulvus). The neck and head are bald, covered with down. The whole of the body, the wings, and the back on to the tail are yellowish-brown. It is about 4 feet high. Its talons are not formidable, but its bill is "The griffin," says Tristram, "is the most striking ornithological feature of Palestine. It is impossible in any part of the country to look up without seeing some of them majestically soaring at an immense height, and their eyries abound in great colonies in all the ravines of the country."

W.

Wa'ges.

In early times and not infrequently at a comparatively late date wages were paid in kind (Gen. xxix. 15, 20; xxx. 28-34). In Egypt money or goods were given as hire at the time of the sojourn of the Israelites there (Ex. ii. 9). By the law of Moses, wages were to be paid each evening (Lev. xix. 13; Deut. xxiv. 14, 15), and the withholding of wages due was severely denounced by religious teachers (Jer. xxii. 13; Mal. iii. 5; Jas. v. 4). Tobit offered a drachma, or 16 cents, a day and food as wages (Tob. v. 14). When our Lord was on earth the rate for a day's labor was a denarius, worth about 17 cents (Mat. xx. 2, in E. V. penny). What the purchasing power of that amount was is, however, unknown; it was evidently great (cp. Luke x. 35). In the later days of the Roman republic, the usual pay of a Roman soldier was 10 asses, or about a dime, a day (Tacitus, Annal. i. 17).

War.

Before engaging in aggressive war, the Israelites consulted God's will in the matter (Judg. xx. 23, 27, 28; 1 Sam. xiv. 37; xxiii. 2; 1 Kin. xxii. 6) or, when conflict was unavoidable, invoked God's help by prayer and sometimes by sacrifice (1 Sam. vii. 8, 9; xiii. 12; 2 Chron. xx. 6-12; 1 Mac. iii. 47-54). The heathen had recourse to divination for the same purpose (Ezek. xxi. 21), and were careful to set forth on a day pronounced to be propitious. Frequently before entering a hostile country or engaging in battle spies were sent forward to obtain information regarding the country, and the preparation for resistance (Num. xiii. 17; Josh. ii. 1; Judg. vii. 10; 1 Sam. xxvi. 4); and, when captives were taken, they were questioned with the same intention (Judg. vii. 14; 1 Sam. xxx. 11). When the host drew nigh unto battle, a priest or the commander encouraged the people by reminding them of God's presence and help; and the officers exempted from service those who were faint-hearted and those who had built a new house but not inhabited it, planted a vineyard but not enjoyed the fruit of it, betrothed a wife but not married her (Deut. xx. 2-9; 2 Chron. xx. 14-20; 1 Mac. iii. 56; iv. 8-11). Various stratagems were practiced, such as surprise, ambush, pretended flight, circumvention (Gen. xiv. 15; Josh. viii. 2, 5; Judg. vi. 16; 2 Sam. v. 23). Occasionally when the opposing armies were drawn up in battle array, a champion was chosen by each party (1 Sam. xvii). Otherwise the battle was joined. A trumpet sounded the attack, the blast being both a signal to advance and an appeal to God (Num. x. 9; Josh. vi. 5; Judg. vii. 20; 2 Chron. xiii. 12; 1 Mac. iv. 13; v. 33). The host pressed forward with shouting (Josh. vi. 5; 1 Sam. xvii. 52; Jer. l. 42; Ezek. xxi. 22; Amos i. 14), and engaged in hand to hand conflict. The pursuit was bloody. Like other nations of their time, the Israelites when victorious pillaged the camp of the enemy, robbed the dead (Judg.

viii. 24-26; 1 Sam. xxxi. 9; 2 Chron. xx. 25; 1 Mac. iv. 17-23), and sometimes killed or mutilated the prisoners (Josh. viii. 23, 29; x. 22-27; Judg. i. 6; viii. 21; 2 Sam. viii. 2), but more frequently reduced them to slavery.

When a city was besieged, the besiegers fortified their own camp against attack (War v. 2, 3); if possible, they cut off the water supply from the city (Judith vii. 7). In order to bring their engines into play they cast up mounds in the direction of the city (2 Sam. xx. 15; Ezek. iv. 2). The mound gradually increased in height until it was sometimes half as high as the city wall. Upon this inclined plane the battering-ram was rolled into position; from its roof and from the mound, archers and slingers discharged their missiles, and from the summit of the mound scaling-ladders were leaned against the wall; see illustrations LACHISH, RAM. Sometimes fuel was laid against the gates and fired in order to burn them and afford ingress (Judg. ix. 52); and often the defenders of the wall were attacked by archers posted, not on the mound, but at the base of the wall. The besieged were not idle: they prepared for the investment by protecting their water supply, and repairing and strengthening the fortifications (2 Chron. xxxii. 3-5); they harassed the enemy and attempted to drive them off by sallies; they repelled attack and hindered the besiegers in their aggressive operations by casting darts and stones and shooting arrows at them from the walls; and they destroyed, or attempted to destroy, the military engines by hurling burning torches at them and by undermining the banks on which the battering-rams stood (2 Sam. xi. 21, 24; 2 Chron. xxvi. 15; 1 Mac. vi. 31; War v. 2, 2 and 4; 6, 4; 11, 4). Captured cities were often destroyed and their inhabitants slaughtered, neither age nor sex being spared (Josh. vi. 21, 24; viii. 24-29; x. 22-27; 2 Kin. xv. 16). Victory was celebrated with song and dance (Ex. xv. 1-18; Judg. v.; 1 Sam. xviii. 6; 2 Chron. xx. 26-28; 1 Mac. iv. 24). See ARMY.

Wa'ter of Bit'ter-ness.

Holy water in an earthen vessel, mingled with dust from the floor of the sanctuary (Num. v. 17), intended to reveal the innocence or guilt of a woman accused of adultery by her husband, when there were no witnesses. The charge was perhaps only brought when suspicion was aroused by the woman's being found with child. The accused woman, with loosened hair, sat before the Lord in the sanctuary, and held an offering of dry, unscented, barley meal in her hand (18, R V.). The priest, taking the water of bitterness, asked that it have no effect upon the woman, if she were innocent, but that God would cause her body to swell and her thigh to fall away, if she were guilty. The woman responded, Amen. The priest wrote the imprecation in a book, and washed it out into the water; and having waved the meal offering before the Lord and thrown a handful of it on the altar, he gave the water of bitterness to the woman to drink. If guilty, it became bitter within her and the curse went into effect; if innocent, the potion remained inoperative, and the woman was pronounced clean and received or retained ability to conceive. The essential part of this procedure was the oath, the ritual was symbolical, the effect was left to God. It is probable that this ordeal was an old custom, which the Mosaic law took up in order to regulate and elevate it.

Wave Of'fer-ing.

The rite of waving was regularly performed in connection with—1. Peace offerings: the right thigh or shoulder was heaved and the breast was waved before the Lord and, having been thus consecrated, were eaten by the priest. 2. The sheaf of first ripe grain on the second day of the passover, whereby the harvest was consecrated to the Lord (Lev. xxiii. 10, 11). 3. The two loaves made from the new grain and the two lambs for a peace offering at Pentecost, fifty days from the waving of the sheaf at the passover (15, 20). 4. The guilt offering of the leper (xiv. 12, 21), whereby the offerer represented by it was consecrated again to the service of God. 5. The meal offering of jealousy (Num. v. 25).

When the peace offering was private, the wave breast and the heave shoulder or thigh went to the priest, and the rest of the flesh was eaten by the offerer and his friends before the Lord at the sanctuary (Lev. vii. 30-34; x. 14, 15; Num. xvii. 18). Of the peace offering brought by the Nazirite, the sodden shoulder of the ram went to the priest, in addition to his regular perquisites (Num. vi. 17-20). At Pentecost, the whole of the two lambs of the peace offering and the loaves went to the priests (Lev. xxiii. 20), since they were offered in behalf of the nation.

In performing the rite the priest laid the matter to be waved upon the hands of the offerer, probably placed his own hands under the hands of the latter, and moved them (Ex. xxix. 24, 25; Num. vi. 19, 20). The motion was horizontal backward and forward (Talmud), and toward the right and left (Rabbis), that is, toward the four cardinal points; but this fourfold movement may have been a late refinement of the original waving.

Wea'sel.

The rendering of the Hebrew Holed, glider or burrower, applied to an unclean quadruped (Lev. xi. 29). It is confessedly either a weasel or a mole. The corresponding word in Arabic and Syriac signifies a mole: but probably the former meaning is intended by the Hebrew word, as the ancient versions, followed by the A. V. and R. V., render it by weasel; in the Talmud the hul'dah is often mentioned as an animal that captures birds and creeping things, like the mouse, can run with such prey in its mouth, and that can lap water out of a dish; and, finally, the typical mole genus Talpa is not believed to occur in Palestine (see MOLE 2), while the weasel (Putorius vulgaris) and the polecat (Putorius feticus) are found throughout the country.

Weav'ing.

The Egyptians practiced the art of weaving before the arrival of the Israelites in their midst, producing woven goods, such as linen (Gen. xli. 42). The work was usually done by men (Herod. ii. 35), but not exclusively, for women appear at the loom in ancient Egyptian delineations. At the time of the exodus the Hebrews understood both simple and elaborate weaving (Ex. xxxv. 35). They produced various textures on the looms. Coarse kinds, such as tent cloth and tough garments for the poor, were made of goats' and camels' hair (xxvi. 7, Mat. iii. 4); finer goods were woven of flax and wool (Lev. xiii. 47); chequered and figured patterns, as well as variegated stuffs, were made by the use of differently colored threads (Ex. xxvi. 1; cp. xxviii. 39, R. V.; cp. Herod. iii. 47), and gold threads were even woven in (Ex. xxxix. 3); cloth was also embroidered with figures or patterns (xxvii. 16; xxxviii. 23) with the needle (ibid. Septuagint); see EMBROIDERY. Many interpreters, however, believe that the Hebrew word rendered embroiderer denotes one who weaves designs, as the modern Arabic markum, from the same root, signifies the curtain with inwoven flowers or other patterns which is used to partition off apartments in a tent. Among the Hebrews, the weaving as well as the spinning was usually done by the women (2 Kin. xxiii. 7; cp. 1 Sam. ii. 19; Prov. xxxi. 22, 24; Acts ix. 39). Mantles and even tunics came from the loom ready for use; the latter, when thus woven complete, required no seam. Such tunics were prescribed for the priests (Ex. xxviii. 6, 8; Antiq. iii. 7, 4); and one was worn by Jesus previous to his crucifixion (John xix. 23), perhaps not without symbolical purpose.

The loom in Egypt was placed either vertically or horizontally. The accompanying illustration is intended to represent a loom in the latter position. The frame is but slightly raised above the ground, the weaver squats at his work and apparently treads on the threads. The warp threads run in parallel relation and extend between the two beams to which they are attached; heddles of primitive sort, which separate the warp threads into two series and form a shed for the passage of the shuttle or other bearer of the woof threads, are next to him, between him and the woven cloth. With a reed he strikes the last thread which he shot through against the woof, pressing it close.

The Hebrew loom likewise had its beam and shuttle (1 Sam. xvii 7; 2 Sam. xxi. 19; Job vii 6). The pin of the beam, or rather weaving pin, for a different Hebrew word is used from that elsewhere rendered beam, may have been the slay or reed by which the thread of the woof was struck home (Judg xvi. 13, 14). The web was cut off from the thrum (Is xxxviii. 12, R. V. margin), or to speak more generally from the loom (R. V. text).

Week.

The division of time into periods of seven days appears in Scripture in connection with the institution of the Sabbath (Gen. ii 1-3), and according to both the Hebrew and Babylonian account was in vogue at the time of the flood (vii. 4, 10; viii 10, 12); see FLOOD. In the Babylonian legend of Adapa, which was current fifteen centuries and more before Christ, it is mentioned that the wind ceased to blow for seven days. There is reason to believe that the reference to its cessation for seven days is more than the mere note of a chance fact. Izdubar's sleep lasted six days and seven nights; and this peculiar phrase was the familiar designation for a week. Gudea, prince of Lagash, celebrated the completion of a temple by a festival of seven days' duration. Seven days was the conventional period for marriage festivities in Syria at the time of Laban and Jacob (Gen. xxix 27, 28); and the same custom prevailed among the Philistines in the days of Samson (Judg xiv. 12, 17). Funeral obsequies also, like those of Jacob and others, were conducted for seven days (Gen. l. 10; 1 Sam. xxxi. 13). Weeks constantly entered into all the arrangements of the ceremonial law (Ex. xii. 15; xiii 6, 7; xxii. 30; xxix. 30, 35, 37; Lev. xii. 2; xiii. 5; xiv. 8, etc.). A week with a fixed beginning, which everybody reckoned as the first day, is, of course, not intended in all or even in the majority of these cases. The week of nuptial festivities, for example, began on the day of the wedding on whatever date it occurred. Nevertheless these numerous instances show that the seven-day period was a standard in common use; and it is worthy of notice that the periods are consecutive in the narrative of the flood (see FLOOD), as well as later, in determining the date of Pentecost. For the origin of the week, see SABBATH.

The ancient Hebrews named none of the days of the week except the seventh day, which they called the Sabbath. They numbered the days of the festivals, and the Babylonian narrator enumerates each of the seven days during which the ark lay stranded. In the N T period the Hebrews numbered the days of the week (Mat. xxviii. 1; Acts xx. 7), and besides the seventh day named also the preceding day, which they called the preparation (Mark xv. 42).

The week and the names of its days were introduced at a comparatively late period into the Roman empire. The ancient Romans had a week of eight days. The Greeks divided the month into three periods. The Egyptians, as early as the time when the pyramids were built, had a ten-day period, each one of which began with the rising of one of thirty-six constellations in succession. Dio Cassius, who wrote in the second century A D, speaks of the hebdomadal division of time being universal in his day in the Roman empire and a recent introduction. He represents it as borrowed from the Egyptians, and as based upon astrology. Of the two schemes, by one or the other of which he considers that the planetary names of the different days were fixed, only one has plausibility: each day in succession was assigned to one of the planets as regent, and the hours were also allotted to the planets. If the planets are arranged in the order of their distance from the earth, as believed at the time of Dio Cassius, Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, Sun, Venus, Mercury, Moon, and if, further, the first hour is allotted to Saturn, the second to Jupiter, and so on, the twenty-fifth hour, or the first hour of the morrow, will fall to the sun and on the following morning to the moon, and so on to Mars, Mercury, Jupiter, and Venus. If the planet to which the first hour of the day belongs be reckoned as the regent of the day, the days of the week will be, Saturn's day, Sun's day, Moon's day, and so on. This theory must be held with cautious reserve. There may be an entirely different reason from that given for the order of the planets, although the effort to explain satisfactorily the names from Babylonian astronomy has not been successful as yet. The names passed from Roman to European use, both in their Latin form, and also, when translated into the Germanic languages, with the names of Germanic deities substituted for the corresponding Roman ones. They are found also in India, which is believed to have received them with astronomy and astrology from Greece and Rome. The names are of heathen origin, and originated in superstition, but no associations of any kind are now connected with them any more than with January, the month of Janus, god of the sun and the year, or with March, month of Mars, god of war, or with June, which was sacred to the goddess Juno.

The Hebrew word for week, shabua', hebdomad, might of itself refer to a period of seven years as well as to one of seven days. The existence of the Sabbath year would tend to produce this usage. It is therefore not surprising to find the Hebrew word for week used by Daniel for a period of seven years, as interpreters commonly understand (Dan. ix. 24-27; cp. Lev. xxv. 8).

Weeks, Feast of.

The second of the three annual festivals at which every male Israelite was required to appear before the Lord at the sanctuary, and the first of the two agricultural festivals (Ex. xxxiv. 22, 23; 2 Chron viii. 12, 13; cp. 1 Kin. ix. 25). It was so called because its date was set seven complete weeks after the consecration of the harvest season by the offering of the sheaf of the first ripe barley (Lev. xxiii. 15, 16; cp. Deut. xvi. 9, 10). This sheaf was waved on the morrow after the Sabbath (Lev. xxiii. 11). The Baitheuseans (Sadducees) interpreted this Sabbath as meaning the weekly Sabbath which occurred during the festival of unleavened bread; and some modern scholars have adopted this view. The opinion has even been held that it denoted merely the weekly Sabbath which fell immediately before the harvest. The older and better opinion is that it denotes the first day of the festival of unleavened bread. The Greek translators understood it so (Lev. xxiii. 7, 11, Septuagint), as did also those who directed the services of the second temple (Antiq. iii. 10, 5); this first day was kept as a Sabbath, no work was done on it and there was a holy convocation; and such rest days, not less than the seventh day of the week, were called Sabbath (Lev. xxiii. 32; xxv. 2); on the morrow after the passover the new grain was used, which could not be eaten until the sheaf had been waved before the Lord (Lev. xxiii. 14; Josh. v. 10, 11, R. V. margin). The festival fell on the fiftieth day after the waving of the sheaf, which gave rise to the name Pentecost or fiftieth day (Acts ii. 1). It was also called the feast of harvest or day of firstfruits, because the firstfruits of the wheat harvest, then ended in most districts, were presented (Ex. xxiii. 16; xxxiv. 22; Num. xxviii. 26). It celebrated the close of the grain harvest. It was bound up with the cycle of religious feasts by the number seven. It was observed as a Sabbath, ordinary labors were suspended and there was a holy convocation (Lev. xxiii. 21; Num. xxviii. 26); two loaves of leavened bread, such as was used in the household, representing the firstfruits of the grain harvest, were offered to the Lord (Lev. xxiii. 17, 20; cp. Ex. xxiv. 22; Num. xxviii. 26; Deut. xvi. 10); and with them ten proper animals were sacrificed for a burnt offering, a kid for a sin offering, and two lambs for a peace offering (Lev. xxiii. 18, 19). The sacrifices for the entire day were distributed into—1. The regular daily burnt offering of two lambs (Num. xxviii. 3, 31). 2. The special sacrifices for the feast day (27-30), which were the same as on the day of the new moon and each day of unleavened bread (ver. 11, 19). 3. The sacrifices connected with the offering of the loaves and the two lambs (Lev. xxiii. 17-19). Josephus correctly sums up the offerings additional to the daily burnt offering, except that he or his text as transmitted mentions two instead of three rams (Antiq. iii. 10, 6). As at the culminating agricultural festival, so at this the people were urged to remember the needy (Deut. xvi. 11, 12). Pentecost came to be regarded in later times, especially in the early Christian centuries, as the commemoration of the giving of the law on mount Sinai; but there is no authority for this belief in the O. T., and it cannot be shown that the law was given exactly fifty days after the passover.

The most notable Pentecost was the first which occurred after the resurrection and ascension of Christ (Acts ii.). From it dates the founding of the Christian church. The essential traits of an institution are seen in the history of its establishment. At the institution of the church, the Holy Spirit descended into all believers, without distinction of age, sex, or class (1-4, 14-21); see TONGUE. Life had been imparted. The Spirit had been given to men before, but now the church entered upon what is characteristically the dispensation of the Spirit. The Spirit is now given in full measure to all believers without the intervention of prescribed rites. He had preserved a people of God on earth; in this new era of his power he devotes his divine energy to enlarging, perfecting, and edifying the church.

Weights.

The Hebrews used scales and weights (Lev. xix. 36), and they weighed money as well as other commodities (Jer. xxxii. 10). The denominations were talent (circle), maneh (part), shekel (weight), gerah (grain), and beka (half [shekel]).

20 gerahs = 1 shekel
60 shekels = 1 maneh
60 manehs = 1 talent.

It is important to observe that the table for gold and silver is different from the table for commodities, and is—

20 gerahs = 1 shekel
50 shekels = 1 maneh
60 manehs = 1 talent.

Pound is the rendering of 1. Hebrew Maneh (1 Kin. x. 17); 2. Greek Mna (1 Mac xiv.

Bronze and Stone Weights in the form of Lions and Ducks. They were used by Tradespeople in Nineveh.

24; xv. 18), which is generally believed to be reckoned on the basis of the Attic talent,

Hebrew maneh of gold. Pound as a sum of money was equivalent to 100 drachmas and worth about sixteen dollars (Luke xix. 13, R. V. margin); see MONEY.

In weight a shekel equaled 20 gerahs, and a maneh was $20 + 25 + 15 = 60$ shekels (Ezek. xiv. 12). This interpretation is confirmed by the Assyrian and Babylonian division of their maneh into sixty parts. Weights of the denomination of maneh have been discovered in Nineveh and Babylonia, and show that a heavy and a light talent were used, the former weighing 60.6 kilogrammes and the latter exactly one-half or 30.3 kilogrammes. The heavy and light manehs weighed 1010 and 505 grammes respectively, and the shekels 16.83 and 8.41 grammes. According to Josephus, the Hebrew maneh of gold equaled two and a half Roman pounds (Antiq. xiv. 7, 1) or 818.57, according to Madden, 819.538 grammes. It appears from this that the Jewish maneh of gold was reckoned at 50 shekels, that the shekel of gold was a trifle lighter than the Assyrian shekel of weight, being 16.37, according to Madden 16.39, grammes, and that the shekel of gold and the shekel of weight were intended to be identical. The difference between this Hebrew shekel and the Assyrian shekel was about seven troy grains. A comparison of 1 Kin. x. 17 (R. V. margin maneh) with 2 Chron. ix. 16, if the text is pure, probably indicates that a maneh of gold was sometimes reckoned at one hundred light shekels, instead of at fifty normal shekels.

Three thousand shekels of silver equaled one talent. This appears from the fact that 603,550 half shekels or 301,775 shekels of the sanctuary equaled 100 talents and 1775 shekels (Ex. xxxviii 25, 26). It may justly be concluded that the talent of silver was reckoned at sixty manehs of fifty shekels each. The shekel equaled twenty gerahs (Ex. xxx. 13). The shekel of silver, however, was and hence a little more than half as heavy as the Hebrew maneh; and 3. Litra (John xii. 3; xix. 39), equivalent to the Roman libra, of which two and a half equaled a lighter than the shekel of gold and weight, the average weight of the extant silver shekel coins being only 14.5566, according to Madden 14.5668, grammes.

Well.

A pit sunk in the earth to reach a supply of water. It was called in Hebrew b'er, a word often used in compound names like Beer-sheba. The water reached was found collected in a depression, or slowly percolating through the sand on its way to a lower level, or flowing as an underground stream (Gen xvi. 7 with 14; xxiv 11 with 13). Wells were often scooped in the sandy soil by those who knew of the presence of water. They were dug in the wadies and fed by an underflow, even when the bed of the torrent was dry, as at Beer-sheba and in the valley of Gerar (xxi 30, 31; xxiv. 19). They were sunk far and wide through the surface soil of the Philistine plain into the lower sand, where an inexhaustible stream makes its way to the sea. In hilly Palestine they were dug in the limestone rock. The well did not essentially differ in outward appearance from a cistern. The mouth was protected by a stone curb (John iv. 6), and to prevent accidents to man or beast was covered by a stone or plank (Ex. xxi 33; 2 Sam. xvii. 19; Antiq. iv. 8, 37). When the well was shallow, steps were cut in the rock which led down to the water. Troughs of wood or stone were placed near the mouth for the benefit of the cattle (Gen. xxiv. 30). The water was dipped with the pitcher (16), or, when the well was deep, was drawn by a rope with bucket, jar, or waterskin attached (John iv. 11). The rope was either dragged over the curb by the person getting the water, or perhaps an ox or ass was sometimes employed, as now, for the purpose, and occasionally a wheel was, as now, fixed over the well to assist in the work.

The shaduf is common in Egypt for raising water from the Nile, and it was used there in antiquity. It is not employed in Palestine, but its counterpart, the well sweep and bucket, is used. In the Philistine plain, the Persian wheel, called na'ura, is employed by the hundred. It consists of a tall upright axle, bearing a horizontal cogwheel, and turned by a mule attached to a sweep; this turns a vertical wheel which is directly over the mouth of the well. Over this pass two thick ropes, made of twigs twisted together and carrying jars or wooden buckets. The ascending buckets come up full of water, which they empty into a spout as they pass over the wheel; this spout conducts the water to a reservoir. See CISTERN, FOUNTAIN.

Whale.

The word rendered whale in the A. V. of the O. T. denotes any great animal of the sea, except in Ezek. xxxii. 2, where the Hebrew text must be emended and translated dragon (R. V.); see DRAGON.

The Greek word kētos, which is used in Mat. xii 40 and rendered whale in the E. V., means any huge fish or other large animal of the sea, such as the dolphin, sea dog, and seal, and later whale, shark, tunny. The Septuagint employs kētos megalos in Jon i. 17 (in Septuagint ii. 1) to render the two words "great fish" of the Hebrew text, and thus the word kētos passed into Mat. xii. 40.

Wheat.

Wheat was cultivated in Babylonia (Herod. i. 193), in Mesopotamia (Gen. xxx. 14), in Egypt (Ex. ix. 32), in Palestine (xxxiv. 22; Deut. viii. 8; Judg. vi. 11), and elsewhere, from a very early period.

In Palestine wheat was sown in November or December, after the rains began. It was thought that the best manner of planting it was in rows (Is. xxviii. 25, R. V.). The harvest was in April, May, or June in Palestine, varying according to the locality, the soil at the place, and the weather at the time; see YEAR.

The ordinary bread of the Hebrews was made of the flour of wheat (Ex. xxix. 2). The ears were also roasted and eaten (Lev. ii. 14; Ruth ii. 14); see PARCHED CORN. The wheat, bruised and crushed, was also used as food (Lev. ii. 14, 16). New wheat thus prepared, or else the fresh ear, is mentioned as eaten (xxiii. 14; 2 Kin. iv. 42).

Egypt was the granary of the Mediterranean region, and vast quantities were shipped annually to Rome from Alexandria (Acts xxvii. 6, 38). The best quality, according to Pliny, was grown in Upper Egypt, in the Thebaid (Hist. Nat. xviii. 47). The Egyptian wheat was a bearded variety, with many ears on the head (Triticum compositum). It is mentioned in Gen. xli. 22, is depicted on the ancient monuments, and is still grown. The wheat commonly cultivated in Palestine is Triticum vulgare, with a simple head.

Egyptian Wheat.

Widow.

A widow from early times wore an appropriate garb (Gen. xxxviii. 14, 19); she laid aside her ornaments, clothed herself in sackcloth, let her hair hang unbound, and did not anoint her face (Judith x. 3, 4; xvi. 8). God shows special compassion to the more helpless classes, among whom he reckons widows (Deut. x. 18; Ps. lxxviii. 5; cxlvi. 9; Prov. xv. 25; Jer. xlix. 11). Under the Mosaic law, and subsequently, the Hebrews were enjoined to treat widows with justice and consideration, threatening judgment on those who did differently (Ex. xxii. 22; Deut. xiv. 29; xvi. 11, 14; xxiv. 17-21; xxvi. 12, 13; Is. i. 17; Jer. vii. 6; xxii. 3; Zech. vii. 10; Mal. iii. 5), as our Lord also did in his preaching (Mark xii. 40). The apostolic church looked after poor widows (Acts vi. 1; Jas. i. 27). In the churches under Timothy's care certain widows, who were widows indeed, and had neither children nor grandchildren to provide for them (1 Tim. v. 4), were enrolled and cared for by the church (16). To obtain enrollment it was required that they be at least sixty years of age, have been married but once, and be well reported of for good works (9, 10). Here are the beginnings of an institution. From the end of the second century to the fourth they are mentioned by ecclesiastical writers as elder widows or the order of widows. Their duty was to serve the church, and they had oversight over the women of the congregation, especially over widows and orphans. The office was abolished by the synod of Laodicea, A. D. 364.

1. Boundaries and Extent of the Wilderness. Nature has defined a large inverted triangle, having for its base the southeastern shore of the Mediterranean Sea and the southern boundary of Palestine, for its western side the depression in which the gulf of Suez and the Bitter Lakes lie, and for its eastern side the depression occupied by the gulf of Akaba and the gorge of the Arabah. The base of this triangle measures 200 miles, and its area about 22,000 square miles. This district may be called the wilderness of the wandering; but this designation in Arabic, Badiet et-Tih, is restricted to the table-land north of Sinai. The region is barren, little desired by man; and the great nations of antiquity accordingly left it virtually to itself. The Israelites pushed their southern boundary but a short distance into its limits, and the Egyptians fortified a frontier for themselves where its sands began.

2 Physical Features of the Wilderness. The chief features of the territory are four: a region of sand, or the northern and north-western coast; a region of limestone, or the table-land; a region of sandstone, or the low mountains; and a region of granite, or the high mountains. (1) The region of sand extends in a broad band from Philistia along the shore of the Mediterranean Sea to the boundary of Egypt and beyond, bending to the south and continuing in a strip about 10 miles wide past Suez to a point one-third of the way down the coast. This sandy region is more or less coextensive with the wilderness of Shur (Saadia, quoted by Delitzsch, Gen. xvi. 7). (2) The northern and central portion of the triangle is a sterile table-land of limestone, from 2000 to 2500 feet high; sloping down on the north to the sandy region on the Mediterranean; swelling in the northeast into a mountainous country; and confined on the other sides by an encircling chain of mountains, 4000 and more feet high, now called Jebel et-Tih. The middle of this desert is occupied by a long central basin, which is drained into the Mediterranean by the wady el-'Arish and its tributaries. These water courses are dry most of the year, but filled by the rains with raging torrents. West of this basin, other wadies run by themselves down to the sea. On the east of the same central basin, between it and the Arabah, is another similar and parallel one, extending from Jebel et-Tih nearly to Jebel 'Arâif and the mountainous country of the northeast, and drained throughout by the wady el-Jerâfeh. The table-land proper, with its continuation in the adjacent clusters of mountains in the northeast as far as the cleft of the wady el-Fikreh, was the wilderness of Paran (Num. x. 11, 12; xiii 26; 1 Sam. xxv. 1, 2), in which the Israelites wandered for 38 years, and of which the portion lying between Horeb and Kadesh was remembered by them as "the great and terrible wilderness" (Deut. i. 19). This plateau is mostly naked of vegetation, and has a gravelly surface. The wadies, however, seldom fail to show vegetation of some sort, and after the rainy season are covered with a thin herbage. The springs are few, and generally send forth impure water; but in the region about Kadesh and along the border of the Arabah there is a considerable number of living fountains, and near Kadesh and even at other places in the very heart of the desert water is obtainable by digging. (3) The sandstone formation crosses the peninsula in a broad belt immediately south of Jebel et-Tih and extends nearly from shore to shore, separating the limestone table-land from the granite mountains. It is rich in mineral wealth. It may be compared to a dumb-bell in shape; for it consists of two groups of mountains connected by a central plateau. This sandy table-land has an altitude of about 1500 feet. (4) The region of granite consists of the groups of mountain ranges about mount Sinai. The watershed runs north and south, and lies just east of wady esh-Sheikh.

3. Possibility of a Sojourn of Forty Years in the Wilderness. The Israelites numbered 600,000 men from 20 years old and upward, according to the repeated testimony of the Hebrew records. According to statistics of population, which yield the proportion of four to five between those under and those above 20 years of age in a given community, the whole body of fugitives from Egypt numbered 2,100,000. The Bible, as well as exploration, teaches that this great host could not have survived for any great length of time in the wilderness save by the providence and miracles of God. Moses reminded the people that in the wilderness they had seen how that the Lord their God did bear them, as a man doth bear his son, in all the way that they went (Deut. i. 31). The recorded miracles of sustenance are few. In the wilderness of Sin, at the beginning of their journey, to the children of Israel manna was given, of which they continued to eat for forty years, until they came into the borders of Canaan (Ex. xvi. 1, 4, 14, 15, 35). This was the permanent provision for their needs. The occasional supplies were the quails, given at the same time as the manna, but apparently only as a sign and temporarily, for they are not again mentioned (xvi. 12, 13); the water provided shortly afterwards from the rock near Rephidim (xvii. 3-7); the quails given in the second year for a month (Num. x. 11; xi. 4-6, 31); and the water caused to gush from the rock at Kadesh toward the end of the forty years' sojourn (xx. 2-11). The Bible teaches further that, notwithstanding these miracles, certain periods of the sojourn remained a horrible memory (Deut. i. 19; viii. 15); that though it could be said "Thou hast lacked nothing" (ii. 7), yet the life in the wilderness was one of repeated privation and hardship. The water was insufficient at Rephidim and Kadesh (Ex. xvii. 1; Num. xx. 2); the people were murmuring three days after leaving Sinai before reaching Hazeroth (x. 33; xi. 1, 35) and as they journeyed from mount Hor toward the Red Sea (xxi. 4, 5); and the wilderness was found to be terrible (Deut. viii. 15).

It appears from the biblical narrative that the manna sufficed as staple fare, though the people grew weary of it; and that the water supply, though scanty often to distress, was ordinarily sufficient. Food was furnished continuously. In regard to the supply of water in this region of desolation, there are two considerations of importance: (1) The ability of the people to alleviate the distress of the desert journey arising from the scarcity of water. The power of man and beast to endure thirst is great in these dry countries. The camel drivers of Egypt, both men and boys, escort travelers across scorching sands and under a burning sun without tasting a drop of water from early morning until after nightfall, because unable to obtain it. Dr. Robinson relates that his Arab guide spent a fortnight on the Sinaitic peninsula near mount Serbâl pasturing his camels, without a drop of water for himself or them. He drank the milk of the camels; and they, as well as sheep and goats, when they have fresh pasture, need no water, sometimes going three or four months without it (Researches i. 150). Again, like other travelers in the desert, the Israelites undoubtedly carried a supply of water with them, which they replenished at every opportunity. It is evident from the narrative that at the beginning of their journey they provided water sufficient for a march of at least three days into the wilderness (Ex. xv. 22). Again, the Israelites discovered hidden natural supplies. Frequently when the bed of the wady or the surface of the plain is dry, a stream flows or water lies in a basin underground. According to the geologist Fraas, the so-called wells of Moses, which bubble up in the desert a short distance from Suez, are fed by a subterranean stream which flows from the mountains of er-Rahab, 10 or 14 miles away (Baedeker, Lower Egypt, 421). In the wady Ghurundel, which is commonly identified with Elim, there is a subterranean stream which the Arabs open when the upper water course is dry. Though the rains fail for two or three years, water is always to be found by digging a little below the surface (Robinson, Researches i. 69). Back of Tur, at Mabuk, at Kubah, and elsewhere, water collects beneath the surface and may be reached with slight effort (Ritter, Erdkunde xiv. 161, 185; Robinson, Researches i. 167). The Hebrews understood this fact and took advantage of it during their sojourn in the wilderness, as the song of the well testifies (Num. xxi. 17, 18). Again, if the manner of travel was like the migrations of other large bodies of people, the Israelites scattered in order to utilize for man and beast all the soil and herbage and water. Again, the Israelites husbanded the resources of water. The rainfall is considerable; the wadies bear evidence of the torrents which at times sweep down their courses. The early Christian monks who dwell in the mountains of Sinai and the former inhabitants and cultivators of the district about Kadesh built dams across the ravines and dug cisterns, and thus secured water for themselves, their cattle, and their gardens. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, the forefathers of these Israelites of the exodus, had likewise husbanded the rainfall, and the descendants of these Israelites dug trenches in the valleys and built reservoirs for a like purpose; and doubtless so did the Israelites during their sojourn of 30 and 8 years in the wilderness. (2) A second important consideration is the evidence that the country was better wooded in former times. Charcoal has been made in the peninsula from the acacia tree for ages, but the improvident Arabs have never been wont to replace the destroyed timber by replanting. Bartlett in 1874 mentions seeing stumps where the Arabs had burned down the trees, and acacias with the boughs lopped off for the camels to eat (From Egypt to Palestine, pp. 225, 300, 301). Burckhardt, one of the earliest travelers to explore Sinai, in his journey across the country in 1812 came across charcoal burners (Erdkunde xiv. 183); and Ruppell in 1822 mentioned the burning of charcoal for sale in Egypt as an immemorial industry of the Bedouin, and ascribed the nakedness of the valleys to the neglect of the Arabs to replant the ground which they had denuded (Erdkunde xiv. 274, 342). A tribute in charcoal has also been imposed on the Arabs of Sinai by Egypt since 1823. But charcoal burning for domestic purposes and export has not been the only means whereby the peninsula has been impoverished of wood; mining and smelting have also caused the destruction of great quantities of timber. The ancient Egyptians worked copper mines in the sandstone mountains of the west intermittently from a very early period, and were still operating them subsequently to the exodus. Acacia wood was sometimes used as supports for the roofs of the mines (Palmer, Desert of the Exodus i. 203), and the smelting operations, which were of magnitude, demanded large quantities of timber for fuel (ibid 26, 43, 231-235; Erdkunde xiv. 786, 787). One should recall the disappearance of the cedars of Lebanon and of wide stretches of forest in America. It is clear that, beginning long before the exodus and continuing down to the present day, causes have been at work reducing the timber in the region traversed by the Israelites. This fact has a direct bearing on the question of the water supply in earlier times; for the country being better wooded, there was a natural preservation of the rainfall. As always where there is vegetation, the rain fell more regularly; the water was admitted to the wadies more slowly and gently; soil and vegetation were less ruthlessly swept away; springs were more numerous and flowed more copiously; and streams endured longer into the dry season and were more frequently perennial.

Under an energetic, competent, and provident leader who was acquainted with the desert and its resources, by husbanding the supply, by extending the bounds of the encampment, and by scattering from the central camp in groups of various size, and with no failure of the annual rains, it is not to be doubted that a large host could have secured a sufficient though scant supply of water for man and beast.

4. The Route of the Israelites through the Wilderness Certain sites have been identified Succoth in Egypt at the beginning of the journey, the river Arnon which was reached at the close of the forty years, when the wilderness was left, and the encampments beyond the Arnon which are mentioned in the itinerary, Kadesh, with which there is reason to believe Rithmah was practically equivalent, where the camp was twice pitched, and whence the Israelites expected to march directly into the promised land, and Ezion-geber, where the camp was located just before the second march to Kadesh, and near which they afterwards passed on their way to the Arnon Mount Sinai is almost universally located in the peninsula, which is accordingly called the peninsula of Sinai The camp at Moserah was hard by mount Hor, on the border of Edom; and the wells of Bene-jaakan and Hor-haggidgad were also near the boundary of Edom Punon was east of Edom and northeast of Petra With a knowledge of the location of these places, one may readily trace the general route See maps, ABRAHAM, EGYPT

An itinerary covering the journey from Rameses and Succoth to the camp opposite Jericho was drawn up by Moses (Num. xxxiii.). The encampments recorded in it after Sinai represent the movements of the tabernacle. The people were, however, doubtless often dispersed through the wilderness, tending their flocks wherever herbage and water were found. When they were collected and encamping in a body, their camp was very large and, in a settled country, covered the distance between several towns; hence the same encampment may be differently described or designated (49 with xxv. 1). Besides the itinerary there is the narrative of the journey (Ex. xii.-Num. xxv.), and there are also scattered allusions in the address of Moses to various incidents that occurred on the way. It is important to remember that each of these three recitals was prepared for a special purpose of its own. The itinerary records formal encampments, and does not mention every halting place and every place of spending the night (Ex. xv. 22; Num. x. 33). It is doubtful whether it omits a single encampment where the tabernacle was set up The narrative is apt to mention an encampment or even a stopping place where an important event occurred, and to pass over the others. In the address events are cited as illustrations or to enforce the argument; and of course they are chosen at random, without reference to chronological sequence, and they are frequently alluded to broadly and by comprehensive statement.

Willow, Willow Tree.

1 Any tree of the genus Salix. It was called saphsaphah in Hebrew (Ezek. xvii. 5), safsaf in Arabic. Several species are common in Palestine.

2. The rendering of the Hebrew "arabah. The Israelites were directed to take branches from it, as well as from other trees, to make booths at the feast of tabernacles (Lev. xxiii. 40). It grew beside brooks or water courses (ibid.; Is. xlv. 4), and afforded cover even to the bulky behemoth (Job xl. 22). It was the tree on which the Hebrews hung their harps when exiles at Babylon (Ps. cxxxvii. 2). The Septuagint and Vulgate render the Hebrew word by willow, and they are followed by the English version. It may have been the weeping willow (Salix babylonica), which is found abundantly on the Euphrates, and is cultivated in Palestine. But leading interpreters, following Wetzstein, understand the Arabic gharab, and consequently its etymological equivalent, the Hebrew "rabab," to denote the Euphratean poplar (Populus euphratica)

Willows, Brook of the.

A willow-fringed brook in Moab (Is. xv 7), probably wady el-'Ahsy, the upper course of wady Kurahi, the boundary between Moab and Edom. It may be identical with the brook of the Arabah (Amos vi. 14, R V.)

Wim'ple.

An article of woman's attire, made of silk or linen, and worn as a covering for the neck, chin, and sides of the face. In A. V. of Is. iii. 22, it is the rendering of the Hebrew Mitp'hath, a shawl or mantle (ibid.; Ruth iii. 15, both R V.).

Wind.

The Hebrews, who did not define direction with the minuteness customary in modern times, recognized four winds: the east, the west, the north, and the south winds (Jer xlix 36; Ezek xxxvii. 9; Rev. vii. 1). God created the wind (Amos iv. 13); and it stands at his summons, is under his control, and performs his pleasure (Job xxviii 25, Ps lxxviii 26; cvii 25; cxxxv 7; cxlviii 8, Mat viii 26). The wind that blew from the west, southwest, and northwest brought rain to Palestine, and accompanied the storm (1 Kin xviii 43-45; Ps cxlvii 18; Prov. xxv. 23, R. V.; Ezek xlii 13). Wind was often destructive to houses and shipping (Job i. 19; Ps. xlviii 7; Mat vii 27). The scorching wind dried up streams, and blasted vegetation (Gen. xli 6; Is. xi. 15; Ezek xix. 12; Jon. iv 8); see EAST WIND. The south and southeast winds traversed the Arabian desert, and were dry and hot (Job xxxvii 17; Luke xii. 55). The north wind was cooler (Ecclus xliii. 20), and was favorable to vegetation (Song iv. 16). Wind was taken advantage of by the threshers to blow away the chaff and broken straw (Job xxi. 18; Ps i. 4); see THRESHING. The mariner also availed himself of the wind (Acts xxvii. 40). The words which are rendered whirlwind in the E. V. do not denote a rotary wind specifically, but signify a violent storm of any kind.

Win'dow.

An aperture especially in the wall of a building (Gen. xxvi. 8; 1 Kin. vi 4; Jer. xxii. 14), which was opened and closed at convenience by means of a movable shutter of some sort (Gen. viii. 6; 2 Kin. xiii. 17; Dan. vi. 10), generally a lattice (Judg. v. 28; 2 Kin. i. 2; Prov. vii. 6; Song ii 9); but a window on the ground floor, that looked into the street, was doubtless in ancient as in modern times small, high up in the wall, and strongly barred. In the better class of houses most of the windows faced the court. Houses that abutted on the town wall usually had windows looking toward the country (Josh. ii. 15; 2 Cor. xi. 33).

Wine.

Wine was made from grapes. The ripe clusters were gathered in baskets (Jer. vi. 9), carried to the press, and thrown into it. The press consisted of a shallow vat, built above ground or excavated in the rock (Is. v. 2) and, through holes in the bottom, communicating with a lower vat also frequently excavated in the rock (Joel iii. 13). An upper vat measuring 8 feet square and 15 inches deep had at times a lower vat 4 feet square and 3 feet deep. The grapes were crushed by treading (Neh. xiii. 15; Job xxiv. 11), one or more men being employed according to the size of the vat. In Egypt, and probably in Palestine, the treaders held to ropes overhead to keep from falling, they sang at their work and shouted, doubtless to keep time (Is. xvi 10; Jer. xxv. 30; xlviii 33); and the red blood of the grapes flowed around them and stained their skin and their garments (Is. lxiii 1-3). From the upper vat the juice trickled into the lower. From this receptacle the juice was put in bottles of skin (Job xxxii 19; Mat ix. 17), or in large earthenware jars, where it was allowed to ferment. When fermentation had proceeded far enough the wine was drawn off into other vessels (Jer. xlviii. 11, 12).

Treading the Wine Press in Ancient Egypt

The juice of the grape when expressed was used in various conditions: as must, fresh from the press; as wine, which was produced by vinous fermentation; and as vinegar, which resulted when the fermentation was continued too long. Probably in ancient times, as at the present day, some of the must was reduced to a syrup or honey by boiling; see HONEY. As vinegar it was called homes, in Greek, oxos; see VINEGAR. Various names were applied to it in the other states:

The Hebrew tiros'h, that which takes possession of, intoxicates: or better, possession, product of labor. The R. V. sometimes renders this word by vintage (Num. xviii. 12; Neh. x. 37, margin); and the attempt has been made by some interpreters to limit the meaning to this sense, and to deny that it ever signifies new wine or must. It means juice of the grape or must in Joel ii. 24: "The floors shall be full of wheat, and the fats shall overflow with wine and oil;" cp. iii. 13. "Put ye in the sickle, for the harvest is ripe: come, tread ye; for the wine press in full [of grapes], the fats [both of them] overflow." It also means juice of the grape or new wine, as it is rendered in the E. V., in Hos. iv. 11: "Whoredom and wine and new wine take away the understanding;" for the exegesis is forced and invalid which interprets this verse as meaning that whoredom proceeds from the abuse of wine, and wine is connected with the abuse, that is, the fermentation, of tirosk or must. The passage affirms that all three take away the understanding. There is no need to depart from this meaning of tirosk anywhere, and render it vintage; for example: 1. Not in Is. lxii. 8, 9: "Surely I will no more give thy corn to be meat for thine enemies, and strangers shall not drink thy wine [on margin, vintage], for the which thou hast labored: but they that have garnered it shall eat it, and praise the Lord; and they that have gathered it shall drink it in the courts of my sanctuary" (R. V.) There is no need to give tirosk the meaning of vintage here, as the R. V. shows by placing wine in the text, as the A. V. did. It is said indeed to be gathered; but this is a proleptic form of speech, and elsewhere wine and oil are said to be gathered (Jer. xl. 10; the Hebrew word for wine being yayin). 2. Not in Is. lxxv. 8: "As the new wine is found in the cluster, and one saith, Destroy it not, for a blessing is in it." Cheyne renders "As when [a few good] grapes are found in the cluster, and one saith [to the other gleaners] destroy it not, for a blessing is in it." But the same meaning exactly is yielded by rendering: "As when the juice is found in the cluster," etc. (Alexander, Delitzsch, Dillmann). 3. Not in Mic. vi. 15: "Thou shalt sow, but shalt not reap: thou shalt tread the olives, but shalt not anoint thee with oil; and the vintage [in A. V. sweet wine], but shalt not drink the wine." The Hebrews spoke of treading grapes (Amos ix. 13) and of treading wine (Is. xvi. 10; yayin being used, and the word "out" not being found in the original). 4. Not even in those numerous passages where the fruits of the ground are mentioned comprehensively as corn, wine, and oil (Num. xviii. 12, R. V. vintage; Deut. vii. 13; xi. 14; xii. 17; Hos. ii. 8, 22; Joel i. 10; ii. 19, in all 18 times). In many of these passages the tithe of the corn, wine, and oil is spoken of. Since yishar denotes the oil which is found in the olive (2 Kin. xviii. 32; Zech. iv. 14), tirosk may denote the juice which is found in the grape; and as the grain was thought of as threshed, the tirosk and the oil may be thought of as expressed. Indeed the threshed grain rather indicates that the grape juice and the oil were expressed. The only question then is: Were not firstfruits and tithes brought from the other produce of the vineyard which was not reduced to wine? They were; but they are not specifically included in the threefold designation so often employed. The firstfruits of all that was in the land were presented to the Lord, as is more explicitly stated in Num. xviii. 13; and mint and anise were tithed, although the threefold designation does not when interpreted literally embrace them. Grain, must, and oil were prominent enough to stand for all.

The Hebrew 'asis, something trodden out; hence grape juice, must (Is. xlix. 26; Amos ix. 13). It does not denote the expressed juice of the grape only, but of other fruits as the pomegranate.

The Greek gleukos is used by Josephus in speaking of the grape juice squeezed into Pharaoh's cup (Gen. xl. 11; Antiq. ii. 5, 2). It is explained by Hesychius as the juice that flowed spontaneously from the grapes before the treading commenced. It was drawn off and kept separate from the juice which flowed under pressure. It was with this that the apostles were accused of being filled on the day of Pentecost (Acts ii. 13).

Must was drunk; and, after fermentation had set in, was intoxicating (Hos. iv. 11, tirosk, Acts ii. 13, gleukos; and probably Is. xlix. 26, 'asis). But although must was used as a drink, the old wine was preferred (Ecclus. ix. 10; Luke v. 39). Pliny regarded must as hurtful to the stomach (Hist. Nat. xxiii. 18).

The Hebrew yayin is undoubtedly the same word etymologically as the Greek oinos and the Latin vinum. Hamar is the Aramaic name for the same thing; and hemer is the etymological equivalent of the Aramaic word, and is occasionally used in Hebrew poetry. When the Hebrew word yayin first occurs in Scripture, it is the fermented juice of the grape (Gen. ix. 21), and there is no reason to believe that it has a different meaning elsewhere. The Greek oinos also means the fermented juice of the grape, except when it is qualified by the word new, and even then there are not two wines, one fermented and the other unfermented. New wine is must, which only becomes wine by fermentation. An argument for the use of the term wine for unfermented grape juice has been sought in the fact that wine was used in later times at the passover, and yet leaven was strictly forbidden during the seven days of the paschal festival; hence the term wine, it has been argued, must have been applied to unfermented juice. But the reason is invalid. Vinous fermentation was not regarded as leaven. During the passover it was fermented drinks into which grain, and hence the leaven of bread, had entered that the Jews would not taste or touch (Mishna, Pesachoth i.). There were numerous varieties of wine which differed in body and flavor, such as the wine of Lebanon, the wine of Helbon. See VINE.

Fruit of the vine, the designation used by Jesus at the institution of the Lord's Supper (Mat. xxvi. 29), is the expression employed by the Jews from time immemorial for the wine partaken of on sacred occasions, as at the passover and on the evening of the Sabbath (Mishna, Berakoth vi. 1). The Greeks also used the term as a synonym of wine which was capable of producing intoxication (Herod i 211, 212). The juice of the grape which was ordinarily planted was red (Is. lxiii 2; Rev. xiv. 19, 20) and was called the blood of the grape (Gen. xlix. 11; Deut. xxxii. 14; 1 Mac. vi. 34). It was wine (Ecclus i. 15).

Mixed wine was known by the specific names of mesek (Ps lxxv 8), mimsak (Prov. xxiii. 30; Is. lxxv. 11), and mezeg (Song vii 2), each of which means mixture and denotes wine mixed with spices to give it a pleasant flavor (Song viii. 2, Pliny, Hist. Nat. xiv. 19, 5), or with water to diminish its strength (Herod vi. 84; see below).

Wine differed from shekar, rendered strong drink in E. V., in that wine was made from the juice of the grape, and shekar from the juice of other fruits and of grain. It was fermented, for it was capable of producing intoxication (Is xxviii. 7, xxix. 9). It was prepared from barley (Herod. ii. 77), from honey, or from dates (i. 193; ii. 86; Jerome, Epist. ad Nepotianum), or from the lotus (Herod. iv. 177). The drink made from dates is wholesome and refreshing, but in one day's heat it undergoes rapid fermentation, effervesces, and produces intoxication if taken immoderately. Shekar is once used in a broad sense for strong drink generally in distinction from water, and refers to the drink offering, which consisted of wine exclusively (Num. xxviii. 7).

Other words are sobe', a name derived from a root which signifies to soak or drink to excess (Is. i. 22; Nah. i. 10); and sh'marim, which strictly denotes the lees of wine and then is used for wine kept long on the lees, and hence, old.

Wine was employed medicinally (Prov. xxxi. 6; Luke x. 34; 1 Tim v. 23); was used in the service of God (Ex xxix. 39-41;

Lev xxiii. 13); and light wine was a staple article of diet in Palestine, as it has been in other Mediterranean lands from time immemorial (Num. vi. 20; Deut. xiv. 26; 2 Chron. ii 15; Neh. v. 18; Mat. xi. 19; 1 Tim. iii 8). Palestine was a country where meat was difficult to obtain and vegetables were rare; and wine supplied the lack. It would be a mistake, however, to suppose that wine was the invariable accompaniment of a meal; many a repast was partaken of without it; see FOOD. Still wine was in common use. Bread and wine signified the staples of life (Ps. civ. 14, 15; Prov. iv. 17). Wine was offered as an ordinary hospitality (Gen. xiv. 18) and was served at festivities (Job i. 13,

18; John ii. 3). The Hebrew people were, as a rule, simple in their mode of living, and temperate; but the danger of excess in the use of even light wine, especially at feasts, was clearly discerned. Its use was accordingly forbidden to priests when ministering at the sanctuary (Lev x. 9), and was declared to be improper for those about to sit on the judgment seat (Prov. xxxi. 4, 5; cp. Ecc. x. 17; Is. xxviii

7); and precautions were taken to guard all men against excess. The means employed to prevent the danger line from being crossed were: 1 The weakening of the wine with water (2 Mac. xv. 39; Herod. vi 84). That this was done further appears, for example, in connection with the kettle of warm water and the servants to mix the wine, which were employed at the passover (Mishna, Pesachum vii. 13; x. 2, 4, 7); hence in the early Christian church it was customary to mix the sacramental wine with water (Justin Martyr, Apol. i. 65). 2 The governor of the feast (Ecclus xxxii. 1, 2; John ii. 9, 10), one of whose duties, at least where Greek customs were observed, was to fix the proportion in which the wine and water should be mixed and to determine how much wine each guest might drink; see MEALS. 3. Warnings against the danger of lingering over the wine, of tampering with the cup when it delights the eye, and of making strong intoxicants were urgently given, and the degradation of the drunkard was pointed out by sad example (Gen. ix. 21; Prov xxiii. 29-35; Is. v. 22). 4. The folly of excess even from a worldly standpoint was emphasized and expressed in proverbs, and put on record in the religious literature of the people (Prov. xx. 1; xxi. 17; xxiii. 20, 21; Hab. ii. 5; Ecclus. xxxi. 25-31). 5. The sinfulness of drunkenness was earnestly taught and the condemnation of the drunkard by God the Judge was fully known (1 Sam. i. 14-16; Is. v. 11-17; 1 Cor. v. 11; vi. 10; Gal. v. 21; Eph. v. 18; 1 Pet. iv. 3).

Wis'dom.

One of the three departments of knowledge among the Hebrews, the other two being the law and prophecy. The law presents the commandments and claims of Jehovah to man; prophecy passes judgment on conduct in the light of God's revealed will and explains the object of God's dealings with men; wisdom seeks by observation, experience, and reflection to know things in their essence and reality as they stand related to man and God. The law and prophecy proceed directly from God, and in the highest sense are the word of God. Wisdom proceeds from man, and is the product of his own experience and observation. But while it is a human effort, it recognizes that a good understanding is the gift of God, and it postulates the fear of God and obedience to his commands as its first principle (Ps cxi. 10, Prov. ix. 10; Ecc xii. 13). In the earlier chapters of The Proverbs, in the Book of Job, and in the Wisdom of Solomon, wisdom is personified. See PHILOSOPHY.

The wise in counsel (Jer xviii. 18) are met with from time to time during Israel's national history; as the wise woman of Tekoa (2 Sam. xiv. 2), the wise woman of Abeldeth-maacah (xx. 18), the four celebrities Ethan, Heman, Calcol, and Darda (1 Kin. iv. 31). Their utterances took the form of parable (2 Sam. xiv. 4-11), precept (Prov. xxiv. 27-29), proverb (23-26), riddle (i. 6), the story of real life and its lesson (xxiv. 30-34); and it is customary to see specimens of their keen observation, method, and shrewd sayings in Jotham's fable (Judg. ix. 7-20), Samson's riddle or dark saying (xiv. 14), Nathan's parable and those enacted by the wise woman of Tekoa and a certain prophet (2 Sam. xii. 1-7; xiv. 4-17, 1 Kin. xx. 35-43), and the fable uttered by king Jehoash (2 Kin. xiv. 9, 10). But the great books of Hebrew wisdom are Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Ecclesiasticus, and the Wisdom of Solomon.

Wit'ness.

Evidence which could be appealed to in the future was secured by some tangible token or memorial, as a heap of stones (Gen. xxxi. 46-52), or by calling in men to witness the event (xxiii. 10-18), by a written document, as a deed or a letter of divorce (Deut. xxi. 1, 3; Jer. xxxii. 10).

The concurrent testimony of at least two witnesses was required under the Mosaic law to establish guilt of a capital crime (Num. xxxv. 30; Deut. xvii. 6; Heb. x. 28; cp. 1 Kin. xxi. 10, 13; Mat. xxvi. 60). This principle was a general rule in all judicial procedure (Deut. xix. 15). The Mosaic law did not sanction the use of torture to extract testimony; see PUNISHMENT. The witness, before his testimony was given, was adjured to tell the truth and to conceal nothing; and then it was sin for him to withhold evidence in his possession (Lev. v. 1; Prov. xxix. 24). False witness bearing was denounced in the decalogue (Ex. xx. 16), and when detected, it drew upon the false witness the same penalty that he had attempted to get imposed on the accused (Deut. xix. 16, 19). The witnesses aided in executing a sentence of death; see STONING. Josephus asserts that women and children were excluded from giving testimony by the Mosaic law (Antiq. iv. 8, 15). The law itself says nothing on the subject; but the participation of the witnesses in the execution of the death penalty would make the exclusion of women and children from witness bearing expedient. Josephus' statement evidently represents the current interpretation of the Mosaic law in his day.

The excellent principle involved in having at least two witnesses is capable of broad application in the dealings of man with man (Is. viii. 2, Mat. xvii. 1, 2; xviii. 16, John viii. 17, 18; 1 Tim. v. 19).

Those who in the face of danger and distress testify to the truth of God are witnesses in the highest sense (Heb. x, xi, xii. 1). Martyr is a Greek word meaning witness, and it came to signify one who sealed his testimony with his blood, as Stephen and Antipas (Acts xxii. 20; Rev. ii. 13).

Wiz'ard.

A professed possessor of supernatural knowledge derived, in the form of wizardry referred to in the Bible, from the pretended ability to converse with the spirits of the dead (Is. viii. 19). The wizard chirped and muttered (ibid) in imitation of the voice of the spirit (cp. xxix. 4). The wizard is never mentioned alone, but always in connection with them that have familiar spirits, because he belonged to the same class of questioners of the dead. The Canaanites consulted wizards (Deut. xviii. 9-12), so did the Egyptians (Is. xix. 3); but for a Hebrew to go to such an oracle defiled him, and was apostasy from Jehovah (Lev. xix. 31; xx. 6; Is. viii. 19). The offense of wizardry was punished with death (Lev. xx. 27). Saul, and subsequently Josiah, put the law in force (1 Sam. xxviii. 3, 9; 2 Kin. xxiii. 24); whilst Manasseh violated it shamelessly (2 Kin. xxi. 6).

Wolf.

1 A carnivorous animal, wild and fierce (Is. xi. 6; Hab. i. 8), that kills sheep (Ecclus. xiii. 17; John x. 12), and is accustomed to remain in hiding by day and seek its prey in the evening (Zeph. iii. 3). Benjamin was compared to the fierce and dreaded wolf (Gen. xlix. 9, 27; cp. the warrior Zeeb). But comparison with the wolf was not always intended as an honor. Violent princes who prey upon the helpless are likened to ravening wolves (Ezek. xxii. 27); and so are false teachers (Mat. vii. 15; Acts xx. 29), and enemies of the flock of God (Mat. x. 16). The wolf of Palestine is a variety of the European species (Canus lupus), and is diffused throughout the country. Owing to the ease with which food is obtained and the mildness of the winter, they do not hunt in packs, as in the colder north, but prowl alone.

2. The rendering of the Hebrew 'Iyyim, howling creatures (Is. xiii. 22; xxxiv. 14; Jer. l. 39; in A. V. wild beasts of the islands). The wolf belongs to the same genus as the dog; but it cannot bark, it can only howl.

Wom'an.

The counterpart of man, made to be his helpmeet and social equal (Gen. ii. 21-24; see EVE); and monogamy, or the marriage of one man and one woman, was the Creator's intention; see MARRIAGE.

The younger women of the family, especially in the earlier times and among the nomads, tended the sheep (Gen. xxix. 6; Ex. ii. 16), and they went to the harvest field and gleaned (Ruth ii. 3, 8); but the main duties of women were about the household. They brought water from the well (Gen. xxiv. 13; John iv. 7), ground the grain for daily use (Mat. xxiv. 41), prepared the meals (Gen. xviii. 6; 2 Sam. xiii. 8; Luke x. 40), spun wool and made clothing (1 Sam. ii. 19; Prov. xxxi. 13, 19; Acts ix. 36-39), taught the children religious truth (Prov. i. 8; xxxi. 1, cp. 2 Tim. iii. 15), and directed the household (Prov. xxxi. 27; 1 Tim. v. 14).

The Mosaic law and also public opinion among the Hebrews secured to women the enjoyment of many rights; see CONCUBINE, DIVORCE, MARRIAGE. Marriage was regarded by the Hebrews as a sacred relation (Mal. ii. 14-16). The wife was spoken of with respect and accorded honor (Prov. v. 18; xviii. 22; xxxi. 10-12; Ecc. ix. 9). To the mother honor was due, and her law had authority (Ex. xx. 12; Prov. i. 8). The capable woman was highly praised (xxx. 10-31), and examples of noble womanhood were freely and purposely admitted to the sacred writings. The spirit of the N. T. was equally hostile to woman's degradation. It insisted that man and woman shall occupy their respective spheres as indicated by the Creator in mutual respect and dependence (Mark x. 6-9; Eph. v. 31; 1 Tim. ii. 12-15). The sanctity and permanence of the marriage relation were taught, and divorce permitted only for extreme causes (Mat. xix. 8, 9; 1 Cor. vii. 15; Eph. v. 22-33). Woman was made the recipient of the same grace as man, and heir of the same promises (Gal. iii. 28); she was accorded honorable position in the church, and her services in the cause of Christ were fully appreciated and acknowledged (Rom. xvi. 1-4, 6, 12). The practical precepts in the epistles were calculated, whether addressed to saints generally or to woman in particular, to refine and ennoble her, and to bring her best qualities into exercise (1 Tim. ii. 9, 10; iii. 11).

Wool. See SHEEP, SPINNING, WEAVING.

The world as known in the Mosaic age was small (Gen. x.). On the south it extended from the mountains east of the Persian Gulf to the Nile; and on the north, from the Caspian Sea to the Grecian islands; in other words, it measured about 1500 miles from east to west, and 900, or including southern Arabia about 1500, miles from north to south. The area was about 2,250,000 square miles; but a large part of the surface was occupied by sea, so that the land was scarcely two-thirds of the extent of the United States, excluding Alaska. The history which is recorded in the Bible, and the great events of the world's history, were enacted in the northern portion of this region, in an area about one-third that of the United States.

During O. T. times these limits remained essentially unchanged, although the geographical horizon widened a little. Media and Persia rose to importance before the close of this period, making themselves known as never before and taking the first place among the nations. India became a boundary (Esth. i. 1). The existence of the Sinim was known (Is. xlix. 12). In the west Africa was circumnavigated during the reign of Pharaoh-necho, but without increasing geographical knowledge. The navigators did not realize the meaning of their achievement. They had spent more than two years on the voyage, and what appeared most noteworthy to them was that the sun, which rose upon their left hand when they sailed south from Egypt, rose on their right before they returned (Herod. iv. 42, 43). In Italy and on the opposite coast of Africa population was increasing and civilization was slowly developing; but these facts seldom reached the ears of men in the east, and then only through the reports of traders. Almost at the close of the O. T. period Greece emerged from obscurity by the vigorous resistance which it offered to the Persians.

Alexander the Great conquered the world. He extended its eastern limits, and added immensely to geographical knowledge, by carrying his arms across the Oxus into modern Turkestan, eastward beyond the bounds of modern Afghanistan, and southward into northern India. The Romans followed him. In the time of Christ the world, as currently thought of by men, extended from Spain and Britain to the plateau of Iran and India, and from the desert of Sahara on the south to the forests of Germany and the steppes of Russia and Siberia on the north. Knowledge of inhabited regions beyond these limits existed; but there was little contact with this outside world, it seldom engaged men's attention, and the ideas of its geography were confused.

World is frequently put for the inhabitants of the world (Ps. ix. 8; Is. xiii. 11; John iii. 16; vii. 7; Rom. iii. 19), and in the N. T. for that which pertains to the earth and this present state of existence merely (1 Cor. vii. 31, Gal. vi. 14; Eph. ii. 2; Jas. i. 27; i7. 4; 1 John ii. 15)

Worm.

Any small, creeping animal, whose body is boneless and consists of a number of movable joints or rings, and which has no limbs or only very short ones. It was generically called tola'ath or tole'ah in Hebrew, skōlēx in Greek; and it is mentioned as destroying grapes and the gourd vine (Deut. xxviii. 39; Jonah iv. 7), being bred over night in manna (Ex. xvi. 20), consuming the corpse (Is. xiv. 11, cp. lxxvi. 24 with Mark ix. 48), and causing death to the living (Acts xii. 23). Man as feeble and despised is likened to a worm (Job xxv. 6, Is. xli. 14).

Specific worms referred to are:

1. Maggots, in Hebrew a collective term rimmah, putridity and the worm bred in it. They feed on corpses (Job xxi. 26; xxiv. 20; Is. xiv. 11), and might be expected in putrid manna (Ex. xvi. 24). Man as very small and despicable is likened to the maggot (Job xxv. 6). In all these passages the E. V. uses the general term worm.

2. The larva of the moth, in Hebrew sas (Is. li. 8), see MOTH.

3. The coccus worm, tola'ath shani, which, however, is not a worm, but an insect, according to modern classification; see SCARLET.

The Hebrew word zahal, creeper, denotes something that crawls on the ground, and is rendered by worm in A. V. (Mic. vii. 17; in R. V. crawling things).

Worm'wood.

A plant, ranked with gall, having very bitter juice (Deut. xxix. 18; Prov. v. 4), unpalatable and, when exclusively drunk, noxious (Rev. viii. 11); called in Hebrew la'-nah, in Greek of N. T. apsinthos. It is used figuratively for injustice (Amos v. 7; vi. 12; in latter passage rendered hemlock in A. V.), for sore punishment (Jer. ix. 15), for bitter suffering (Lam. iii. 19) with which one is sated, not intoxicated (15). It seems to be some species of the great composite genus Artemisia. About 180 species are known. Post enumerates five species and several varieties as occurring in Palestine or the adjacent regions. The type is the common wormwood (Artemisia absinthium), cultivated in gardens.

Wor'ship.

Respect and honor shown to a person (Luke xiv. 10, in R. V. glory). This sense of the word worship has become obsolete. Respect which implies that the object thereof possesses divine attributes (Mat. xiv. 33; xv. 25; Rev. xiv. 7). Man is forbidden to give this worship to any but God alone (Ex. xxxiv. 14; Mat. iv. 10; Acts x. 25; Rev. xix. 10). The same outward act may be civility shown to man, as when people bowed down to Esau, to Joseph, or to the king Wormwood (Artemisia absinthium).

(Gen. xxxiii. 3; xlii. 6; 2 Sam. xxiv. 20), or worship rendered to God (Gen. xxiv. 52, R. V.; Ps. xcvi. 6), the same Hebrew word being used in all these passages. The performance of this outward act to idols was strictly forbidden (Ex. xx. 5).

For public worship in apostolic times see CHURCH.

Writ'ing.

The Hebrews, or rather some of them, were able to write (Ex. xvii. 14; xxiv. 4;

Writing Materials.

Num. xxxiii. 2). The art had been practiced in Babylonia centuries before Abraham left Ur of the Chaldees, and in Egypt centuries before the Israelites sojourned on the Nile. It was in use in the towns of Canaan before the conquest of the country by the Hebrews. It is recorded that the Hebrews at the time of the exodus wrote documents (ibid.: Deut. xxxi. 24), inscribed the law on the plaster of an altar (xxvii. 4, 8; Josh. viii. 32), and engraved words on gems and metallic plates (Ex. xxxix. 14, 30). The ancient inscriptions of Babylonia were impressed on soft clay, afterwards baked; and were engraven on stone tablets, on the surface of stone statues, on metal, and on the gem of which the seal was made. The letters sent from Canaan to Pharaoh previous to the exodus were written on clay tablets. The Egyptians, long before the sojourn of the Israelites among them, cut records in stone and wrote on papyrus. See BOOK, INK-HORN, PAPYRUS, PARCHMENT, TILE.

Yarn. See LINEN 6.

Year.

The year of the Hebrews consisted of twelve months (1 Kin. iv. 7; 1 Chron. xxvii. 1-15). These appear to have been lunar (see MONTH), and the year would accordingly contain 354 days, 8 hours, 48 minutes, 32.4 seconds.

The annual festivals were inseparably connected with the agricultural seasons. A strictly lunar year would cause these festivals, as fixed by the calendar, to constantly recede from their appropriate season. It was necessary to bring the lunar year into correspondence with the solar year of 365 days. This was doubtless accomplished by the intercalation of an additional month every three or four years, although the custom is not mentioned in the Bible. The year began with the month Abib or Nisan (Ex. xii. 2; xxiii. 15; Esth. iii. 7), with the new moon next before or next after the vernal equinox, when the sun is in Aries (Antiq. iii. 8, 4; 10, 5); but there was from the earliest times a civil, or rather agricultural, year which began in the autumn (cp. Ex. xxiii. 16; xxxiv. 22; Lev. xxv. 4, 9, seq.). It was convenient for a people devoted to horticulture and agriculture to begin the year with the season of plowing and sowing, and to close it with harvest. In practice they frequently preferred to indicate the time of year by the particular harvest or agricultural occupation than by the number or name of the month (e. g. Num. xiii. 20; Ruth i. 22). Sometime after the exile the new moon of the seventh month came to be kept as new year's day. The custom was probably not started by the events recorded in Ezra iii. 6 and Neh. viii. 2, but was yet favored by them.

Yoke.

A small transverse bar of timber, generally with two portions of the lower surface hollowed so as to rest on the necks of two oxen, used to draw a cart or a plow (Num. xix. 2); see illustration, Plow. Two oxen thus held together were also called a yoke (1 Kin. xix. 19), and so, figuratively, was any burden imposed on one as a token and means of subjection (xii. 4; Mat. xi. 30; Acts xv. 10).

Z.

Za-a-na'im. See ZAAANANNIM.

Za'a-nan [place of flocks].

A town (Mic. i. 11), perhaps the same as Zenan.

Za-a-nan'nim, in A. V. once Zaanaim (Judg. iv. 11), the Hebrew text being preferred to the traditional reading [departures].

A frontier town of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 33), near Kedesh (Judg. iv. 11). Conder follows Septuagint which has Besemiin, having made one word of "in Zaanannim" (so Josh. xix. 33, R. V. margin), and he believes it to have probably been near Bessüm, on the table-land west of the sea of Galilee.

Za'a-van, in A. V. once Zavan [unquiet].

A son of Ezer the Horite (Gen. xxxvi. 27; 1 Chron. i. 42).

Za'bad [he hath given or endowed].

1. A descendant of Ephraim, family of Shuthelah (1 Chron. vii. 21).

2. A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel, descended through She-shan, and a great-grandson of Ahlai (1 Chron. ii. 31, 34-37). Possibly he was David's mighty man of this name (xi. 41).

3. Corrupt form of Jozacar (2 Chron. xxiv. 26); see JOZACAR.

4, 5, 6. Three Hebrews, each of whom was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 27, 33, 43).

Zab-a-de'ans, in A. V. Zabadeans.

An Arabian tribe which dwelt between the river Eleutherus, Hamath, and Damascus (1 Mac. xii. 30-32; cp. 25), and hence probably occupied that part of the Anti-Lebanon mountains where the villages of Zebedani and Zebad are situated, on the route from Ba'al-bek to Damascus.

Zab'bai [humming].

A son of Bebai. He was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 28). He was the father of a certain Baruch (Neh. iii. 20).

Zab'bud [endowed].

Head of a family among the sons of Bigvai, who accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezra viii. 14).

Zab'di [gift of (Jehovah)].

1. A man of Judah, family of Zerah, and founder of a house (Josh. vii. 1). Called in 1 Chron. ii. 6 Zimri. For the confusion of b and m, d and r, see BETH, DALETH.

2. A Benjamite (1 Chron. viii. 19).

3. A Shiphmite, David's officer over the increase of the vineyards for the wine cellars (1 Chron. xxvii. 27).

4. A Levite, son of Asaph (Neh. xi. 17); see ZICHRI 5.

Zab'di-el [gift of God].

1. Father of Jashobeam (1 Chron. xxvii. 2).

2. Son of Haggadolim (Neh. xi. 14), or one of the great men (A. V. and margin of R. V.).

3. An Arabian prince who treacherously decapitated Alexander Balas and sent the head to Ptolemy Philometor (1 Mac. xi. 17; Antiq. xiii. 4, 8). He is probably the person referred to by Diodorus Siculus as Diocles, ruler of Aba, to whose care Alexander committed his infant son, and while sojourning with whom Alexander was murdered by two of his own officers.

Za'bud [given, endowed].

Son of Nathan and chief minister in Solomon's reign (1 Kin. iv. 5, R. V. margin).

Zab'u-lon. See ZERULUN.Zac'cai [pure, innocent].

Founder of a family, members of which returned with Zerubbabel from the captivity (Ezra ii. 9; Neh. vii. 14).

Zac-ché'us [Greek from Hebrew Zakkay, pure].

A wealthy man of Jericho who farmed the revenue for the Roman government. He became a disciple of Christ (Luke xix. 1-10).

Zac'cur, in A. V. once Zacchur (1 Chron. iv. 26) [mindful].

1. A Reubenite (Num. xiii. 4).

2. A Simeonite, descended through Mishma (1 Chron. iv. 26).

3. A Merarite Levite, a son of Jaaziah (1 Chron. xxiv. 27).

4. A Gershonite Levite, a son of Asaph, and head of a course of musicians in David's reign (1 Chron. xxv. 2, 10; Neh. xii. 35). See ZICHRI 5.

5. A son of Imri, who helped to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 2).

6. A Levite, who sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 12).

7. Son of Mattaniah and father of Hanan (Neh. xiii. 13).

Zach-a-ri'as, in R. V. twice Zachariah (Mat. xxiii. 35; Luke xi. 51) [Greek form of the Hebrew Z'karyah, Jehovah hath remembered].

1. Father of the captain Joseph (1 Mac. v. 18).

2. Father of John the Baptist. He was a priest of the course of Abijah (Luke i. 5); see ABIJAH. He and his wife were godly people, and she was related to Mary of Nazareth (6, 36). Their home was in the hill country of Judæa (39, 40.) It was customary to allot to the members of the course on duty at the sanctuary the several parts to be performed in the daily ministrations. When Zacharias' course assembled at Jerusalem the lot fell to him to burn incense; and while he was discharging this service at the hour of prayer, an angel appeared to him and announced that his supplication was heard. His old prayer for a son, although long abandoned as denied by God (18), and the prayer which he continually offered for the advent of the Messiah (68-75), were heard; and he was told that his wife should bear a son who should go before the face of the Lord to make ready for the Lord a people prepared for him (13-17). Zacharias questioned the promise on account of the advanced age of himself and his wife, and asked for a sign. The sign was granted in the form of a punishment. Zacharias was smitten with dumbness until the promise was fulfilled (18-22; 62-64). When the child was born, not only was the tongue of Zacharias released from its speechlessness, but he himself was filled with the Spirit and prophesied in words of thanksgiving and praise (67-79).

3. A righteous man who was murdered in the court of the temple, between the sanctuary and the house (Mat. xxiii. 35, Luke xi. 51); see ZECHARIAH 11.

Za'cher. See ZECHARIAH 1.Za'dok [just, righteous].

1. A descendant of Eleazar, the son of Aaron (1 Chron. xxiv. 3). He was the son of Ahitub (2 Sam. viii. 17). He was doubtless the young man, mighty of valor, who went with the chief men of the tribes of Israel to David at Hebron to turn the kingdom of Saul unto him (1 Chron. xii. 27, 28). Early in David's reign he was joint high priest with Abiathar (2 Sam. viii. 17). During the rebellion of Absalom the two colleagues joined in David's flight from Jerusalem, carrying with them the ark, but the king desired them to return to the capital, and there await the issue of the contest (xv. 24-29). After the death of Absalom, a message, on which they acted, was sent by David to Zadok and Abiathar, requesting them to suggest to the people that the king should be called back (xix. 11). When, in David's old age, Adonijah plotted to usurp the throne, Zadok remained faithful, while his colleague Abiathar went with the usurper (1 Kin. i. 7, 8). When the plot was discovered to David, Zadok, with Nathan the prophet, received instructions immediately to anoint Solomon king (32-45). Abiathar was deposed from the priesthood, and Zadok was the sole occupant of the high office till his death, during the reign of the new monarch (i. 26, 27; cp. iv. 4). The office of the high priest was thus restored to the line of Eleazar; see HIGH PRIEST.

2. A priest in the line of high priests, father of Shallum (1 Chron. vi. 12). He was descended from the second Ahitub (ibid.; Ezra vii. 2) through the second Meraioth (1 Chron. ix. 11; Neh. xi. 11).

3. Father of Jerusha, king Uziah's mother (2 Kin. xv. 33).

4. A son of Baana. He repaired part of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh. iii. 4), and was perhaps the person of the name who sealed the covenant (x. 21).

5. A priest, son of Immer. He repaired the city wall opposite to his house (Neh. iii. 29), and was perhaps the scribe who was made a treasurer (xii. 13).

Za'ham [loathing].

A son of Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 19).

Za'in, in A. R. V. Zayin.

The seventh letter of the Hebrew alphabet. English Z, which had the same origin, represents it in Hebrew names in the English version. It heads the seventh section of Ps. cxix in several versions, because each verse of the section begins with this letter.

For possibility of confusing it with other letters, see VAU.

Za'ir [little].

A place in or near Edom, where king Joram, of Judah, encamped before making a night attack on the Edomites (2 Kin. viii. 21; cp. the different text in 2 Chron. xxi. 9). Conder proposes Zuwëra, a double town near the Dead Sea, on the road from the southern end of the sea to Hebron.

Za'laph [fracture].

Father of a certain Hanun (Neh. iii. 30).

Zal'mon, in A. V. once Salunon (Ps. lxxviii. 14) [shady].

1. An Ahohite, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 28). Also called Ilai (1 Chron. xi. 29).

2. A wooded mountain near Shechem (Judg. ix. 48; cp. Ps. lxxviii. 14).

Zal-mo'nah [shady].

An encampment of the Israelites (Num. xxxiii. 41, 42), either west or east of Edom.

Zal-mun'na [perhaps, shelter is denied].

One of the two kings of Midian slain by Gideon (Judg. viii. 4-28; Ps. lxxxiii. 11).

Zam'bri. See ZIMRI 2.

Zam-sum'mim, in A. V. Zamsummins [murmurers, makers of noise].

A tribe of Rephaim, who in ancient times inhabited the region east of the Jordan, afterwards occupied by the Ammonites (Deut. ii. 20); probably the same as the Zuzim.

Za-no'ah [foul water].

1. A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv. 34). It was inhabited after the captivity

(Neh. xi. 30), and seems to have been the Zanoah whose inhabitants restored the valley gate of Jerusalem (iii. 13). Robinson plausibly identified it with Zânûa, nearly 3 miles southeast by south of Beth-shemesh.

2. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv. 56; and probably 1 Chron. iv. 18). Zânûta about 12½ miles southwest by south of Hebron, 2½ south of Shuweikeh, and 5 southwest by west of es-Semua, is scarcely the site; for it belongs to the group of Josh. xv. 48-51 rather than to that of 55-57.

Zaph'e-nath-pa-ne'ah, in A. V. Zaph-nath-paaneah [God speaks, he lives (Steindorff)] From the sound of the name, the Jews guessed that the name meant revealer of secrets (Targum Onkelos, Antiq. ii. 6, 1).

The name given by Pharaoh to Joseph after he had interpreted the king's dreams (Gen. xli. 45).

Za'phon [concealment, north].

A town of the Gadites in the Jordan valley (Josh. xii. 27; cp. Judg. xii. 1, R. V. margin). The Talmud calls it 'Amatho. If this is correct, it is Amathus (Antiq. xiii. 13, 5; xiv. 5, 4), and its site is Tell Ammete, in the Jordan valley, east of the river and 8 miles north by east of the mouth of the Jabbok.

Za'ra and Zarah. See ZERAH.

Za're-ah. See ZORAH.

Za're-ath-ite. See ZORATHITE.

Za'rad. See ZERED.

Zar'e-phath, in A. V. of N. T. Sarepta (Luke iv. 26) [perhaps, smelting furnace].

A town belonging to Sidon (1 Kin. xvii. 9; Luke iv. 26; Antiq. viii. 13, 2). Thither Elijah repaired when the brook Cherith dried up. Trusting his word, spoken in the name of Jehovah, a widowed woman of Zarephath gave the prophet a home while the famine lasted. As a reward of her faith her oil and meal failed not, and her boy was brought back to life (1 Kin. xvii. 8-24). It is the predicted limit in one direction of the Israelites (Obad. 20). The name still lingers in the form of Surafend, a large village on a hill near the sea, 14 miles north of Tyre, and 8 south of Sidon. The ancient city was, however, on the shore, where considerable ruins, extending for a mile or more, point out the old site.

Zar'e-than, in A. V. Zaretan (Josh. iii. 16), and Zartanah (1 Kin. iv. 12), and Zarthan (1 Kin. vii. 46).

A village beneath Jezreel and near the towns of Beth-shean and Adam (Josh. iii. 16; 1 Kin. iv. 12). In the marly soil between it and Succoth the bronze work for Solomon's temple was cast (1 Kin. vii. 46). The name is probably another form of Zeredah (q. v.). The site has not been identified, the name not corresponding with Kurn Sartabeh, a peak southwest of the ford Damieh.

Za-reth-sha'har. See ZERETH-SHAHAR.

Zar'hite, in R. V. Zerahite.

A person belonging to the family of Zerah. There was a family of this name in the tribe of Simeon and another in Judah (Num. xxvi. 13, 20; Josh. vii. 17; cp. 1; 1 Chron. xxvii. 11, 13).

Zar'ta-nah. See ZARETHAN.

Zar'than. See ZARETHAN.

Zat'tu, in A. V. once Zatthu (Neh. x. 14).

Founder of a family, members of which returned from the captivity (Ezra ii 8; Neh vii 13). Some of them married foreign wives, but were induced to put them away (Ezra x. 27). The representative of the family sealed the covenant (Neh. x. 14).

Za'van. See ZAAVAN.

Za'yin. See ZAIN.

Za'za [movement, abundance].

A man of Judah, family of Hezron, house of Jerahmeel (1 Chron. ii. 33).

Zeal'ot, in A. V. Zelotes [zealous one]; Greek equivalent of Cananean (q. v.).

A member of a Jewish patriotic party (War iv. 3, 9; vii. 8, 1). Simon the apostle was distinguished from Simon Peter and others by this epithet (Luke vi 15; Acts i. 13). The party was started into being by Judas the Galilean in the time of Cyrenius to resist Roman aggression. Its increasing fanaticism contributed to provoke the Roman war. Ultimately it degenerated into a body of mere assassins, called Sicarii (Antiq. xviii. 1, 1 and 6; War ii. 8, 1; 17, 8; iv. 3, 9 seq.).

Zeb-a-di'ah [Jehovah hath given or endowed].

1. A Benjamite, of the house of Beriah (1 Chron. viii. 15, 16).

2. A Benjamite, descended from Elpaal (1 Chron. viii. 17, 18).

3. A son of Jeroham of Gedor. He joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 7).

4. Son of Asahel, Joab's brother (1 Chron. xxvii. 7).

5. A Korhite Levite, a son of Meshelemiah, in David's reign (1 Chron. xxvi. 1, 2).

6. One of the Levites sent forth by Jehoshaphat to teach the law (2 Chron. xvii. 8).

7. A prince of Judah, who was the chief judicial functionary for civil cases in the court which Jehoshaphat established at Jerusalem (2 Chron. xix. 11).

8. A descendant of Shephatiah. He was one of those who accompanied Ezra from Babylon (Ezra viii. 8).

9. A priest of the house of Immer. He was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 20).

Ze'bah [slaughter, sacrifice].

One of the two kings of Midian pursued and slain by Gideon (Judg. viii. 4-28; Ps. lxxxiii. 11).

Ze-ba'im. See POCHERETH-HAZZEBAIM.

Ze'b'e-dee [Greek form of Hebrew Z'bad-yah, Jehovah hath endowed].

The husband of Salome (q. v.), and father of James and John. Like his sons, he was a fisherman on the sea of Galilee (Mat. iv. 21, 22), and was a man of some substance, for he had hired servants (Mark i. 19, 20). He raised no obstacle to his sons following Jesus.

Ze-bi'dah, in A. V. Zebudah, the traditional pronunciation [given, bestowed].

A daughter of Pedaiiah of Rumah, and mother of king Jehoiaakim (2 Kin. xxiii. 36).

Ze-bi'na [acquired].

A descendant of Nebo. He was induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 43).

Ze-boi'im and Zeboim, I. [gazelles]. In Hebrew text and R. V. the first form is used in the Pentateuch, the second in Hosea.

One of the five cities of the plain (Gen. x. 19). Its king was defeated by Chedorlaomer (xiv. 2, 8, 10). It was destroyed with the other cities of the plain by fire from heaven (xix. 17-29; Deut. xxix. 23; Hosea xi. 8).

Ze-bo'im, II. [hyenas].

1. A valley in the territory of Benjamin, between Michmash and the wilderness on the east (1 Sam. xiii. 16-18). A cliff just above the Jordan plain, near Jericho, is called Shukh ed-Duba, lair of the hyena, and perhaps indicates the locality.

2. A town occupied by Benjamites after the captivity (Neh. xi. 34). It is evidently to be sought in the hills bordering the plain of Sharon, near Lydda.

Ze-bu'dah. See ZEBIDAH.

Ze'bul [habitation]

The governor of the city of Shechem in the time of Abimelech, to whom he showed unswerving fidelity (Judg. ix. 28, 36-39).

Zeb'u-lon-ite. See ZEBULUNITE

Zeb'u-lun, in A. V. of N. T. Zabulon [habitation, dwelling]

1. The tenth son of Jacob, and the sixth by Leah (Gen. xxx. 19, 20). He went down with his father into Egypt (Ex i. 3). He had three sons: Sered, Elon, and Jahleel (Gen. xli. 14). Jacob, in his farewell address, blessing his sons, pictured Zebulun as dwelling at the haven of the sea, being a haven of ships, and having his border on Zidon (xlix. 13). This picture was realized in its essentials, but not in its details. Zebulun was allotted territory in the vicinity of the sea, and enjoyed the markets of the towns on the coast; but it was itself separated from the sea of Galilee by Naphtali and Issachar, and from the Mediterranean Sea and the city of Zidon by the tribe of Asher. This lack of agreement between the picture drawn in Jacob's address and the actual state of the tribe in Palestine is a strong argument that the address was not composed after the settlement of the tribes, but is genuine.

2. The tribe of which Zebulun was the progenitor. From his three sons sprang the great families into which the tribe was divided (Num. xxvi. 26, 27). The prince of the tribe early in the wilderness wanderings was Eliab, son of Helon (i. 9; x. 16), and at a later period Elizaphan, son of Parnach, was a prince (xxxiv. 25). The spy from the tribe was Gaddiel, son of Sodi (xiii. 10). At the first census it contained 57,400 fighting men (i. 30, 31); at the second 60,500 (xxvi. 27). It was one of the six tribes the representatives of which stood on mount Ebal to pronounce curses on transgressors (Deut. xxviii. 13; cp. Josh. viii. 32-35). Moses before his departure, associating the two brothers, later sons of Leah, and with the prophecy of Jacob in mind, thus indicated their future history: "Rejoice, Zebulun, in thy going out; and, Issachar, in thy tents. They shall call the peoples unto the mountain; there they shall offer sacrifices of righteousness: for they shall suck the abundance of the seas, and the hidden treasures of the sand" (Deut. xxxiii. 18, 19, R. V.). In the mountain of Jehovah's inheritance (Ex. xv. 17), where he will establish his chosen people, Zebulun and Issachar will bring rich offerings to their bountiful Benefactor. After the conquest of Canaan, Zebulun was allotted territory in the northern part of the country. It lay north of Issachar, east of Asher, and south and west of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 27, 34). Its southern boundary ran by Daberath on the western foot of mount Tabor, passed Chisloth-tabor, and after skirting the plain of Esdraelon and then crossing it reached the brook that is before Jokneam (11. 12), probably the wady el-Milh, a southern tributary of the Kishon. Its eastern boundary went to Gath-hepher, which was probably 3 miles north by east of Nazareth, and on to Rimmon, 6 miles almost due north of Nazareth (13, R. V.). At the northwestern corner of the territory was the valley of Iphtah-el (14), probably about 9 miles north by west of Nazareth, and leaving the fertile plain of el-Buttauf within the bounds of Zebulun. Since Bethlehem, 7 miles west-northwest of Nazareth, belonged to Zebulun (15), the western boundary was doubtless in part the wady el-Khalladiyeh. The region possessed by Zebulun was fertile. It embraced a part of the mountainous country of lower Galilee and the northwestern corner of the plain of Esdraelon. The Zebulunites constituted an important part of Barak's force in the fight with Sisera (Judg. iv. 6-10; v. 14, 18), and of Gideon's army in the war with Midian (vi. 35). Deborah sang that there were in the tribe they that handle the marshal's staff, or the staff of the scribe (v. 14, R. V. text and margin), meaning the scribes who gathered and mustered the army (2 Kin. xxv. 19). The judge Elon was a member of the tribe, exercised his office, died, and was buried at Aijalon, within its territory (Judg. xii. 12). Fifty thousand warriors of the tribe, with skillful and faithful commanders, went with the other tribes to Hebron to make David king (1 Chron. xii. 33, 40). Ishmaiah was the ruler of the Zebulunites in David's reign (xxvii. 19). The tribe with the rest of Galilee suffered severely during the Assyrian wars, but Isaiah prophesied that it would obtain compensatory blessings in Messianic times (Is. ix. 1, 2; Mat. iv. 12-16). Some men of the tribe accepted Hezekiah's invitation to come to Jerusalem for his great passover (2 Chron. xxx. 10, 11, 18). Ezekiel, of course, assigns a gate for the Zebulunites in the Jerusalem which he describes (Ezek. xlvi. 33), and of the tribe there were sealed in the apocalyptic vision the normal number 12,000 (Rev. vii. 8).

Zeb'u-lun-ite, in A. V. in Judges Zebulonite.

One belonging to the tribe of Zebulun, or resident within its territory (Num. xxvi. 27; Judg. xii. 11, 12).

Zech-a-ri'ah, in A. V. four times Zachariah (2 Kin. xiv. 29; xv. 8, 11; xviii. 2) [Jehovah hath remembered].

1. A Benjamite of the family of Jeiel of Gibeon (1 Chron. ix. 37); called in 1 Chron. viii. 31 Zecher (in A. V. Zacher). If the traditional vocalization is correct, Zecher is a synonymous name meaning memory. Perhaps, however, it was an abbreviation of Zechariah, as Ahaz is of Abaziah, and was pronounced Zachar, meaning he hath remembered.

2. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar, descended through Ebiasaph. He was the eldest son of Meshelemiah. He was porter of the door of the tent of meeting in David's reign (1 Chron. ix. 21, 22; xxvi. 2). He was a discreet counselor (14).

3. A Levite of the second degree who played a psalm in the procession that escorted the ark to Jerusalem, and afterwards was permanently employed in the tabernacle which David pitched for the ark (1 Chron. xv. 18, 20; xvi. 5). It is doubtful whether the word doorkeepers (xv. 18) is intended to include him.

4. A priest who blew a trumpet when the ark was brought up from the house of Obad-edom (1 Chron. xv. 24).

5. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Uzziel. He was a son of Issiah and lived in the reign of David (1 Chron. xxiv. 25).

6. A Levite, family of Merari, and fourth son of Hosah. He was one of the doorkeepers in David's reign (1 Chron. xxvi. 11).

7. A Manassite of Gilead and father of Iddo, who lived in David's reign (1 Chron. xxvii. 21).

8. A Levite, of the sons of Asaph, and hence of the family of Gershon (2 Chron. xx. 14).

9. One of the princes whom Jehoshaphat sent to teach the people of Judah (2 Chron. xvii. 7).

10. Fourth son of king Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xxi. 2).

11. Son of Jehoiada, the high priest, and a righteous man like his father. He lived in the reign of king Joash of Judah. The Spirit of God came upon him and he remonstrated with the people on their apostasy from Jehovah which ensued on the death of Jehoiada. At the instance of the king he was stoned to death in the court of the temple (2 Chron. xxiv. 20-22). It is commonly believed that he is referred to by our Lord when speaking of the righteous blood shed on earth, from the blood of Abel unto the blood of Zechariah, who perished between the altar and the sanctuary (Luke xi. 51). Zechariah, son of Jehoiada, is the only person mentioned in Scripture as being thus slain; his violent death was memorable and was familiar to succeeding generations; and he is the last of the righteous men wickedly slain, as Abel was the first, who are mentioned in the Hebrew Scriptures, Chronicles being the last book in the Hebrew Bible. He is called the son of Barachiah in the parallel passage (Mat. xxiii. 35, in A. V. Barachias), which naturally identifies him with the well-known prophet who lived after the exile. But this explanatory clause in Matthew is not improbably a gloss which was written on the margin by a reader and afterwards crept into the text.

12. A man who had understanding in the vision of God, and gave wise counsel to king Uzziah, which for a time he followed (2 Chron. xxvi. 5).

13. A king of Israel and last ruler of the dynasty of Jehu. He came to the throne of Samaria in the thirty-eighth year of Azariah, king of Judah, and reigned six months, about 749 B. C. He was the son of Jeroboam II, and was murdered by Shallum, who succeeded him as king (2 Kin. xiv. 29; xv. 8-12). By his occupancy of the throne the prediction was fulfilled that the fourth generation of Jehu's sons should sit on the throne (x. 30).

14. A Reubenite chief (1 Chron. v. 7).

15. Son of Jeberechiah. He was a witness that Isaiah wrote certain enigmatical words about a year before their meaning was explained by a prophecy (Is. vii. 2).

16. Maternal grandfather of Hezekiah (2 Kin. xviii. 2).

17. A Levite descended from Asaph. He took part in the cleansing of the temple during the reign of Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxix. 13).

18. A Kohathite Levite, overseer of the workmen employed to repair the temple in Josiah's reign (2 Chron. xxxiv. 12).

19. A ruler of the house of God in Josiah's reign and doubtless a priest (2 Chron. xxxv. 8).

20. A man of Judah, family of Shelah (Neh. xi. 5).

21. A man of Judah, family of Perez (Neh. xi. 4).

22. A priest descended from Pashhur of the house of Malchijah (Neh. xi. 12).

23. A descendant of Parosh. He returned from Babylon with a party along with Ezra (Ezra vii. 3).

24. A son of Bebai who did likewise (Ezra viii. 11).

25. One of the chief men whom Ezra sent to secure Levites and Nethinim to accompany the returning exiles (Ezra viii. 16).

26. One of the men, probably priests, who stood beside Ezra at the public reading of the law (Neh. viii. 4).

27. A son of Elam, induced by Ezra to put away his foreign wife (Ezra x. 26).

28. A Levite, son of Jonathan, and a descendant of Asaph. He led a division of Levitical musicians at the dedication of the rebuilt wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 35, 36).

29. A priest who blew a trumpet at the dedication of the rebuilt wall of Jerusalem (Neh. xii. 41).

30. A priest, head of the father's house of Iddo in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. xii. 16). See the following.

31. A prophet, son of Berechiah, and grand-son of Iddo (Zech. i. 1). His first recorded prophecy was delivered in the second year of Darius Hystaspis, 520 B. C. (ibid., Ezra iv. 24 with v. 1). He was a contemporary of Zerubbabel the governor, Jeshua the high priest, and Haggai the prophet (Zech. iii. 1; iv. 6; vi. 11, Ezra v. 1, 2), and united with Haggai in exhorting the leaders of the Jewish colony to resume work on the house of God. It scarcely admits of question that he was born in Babylonia, for the exiles had been back in Palestine eighteen years only and Zechariah hardly began to prophesy before he was eighteen. Not improbably Zechariah belonged to the tribe of Levi, and, like Jeremiah and Ezekiel, was a priest as well as a prophet, for, according to Nehemiah (Neh. xii. 1, 4, 7) Iddo was head of a priestly family and one who returned from Babylonia with Zerubbabel; and a descendant of his, Zechariah by name, was head of the priestly house of Iddo during the high-priesthood of Joiakim, son of Jeshua (10, 12, 16). It is true that the lineage, which is involved in Nehemiah's statements, may be quite distinct from the genealogy of the prophet, although it contains the same names in the same order, but the theory which identifies the two has not a little confirmation. 1. Since Iddo had attained to the headship of a priestly family, he is rightly judged to have been an elderly man in the year of the return, 538 B. C. His descendant, Zechariah, attained to the same position in the next generation, which would naturally involve his being of such an age in 520 B. C., that he could be called a young man. The prophet Zechariah is called a young man (though by an angel it is true), in the year 520 B. C. (Zech. ii. 4). 2. Assuming that the prophet's father Berechiah was the son of the priest Iddo and died prior to 520, without attaining to the headship of the family, then the prophet Zechariah was left next in the line of succession, and this would lead Ezra to call him the son of Iddo, naming him both as descendant and successor of Iddo. But even if Berechiah were alive, his name might be omitted; for it was only necessary to name the father's house to which a man belonged, in order to locate him among the tribes and families of Israel. The assumption of Berechiah's death would also account for the fact that in the generation after the return, Zechariah was head of the father's house. 3. The theory that the prophet Zechariah was a priest accounts for his familiarity with priestly functions and ideas (iii.; iv.).

Another view is that favored by Kimchi. According to him, the term prophet in 1:1 and 7 refers to Iddo (for position of the title, cp. Ezra vii. 5), and the latter is the seer who prophesied in the reign of Rehoboam (2 Chron. xii. 15; xiii. 22). The theory is improbable, but it is not to be rejected because four centuries intervened between the seer Iddo and the prophet Zechariah.

The book of Zechariah is the eleventh of the minor prophets. It may be divided as follows:

I. Introduction to the book and a series of eight visions. The introduction (i 1-6) strikes the keynote, not to these visions only, but to the whole book. Learn the lesson of the past: "Return unto me and I will return unto you" Vision 1: the drove of horses (7-17), fleet, tireless messengers. By this picture it is shown that God is watching the events of earth; there is no sign of relief for God's people or of the punishment of their oppressors; the nations are at rest. Yet God is jealous for Zion and sore displeased with its oppressors; therefore, he is returned to Jerusalem with mercies; his house and his city shall be built, the land shall greatly prosper. The first vision is introductory to the seven that follow. Vision 2: the four horns and the four smiths (18-21). The vision means that for each of the horns, i. e. nations that scattered Judah, destruction is appointed. Vision 3: the man with a measuring line (ii). The comfortable message of the first vision is unfolded, namely, the rebuilding of the city. The idea is expanded, however. Jerusalem shall not be measured, as cities usually are, by the extent of its walls; for, enjoying unbounded prosperity, it shall spread abroad without walls. It will not be insecure, however; Jehovah will be a wall of fire about it. Vision 4: Joshua, the high priest (iii.). The priesthood, although human and defiled, a brand consuming in the fire of God's wrath, is by grace plucked forth, cleansed, and, on condition of obedience, promised continuance. Then the fact is emphasized that the priests are types of the Messiah, and by a symbolical action it is declared that God has a purpose which he will accomplish; the one typified will be raised up. Vision 5: the golden candlestick and the two olive trees (iv.). It seems as though the light of the church burning feebly after the exile must needs go out; not so, God has provided an abundant, unfailing, self-furnishing supply of oil. Vision 6. the flying roll (v. 1-4). God has pronounced a curse for the destruction of wickedness. Vision 7: the departing ephah (5-11). This is the sequel of the sixth vision. Wickedness, personified as a woman and imprisoned, is removed from the land. Vision 8: the four chariots issuing from the presence of the Lord of all the earth (vi. 1-8). The four chariots are declared to represent the four winds, which commonly denote the unseen power of God; and the vision is a promise that the entire plan outlined in the preceding series will be executed by the Lord of all the earth.

II. Symbolic action: crowning of the high priest (vi. 9-15). This procedure is expressly declared to belong to the future and to relate to the well-known Branch who was the expected king of David's line.

III. Deputation from Bethel to inquire whether the fasts shall still be kept, now that the disasters which they commemorated have been in part retrieved, and the prophet's four answers (vii.; viii.). 1. Fasts terminate on the faster; they do not affect God; obedience is the one thing God requires (vii. 4-7). 2. Justice and truth are the will of God, which is to be obeyed. The desolation of the land and dispersion of the people were not a calamity to be bewailed; they were a punishment for disobedience and intended to work reform (8-14). 3. God returns to Zion in jealousy, and will secure truth and holiness (viii. 1-17). 4. The fasts will become festivals (18-23).

IV. Burdens naturally follow the visions which revealed God's purpose to destroy the oppressors of Judah and bring many nations into the kingdom. Burden 1: Jehovah's overthrow of the enemies of God's kingdom. Punishments are impending which shall bring the surrounding nations low. A remnant of Philistia, however, shall be incorporated in God's kingdom; and Jerusalem shall be safe amid the widespread desolation, for God shall encamp about Judah and Judah's king shall come (ix.). Episode: exhortation to look to the Lord for promised blessings; and not to idols and soothsayers, who only cause the flock to err (x. 1, 2). Resumption of the prophecy. The Lord, however, as already said, hath visited his flock, and because of his wrath will make it as his goodly horse in battle, free Judah from all oppressors, gather both Judah and Ephraim, and make Ephraim joyful in his former habitation (3-12). These promised blessings, however, will not be enjoyed for some time to come. Desolation to the land! is the prophet's cry (xi. 1-3). The reason for this desolation is explained by the parable of the rejected shepherd (4-17): because of the continued rejection of God's righteous government, the covenant with the nations is broken, and Israel is open to desolation; because of the same sin, the unity of Judah and Ephraim remains unaccomplished, and weakness, discord, and desolation result. Burden 2: the conflict and final triumph of the kingdom of God. The nations of the earth are arrayed against Jerusalem and Judah, which at the time of the prophet Zechariah were coextensive with the visible church of Jehovah; but Jehovah makes it a cup of reeling and a burdensome stone to the nations, smiting the enemy with madness, and revealing the fact that the citizens of Zion are strong in the Lord (xii. 1-8). The preparation of Jerusalem (9-xiv. 5): God will prepare Jerusalem, first, by gracious spiritual change wrought by God (xii. 10-xiii. 6); second, by purifying chastisement (7-xiv. 5*). The final triumph (5*-21). The Lord shall come; it shall be a time of darkness and judgment, both for the church and the nations; but at a time appointed of God, at eventide there shall be light. The church shall flourish, and a remnant of the nations shall go up from year to year to worship Jehovah, the king. Then shall the idea of the kingdom of God be realized, the church shall be holy.

The first to hint that the book of Zechariah did not proceed in its entirety from the pen of the prophet whose name it bears was Joseph Mede, of Christ Church college, Cambridge, in 1653. He argued that chapters ix. to xi. were written by Jeremiah, because Matthew in quoting Zechariah xi. 13 refers it to Jeremiah (Mat. xxvii. 9). This argument has no longer weight in the estimation of critics. Some would say that the mention of Jeremiah is an error by Matthew, while others believe that it is probably an early corruption of Matthew's text. It has even been suggested that since the Hebrews in their arrangement of the Scriptures at one time began the latter prophets with Jeremiah, observing the sequence Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Isaiah, instead of the present order, Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel (see CANON), this prophetic section was sometimes referred to as Jeremiah, just as The Psalms and The Proverbs are referred to as the Psalms of David and the Proverbs of Solomon, although David was not the sole author of The Psalms nor Solomon of The Proverbs. Since Mede's day many critics have held that in the present book of Zechariah there are the writings of two, three, or more prophets. The principal views are: 1. Chapters ix. to xi. were written shortly before the fall of Samaria in 722 B. C., and chapters xii. to xiv. shortly before the destruction of Jerusalem in 587 B. C. 2. Chapters ix. to xiv. were written in the late Persian period more than a century and a half after the death of Zechariah, or in the Maccabæan period. 3. Chapters ix. to xiv., as well as chapters i. to viii, proceeded from Zechariah. The debate, it will be seen, concerns chapters ix. to xiv. only. All critics confess that Zechariah wrote the first eight chapters. The debated section contains the two burdens. What then is the date of these burdens? In regard to the first burden, when it was written the house of the Lord was standing (ix. 15; xi. 13): but from this fact no argument as to the date of the burden can be drawn; for Solomon's temple was standing down to the exile, and the new temple, built after the return, was in use after the year 515 B. C. The reference in x. 10, 11 has been cited to prove that Egypt and Assyria were great powers at the time that this prophecy was delivered, and it was delivered after Israel had been carried captive (6), hence after the capture of Samaria but before the fall of Nineveh, about 606 B. C. But a prophet after the exile, as well as a prophet of an earlier date, could foretell that the Israelites would be restored to the lands from which they had been carried, namely, from Egypt and Assyria; and although Assyria had succumbed to a later world empire, he could still say that the pride of Assyria, the power by which the Israelites were still kept in captivity, should be brought down; or Assyria may be used of a geographical region, including Babylonia, just as the term is employed by Ezra (Ezra vi. 22), although the region was then under the government of Persia. Accordingly, the first burden may have been delivered either before the fall of Nineveh, while Assyria was still a power, or else after the exile when the Assyrian empire had given place to other empires, and since the temple is standing, after the sixth year of Darius king of Persia. Another datum which contributes to the solution of this question is obtained from the statement that God will break the brotherhood between Judah and Israel (Zech. xi. 14). The brotherhood existed until the reign of Rehoboam, when it was broken by the refusal of the northern tribes to render further allegiance to the throne of David. It might also be said to have been broken when Samaria fell, and the northern tribes were scattered. The brotherhood existed once more after the Babylonian exile. Now this burden was pronounced after the fall of Samaria and the captivity of Ephraim (x. 6); and therefore it properly dates from the time after the exile, when the current conception was that Ephraim and Judah were reunited in the brotherhood. In point of fact they were reunited: many members of the ten tribes had joined themselves to Judah; and the existing nation was universally regarded as the representative of the twelve tribes, and in Ezra's day accordingly twelve goats were offered as a sin offering at the dedication of the temple, and a second sin offering of twelve bullocks was made for all Israel (Ezra vi. 17; viii. 35; cp. Mat. xix. 28; Luke ii 36; Acts iv. 36; xxvi. 7; Phil. iii. 5). It is true that the prophet frequently uses the old terms Judah and Ephraim, and this fact has been urged to prove that the prophecy was uttered long before the time of Zechariah, but many people living after the exile used the old terms. Zechariah himself in the first eight chapters employs them. He addresses the "house of Judah and house of Israel" (Zech viii 13). It is to this post-exilic period accordingly that the references to the brotherhood of Ephraim and Judah point. There is a further mark. It is declared that God will raise up Judah against the distant sons of Javan, or the Greeks (ix. 13). It will be observed that the Greeks are chosen for two reasons: (1) Because the prophet describes the conflict of the church with the most distant nations of the world. Javan and the isles were at this time within the geographical horizon of the Hebrews, and they were used as types of the remotest heathen nations (Gen x 4, 5; Is. xli 5; lix. 18; lxxi. 19; Ezek. xxvii. 13) (2) The novel feature here is that Javan looms up as the world power of heathenism. The earliest date when the coming power of Greece became evident to observers in the Persian empire was during the years from 500 to 479 B. C., and the coming greatness of Greece as the successful antagonist of Persia was clearly evident. Greece had successfully checked the advance of Persian arms, and the Grecian cities of Asia Minor were in open revolt against their Persian lords during the years 500 to 495 B. C.; the Persians were defeated at Marathon in 490 and, after their victory at Thermopylae, were crushingly defeated by the Greeks at Salamis, 480, Plataea and Mycale, 479. Zechariah, there is reason to believe on considerable and varied evidence, was a young man, say twenty or twenty-five, when in 520 B. C. he exhorted Zerubbabel to the work of rebuilding the temple, and consequently these stirring events which revealed the unsuspected greatness of Greece and opened the prospect that it would successfully intermeddle in oriental affairs occurred during the years which were Zechariah's prime of life.

The second burden, chapters xii to xiv., is also shown by its contents to belong to the post-exilic period. The writer refers to the terror of the people when the earthquake in the days of Uzziah occurred. He refers to it as an event living vividly in the consciousness of the people. It was vivid to them either because of recent occurrence or because it had made a lasting impression on their minds. It certainly had made this lasting impression; it is treated as an epoch by the people of the generation in which it occurred (Amos i. 1), and in the first century of the Christian era it was still remembered as a solemn and striking event (Antiq. ix. 10, 4). There is another historical mark in this second burden, the reference to the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon (Zech. xii 11). The only natural reference here is to the killing of Josiah who opposed Pharaoh-necho at Megiddo, was mortally wounded there and soon died, and his death was mourned by the singing men and singing women, and a lamentation was composed by the prophet Jeremiah. Accordingly the second burden was delivered not earlier than the eve of the exile.

Not only do the historical references in the two burdens point to late times, but the literary characteristics of these burdens proclaim them to have proceeded from the same source as the first eight chapters. This is strenuously denied by certain critics. It is urged that a difference of style is discernible between the burdens and the visions. This is true, but it is a cardinal doctrine of literary criticism that the style of an author differs at various periods of his literary career, and when he essays different forms of literature. Zechariah's style naturally underwent change during a period of thirty or forty years and differed when he depicted visions and symbolical actions from the style in which he set forth solemn warnings. Still, in the parable or the symbolic representation of the good shepherd, there are traces of the same literary hand as that which portrayed the visions and the crowning of the high priest. And the more subtle marks of the same hand are seen in the unique usage of certain words and expressions which characterize the first eight chapters in common with the last six. A few of these are the Qal of yashab in a passive sense (ii 8; ix 5; xii 6), me'ober umishshab (vii. 14; ix. 8), 'ehad for the indefinite article (v. 7; xii 7), 'al-yamin w'al-s'mol (iv 11; xii 6), 'adamah (ii 16; ix. 16; xui 5). The employment of the same word in different senses is also a characteristic both of the section which is acknowledged to be genuine and of the section which is disputed. These reasons afford proof that Zechariah was the author of the entire book, and that his mature life was passed between the years 520 and 479 B. C.

Ze'cher. See ZECHARIAH 1.

Ze'dad.

A place, probably a tower, on the northern boundary line of Palestine (Num. xxxiv. 8; Ezek. xlvii. 15). Sudud or Sadad. In the desert east of the road from Damascus to Hums, is believed by many to be the site.

Zed-e-ki'ah, in A. V. once Ziddikiah (Neh. x. 1) [righteousness of Jehovah].

1 A son of Chenaanah. Having joined with other false prophets in encouraging Ahab to attempt the capture of Ramoth-gilead, and having predicted that Ahab would defeat the Syrians, he was so excited when Micaiah, a prophet of Jehovah, made a contrary prediction, that he struck the man of God upon the cheek, accompanying the blow with words of insult. Micaiah told him that he would have cause to acknowledge his error (1 Kin. xxii. 11-25).

2. A lying and immoral prophet, the son of Maaseiah. Jeremiah predicted that Nebuchadnezzar would roast him in the fire (Jer. xxix. 21-23).

3. A son of Hananiah. He was a prince of Judah in the reign of Jehoiakim (Jer. xxxvi. 12).

4. The name given by Nebuchadnezzar to Mattaniah, one of Josiah's sons, on appointing him vassal-king of Judah in the room of his nephew, Jehoiachin (2 Kin. xxiv. 17; 1 Chron. iii. 15). In 2 Chron. xxxvi. 10 he is called Jehoiachin's brother, i. e., kinsman of the same ancestry; see BROTHER. He was the younger of Josiah's two sons by Hamutal (2 Kin. xxiii. 31 with xxiv. 18). He was twenty-one years old when he ascended the throne, and reigned eleven years, from about 598 to 587 B. C. Neither he nor his people gave heed to the word of the Lord which was spoken by Jeremiah (2 Chron. xxxvi. 12; Jer. xxxvii. 2). The temple was polluted with idolatry (2 Chron. xxxvi. 14), and justice was not executed (Jer. xxi. 11, 12). A strong party in the state, assisted by false prophets, urged the king to throw off the foreign yoke (xxvii. 12-22). At the beginning of Zedekiah's reign (1, R. V. margin) messengers from Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Zidon came to him at Jerusalem to plan a united revolt from the king of Babylon; but Jeremiah was divinely instructed to condemn the purpose (2-11). Zedekiah sent an embassy to Nebuchadnezzar, probably to assure the great king of his fidelity (xxix. 3), and in his fourth year he himself visited Babylon (li. 59). Ultimately he was rash enough to rebel. On the tenth day of the tenth month, in the ninth year of Zedekiah's reign, the Babylonian monarch took post against Jerusalem, and began to erect forts around the city. It was too strong to be taken by assault; and the Babylonians held it in siege. The advance of the Egyptians compelled the Babylonians to withdraw for a time (Jer. xxxvii. 5), but they soon returned. By the ninth day of the fourth month, in the eleventh year of Zedekiah's reign, the food in the beleaguered capital was exhausted. That night Zedekiah, with all the men of war, secretly quitted the stronghold, and, passing as noiselessly as possible between the Babylonian forts, fled in an easterly direction toward the Jordan. On learning that the king was gone, the Babylonian army pursued and overtook him in the plain of Jericho, his soldiers having fled in all directions, leaving him nearly alone. He was brought a prisoner to Nebuchadnezzar, who had retired to Riblah, a little north of Palestine. There, after he had been tried and condemned, his sons were put to death in his presence, and his own eyes put out; after which he was bound in fetters, carried to Babylon (2 Kin. xxiv. 17-20; xxv. 1-7; 2 Chron. xxxvi. 11-21; Jer. xxxix. 1-14), and put in prison till the day of his death (Jer. lii. 11). Jeremiah prophesied during the whole of Zedekiah's reign.

5. A son of Jeconiah (1 Chron. iii. 16); but some expositors assume that son is used here in the sense of successor.

6. A high official who set his seal to the covenant immediately after Nehemiah the governor (Neh. x. 1).

Zeeb [wolf].

A Midianite prince captured and put to death by Gideon. He was slain at a wine press, which was afterwards called that of Zeeb (Judg. vii. 25). Its exact situation is unknown, but it was doubtless west of the Jordan, near the river.

Ze'la, in A. V. Zelah, and so once in R. V. erroneously (Josh. xviii. 28) [rib, side].

A town allotted to Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 28). It contained the sepulcher of Kish; and thither the bones of Saul and Jonathan were carried from Jabesh in Gilead and buried (2 Sam. xxi. 14). Site unidentified.

Ze'lek [a cleft].

An Ammonite, one of David's mighty men (2 Sam. xxiii. 37; 1 Chron. xi. 39).

Ze-lo'phe-had.

A Manassite, family of Machir, subfamily of Gilead, house of Hephher. He had no sons, but five daughters (Num. xxvi. 33). This condition of affairs gave occasion for enacting the law that if a man die and have no son the inheritance pass to his daughter (xxvii. 1-8). The law was soon afterwards developed by the addition of the provision that the daughter must marry within her father's tribe in order that no part of the tribal possession be transferred to another tribe (xxxvi. 1-12). The inheritance of the family was east of the Jordan (Josh. xvii. 1-6).

Ze-lo'tes. See ZEALOT.

Zel'zah [perhaps, shadow in the heat of the sun].

A frontier town of Benjamin, near Rachel's sepulcher (1 Sam. x. 2). Exact situation unknown.

Zem-a-ra'im [two cuttings].

1. A town of Benjamin (Josh. xviii. 22). Es-Sumrah, a large ruined village about 3 miles west of the river Jordan, and 4 north-northeast of Jericho, and less appropriately the ravine es-Sumra, about 5½ miles west of Jericho on the road to Jerusalem, have been suggested.

2. A mountain in the hill country of Ephraim, on which Abijah, king of Judah, stood to address the ten tribes before encountering them in battle (2 Chron. xiii. 4). Perhaps it was south of Bethel (19). Probably it lay not far from the city of Zemaraim.

Zem'a-rite.

A Canaanite tribe (Gen. x. 18; 1 Chron. i.

16). They are enumerated between the Arvadite and Hamathite; and were the inhabitants of Simura, Sumura, now Sumra, on the coast between Arvad and Tripolis.

Ze-mi'rah, in A. V. Zemira [melody, a song].

A Benjamite, family of Becher (1 Chron. vii. 8).

Ze'nan [point or, perhaps, a place of flocks].

A town in or west of the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv. 37). Perhaps the same as Zaanan (Mic. i. 11). Site unknown.

Ze'nas [contraction of Greek Zēnodoros, gift of Zeus].

A lawyer, journeying in Crete with Apolos, whom Titus was enjoined by Paul to set forward on their journey (Titus iii. 13).

Zeph-a-ni'ah [Jehovah has hidden].

1. A Levite of the family of Kohath and house of Izhar (1 Chron. vi. 36-38).

2. A priest, the son of Maaseiah. He was one of those who carried messages between Zedekiah and Jeremiah (Jer. xxi. 1; xxxvii. 3). A certain false prophet who dwelt in Babylon, Shemaiah by name, having sent him letters directing him to punish Jeremiah for his discouraging predictions, he showed the missive to the prophet (xxix. 24-32). He had the oversight of the temple, and was second priest under the chief priest Seraiah. After the capture of Jerusalem by the Babylonians, Zephaniah was put to death at Riblah (2 Kin. xxv. 18-21; Jer. li. 24-27).

3. A man whose son Josiah lived in the days of Zerubbabel and the prophet Zechariah (Zech. vi. 10, 14).

4. A prophet, whose descent is traced through four degrees to Hezekiah (Zeph. i. 1). This ancestor is probably the king, from the fact that so remote a descent is traced and because the time suits. The prophet himself lived and labored in the reign of Josiah (ibid.).

The book of Zephaniah is the ninth among the minor prophets. The date given in its title (i. 1) is confirmed by the omission of Gath in the enumeration of Philistine cities (ii. 4), by Nineveh being still in existence (13), and by the absence of allusion to the Chaldeans. The basis of the prophecy is the great doctrine of God's universal judgment. 1. A universal judgment, like the deluge in destructiveness (1, 2, 3). Idolatry will be overthrown in Jerusalem (4-6), and the sinners of Judah visited with judgment, as though Jehovah conducted a great sacrifice (7-13); and it will be a day of wrath upon men because of their wickedness (14-18). 2. A call to repentance as the only possible means of escape (ii. 1, 2), especially a summons to the humble and God-fearing to seek Jehovah and perhaps obtain deliverance (3); enforced by the certainty that God will punish other nations for their wickedness (4-15), and Jerusalem shall not escape, for it does not repent and the Lord in the midst of her is righteous (iii. 1-8). 2. The blessed result of the judgment. The nations shall turn to the Lord (9, 10), the remnant of Israel shall trust in the Lord and be holy (11-13), and the Lord shall reign gloriously and beneficently as king in the midst of his people (14-18), who shall be gathered from captivity and be a praise in the earth (19, 20).

Perhaps the prophecy was delivered before the religious reformation inaugurated by Josiah in 622 B. C. (2 Kin. xxii. 3; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 8-xxxv. 19). But a later date is possible, during the years of sin just before the advent of Nebuchadnezzar (Jer. xxv. 3; xxvi. 1-6, 12, 13, 20; 2 Kin. xxiii. 32, 37).

Ze'phath [watchtower].

A Canaanite town in the south country toward the border of Edom, assigned to the tribe of Simeon. The Simeonites, assisted by their brethren of Judah, captured the place and changed its name to Hormah (Judg. i. 17); see HORMAH. Robinson suggested that the name is perhaps retained in es-Sufah, the name of a pass leading up from the Arabah to the south of Judah; but the general opinion is in favor of S'baita, discovered by Rowlands and rediscovered by Palmer, 24 miles north by east of Kadesh-barnea, and 2½ south by west of Beer-sheba. The ruins cover an area of 1500 yards. The identification is philologically doubtful.

Zeph'a-thah [watchtower].

A valley near Mareshah, in the tribe of Judah (2 Chron. xiv. 10). Conder proposes the wady Safieh, which, commencing about a mile northeast of Mareshah, near Beit Jibrin, runs for a short distance in that direction.

Ze'phi and Zepho [watch].

A son of Eliphaz, and grandson of Esau. He founded a tribe (Gen. xxxvi. 11, 15; 1 Chron. i. 36). For the difference in spelling see VAU.

Ze'phon [watching, expectation].

A son of Gad, and founder of a tribal family (Num. xxvi. 15). Called in Gen. xli. 16 Ziphion, a synonym having the form usually assumed by similar derivatives.

Zer [flint].

A fortified city of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 35). Site unidentified.

Ze'rah, in A. V. twice Zarah (Gen. xxxviii. 30; xli. 12); once Zara (Mat. i. 3) [springing up of light, dawn].

1. A duke of Edom descended from Esau and also from Ishmael (Gen. xxxvi. 3, 4, 13, 17; 1 Chron. i. 37, and perhaps 44).

2. One of twins borne to Judah by Tamar, and the founder of a tribal family (Num. xxvi. 20; Josh. vii. 1, 17).

3. A son of Simeon, and founder of a tribal family (Num. xxvi. 13). He is called in Gen. xli. 10 and Ex. vi. 15 Zohar, which means dazzling whiteness or brightness.

4. A Levite, of the family of Gershom (1 Chron. vi. 21, 41).

5. An Ethiopian who led a vast army to attack king Asa, but was defeated with great slaughter in a battle at Mareshah (2 Chron. xiv. 8-15). See PHARAOH 4.

Zer-a-hi'ah [the Lord is risen (cp. Is lx. 1, 2)].

1. A priest, son of Uzzi, and a descendant of Phinehas (1 Chron. vi. 6, 51; Ezra vii. 4).
2. One of the children of Pahath-moab (Ezra viii. 4).

Zer'ed, in A. V. once Zared (Num. xxi. 12) [exuberant growth].

A brook and valley, which the Israelites crossed 38 years after being turned back into the wilderness at Kadesh-barnea, and which constituted the farthest limit of the wanderings in the wilderness (Num. xxi. 12; Deut. ii. 13, 14). It was south of the Arnon, not, however, on the southern boundary of Moab, but somewhere along its eastern border (Num. xxi. 11, 13). Hence not the wady el-'Ahsy, which was the boundary between Moab and Edom. It may be either the Sali Sa'ideh, a southeastern branch of the Arnon, or the upper course of the wady Kerek.

Zer'e-dah, in A. V. Zereda, and with the unaccented vowel of the old case-ending Ze-red'a-thah [cooling, coolness].

A village whence came Nebat, an Ephraimite, the father of Jeroboam, and apparently also Jeroboam himself (1 Kin. xi. 26). It was not far from Succoth. In the clay ground between Succoth, east of the Jordan, and Zeredah, west of the river, Solomon cast vessels for the temple (2 Chron. iv. 17). The casting place must have been west of the Jordan as the opposite eastern bank is reported to have scarcely any level ground at all. Zeredah is probably the place elsewhere called Zarethan (1 Kin. vii. 46). Conder doubtfully suggests for its site Surdah, 2½ miles northwest of Bethel; and the Septuagint actually locates it in the hill country of Ephraim (1 Kin. xii. 24). But the Septuagint probably confuses it with Tirzah, and Zeredah was almost certainly in the Jordan valley.

Zer'e-rah, in A. V. Zererath, as in the present Hebrew text.

Apparently the same place as Zeredah and Zarethan, whether the second r should be read d, as in the Arabic and Syriac versions, or whether the two r's are blended in Zarethan (Judg. vii. 22 with 1 Kin. iv. 12).

Zer'esh [probably, gold].

The wife of Haman (Esth. v. 10; vi. 13).

Zer'eth [perhaps, fissure or brightness].

A son of Ashhur, of the tribe of Judah, by his wife Helah (1 Chron. iv. 5-7).

Ze-reth-sha'har, in A. V. Zareth-shahar [brightness of the dawn].

A town of Reuben, on a mountain which overlooks a valley, doubtless that of the Dead Sea (Josh. xiii. 19). Seeetzen suggested Sara, or Zara, near the mouth of the Zerka Ma'in. The names, however, are not identical.

Ze'ri.

A son of Jeduthun (1 Chron. xxv. 3). In ver. 11 he is called Izri, which is doubtless the correct form, the initial jod having been lost in course of transcription.

Ze'ror [a bundle].

A Benjamite, an ancestor of king Saul (1 Sam. ix. 1).

Ze-ru'ah [smitten, leprous].

The mother of Jeroboam I. (1 Kin. xi. 26).

Ze-rub'ba-bel, in A. V. of N. T. Zorobabel [probably, begotten in Babylon].

A son of Pedaiah, and heir to the throne of Judah (1 Chron. iii. 17-19). But he is constantly called the son of Shealtiel, who was the brother of Pedaiah, quite improbably his son (Ezra iii. 2, 8, Neh. xii. 1; Hag. i. 1, 12, 14, ii. 2, 23; Mat. i. 12, 13; Luke iii. 27). Shealtiel doubtless died childless; and either his nephew was his legal heir, and hence called his son (Ex. ii. 10), or else Pedaiah married his widow, in which case the first child would be considered that of the deceased brother (Deut. xxv. 5-10, etc.). When Cyrus, after the conquest of Babylon, adopted the wise political policy of allowing the Jews to return to their own land, he appointed Zerubbabel, as the legal successor to the throne, Persian governor of Judah (Ezra i. 8; Hag. i. 21). In the royal decree he is called by his Babylonian name Sheshbazzar (Ezra i. 8, cp. 11; v. 14-16). Supported by the high priest Jeshua, and other dignitaries, Zerubbabel led the returning captives from Babylon to their own country in 538 B. C. (Ezra ii; Neh. vii; xii. 1-9). They reared an altar, restored the feasts, and set the Levites again to their appropriate work (Ezra iii. 1-9). They next laid the foundations of the temple, but adversaries, after failing to make Zerubbabel stop proceedings, acted on successive Persian kings, so that building operations ceased till the second year of Darius Hystaspis (iv. 1-24). In this year the prophet Haggai, speaking in the name of the Lord, strongly counseled the resumption of the work (Hag. i. 2-11). Zerubbabel and his advocates gave heed to the exhortation and recommenced the erection of the holy house, the prophets Haggai and Zechariah giving them great spiritual encouragement in the enterprise (Ezra v. 1, 2; Hag. i. 12-ii. 23; Zech. iv. 1-14; cp. also iii.). The building was completed 515 B. C. From the office Zerubbabel held when the second temple was built, and the personal interest he took in its erection, it is often called Zerubbabel's temple. His governorship continued at least till 515 B. C. How much longer it lasted is unknown. Zerubbabel was in his day the representative of the Davidic monarchy (Hag. ii. 20-23). He was also in the direct line of ancestry of our Lord (Mat. i. 12, 13; Luke iii. 27).

Ze-ru'iah [cleft, divided].

A sister of David (1 Chron. ii. 16), but probably, like her sister Abigail, not a daughter of Jesse, but a daughter of David's mother by an earlier marriage with Nahash (2 Sam. xvii. 25). She was the mother of Abishai, Joab, and Asahel (u. 18; 1 Chron. ii. 16).

Ze'tham.

A Gershonite Levite, house of Laadan and son of Jehiel (1 Chron. xxiii. 8 and xxvi. 22).

Ze'than [olive tree or place of olives]

A Benjamite, family of Jediahel (1 Chron. vii. 10).

Ze'thar.

A chamberlain at the court of Ahasuerus (Esth. i. 10).

Zi'a [motion, terror].

A Gadite, probably head of a father's house (1 Chron. v. 13).

Zi'ba.

A servant or slave of king Saul's. He had been set free (Antiq. vii. 5, 5), perhaps at the time of Saul's overthrow by the Philistines, and he was father of a large family and had acquired slaves (2 Sam. ix. 10). David made him and his sons and slaves servants to Mephibosheth, Saul's son, and ordered them to till Mephibosheth's lands (9-12). When David was compelled to flee from Jerusalem because of Absalom's rebellion, Ziba appeared with a couple of asses laden with provisions for the king, and stated that Mephibosheth was expecting that Israel would restore Saul's kingdom to him. Thereupon David transferred Mephibosheth's estates to Ziba (xvi. 1-4). After the death of Absalom, when the king was returning to Jerusalem, among those who went to the Jordan to welcome him back was Ziba with his sons and slaves (xix. 17). Mephibosheth also went to meet the king. He had neglected his person, as a sign of sorrow, during the king's absence, and now he declared that he had ordered his ass to be saddled in order to accompany David on his flight; but Ziba had disobeyed his orders and had also slandered him to the king, and he asked David to do what seemed right. David replied somewhat crustily, and ordered half of the estates to be restored to Mephibosheth, and the rest left in the possession of Ziba (24-30).

Zib'e-on [dyed or, perhaps, seizing prey].

A Hivite (Gen. xxxvi. 2; if the text should not be amended to Horite), who perhaps migrated with his family to mount Seir and became a Horite tribe (20, 24), organized under a chief (29). He was ancestor of a wife of Esau (2, 25).

Zib'1-a [a female gazelle].

A Benjamite, son of Shaharaim and head of a father's house (1 Chron. viii. 9).

Zib'1-ah [a female gazelle].

A woman of Beer-sheba, wife of Ahaziah, and mother of Jehoash, king of Judah (2 Kin. xii. 1).

Zich'ri [mindful, famous].

1. A Levite, family of Kohath, house of Izhar (Ex. vi. 21). Zithri in this verse in many editions of the A. V. is a modern misprint.

2. A Benjamite, son of Shimei (1 Chron. viii. 19).

3. A Benjamite, son of Shashak (1 Chron. viii. 23).

4. A Benjamite, son of Jeroham (1 Chron. viii. 27).

5. A Levite, son of Asaph (1 Chron. ix. 15). In all probability he is the person called Zaccur, a synonymous name, in xxv. 2, 10; Neh. xii. 35; and also the person called Zabdi in xi. 17, in the latter instance the letters k, anglicized ch, and r having been misread as b and d; see BETH, DALETH.

6. A Levite, descended from Moses' son, Eleazer (1 Chron. xxvi. 25).

7. A Reubenite (1 Chron. xxvii. 16).

8. A man of Judah, and father of Amasiah, a captain in the army of Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii. 16), and quite possibly of Elishaphat who aided Jehoiaada in overthrowing Athaliah (2 Chron. xxiii. 1).

9. A valiant Ephraimite in Pekah's army, who slew Maaseiah, a royal prince, and two of Ahaz' chief officers (2 Chron. xxviii. 7).

10. A Benjamite (Neh. xi. 9).

11. A priest, head of the father's house of Abijah. He lived in the days of the high priest Joiakim (Neh. xii. 17).

Zid'dim [sides].

A fenced city of Naphtali (Josh. xix. 35). The Talmud calls the place Kefar Chittai, which has led to locating it at Hattin, about 5½ miles west by north of Tiberias, and less than a mile north of the celebrated Horns of Hattin.

Zid-ki'jah. See ZEDEKIAH.Zi'don. See SIDON.Zif. See ZIV.Zi'ha [sunniness, drought].

Founder or possibly only the head of a family of Nethinim, members of which returned from the captivity (Ezra ii. 43; Neh. vii. 46). If he was identical with Ziba, an overseer of the Nethinim, who is named in Neh. xi. 21, the family was of recent origin among the Nethinim, and small, or else it was an older family named from its present chief.

Zik'lag.

A city in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 31), assigned to the Simeonites (xix. 5; 1 Chron. iv. 30). In the time of Saul it was in the hands of the Philistines, and at one time David held it as the vassal of their king, Achish (1 Sam. xxvii. 6; 1 Chron. xii. 1-22). It was captured, plundered, and burnt by the Amalekites, but David pursued them, recovered the spoil, and sent portions of it to many other towns (1 Sam. xxx. 1-31; 2 Sam. i. 1; iv. 10). The connection of David with Ziklag detached it permanently from the Philistines, and placed it under the kings of Judah (1 Sam. xxvii. 6). It was inhabited after the captivity (Neh. xi. 28). Not identified; unless its site is Zuhelikah, a ruin discovered by Conder 11 miles east-southeast of Gaza. Identification with 'Asluj, 32 miles south of Gaza, has nothing in its favor.

Zil'lah [a shadow].

One of Lamech's wives, and the mother of Tubal-cain (Gen. iv. 19, 22, 23).

Zil'le-thai, in A. V. Zilthai.

1. A Benjamite, son of Shimei (1 Chron. viii. 20).

2. A Manassite, captain of a thousand men, who joined David at Ziklag (1 Chron. xii. 20).

Zil'pah [dropping, a drop].

A maidservant, given by Laban to Leah on her marriage with Jacob (Gen. xxix. 24). At Leah's request, she became his secondary wife, and bore to him Gad and Asher (xxx. 9-13).

Zil'thai. See ZILLETHAI.

Zim'mah [counsel, device].

A Gershonite Levite, son of Shimei, and grandson of Jahath (1 Chron. vi. 20, 42, 43; and perhaps 2 Chron. xxix. 12).

Zim'ran [probably connected with the name for antelope].

A son or rather tribe descended from Abraham and Keturah (Gen. xxv. 2; 1 Chron. i. 32). An echo of the name has been surmised either in Zabram, a town west of Mecca, on the Red Sea (Ptol vi. 7, 5), or in Zamareni, an Arabian tribe (Pliny, Hist. Nat. vi. 32, 5).

Zim'ri [pertaining to an antelope]

1. Son of Zerah, and grandson of Judah (1 Chron. ii. 6); called in Josh. vii. 1, 17, 18 Zabdi (q. v.).

2. A prince of the tribe of Simeon. He was slain at Shittim for participating with the Midianites in licentious idolatry (Num. xxv. 14; 1 Mac. ii. 26, in A. V. Zambri).

3. A Benjamite, a descendant of Jonathan, Saul's son (1 Chron. viii. 36; ix. 42).

4. A military officer who commanded half the chariots of Elah, king of Israel, whom he assassinated, fulfilling the denunciation against Baasha's house by extirpating it. Then he set up for himself as king in Tirzah. Israel at once proclaimed Omri, the commander-in-chief, king. He marched against the usurper, and captured his capital, Tirzah. When Zimri saw that the city was taken he set the palace on fire and perished in the flames. His reign, which lasted only a week, fell within the year 885 B. C. (1 Kin. xvi. 8-20). It has been suggested that he may have been Saul's descendant (1 Chron. viii. 36), seeking to regain the throne.

5. A people (Jer. xxv. 25), not otherwise known. They may have been descended from Zimran, but there is no certainty in the case.

Zin [dwarf palm].

A wilderness traversed by the Israelites on their way to Canaan. It was close to the southern boundary of that land (Num. xiii. 21). Kadesh-barnea was within its limits (xx. 1; xxvii. 14; xxxiii. 36; Deut. xxxii. 51). It constituted the limit of Edom on the west and of Judah on the southeast (Josh. xv. 1-3). It was either a part of the wilderness of Paran or marched on that wilderness at Kadesh. It is not the same place as the wilderness of Sin, the Hebrew words for the two being quite different.

Zi'na. See ZIZAH.

Zi'on; in Maccabees Sion, and so in A. V. of N. T. always, and in O. T. once (Ps. lxxv. 1) [a dry, sunny place or a mound or even a defense].

1. One of the hills on which Jerusalem stood. It is first mentioned in the O. T. as the seat of a Jebusite fortress. David captured this stronghold and changed its name to the city of David (2 Sam. v. 7; 1 Chron. xi. 5). Hither he brought the ark, and the hill from that time forth became sacred (2 Sam. vi. 10-12). The ark was afterwards removed by Solomon to the temple which he erected on mount Moriah (1 Kin. viii. 1; 2 Chron. iii. 1; v. 2). From the last two of these passages it is plain that Zion and Moriah were distinct eminences. For the question which hill was known as Zion see Jerusalem, paragraph on topography.

2. After the building of the temple on mount Moriah and the transfer of the ark to it, the name Zion was extended to comprehend the temple (Is. viii. 18; xviii. 7; xxiv. 23; Joel iii. 17; Mic. iv. 7). This accounts for the fact that while Zion is mentioned between one hundred and two hundred times in the O. T., mount Moriah is named only once (2 Chron. iii. 1), or at most twice (Gen. xxii. 2).

3. Zion is often used for the whole of Jerusalem (2 Kin. xix. 21; Ps. xlviii. 1; lxi. 35; cxxxiii. 3; Is. i. 8; iii. 16; iv. 3; x. 24; li. 1; lx. 14).

4. In the Maccabæan period the hill on which the temple stood, as distinct from the city of David (1 Mac. vii. 32, 33).

5. The Jewish church and polity (Ps. cxxvi. 1; cxxix. 5; Is. xxxiii. 14; xxxiv. 8; xlix. 4; lii. 8).

6. Heaven (Heb. xii. 22; cp. Rev. xiv. 1).

Zi'or [smallness].

A town in the hill country of Judah, near Hebron (Josh. xv. 54). Robinson suggested Sia'ir, 4½ miles north-northeast of Hebron.

Ziph.

1. A town in the extreme south of Judah (Josh. xv. 24). Site unknown.

2. A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh. xv. 55), near a wilderness and a forest

(1 Sam. xxiii 14, 15). It was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 8). The ruins, called Zif, are on a low ridge between two small valleys, 4 miles south by east of Hebron. To the east is a wilderness, very hilly, with narrow valleys of rich loam. A woods existed at the time of the Crusaders, but only a few straggling trees remain.

3. A man of Judah, house of Jehallelel (1 Chron. iv. 16).

Zi'phah.

A man of Judah, house of Jahallelel (1 Chron. iv. 16).

Ziph'ims. See ZIPHITE.

Ziph'i-on. See ZEPHON.

Ziph'ites, in A. V. once Ziphims (Ps. liv. title).

Natives or inhabitants of Ziph 2 (1 Sam. xxiii. 19; xxvi. 1; Ps. liv. title).

Ziph'ron [fragrance]

A place on the northern boundary line of the promised land (Num. xxxiv 9). Not identified.

Zip'por [a small bird, a sparrow].

Father of Balak, king of Moab (Num. xxii. 4, 10).

Zip'po-rah [a small bird, a sparrow].

A daughter of Jethro, priest of Midian. She became the wife of Moses (Exod. ii. 21, 22). She evidently opposed the circumcision of their second son; but when the family was journeying to Egypt and her husband's life was in danger on account of that breach of the covenant, she acquiesced (Ex. iv. 18-26); see MOSES. She may have returned with her sons to her father at this time; but quite probably they accompanied Moses to Egypt, and after the exodus, when the host of Israel was slowly approaching mount Sinai, were sent forward to visit Jethro and inform him of all that God had done for Moses and for the Israelites, how that the Lord had brought Israel out of Egypt (Ex. xviii 1). Jethro returned with them to the camp at Rephidim (2-6).

Zith'ri. See SITHRI and ZICHRI 1.

Ziv, in A. V. Zif [splendor (of flowers in bloom)].

The second month of the Jewish year (1 Kin. vi. 1, 37), approximately May. Later it was commonly called Iyar. See YEAR.

Ziz [brightness, burnished plate, flower].

A cliff or ascent by which the Moabites and Ammonites ascended from En-gedi toward the wilderness of Jeruel and Tekoa (2 Chron. xx. 16; cp. 2, 20). Robinson believes it to be the pass up from En-gedi; Tristram and Conder the table-land west of En-gedi, to which the pass leads up, and by which it is commanded.

Zi'za [plenty, fertility].

1. A Simeonite, descended from Shemaiah (1 Chron. iv. 37).

2. A son of Rehoboam, by his queen Maacah (2 Chron. xi. 20).

Zi'zah [plenty, fertility].

A Levite, family of Gershon, house of Shimei (1 Chron. xxii. 11). In ver. 10 the name is mistranscribed Zina.

Zo'an [Egyptian T'a, early changed to T'an].

An Egyptian city of the eastern part of the delta, on the Tanitic branch of the Nile, near the 31st degree of north latitude. It was built seven years later than Hebron, which was in existence in Abraham's lifetime (Num. xii. 22). Zoan existed at least as early as Ramer Pepi of the sixth dynasty, whose pyramid remains. The earliest kings of the twelfth dynasty made it their capital in order to check invasions from the east. The shepherd kings fortified it and retained it as the capital. After their expulsion the city was neglected for several centuries; but it was again raised to importance by Ramses II. and other kings of the nineteenth dynasty, who erected buildings and frequently held court there. The new town which thus grew up adjacent to the ancient fortress was called Pa-Ramses, that is the city of Ramses. Zoan was the place of meeting between Moses and Pharaoh (Ps. lxxviii. 12, 43). It was still an important city in the time of Isaiah and also of Ezekiel (Is. xix. 11, 13; cp. xxx 4, Ezek. xxx. 14). Between the days of Isaiah and Ezekiel, it was captured by the Assyrians. The city was known to the Greeks as Tanis. It has lingered on to modern times, and is now called San. The site has been explored under the auspices of the Egyptian Exploration Fund. The remains consist of a temple surrounded by a great ring of mounds. A colossal statue of Ramses II. was exhumed.

Zo'ar [littleness, smallness (Gen. xix. 20, 22)].

One of the cities of the plain, and apparently the smallest of the five (Gen. xix. 20, 22). The plain was visible from mount Nebo as far as Zoar (Deut. xxxiv. 3). Its original name was Bela, and it had a king, one of those defeated by Chedorlaomer (Gen. xiii. 10; xiv. 2, 8). When threatened judgment was about to descend on the guilty cities, Lot successfully interceded for Zoar, and fled thither from the catastrophe (xix. 20-23). A mountain (or at least high land) rose immediately behind it, with a cavern, in which Lot and his two daughters dwelt for a time (30). Zoar still existed in the days of Isaiah and in those of Jeremiah, and, from their mentioning it in connection with Moab, it may be presumed that it was on the Moabite or eastern side of the Dead Sea (Is. xv. 5; Jer. xlviii. 34; cp. also Gen. xix. 37). In the Maccabæan period it belonged to an Arabian kingdom of which Petra was the capital (Antiq. xiii. 15, 4; xiv. 1, 4). It stood at the southern end of the Dead Sea (War iv.

8, 4). In the Middle Ages it was an important point on the road from Elath to Jerusalem, three days' journey from the latter city via Hebron. These data indicate that the site was not on a spur of mount Nebo (Tristram) nor even on the Lisan, the peninsula which projects into the southern waters of the Dead Sea (Robinson). They are satisfied by assuming that Zoar was situated near where the wady el-'Ahsy opens through the Moabite mountains into the plain, about 2 miles from the southern end of the sea (Wetzstein).

Zo'bah, in A. V. and Hebrew text twice Zoba (2 Sam. x. 6, 8); see ARAM 2 (3).

Zo-be'bah [gentle movement].

Son of Hakkos, a man of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 8).

Zo'har [brightness, whiteness]

1. Father of Ephron the Hittite (Gen. xxiii. 8).

2. Son of Simeon (Gen. xlvii. 10). Called also Zerah (Num. xxvi. 13); see ZERAH.

3. A man of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 7, R. V. margin); see IZHAR.

Zo'he-leth [a serpent or other creeper].

A stone beside En-rogel (1 Kin. i. 9). Not identified. Clermont-Ganneau pointed out that the ledge of rocks, on which the village of Silwan stands, is called by the Arabs Zehwele or Zahweileh, which is like an altered form of Zoheleth. But the Arabic and Hebrew words have no real affinity, it is questionable whether the term stone would have been applied to a cliff, and the distance of the ledge from En-rogel seems too great.

Zo'heth.

A son of Ishi, registered with the tribe of Judah (1 Chron. iv. 20).

Zo'phah [expanse, a flask].

An Asherite, son of Helem (1 Chron. vii. 35, 36).

Zo'phai. See ZUPH.

Zo'phar [chirper].

A Naamathite, one of Job's friends (Job ii. 11; xi. 1; xx. 1; xlii. 9).

Zo'phim [watchers].

A field on the top of Pisgah, from which Balaam could see a part of the encampment of the Israelites at Shittim (Num. xxiii. 14). Conder places it at Tal'at es-Safa, in the valley separating the southeastern point of Pisgah from Luhith.

Zo'rah, in A. V. once Zoreah (Josh. xv. 33), once Zareah (Neh. xi. 29) [perhaps, stroke or scourge].

A town in the lowland of Judah (Josh. xv. 33), inhabited by the Danites (xix. 41).

Manoah, Samson's father, belonged to the place (Judg. xiii. 2), and Samson was buried near the town (xvi. 31). Some of the five Danite spies and of the warriors who subsequently took Laish were from Zorah (xviii. 2, 8, 11). The town was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Chron. xi. 10). It was inhabited after the captivity (Neh. xi. 29). Its site is doubtless Sur'ah, on the north side of the valley of Sorek, 2 miles west-southwest of Eshtaol.

Zo'rath-ite, in A. V. once Zareathite (1 Chron. ii. 53).

A native or inhabitant of Zorah (1 Chron. ii. 53; iv. 2).

Zo're-ah. See ZORAH.

Zo'rite.

Either the same as Zorathite, or a citizen of some unknown place (1 Chron. ii. 54).

Zo-rob'a-bel. See ZERUBBABEL.

Zu'ar [smallness].

Father of that Nathaneel who was prince of the tribe of Issachar in the wilderness (Num. i. 8; ii. 5; vii. 18, 23; x. 15).

Zuph [honeycomb]

1. A Levite, descended from Kohath, and an ancestor of the prophet Samuel (1 Chron. vi. 35). A variant form, of similar meaning, is Zophai (26).

2. A district beyond the borders of Benjamin and apparently lying to the south of the territory of that tribe (1 Sam. ix. 4-6; x. 2). It may have received its name from the settlement of the family of Zuph there. See further in connection with RAMAH 2.

Zur [a rock].

1. A king of Midian, ally or vassal of Sihon, and the father of the woman Cozbi (Num. xxv. 15). He was killed in the war of extermination waged by Moses against the Midianites for their seduction of the Israelites to licentious idolatry (Num. xxv. 15, 18; xxxi. 8; Josh. xiii. 21).

2. A Benjamite, son of Jeiel (1 Chron. viii. 30).

Zu'ri-el [God is a rock].

A Levite, chief of the Merarites in the wilderness (Num. iii. 35, R. V.).

Zu-ri-shad'dai [the Almighty is a rock].

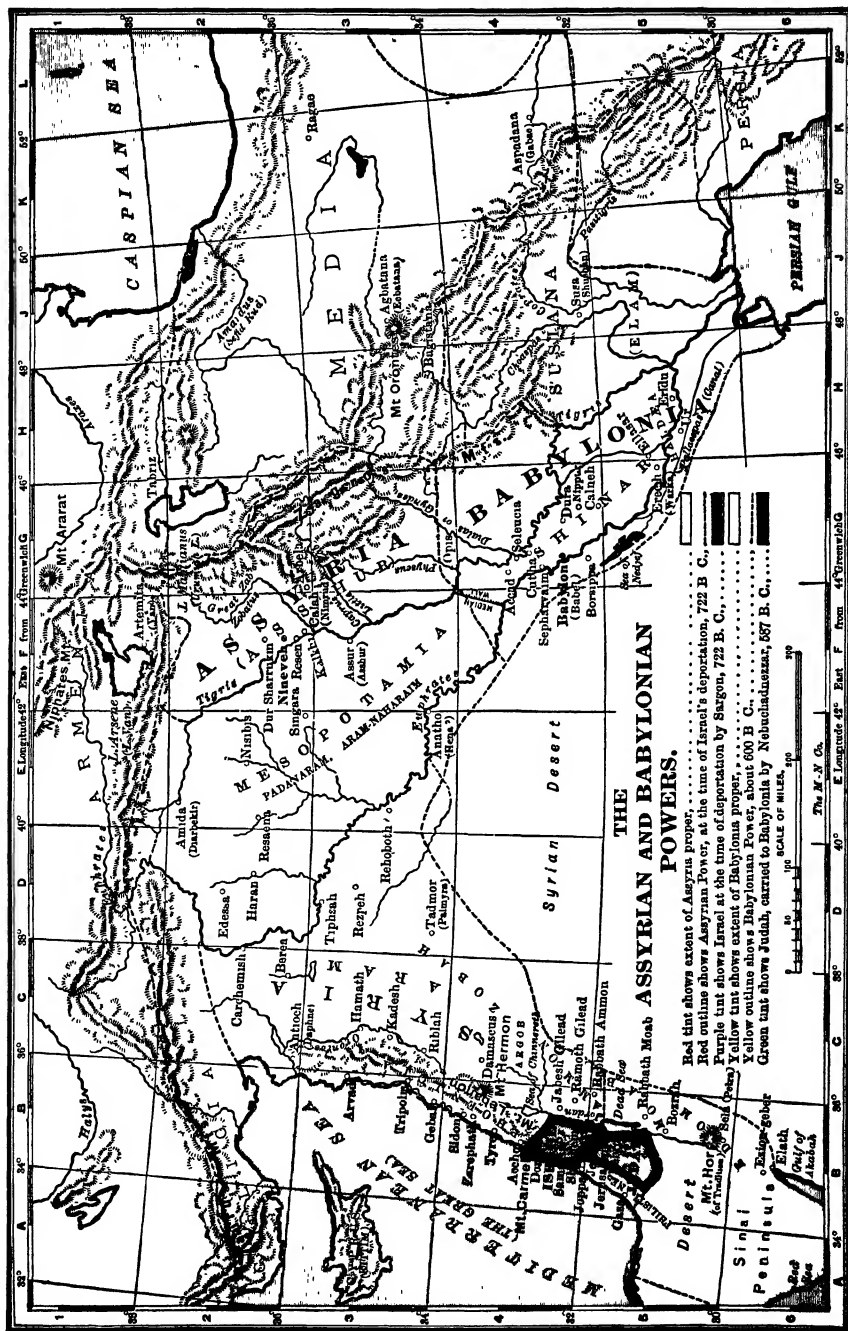

Father of the prince of the Simeonites in the wilderness (Num. i. 6; ii. 12; vii. 36, 41; x. 19).

Zu'zim, in A. V. Zuzims.

A tribe occupying a district called Ham, east of the Jordan, conquered by Chedorlamer (Gen. xiv. 5). Apparently the same as Zamzummim.
